THE QUIVER.

THE CAPTURE OF THE SLAVER.

BY THE REV. D. GATH WHITLEY.

A GROUP OF RESCUED SLAVES.

(From a Photograph taken on H.M.S. "London," latterly used as a depot and hospital in Zanzibar Harbour.)

It is night on the lowlands which stretch along the sea-shore of Eastern Africa.

All through the day the sun has glared down upon jungle, and swamp, and palm-grove. The sluggish streams and stagnant pools have shimmered all day long in the glowing heat, and the foul black ooze has sent up its pestilential miasma, thickly laden with the poison of fever and dysentery. The land has dozed all through the long hours of the day beneath the sweltering sunshine, as if it were oppressed and borne down by the heat; and now that darkness has descended it seems to breathe more freely, and to recover its strength beneath a gentle breeze which comes from the distant sea.

The air is still; and so faint is the breath from the ocean that it hardly stirs the tops of the palm-trees, and does not move a leaf of the bushes or bend a blade of the rank high grass. The sky is dark overhead, for the brief period of twilight has long passed away, and there is no moon. Great black clouds cover up the sky, but in some places long open streaks of clear sky occur between them, in which here and there a star faintly twinkles. All else, however, is gloom and darkness, and in the general obscurity the palm-trees stand out like gaunt spectres against the black sky. Although all around is so still, there are heard now and then the usual sounds of the African night: the shout of the solitary native watcher to scare the hippopotamus from the fields by the river's bank, the splash of some heavy fish plunging in the stream, the qua-qua of the night heron, the dull roar of the bull-crocodile in the reedy pool, and the distant murmur of the surf on the flat sandy coast: all these sounds fall on the ear with dreary monotony. This is the land of pestilence: the land of the mangrove and the mosquito; the land in which the white man feels that the dank unwholesome vegetation breathes a creeping horror o'er the frame, and over which, by day and night, Death spreads his wings.

But hark! what sounds are these? Tramp, tramp, tramp!—clink, clank! The grass rustles beneath the tread of human feet, and gives warning of the approach of marching men. No voice is heard, no single word proclaims the presence of human beings, and only the regular and heavy tread indicates the advance of a considerable body of men. The sound draws nearer. The high grass opens in front, and in the darkness a long string of men in single file is seen approaching, accompanied by others who walk beside them. It is a gang of slaves.

The melancholy procession passes by. Of the slaves, every two of the men are secured by heavy logs of wood with forks at their ends, through which the men's necks are placed, whilst their hands are also tied. The women—of whom there are many in the gang—are not confined in the slave-sticks, but are fastened to the men either by chains or cords, and they carry heavy burdens on their heads. The children walk by the side of the men and women, wearied and ready to drop, but nevertheless driven pitilessly on by the merciless slave-drivers. The traders march by the side of the slaves. They are Arabs or half-caste Swahilis of the coast, and are all well armed with rifles, knives, and hatchets. The gang marches by in perfect silence, for the slave-traders have good reason for quiet and secrecy in their movements. They know that the white men are opposed to slavery, and that the arrival of a slave-gang may be reported to Europeans on the coast. And so the slave caravan avoids the villages, and marches by night along by-paths and unfrequented tracks, in order that suspicion may not be aroused.

As the long and seemingly endless chain of fettered slaves passes by in perfect silence, let us ask: Where did these slaves come from? through what experiences have they passed? and what will be their future fate?

These slaves all come from the lands west of the great Lake Nyassa, and have walked a weary march of many hundreds of miles. Many months ago they lived in the great Valley of the Loangwa, which falls into the Zambesi. Here they had their home in the villages which lie thickly scattered about under the shade of the great mopane-trees, and amidst fields of maize and millet.

But African life is a constant scene of wars and terrors, of which the Loangwa Valley has its share. The savage Angoni, a warlike tribe of Zulu origin, descended from their home on the high tableland between Lake Nyassa and the Loangwa, and spread fire and death among the timid natives of the lowlands. Night after night the glades and dells debouching into the Loangwa Valley were scenes of massacre, and the night sky was illuminated by the red glare of the burning villages. Groups of spearmen stood at the door of each hut that had been fired, and as the terrified occupants rushed out, the older men and women were ruthlessly slaughtered; the younger and more athletic, and the boys and girls, were collected by the blood-stained murderers, and driven off in droves to the homes of the merciless Angoni, there to await the arrival of the slave-dealers from the coast. By-and-by these men, Arabs from Kilwa and Mozambique, arrived in the country, and set about purchasing slaves and buying ivory. Not content with those slaves already provided for them by the Angoni, they began slave-raiding on their own account, and the country for miles in every direction echoed with the reports of their rifles as they shot down the wretched Africans in hundreds.

Again the trembling captives were collected, and at last a great gang of slaves was formed, which the Arabs proceeded to drive towards the eastern coast, nearly six hundred miles distant. Soon the deep blue waters of Lake Nyassa came in sight, lying far beneath them, and looking like the sea itself, with its distant mountains stretching like a faint dark line along the eastern horizon. Down the long slopes to the lake marched the slave caravan, already much thinned in numbers; for by this time death had been busy in its ranks. Arrived at the western shores of the lake, the slave-traders found everything in readiness for them. Several large slave-vessels—or dhows—were filled with their human freight, and they started for the eastern shore. The wind was favourable, and the long swell of the waves of the lake seemed rather to favour than to retard their progress. The clear blue sky overhead, the scream of the sea-birds sweeping with rapid wing above the heaving waters, the foam-tipped waves glittering in the hot sunshine, and the fresh breeze blowing over the vast expanse of waters, would all have been delightful to those who could have appreciated them. But the Arab traders had no thought for these things, and the slaves packed in dozens in the bottoms of the dhows could neither hear nor see what was around them.

About the middle of the lake—in the slave traders' passage—the Arabs in the dhows, as they looked towards the north, saw a long dark streak low down on the water horizon, which filled them with apprehension. It was the trail of smoke from a steamer on the lake, and came either from the Charles Janson, belonging to the Universities Mission to Central Africa, or from the Domira, the property of the African Lakes Company. But the steamer had already been seen by the Arab watchers on the hills, and signal-guns were fired by the slave-traders on the shore, to warn their brethren on the water that a white man's vessel was approaching. But the steamer was too far off, and the slave dhows sailed on safely.

At last the lake was crossed, and the slave-vessels ran into a curving bay on its eastern side, above which extended for a mile the thatched huts and plaster houses of the African slave-trading chief Mankanjira.

This is a great centre of resort for scores of Arab slave dealers and traders, and much barter and discussion now took place. The slaves had died in great numbers, but many were still left; and after remaining at the town for a short time, the caravan divided, one stream going northwards, and the other, pursuing a more easterly direction, is that which has just passed before us.

The long tramp from Lake Nyassa to the coast was dreary and terrible. Slave after slave died, and occasionally whole groups of wretched Africans were left to die in the forests or by the side of the path. Famine, fever, and small-pox claimed victim after victim, and those who fainted by the way were ruthlessly butchered by the savage Arabs. The hyenas followed the gang in packs, making the still night air ring with their horrid laughter, and feasted on the corpses; while vultures congregated round the camping-places, and disputed with the hyenas for a banquet on the bodies of the dead. So passed day after day, until at last the caravan, with its numbers sadly diminished, reached the coast, and we have seen what remains of it pass before our eyes.

Let us follow its progress in imagination, and see what its end will be.

An hour's march through the darkness brings the caravan to the sea-shore. There is no port, and only a few huts and sheds, buried beneath the palm-trees, stand close to the shallow strand, on which the waves are lazily rising and falling in the calm night. Through the darkness, a huge slave-vessel (or dhow), bound for Muscat, in Arabia, can be seen lying near the houses, and prepared to receive its cargo of living beings. Not a word is spoken. Silently and rapidly the wearied slaves are driven on board, and covered over in the bottom of the vessel, of which a strong crew of Arabs—all well armed—is in charge. All is ready, and the dhow, with its living freight, leaves the land in ghostly stillness.

"Like some ill-fated bark that steers
In silence through the Gate of Tears."

The faint breeze plays feebly on the great triangular sail of the slaver, and slowly she gains the open sea, while the stars glimmer down here and there between the rifts in the black clouds. The vessel, however, makes but slow progress, and when the day breaks she is still within sight of the land, although the flat coast in the distance looks only like a dark line on the western horizon.

With the daylight, however, a thick fog comes on, and the wind dies away. It becomes dead calm, and no progress can be made. The waves lap idly against the sides of the dhow, and Arabs and slaves fall asleep in the weltering glare of the glowing sunshine. Hours pass, noon draws on, and still no wind, and still they sleep: and even the watchers in the vessel are dozing in the heat and the calm.

Suddenly through the still hot air of the noon there comes a sound which startles all on board—boom!

Up spring the Arabs composing the slaver's crew, and looking over the waters, they discern in the distance a large vessel, from which issues a long trail of smoke: it is a British man-of-war.

What is to be done? The wind has changed, and a breeze is springing up, and the Arabs in the dhow, after a hurried consultation, decide to try to run back again to the place on the coast from which they started the night before. Round goes the head of the dhow; she catches the breeze, and now she is speeding towards the distant shore.

But this change of course will be dangerous.

Boom! Another gun is fired from the cruiser, the shot of which strikes the water just in front of the bows of the slaver, and sends up a column of spray into the air. More than this: the man-of-war has powerful engines, and the intentions of the Arabs are very plain to all on board her, so she steams in full strength towards the place for which the dhow is running. In a few minutes it is plain that the slaver cannot escape from the cruiser in this manner, and another method must be adopted.

Now, therefore, the Arabs in the dhow fancy that they can creep along the shore, where the cruiser cannot come, from lack of deep water. The Arabs therefore keep their vessel nearer in towards the shore, and manage fairly well for a brief time. But soon they observe, to their terror, a long reef of rocks right in their way, and which stretches out into deep water; and to go outside this obstacle is to lose time, and to fall into the hands of the pursuer.

Once more the Arabs must change their plans; and after a brief debate, they decide upon a last desperate course. They resolve to run their vessel right upon the shore, and allow her to be wrecked. The slaves may be drowned or may escape as they can, and the Arabs will get to shore as best they may. The shifting wind favours the plan, and now the slaver runs straight for the long white line of breakers which marks the low shore.

But all these changes, of course, have made the dhow lose much way, and the pursuer has gained considerably on the slaver.

The water is fast shallowing, but a large boat filled with armed blue-jackets, rowed by the powerful arms of British sailors, and provided with a large sail, is speeding after the fugitives. The chase becomes exciting, for the breakers are now only a short distance ahead. The shore is covered with dense forests of palm-trees, and crowds of white-robed Arabs come running down to the beach with guns in their hands, ready to fire at the British sailors, and to prevent the slaves from escaping if they are fortunate enough to get to land after the dhow has been capsized in the breakers.

The breeze freshens; the great sail of the dhow fills with the wind, and she sweeps swiftly on for the beach; surely she will escape, after all!

Suddenly—flash, boom! another gun from the man-of-war; and then, crack! crash!! The shot has struck the mast of the slaver, and has cut it in two, and down come tumbling sail, rigging, and broken spars in one wild mass of confusion. It is useless for the Arabs to curse the infidels or to pray to all the saints of the Koran—the course of the slaver is ended. Her crew try to cut away the wreckage, so that she may drift into the breakers; but it is too late, for the man-of-war's boat is within hail. Resistance and flight are both alike hopeless, and so the Arabs sulkily surrender.

The British boat comes alongside the dhow, and an English officer steps on the deck of the slaver. He asks the Arabs who they are, and where they are sailing: to which they reply that they are simple traders, and are bound for the island of Pemba, near Zanzibar. The English officer is, however, not satisfied with this answer. He calls several blue-jackets from the boat, and they search beneath the ropes and sails. There they discover, at the bottom of the dhow, the trembling slaves, packed together in masses, and half-dead with fear, exhaustion, and starvation. Quickly enough their fetters are struck off, whilst their Arab masters are firmly secured. The slaves and their now fettered tyrants are transferred to the cruiser, and while the dhow is left to her fate, the man-of-war takes her course for Zanzibar.

At length the white buildings of Zanzibar come in sight, and the cruiser anchors close to the busy town which is the centre of trade and of English influence on the eastern coast of Africa. What is now to be done with the slaves on board the cruiser? The Universities Mission to Central Africa has its headquarters at Zanzibar, and its active agencies are unceasingly at work to rescue and reclaim all liberated slaves. There is a Home for orphan boys, with plenty of decent houses attached to it, and connected with the Mission near Christ Church Cathedral in Zanzibar; then a Theological College at Kiungani, a short distance out in the country, carries on an active work in training liberated and native Africans for the work of the Christian ministry. At Mbweni, a few miles from Zanzibar, the Mission has a school for native girls, and the trees and shrubs grow around it in such profusion that Mbweni is one of the most beautiful of places that can be imagined. Here also is a large estate, with cottages for the rescued slaves. At this place the younger girls find a home, whilst the elder men and women are lodged in the cottages of the Mission. The children are sent to the Mission schools at Mkunazini and Mbweni, where they are trained under Christian teachers, and many of them ultimately become evangelists of the Dark Continent.

Such is a picture of events now happening in Africa. Notwithstanding our boasted civilisation, the slave-trade still flourishes in that unhappy land; and as old routes are closed by the advance of the white man, new tracks are opened up by the Arab slave-traders, along which incessantly their unfortunate victims are driven to slavery and death. It is a melancholy fact that for one slave-vessel captured by our ships of war, at least ten escape; and it must also be remembered that the inland slave traffic can never be affected by a naval blockade of the east coast. English people must be thoroughly aroused to the horrors of this African slave traffic; and it may well be said that at the present day rivers of blood are flowing from the heart of Africa.

And at the same time, let sympathy and assistance be extended to the humane efforts of the Universities Mission to Central Africa, which, at Zanzibar and elsewhere, is so nobly endeavouring to rescue, clothe, and Christianise those slaves who have been delivered from their merciless Mahomedan oppressors.

POOR PRIDE.

BY ISABEL BELLERBY.

CHAPTER I.

ALL Winchmore was awake and out, though the hour was two a.m. A builder's premises in the lower part of the town were on fire, and the flames could be seen for miles. There was a large amount of timber in the sheds, and some mahogany and pine-wood which had come in only the day before.

burned rapidly, and, in spite of the sympathy felt with the builder, and with the men who would be thrown out of work as a result of the fire, most of the lookers-on decided that the sight was well worth leaving their beds to see.

On the outskirts of the crowd stood two girls, arm-in-arm: one slight, and fragile-looking in the broad glare; the other, though a trifle shorter, appeared of stronger build, and her face revealed the fact that its owner had a will of her own.

"I wish we could get a bit nearer, Drusy," she said presently, touched with the excitement of those around.

"No, no!" The other girl shrank back a little. "I should be afraid to get into the crowd."

At that moment a man in a light overcoat approached the spot where they stood, having come, evidently, from another point of vantage.

At the sound of the last speaker's voice he started, and looked round quickly, raising his hat, with a look of keen delight on his pleasant but by no means handsome face.

The two fire-engines were quickly on the spot, and there was a good supply of water; but the wood

"Miss Weston and Miss Margery!—to think of your venturing out, now! Alone, too, I'll be bound!"

"Why, of course!" and Margery laughed a little as she shook hands. "What should we have done with nurse had we brought her? The dear old soul is probably fast asleep at this moment. When did you come, Captain Warre? We thought you were not expected until next week."

"I managed to get away to-day, so took my father

"Now, Drusy, don't be tiresome," expostulated the more venturesome Margery; "we shan't get such a chance again in a hurry. Captain Warre will take care you are not crushed to death, and I can defend myself."

Drusilla generally found it pay to give way to her younger sister; and now, though she would much rather have remained where she was, and not have been beholden to Captain Warre for the strength of by surprise this evening. Grand spectacle, isn't it? Hope poor old Davis is insured. No one seems to know how the fire originated. I have been talking to Davis and some of his men."

"I wish we could get nearer," said Margery.

"No—let us stay where we are!" pleaded her sister.

She had not spoken since Captain Warre joined them, having merely shaken hands in silence, and with evident reluctance.

He looked down at her from his superior height—his military training had developed full six feet of length in him—without attempting to conceal the tender light in his eyes.

"I know you don't like a crowd, Miss Weston; but if you would trust yourself to me—"

"No!" she said again, without allowing him to finish.

his arm, she allowed herself to be led into the thick of the crowd, which was feasting its eyes on the leaping flames and huge columns of smoke, and regaling its ears with the loud crackling of the rapidly burning timbers, the roar of the fire, and the hissing of the water as it fell on the flames.

"It's grand!" exclaimed Margery, with sparkling eyes, peeping over Drusy's shoulder.

"It's suffocating!" complained Drusilla. "I shall faint if these people press much closer."

"Allow me." Captain Warre's voice was quiet enough, but his heart thumped against his ribs with ecstasy of joy as he passed his left arm round the shrinking girl, and so protected her from the ever-moving crowd.

It was of no use to object: perhaps she even felt grateful to him for taking it for granted that she would rather endure such a liberty from him than be crushed to death. There was nothing in her face to show if she understood what those moments meant for him.

She watched the fire with increased eagerness now she was shielded from the pushing of the people around; and he watched her, the wavy black hair nestling low on her forehead beneath the small hat; the straight eyebrows—the curling lashes that hid the blue-grey eyes from his wistful gaze—the delicate little nose, and small sensitive mouth and chin—one and all of the girlish features were the dearest and sweetest the world held for him.

Margery, tearing her eyes for an instant from the fascination of that roaring, crackling furnace, glanced now and then from her sister to the man beside her, who had plainly forgotten the fire and all around in the dear delight of having Drusy close to him, within the shelter of his arm. Margery knew that Reginald Warre would gladly have forfeited half his worldly possessions to win her sister; and she knew also that Drusy, yielding in most respects, could be very obstinate when she chose, and when she had the noted Weston pride to help her. For centuries past the Westons had prided themselves on being yeomen; and as such, they considered any advance beyond mere neighbourliness on the part of the lord of the manor and his family as intended patronage, and therefore to be scorned and returned on their hands.

Drusy refused to believe in the genuineness of Captain Warre's interest in her sweet self. When Margery showed a disposition to argue the point, she had always the same answer ready.

"You will never convince me, Margery. You know as well as I do that old Mr. Warre is anxious for his son to marry one of us. If Captain Warre is dutifully disposed to be sacrificed to his father's conscience, it is no affair of mine."

Whereupon Margery would express a desire to shake her unbelieving sister.

"He worships the ground you walk on, you blind little bat! Sacrifice himself to his father's conscience, indeed! I haven't patience with you!"

"Haven't you? Suppose it were you instead of me, Margery? Would you encourage him to think you would have him?"

"Not likely!"—for Margery, too, possessed a share of the family pride. "I never said I wanted you to have him, you little goose! only you might believe he is not such a donkey as to pay you attention just because his father tells him to."

"I really don't see that it matters what I believe or disbelieve," Drusy would say, with an imperceptible little sigh. "We are both agreed that it wouldn't do at any price; and so, what is the use of talking about it?"

Margery thought of these occasional arguments, and their inevitably unsatisfactory conclusion, as she watched the light on Reginald Warre's face—a light not occasioned by the red glare that touched all the eager faces in that human crowd.

"Poor fellow!" she said to herself; "I half wish we were not so abominably proud. I wonder if Drusy cares—just a little bit! She is as close as wax, bless her heart! If she does care, I hope to goodness something will happen to vanquish our horrid pride."

Then, availing herself of a slight opening in the crowd to advance a step or so, her eyes returned to the fire, and she missed seeing an expression of firm determination that suddenly stole into Captain Warre's face, which was the result of a vow he had just mentally vowed to himself in these words:

"I will win her—in spite of her pride—please God!" And what had produced this determined frame of mind was a simple little incident enough.

A big fellow, working his way through the crowd with his fists and elbows, had come perilously near Captain Warre's precious charge. To guard her the more effectually, Reginald clasped his other arm about her for an instant, covering her left shoulder with his right hand: and not a moment too soon, for the great burly intruder brought his elbow down on that slender shoulder with a force that must have bruised it sadly had not Captain Warre's hand received the blow.

Drusy glanced up hastily.

"Did he hurt you?"

"Nothing to mention. The great brute! He wouldn't have cared if it had come on your shoulder."

"How thoughtful you are! Are you sure it doesn't pain you much?"

"Quite sure."

Her words had been so gentle, her glance so kind, that, half-involuntarily, he drew her a little closer to him. She did not resist. His arm being now further round her, he became aware that her heart was beating rapidly.

"You are not frightened now?" That was his first thought.

"Oh no!" And she smiled a little.

And then the blissful thought entered his brain that her heart beat faster than usual because they two stood so for the first time—close together, and as one, in that increasing surging mass of humanity. Could it be possible that she cared for him—that it was only her pride that kept them apart?

And that possibility, which he chose to think was already a certainty, made him vow to himself then and there—

"I will win her—in spite of her pride—please God!"

Presently, when the fire had been got under a little by the unceasing exertions of the firemen and their voluntary assistants, Drusy suggested going home.

"I suppose the best of it is over!" sighed Margery regretfully. "I really am sorry for Mr. Davis; but I do love a good fire."

"How independent you are!" said Reginald Warre, watching her elbow her way skilfully to the edge of the crowd. From that hour he looked upon her with brotherly eyes; and much as men like their sweethearts to lean on their masculine strength, they do not object, as a rule, to any amount of independence in their sisters.

"I am used to looking after myself," replied Margery, glancing back at him with a contented smile. "Phil and Drusy are the two timid ones of the family. Now Phil is married, and will always have someone to look after her: and, of course, Drusy will marry some day."

"There is no 'of course' about it!" Drusy spoke a trifle sharply, and her cheeks grew rosy with—vexation, was it? But they had turned their backs on the fire now; so no one could see. She contrived that Margery should walk between Captain Warre and herself as they returned to Long Reach; considering, perhaps, that he had "sacrificed" himself sufficiently for one occasion.

St. Ouans was about half a mile farther up the hill which led past Long Reach. In the old days when Gregory Warre signed away his right to St. Ouans, the manor-house and the farm were both quite in the country, Winchmore being at that time an insignificant little fishing village. But time, which changeth all things, had worked wonders at Winchmore: first the village became a town, by the addition of several streets, the only original one being lengthened, and paved, and rebuilt, and lighted, out of all semblance to its ancient self. Then suburbs were begun and added to—the more aristocratic houses nestling, as by common consent, under the shelter of the hill where grew the picturesque woods which wound round St. Ouans, and formed a background for the fine old house. As a natural result of suburbs, there appeared, eventually, an esplanade, which in due course was improved by the addition of a pier, replacing the little jetty that had done duty so many years. And thus it came to pass that Long Reach was not far now from other houses, and that made it more cheerful as a residence for the girls, who were too much attached to it to leave it for anything less than for the sake of a husband, to whom they might be even more attached.

Captain Warre's newly born hopes were somewhat damped when he observed that Drusy yawned again and again on the way home. He told himself that he never felt less like yawning than when in her society.

They began to ascend the hill, and Drusy dropped behind.

"I cannot go so fast!" she said plaintively.

Reginald's heart smote him even while it rejoiced: the poor child was tired out, of course, with the excitement and the unearthly hour, and all the rest of it: and that was why she had yawned. He slipped behind Margery to Drusy's further side, and coolly took her arm, saying—

"Now, Miss Margery, you take her other arm, and we shall get along splendidly. You step out as if you were made of cast-iron."

"I believe I am!" Margery was proud of her powers of endurance and of her perfect health. With all the arrogance and ignorance of twenty-one, she failed to sympathise with her more fragile sister, though she was always ready to help her.

Long Reach was less than a quarter of a mile up the hill; a very few minutes' climbing brought them to the gate, with its pretty arch of Virginian creeper: similar arches were placed at short intervals up the sloping path leading to the lower entrance, which was always used by the girls themselves: their snugest sitting-room, where they took their meals, and usually sat of a winter evening—for all it was called breakfast-room—being on the ground floor. Just inside the gate some steps on the left led to an upper garden and to the hall door proper, and up those steps Captain Warre had always felt compelled to go on the rare occasions when he had called with his father on the Misses Weston: visits the girls never returned, owing to the absence of a mistress at St. Ouans—at least, so they said; though when Mr. Warre's sister stayed with him for a month or two at a time, which she did every year, there was no inducing the Westons to so much as call at St. Ouans; much more accept invitations to dinner.

"Lady Vanborough cannot possibly desire to receive a farmer's daughters," the girls would say to the discomfited "squire."

"My dear young ladies, when will you remember that the same blood runs in your veins as in ours?"

"Not all the same, Mr. Warre; we are half Westons, you know."

"Well, the Westons were gentlefolks before they took to farming, and I know of no law which forbids a farmer being a gentleman."

"But there is a social law which forbids his ranking as one," was the unanswerable reply of a pride that was not to be vanquished.

Remembering the distance at which he had always been kept by these haughty young neighbours, Captain Warre glanced wistfully up the dark pathway under the arches, but did not offer his escort to the door.

Margery was in a wicked mood that night; she produced the latch-key as Drusilla was about to shake hands and thank Captain Warre for his "kindness."

"It is fearfully rusty; I shall never get the door open. I meant to have it oiled to-day, and I forgot it. Do you mind coming up and insuring our getting in, Captain Warre? I don't feel inclined to pass the remainder of the night with earwigs and spiders."

Smiling broadly with pleasure—all unnoticed in the darkness—Reginald took the key, and accompanied them up the path Drusy's feet had trodden nearly every day of her life—that thought alone made him long to kiss the ground he walked on with reverent step.

In spite of Margery's fears, the door was opened easily; and when he had been vouchsafed one glance at the dimly lit hall, he had to wish them good-night and take his departure.

And then Drusilla turned on her sister.

"Margery, what possessed you to do that?"

"What, dear?" Margery had tossed off her hat, and was drawing hair-pins from the massive brown coils which adorned her head.

"What possessed you to ask Captain Warre into the garden?"

"Didn't you hear? The latchkey wanted oiling; it was so difficult to turn the last time I used it." She gave herself a little shake, and the coils fell and spread themselves over her shoulders and below her waist.

"As if it was not enough to invite him to take care of us, without——"

"Begging your pardon, Drusilla, we did not invite him to take care of us. He proffered his assistance, and you accepted it. I did not require, or get it."

"Like this, ma'am."—p. 11.

This was turning the tables with a vengeance, and Drusy had not a word to say in self-defence. She walked up-stairs in meekest silence, partly as a token of defeat, and partly to hide a pair of conspicuously red cheeks.

Margery nodded triumphantly at her retreating form, and followed; magnanimously saying not another word.

Superstitious people fully expected a third excitement to follow on the fire, for that had been the second great event of the day: before it had come the wedding, when sweet Philippa Weston—sister to Drusilla and Margery—had given her life into the keeping of Dr. Theo Kershaw.

There had been a reception at Long Reach in the afternoon, attended by many friends and acquaintances, who had assembled to congratulate the young couple; not the least important of these being Mrs. Algernon Pearson, of clerical descent—as she liked to remind people—who had so far forgotten her duty to society as to marry a wealthy tradesman. An ironmonger in a large way of business was her husband.

A little later there arrived two gentlemen who generally went about together: one was Mr. George Harrison, retired solicitor, with a weakness for rocking-chairs; and the other Mr. Thomas Maver, formerly a pawnbroker, who had never succeeded in curing himself of a boyish affection for hardbake. The former was a widower, the latter a bachelor; both were well off.

At the gate of Long Reach they came face to face with three ladies who were leaving, one of whom planted herself in front of Mr. Maver, saying severely—

"You enticed my dog away again yesterday; he was absent over two hours."

"Twist is a friendly little brute," was the evasive reply.

But he was not to escape without receiving a bit of Miss Fraser's mind, the others listening in somewhat awed silence; albeit they were used to such scenes. Mr. Maver amused himself occasionally by purposely aggravating Miss Fraser, who was capable of showing much irritation. That lady was shortish and stoutish, compared with her companions. Possibly she was the eldest of the three, though she never said so. Her hair was as grisly as Mr. Maver's own, and she possessed an irrepressible moustache—very short, but very bristly.

Yet, in spite of the moustache and the frequent angry light in Miss Fraser's eyes, she was not so awe-inspiring at a second glance as Miss Foster, who was tall and gaunt, and utterly colourless—hair, cheeks, lips, and eyes.

Miss Fagan, the youngest of the trio, was small in every way; she had thin lips, and was much given to knitting. It went without saying that Miss Fagan kept a cat.

When Miss Fraser had finished with Mr. Maver, he and Mr. Harrison disappeared up the garden path, and the three ladies departed for South Terrace, where they all lived—at Nos. 30, 31, and 32 respectively.

No. 30 was Miss Foster's residence; there they paused with one accord.

"Miss Paule will have arrived by now," said Miss Foster, as they entered the garden gate.

Miss Paule was her new companion, who was expected that afternoon, and had arrived while they were all at Long Reach; so Miss Foster herself had not seen her yet, the engagement having been by letter.

"My goodness!" was the mental exclamation of all three ladies when they entered the drawing-room; and if they had said it aloud it would not have been much wonder, considering that the companions formerly engaged by Miss Foster had been of the depressed and anxious sort, with limited wardrobes, and painfully anxious to please.

Miss Paule, by way of contrast, was elegantly dressed in a tailor-made grey cloth; she had a quantity of hair on her small head, arranged in the newest fashion, and she stood in perfect self-possession as her employer advanced and scrutinised her fashion-plate form in undisguised amazement.

"You aren't exactly what I expected to see, Miss Paule!"

But the severe tone did not dismay her in the least; she smiled sweetly, revealing some wonderfully white teeth.

"No? But I think you will find that I suit you. You've been to a Reception, your servant tells me; aren't you awfully tired? Let me take your bonnet and cloak up-stairs. I told the girl to be sure and have tea ready."

Before Miss Foster could remonstrate, her bonnet was off, and her mantle was being carefully unfastened by her new companion.

"Thank you; but I'll go up myself. I want a particular cap; and you won't know where to find it."

"Won't I? Try me!"

"Well, it's in the top right-hand drawer of my chest. Do you know my room? Yes? You haven't wasted time since you came, evidently. It's cream lace and red velvet, with silver pins."

The companion disappeared, trailing half a yard of train gracefully on the carpet behind her.

"Walks as if she'd practised before a looking-glass," observed Miss Fagan, screwing up her mouth.

"Looks as if she'd moved in tip-top society," said Miss Fraser, who had aristocratic connections, and visited them by invitation once a year.

"Humph!" Miss Foster reserved her opinion; she had not decided yet whether or no she liked being taken possession of, as it were, by her new companion.

Miss Paule returned with the cap, and was presented to the other two ladies; then, as tea was brought in, she took her place at the tea-tray as a matter of course, dispensing the beverage with much grace.

"Tell me about the wedding, please, Miss Foster," she implored, when she had settled in a low chair to enjoy her own cup of tea. "The bells have been ringing like mad ever since I came, and everyone looks more or less excited about it. Who are these Westons? They might be ladies of the manor, by the interest people seem to take in this wedding."

"So they would be but for an unfortunate occurrence which took place nearly a century and a half ago," replied Miss Foster.

Misses Fraser and Fagan nodded their heads, and looked as if they could a tale unfold.

That was sufficient invitation for Miss Paule to beg them to unfold it.

"You make me so curious," she declared. "It sounds like a romance hidden somewhere."

"You will think it is a romance when you have heard it," said Miss Foster. "Keep the tea hot; I shall want another cup when I have finished telling the story." She drank what she had, and leant back comfortably against her own particular cushion as she began the history of the Westons.

"As you came along in the train you must have seen a fine old house nestling against the hill, nearly at the top of it—a house that had a covered terrace or verandah running nearly round it, with massive stone pillars supporting it? Well, that is St. Ouans, which has belonged to the Warres for I can't say how many generations. They used to call themselves De Warre, but for the last hundred years they have preferred to drop the 'De'. Nearly a hundred and fifty years ago the property belonged to a childless widower—Christopher Warre. The heir-apparent was his nephew, Gregory Warre; but the two did not get on well together. Gregory was inclined to be wild, and he was so lazy that he refused to help his uncle in the management of the estate. They quarrelled frequently; and when, at last, Gregory fell in love with and married the daughter of one of his uncle's tenants, old Christopher began to cast about in his mind for some means of disinheriting him. Previous to this, he had married again himself, hoping to have a son; but he was disappointed: he was destined to be childless. One day he encouraged his nephew to drink more than usual at dinner; and when he was in a manageable mood—which was only when half-intoxicated—the old man artfully talked him into signing away the entail, promising that the farm tenanted by his wife's father should be his and his heirs' for ever, with all the fields, and so on, then let with it. This meant a tidy little income, and not half the work and responsibility of managing an estate; and young Gregory weakly allowed himself to be talked over. So it fell about that his son, instead of inheriting St. Ouans, found himself merely in possession of Long Reach, and was so disgusted that he challenged his more fortunate cousin—the son of a younger brother of Gregory's, who had been substituted for him—to settle the matter by a duel. They fought, and Gregory's son was killed. As there was no other boy, Long Reach went to his sister, who married someone called Weston, and there have been no lack of Westons ever since; while the Warres have simply existed by the skin of their teeth, as it were—each Warre since then having only one son to inherit the property after him. The present Mr. Warre is said to be of opinion that this scarcity of heirs is a judgment on the family for continuing in possession of a property to which they have no moral right; and his son, Captain Reginald Warre, if all accounts are true, not only agrees with him, but is something more than willing to at least share the property with one of the Westons. The three Weston girls have lived alone at Long Reach for the last ten years. Their mother died when the youngest girl was barely twelve months old; and when, ten years later, their father followed her, the girls, acting on his advice, let all the fields and pasturage land, with the larger orchard and the farm buildings, keeping the dwelling-house, smaller orchard, and flower-gardens for their own use. They have sufficient income—about £100 a year each—to enable them to live comfortably, their only chaperon being their old nurse. Now the eldest daughter is married, and it remains to be seen whether the other two will like living alone. Perhaps Philippa's example will make the second one, Drusilla—they always call her Drusy—more inclined to be civil to Captain Warre. But the Westons were always as proud as Lucifer in some ways, for all they are—or have been until now—only farmers. The youngest is called Margery, and she is my favourite. Another cup of tea, please, Miss Paule."

Lilian Paule had listened very attentively.

"Where will she live: the one who is married?"

"At Norwood. Her husband, Dr. Kershaw, has a practice there, or has just gone into partnership with someone who has one."

"Perhaps the other two sisters will go and live with her?"

"Not they. They will never leave Long Reach. Must you go?"

This to Miss Fagan, who was arranging her bonnet-strings.

"Scott will want his tea." Scott was Miss Fagan's cat: a handsome Persian, and a most important member of her small household. "Don't trouble to come to the door, Miss Paule; you will find we three run in and out of each other's houses without any ceremony. Are you coming, Miss Fraser? Do you observe that Twist is eating the cake?"

"A naughty doggie!" But the tone was not severe; and as his mistress caught him up, the naughty doggie licked her face with assurance of not being repulsed.

CHAPTER II.

"ONLY wish I'd been awake, and caught ye going out in the middle of the night, that's all! You'll be catching your deaths of cold: that's what'll happen. Please to send in some linseed-meal, Miss Drusilla, in case; and you with your 'ceptional chest, too."

"I am all right, nurse. There is no fear for my 'ceptional' chest, I think, on this occasion; and the fire was worth seeing; wasn't it, Margery?"

"Rather! You should have seen it, nurse!"

But nurse grunted disapproval and retired to the kitchen.

The fire formed the principal topic of conversation at more than one breakfast-table that morning.

Bob, Mr. Pearson's "general man," calling early to drive his master to the station—Mr. Pearson having to be away on business that day—volunteered the information that he "seed'd Cap'en Warre at the fire 'long of the Miss Westons."

"Nonsense, Bob!" said Mr. Pearson.

"Surely you must have been mistaken—er—Robert!" Mrs. Pearson glanced reprovingly at her spouse as she laid a stress on the man's baptismal name; she greatly objected to his being called Bob.

"No, ma'am; I didn't make no mistake. There wasn't no chance of making a simple mistake of that sort with that there glare making it seem as if the whole world was afire. The Cap'en it was, sure enough; and the Miss Westons it was, just as certain. Miss Drusilla, she were nestlin' up to 'm terrified like. Miss Margery, she looked to be enjoyin' the flames; she never fears nothin' mortal, she don't. But I make bold to say as Cap'en Warre was a-harming of Miss Drusilla."

"Harming her! In what way, Robert?"

"Like this, ma'am;" and "Robert" grinned as he hooked his arm round an imaginary waist. "Law! you must have seed it done many's the time in courtin' days. Miss Drusilla, she'll be followin' Miss Philippa's example afore she's much older, I reckon, if it's come to that already out-o'-doors: though the quality is, in general, main particular about such things; but I s'pose 't was the fire done it. The Cap'en, 'tain't like as how he'd see her frightened, and not go for to comfort her."

"Really, Robert, I think your eyes must have deceived you!" Mrs. Pearson was bridleing with decorum. "Miss Weston would never—er—permit such familiarity in public, were she twenty times engaged—er—to Captain Warre."

"Guess you'd had an extra glass or so, Bob, before you saw that. Come now; aren't I right?"

"No, sir: I'll stick to what I says. It happened: and I seed it. But as it seems to strike you as bein' a trifle unexpected like, perhaps I'd better hold my tongue about it t' anyone else. You're the first I've told."

"Just as well, I think, Bob. Miss Weston would not care to have such a report going about, I am sure. Time's up! Good-bye, Matilda. I shall come by the seven o'clock, if I can catch it. You must hurry up, Bob."

It never occurred to Mr. Pearson to put a stopper on his wife's tongue similar to that he had put on "Robert's."

As soon as she could decently call anywhere, Mrs. Pearson put on her bonnet and went to South Terrace. As she approached, not from the town, but from the opposite direction, she came first to No. 32, Miss Fagan's house; but her curiosity to see Miss Foster's new companion made her give No. 30 the honour of her presence on that occasion.

Miss Foster was at home, but not prepared to receive visitors, being still arrayed in the flowered dressing-gown in which she had passed the early hours of every week-day for the last fifteen years.

"Now, don't you be put out, Miss Foster: I'll go and talk to her while you dress yourself in comfort."

Put on the same cap you wore yesterday, will you? It was wonderfully becoming."

It was Miss Paule who spoke: she was as much at home at No. 30 as if she had lived there all her life. Instead of the question, "Would she do?" Miss Foster was already asking herself how she had hitherto existed without her new treasure.

Mrs. Pearson stared when a self-possessed person in a tailor-made gown entered the room, introduced herself as Miss Foster's companion, and proceeded to apologise for that lady's tardy appearance, gliding from that topic to others with an ease that Mrs. Pearson would have given her best bonnet to possess.

When Miss Foster came gliding into the room in her ghost-like fashion, robed in a gown as colourless as herself, and began to murmur excuses for having kept her visitor waiting, Mrs. Pearson cut her short by declaring most affably, if—er—a trifle hesitatingly, that she had been unable to find the time of waiting otherwise than agreeable, so well had Miss Paule entertained her.

"She is the very companion I have sought for years," declared Miss Foster, with a sigh of satisfaction. "To what do I owe the pleasure of so early a visit, Mrs. Pearson?" For Mrs. Pearson rarely made calls so early in the day.

"I—er—thought you might not have heard the news."

"About the fire?—oh, yes: the milkman told Sarah all about it. Davis has lost between £1,500 and £2,000; but he is insured for nearly the full amount, you know."

"That is not exactly what I meant. I was referring to—er—Miss Drusilla Weston's engagement to Captain Warre."

"What?"

Miss Foster almost shrieked out the question, and Miss Paule visibly started—possibly remembering the story she had heard little more than twelve hours ago.

"I thought you would be surprised," said Mrs. Pearson complacently, forgetting, for once, to hesitate over what she wanted to say. "It will probably be all over the town by mid-day: so I thought you would like to know it at once. I had it from a most reliable source, though I am not at liberty to mention names. They were watching the fire together last night, arm-in-arm—if not— But, there! Miss

"I don't understand, Mrs. Pearson. To what are you alluding?"—p. 13.

Drusy would not thank me for spreading that piece of information."

"Now, that is too bad!" declared Miss Foster, her pale lips working with curiosity and excitement. "Do finish what you were going to say, Mrs. Pearson."

"Well, you won't let it go any further, I am sure. But—er—I was told that Captain Warre had his arm round her waist most of the time."

"To protect her from the pressure of the crowd, of course," suggested Miss Paule, smiling. "How interesting! To think this should have happened so soon after your telling me the history of the two families, Miss Foster. How pleased old Mr. Warre will be! By the bye, I think I did not tell you yesterday—I'm sure I did not, in fact, for Miss Fraser at that moment gave a turn to the conversation—I know Captain Warre slightly: he visits occasionally at the house of some intimate friends of mine. I have not met him many times. He may not remember me."

"That is your modesty!" observed Mrs. Pearson, smiling. "I think, Miss Foster, all Winchmore will rejoice—er—at this unexpected dénouement to the estrangement between the families."

"I should think so. Shall you call to-day?"

"Certainly. I am all anxiety to—er—satisfy myself that my informant was correct. Not that I have the slightest doubt on the subject."

Mrs. Pearson rose, well pleased that her news had not been anticipated, and delighted that she would have the start in the matter of ascertaining whether there really was "anything in it": of which she did not feel so certain, in spite of her assurances; and, if not, what a dear little bit of scandal it would be to spread concerning one of those proud Weston girls, who had more than once caused Mrs. Pearson to feel that she was almost beneath their notice. She thought this was because her husband was in business, whereas it was simply because she was ashamed of that fact.

They were at home, both of them: Drusy colouring a little sketch she had drawn of the fire for Phil's private edification, and Margery exercising her sweet mezzo-soprano voice at the piano.

Mrs. Pearson was shown into the drawing-room; she was not one of the privileged few who were received into that cozy used-for-everything breakfast-room down-stairs.

"What in the world can bring her here again to-day?" queried Margery, linking her arm in Drusy's as they mounted the wide stairs together.

Mrs. Pearson rose with a rustle when they entered the room, and held out her hand with a smile of vast understanding.

"Dear Miss Drusilla—I should say, Miss Weston—it is so difficult to remember that your sister is now Mrs. Kershaw; I have hastened to offer my congratulations. How heartily gratified Mr. Warre must feel! All Winchmore is delighted at the news."

"I don't understand, Mrs. Pearson. To what are you alluding?"

Drusy stood before her, white to the lips, fearing she knew not what, and dreading to hear her visitor's next words.

Margery also stood: only Mrs. Pearson, wilfully blind to the expression of the girls' faces, sat, choosing the most comfortable chair in the room.

"Oh! I see, you didn't think the news would spread so rapidly. I assure you—er—it reached my ears before ten o'clock."

"What news? Kindly explain yourself."

For a moment Mrs. Pearson quailed before the look in Drusy's eyes, which were fixed steadily on her face. Then she smiled again, and recovered her equanimity.

"Explain myself?—certainly. I can easily understand that you feel—er—a little strange about it at first. I allude—er—dear Miss Weston, to your engagement to Captain Warre."

For a moment the room seemed to rock under Drusy's feet; Margery had hard work to refrain from catching hold of her, but she guessed rightly that pride would enable her sister to hold up before this odious woman.

"You have been misinformed, Mrs. Pearson: Captain Warre and I are not engaged."

Drusy spoke with an effort, but her voice was steady enough, and her tone as cold as ice.

"No?—you astonish me, Miss Weston. I was told you were watching the fire together, and evidently on terms—er—of great intimacy."

The girl's face crimsoned painfully. Margery longed to roll Mrs. Pearson's stout little body down the stairs and out into the road, but she refrained from speaking, knowing that Drusy would rather go through with it herself.

"I understand now what has misled you, Mrs. Pearson, though I don't see how it misled your informant, who was, of course, present at the fire. Captain Warre very kindly protected me from the pressure of the crowd; but for him, I should have been sadly bruised. It was, perhaps, foolish of my sister and myself to go alone into the midst of a crowd."

Both girls still stood, and both looked exceedingly haughty, though apparently as cool as cucumbers.

Mrs. Pearson, beginning to feel very uncomfortable, rose, anxious to take her departure, and conscious that she had made a mistake in thinking she was going to get a rise out of "those Weston girls." But she determined not to leave the house without making them pay for making her feel so small; she had a beautiful little bit of venom left in her sting, and it was some satisfaction to know she could wound, even though her victims were too game to show that they were hit.

"Really, I am very sorry I was so precipitate, Miss Weston. I can understand how exceedingly awkward it is for you to have to contradict such a rumour. I should hope Captain Warre will feel, now he has got you so unpleasantly talked about, that the least he can do is to propose at once."

This, spoken without a single "er," struck Drusy dumb, though she stood unmoved.

One glance at her sister's white proud face, and Margery laid her hand on the bell, and moved to open the door, saying softly and distinctly—

"As you are so quick to understand things, Mrs.

Pearson, you will easily comprehend my meaning when I tell you that, for the future, we receive no ladies who are not also gentlewomen. Ellen, the front door!"

Then, as the discomfited woman disappeared, Margery turned to take Drusy in her arms, and to hear her moaning appeal—

"Whenever—if ever—he comes again, alone or with his father, tell them to say we are not at home, Margery."

CHAPTER III.

MRS. PEARSON did not return to South Terrace to contradict the report she had started on its rounds. She congratulated herself on having done her best to publish it before going to Long Reach to ascertain if she was justified in doing so. The more "those upstarts" were made to smart, the better pleased she would be.

"To shut the door in my face! As if I wasn't just as good as they are! They shall be sorry for it, or my name is not Matilda Pearson. Here comes Mr. Maver. I wonder if he has heard anything!"

Mr. Maver was about to pass with a bow and a "good-morning," but he was not to escape so easily.

"I was just—er—wishing I could meet someone who is sure to have been watching the fire at close quarters. Tell me now, Mr. Maver, did you see the Miss Westons there?"

"Certainly not!" was the prompt reply. And, considering the number of people there assembled, and that they were divided into three sections—there being three streets from which the fire could be seen equally well, Davis's premises being at the corner where four roads met—it was not surprising that Mr. Maver had missed meeting Drusy and her sister. But Mrs. Pearson chose to think he was not speaking the truth.

"Ah! You want to shield that imprudent girl. When—er—I heard of it, I immediately concluded that the Captain had proposed; though, even then, it seemed a little—er—noticeable. And now to find they are not engaged!"

"May I ask what you are talking about, ma'am?" Mr. Maver scented scandal in connection with the Westons, and his back was up at once.

"It really is kind of you to pretend—er—not to understand! Of course, one does not like to be uncharitable. And they are motherless—poor girls!" She cast her eyes upwards, as if to confide her concluding remark to the care of the clouds.

"Now, look here, Mrs. Pearson, I am not pretending anything. I see you have something to say about the Miss Westons, and I conclude by your manner that it is something not too kind. Tell me what it is without any more preamble, or I'll go straight to Long Reach, and ask for myself; I see you have just come from there."

For a moment Mrs. Pearson was tempted to let him go; but she quickly reflected that it would not pay to get herself disliked too much; as she was fond of reminding her husband, she was, even now, only received on sufferance in the little circle into which she had forced her way. So, acting on the advice of second thoughts, and trying hard to keep her tone from sounding too malicious, she told him the story as it stood to the moment of her calling at Long Reach. Her interview with Drusy and Margery she gave in these words:—

"I entered the house primed to the lips with congratulations, only to find that they were—er—not only unnecessary, but decidedly de trop. It was a most unpleasant position to be in, and that foolish girl found it so, I'm sure; for she could not—er—deny that Captain Warre had been with them, and that Robert had even correctly."

"Robert be hanged!" exclaimed Mr. Maver. "I should have thought you of all people would be above encouraging a servant's tittle-tattle. How annoyed the Warres will be at such an idiotic piece of folly if it reaches their ears—and of course it will. Mr. Warre would pay five thousand pounds down to see his son married to Miss Weston, and the Captain would give his eyes to win her. And now this will spoil everything; she will never look at him again. I wouldn't stand in your shoes for anything you could offer me, Mrs. Pearson. Winchmore will feel itself aggrieved to a man. Shouldn't wonder if you were sent to Coventry; and, upon my word, it would serve you right."

"Thank you, Mr. Maver! I might have known I was liable—er—to insult of some sort from a man of such low origin as yourself. I deeply regret that my husband compelled me to suffer you to be introduced to me."

"This is personal with a vengeance!" and Mr. Maver laughed aloud. "I deserve it for speaking so plainly to a woman. I wish you good-morning, ma'am."

Mrs. Pearson resumed her walk, beginning to think that her favourite amusement of scandal-mongering was likely to cost her dear on this occasion.

Mr. Maver, continuing on his way to the town, met Miss Fraser and her dog.

"Have you heard the news, Mr. Maver? But of course you have; it's all over Winchmore by this time, I should think. I didn't like to call too early, so I did my shopping first. Now I'm going to take Twist home—they won't have him at Long Reach, you know, poor little doggie!—and then call and congratulate Miss Drusy."

Of the three "witches"—his own name for them—Mr. Maver fell out most frequently with Miss Fraser, whose bristling moustache irritated him beyond measure; and whose all-too-ready tongue frequently provoked him to downright incivility; yet, of the three, he preferred her—if preference were possible in a case where he dreaded all, fearing they conspired against his bachelor-liberty. Scarcely pausing to consider his words, he said:

"Miss Fraser, I'll bless you if you will call at Long Reach, and say not a word about the fire, unless they begin the subject. Mrs. Pearson, no doubt, has been to your house with her imaginary story of Miss Weston's engagement!"

"Yes; at least, it was to Miss Foster's; but it's all the same. Go on, please."

"That story has not an atom of truth in it. The woman went to Long Reach, and had it contradicted there—from head-quarters, you see. But I make no doubt that poor girl was sorely wounded before she got Mrs. Algernon Pearson out of the house."

"She's a snake—that woman!" muttered Miss Fraser. "Twist, don't scratch."

"My sentiments exactly, Miss Fraser. Now, if someone—especially a woman, and more especially one of you three South Terrace ladies——"

"All right. Mr. Maver; I see your meaning. I'll go at once. But what am I to do with Twist?"

"Will you go a-walking with me, little dogling?" And Mr. Maver put his hand in his pocket, and rustled a paper bag containing sticky stuff that was therein.

Twist held up one paw and winked one eye.

"I think he'll follow you, Mr. Maver."

"I think so too, Miss Fraser. Come along, Twist."

Miss Fraser went straight to Long Reach, and was observed approaching by the sisters.

"Another of those odious women, Margery! I cannot go through a second interview of that sort."

"I think you can, Drusy dear. We can't allow Mrs. Pearson to be told that she was successful in——"

"Thanks, Margery; I was forgetting."

She braced herself for the ordeal, and went up-stairs with her sister.

Miss Fraser chatted about every topic of local interest except the fire and Captain Warre's return; and when ten minutes had passed without the dreaded congratulations being forthcoming, Drusy began to breathe freely once more. Surely if Mrs. Pearson had said a word to anyone, it would have been to Miss Fraser, or Miss Foster, or Miss Fagan, and if it had been whispered to one, all three would have heard almost simultaneously.

Miss Fraser began to think her task an easy one; but Drusy, not able to feel quite comfortable in her mind, presently asked point-blank—

"Have you heard that Margery and I were childish enough to leave our warm beds to go and watch the fire, Miss Fraser?"

A plain "Yes" would have been equivalent to saying, "I know all there is to know about your nocturnal doings, Miss Drusy Weston." Miss Fraser, however, was equal to the occasion, replying, without a moment's hesitation:

"You did?—actually? But, there! girls of your age will be venturesome. Did you drag poor old nurse out too?"

Margery took it upon her to reply; she had had her eye on their visitor, and she had seen behind the scenes.

"No, Miss Fraser: we didn't dare wake nurse; she would never have let us go. I suppose it was foolish of us, for Drusy is terribly afraid of getting into a crowd. I don't know what we should have done if Captain Warre had not appeared at just the right moment, and taken her under his wing."

"But I thought the Captain was not expected until next week?"

Miss Fraser's little bit of acting deceived the joyous Drusy; but Margery's keen eyes saw through that also, and her heart warmed to this old maiden lady as it had never done before.

"I would hug her, if I dared!" she said to herself.

"He turned up some time last evening—so he said."

Drusy got this out with elaborate carelessness, and then turned the conversation to Phil's wedding once more.

Miss Fraser had commenced with that: explaining her presence so soon again by saying she had called to see how they felt after their excitement the day before; so now, feeling that she had safely circumnavigated the conversational globe, she took her leave.

"Ellen," said Margery to the neatly dressed Abigail whose duty it was to open the door, "next time Miss Fraser calls alone, show her into the breakfast-room."

"What's that for, Margery?" asked Drusy, when Ellen had vanished.

"Oh—because I like her rather, don't you? The other two are horrors; but I really think Miss Fraser is a woman."

Later—and not so very much later, either—Drusy learnt for herself why Miss Fraser was to be "promoted."

For, although Mr. Maver's kindly thought, so ably carried out by his willing aide-de-camp, saved the two girls much annoyance, it could not remedy the evil set afloat by Mrs. Pearson's malicious tongue. Before Miss Fraser could inform her neighbours of the incorrectness of the news brought them by that past-mistress of the art of scandal-mongering, they had repeated what they had heard to several persons, so that by mid-day the rumour was, in reality, all over the town.

Mr. Maver started in one direction and Mr. Harrison departed in another, seeking converse from all they met, and flatly contradicting the news, whenever volunteered, that Miss Weston and Captain Warre had "come to an understanding at last."

It was not improbable that the gossip would have mounted to St. Ouans, but the father and son set off to visit Long Reach after lunch; and it met them on the way, through the mouth of a man who was driving sheep into one of the fields above the old farm buildings, formerly a part of Long Reach itself.

"Af'noon, Squire—af'noon, Cap'en; glad to see you back agen, s'r, and more'n gladder to 'ear the noos."

"What news, Wilson?"

"'Bout you and Miss Weston, Cap'en. I wishes you long life and 'appiness, if it ain't too persoomptuous-like."

Reginald Warre flushed a deep red, and gnawed the end of his moustache.

"I am sorry to say your good wishes are a wifle 'previous,' Wilson. Who has been telling you this—this mistake?"

"I 'eerd the boys a-talkin', Cap'en: they was all main pleased—like I be—leastways, should 'ave been, arskin' your pardon, Cap'en. As 't is, I'm main sorry as 'tain't true, and wish you good af'noon, Cap'en and Squire."

Wilson hurried after his sheep, having perceived, with the delicacy possessed by many of his class, that his too "previous" congratulations were the reverse of pleasant to Captain Warre; though why he should object to an allusion to what it was well known he hoped would some day be a fact was a problem Wilson found beyond him, and settled in his own mind as being "quality ways."

"'I 'eerd the boys a talkin', Cap'en'"—p. 15.

"Confound it!—just like my luck!" muttered Reginald angrily, as he strode on down the hill, giving his father plenty of work to keep up with him.

"What's the meaning of such a rumour getting about?" asked the squire.

"I'm afraid it's last night's business that's done it," replied Reginald, waxing more and more wrath. "I told you they were at the fire, sir; and I saw them through the crowd, and walked home with them afterwards. Some jabbering idiots must have seen us, and formed their own imbecile conclusions."

"Humph!—it's a pity! They won't like it," said the squire briefly.

"If it reaches her ears, I'm done for!" and Reginald almost groaned aloud.

"Tut! tut! 'Faint heart never won fair lady,' my boy. Your mother would never have been my wife if I had been easily daunted. I like the Westons for their enormous pride; and, as I can't help thinking Miss Drusy, in her heart of hearts, doesn't exactly dislike you, I must say I admire the plucky way she always keeps you at arm's length. What's that you're muttering with such an abominably conceited smile?"

Reginald had been telling his moustache that she hadn't kept him at arm's length when they were watching the fire together; only, of course, he wasn't such a prig as to repeat his words aloud.

"I was wishing she wouldn't, sir, that's all," was his mendacious translation. "In that one respect, her arm is a deal too long to please me. What's the use of my going in with you? She won't see me."

For they had reached the picturesque old house by this time; and the squire had his hand on the gate.

He looked round doubtfully.

"Bless you!—she hasn't heard! Come along, lad!"

And Reginald, longing for a glimpse of her after her "sweetness" twelve hours before, suffered himself to be persuaded, and went.

But no Drusy was visible. Margery alone received them in the drawing-room; Drusy was out, she explained, but she did not say—though Reginald guessed it quickly enough—that Drusy had seen them coming down the hill, and had put on her hat and slipped out through the orchard at the back of the house to avoid meeting Captain Warre.

The two gentlemen chatted for half an hour, discussing the wedding and the fire; and then they rose to go, to Margery's infinite relief, for she knew Drusy was sitting on the stile leading from the orchard to the fields beyond, and was watching for the signal her sister had promised to tell her the coast was clear.

"Did they say anything?" she asked breathlessly, rushing back to the house.

"Not a word," said Margery: "you needn't have been afraid, you goose!"

"I don't care! I never, never can meet him again!"

DAVID'S BIBLE.

BY THE REV. R. B. GIRDLESTONE, M.A., HON. CANON OF CHRIST CHURCH, OXFORD, AND INCUMBENT OF ST. JOHN'S, DOWNSHIRE HILL, HAMPSHIRE.

WHO would not like to see David's Bible? He evidently had one, and loved it dearly. God's Word was to him sweeter than honey, and more precious than gold—yea, than much fine gold. It is true that much which is described as the Word of God may have come through personal intercourse with prophetic men, and much may have descended through tradition; but we have every reason to believe that beside all this David had some parts of the Holy Scriptures within his reach, and in this sense he had a Bible. Let us inquire what it contained.

According to the natural common-sense view of Scripture, to which we may in the main adhere, we gather that there were already in existence in David's time the Pentateuch, Joshua, the Judges, and Ruth; though these may not have been quite completed or arranged as we have them now. The materials for Genesis probably came into Moses' hands, together with the mummy of Joseph, the last of the patriarchs. The next three books are a wilderness-growth, and the official scribes under Moses must have committed the documents either to the heads of the tribes or to the priestly officials. The latter alternative seems the most probable. The speeches which the old legislator uttered a few days before his death, and which make up the fifth book of the Bible, were put in charge of the priests, the sons of Levi (Deut. xxxi. 9), and provision was made that they should be read every seven years at the Feast of Tabernacles, a selection of the earlier books being probably read also. It is quite possible that this goodly custom was not kept up, but it was reverted to in the days of the return from captivity. This may be seen from Nehemiah viii., where we are told that day by day, from the first day of the feast to the last the book of the Law of God, or (as it is called in the first verse) the book of the Law of Moses, which the Lord had commanded to Israel, was read out clearly and distinctly in the ears of the people. Such a feast, we are further told, had not been kept since the time of Joshua.

Phinehas, the grandson of Aaron, survived Joshua, and was the connecting link between the time of Moses and the days of the Judges. To him we probably owe the collection of speeches and official documents which make up the Book of Joshua; whilst the fragmentary records of the next few centuries may have been collected by the industry of Samuel, and formed a fitting introduction to the history of his own time, written by him in his later days (1 Chron. xxix. 29).

We are thus brought to the time of David himself. A scion of a notable family and an inhabitant of an historic city, he must have heard in his boyhood the stories of the patriarchs, the thrilling incidents of the Exodus which were brought vividly to mind as the yearly Feast of the Passover came round, and the rude and stormy scenes connected with the days of the Judges.

The story of Ruth would also be well known and treasured up by one who was her lineal descendant. Memories were good in those days, and the same tales were told with wonderfully little variation from one generation to another. Reading, moreover, was not uncommon. Those who wanted to learn would readily find a village scribe to teach them, and the art of copying was already a very old one. The sacred archives were fairly accessible, and we can well understand that a youth of piety, intelligence, and vigour, such as David must have been, would not rest satisfied until he had seen with his own eyes and read with his own mouth copies of some of the ancient records preserved in the Tabernacle. His duty in this respect, when he became a king, was very clear. In Deut. xvii. we have an account of the provision for the Days of the Kingdom, and we read in verse 18 concerning the ruler who should be appointed in time to come that "when he sitteth upon the throne of his kingdom, he shall write him a copy of this law in a book out of that which is before the priests the Levites: and it shall be with him, and he shall read therein all the days of his life: that he may learn to fear the Lord his God, to keep all the words of this law and these statutes, to do them: that his heart be not lifted up above his brethren, and that he turn not aside from the commandment, to the right hand, or to the left."

David first comes on the scene at the time of his anointing, in 1 Sam. xvi. We can almost picture him: a youth, ruddy, comely, vigorous, strong in the limb, active with his hands, whether with staff, sling, or harp; impulsive, affectionate, with intense reverence for the God of his fathers, and with a deep conviction that the God of Israel was the living God, a present help in the day of trouble. The battles of Israel were God's battles, the enemies of Israel were God's enemies, the covenant made with the patriarchs centuries ago was instituted by the everlasting God, whose faithfulness and mercies stood sure. How dare such a one as the uncircumcised Goliath defy the armies of the living God! The Hebrew words which he used in reply to the giant's challenge stamped themselves on the language of the people, as many other of his utterances did, and may be seen reproduced on a similar occasion centuries afterwards (see 2 Kings xix. 4). The great truth committed to Israel that the Lord is a Saviour was grasped by David from his youth up. Whether it were a lion or a bear or an army that stood against him, his trust was in something better than muscle or weapon or troop. He "encouraged himself in the Lord his God" (1 Sam. xxx. 6). He felt, like Jacob of old, that the Being who redeemed him from all evil was ever present to bless, and it became a form of oath with him to swear "as the Lord liveth, Who hath redeemed my soul out of all adversity" (see 2 Sam. iv. 9; 1 Kings i. 29; and compare Psalms xxxi. 5, 7).

There are other points which show how the truths of David's Bible had got hold of him. For example, his reverence for the anointing oil which had been poured on the head of Saul; his feeling that Canaan was the Lord's inheritance; his intense interest in the Ark, and in the various religious services, many of which had been neglected for centuries and were brought to life again by him; also his constant habit of inquiring of the Lord through the medium of one of the priestly family, or through a prophet.

It would be interesting to inquire whether in David's public speeches, of which we have only a small selection in the historical books, there are to be found any definite verbal references to the preceding Scriptures. The inquiry is simpler and narrower than in the case of the Psalms, because there is some uncertainty as to the authorship of many of the Psalms, whilst in the case of the speeches we have official accounts preserved to us by the authorised compilers of Samuel, Kings and Chronicles. There are certain notable occasions on which David's words have been recorded at some length. The first is his thanksgiving to God in connection with the great Messianic promise (2 Sam. vii.; 2 Chron. xvii.). In the course of it we read, "Wherefore Thou art great, O Lord God: for there is none like Thee, neither is there any God beside Thee, according to all that we have heard with our ears. And what one nation in the earth is like Thy people, even like Israel, whom God went to redeem for a people to Himself, and to make Him a name." The truth contained in the words, "There is none like Thee," springs from Ex. viii. 10 and ix. 14, and reappears in the blessing of Moses (Deut. xxxiii. 26). The words that follow are condensed from sentences in Deuteronomy iv., where the nation is described as unique. See especially verses 7, 8, and verses 32-38, where it is shown that the exceptional dealings of God with Israel were intended to show that "The Lord He is God, there is none else beside Him."

In 1 Chron. xv. 2, David utters a brief order, "None ought to carry the ark of God but the Levites: for them hath the Lord chosen to carry the ark of God, and to minister unto Him for ever." Further, he calls on the priests and Levites to sanctify themselves that they might bring up the ark, and adds, "For because ye did it not at the first, the Lord our God made a breach upon us, for that we sought Him not after the due order." Accordingly, "The children of the Levites bare the ark of God upon their shoulders with the staves thereon, as Moses commanded according to the word of the Lord." The context shows that it was the sons of Kohath in particular to whom David assigned this important duty. We have here a definite reference to the Levitical ritual prescribed in Num. iv., where the sons of Kohath have this special work allotted to them. Things had got into sad disorder, but David, in the spirit of a true religious reformer, resolved to have everything carried out as far as practicable in conformity with the Scriptures.

In 1 Chron. xxii., we have David's instructions to Solomon with reference to the building of the Temple. He urges his son at the same time to "keep the law of the Lord his God:" and adds, "Then shalt thou prosper, if thou takest heed to fulfil the statutes and judgments which the Lord charged Moses with concerning Israel: be strong, and of good courage; dread not, nor be dismayed." These words are almost entirely taken from Joshua i. 5-9. Three times in these verses is Joshua told to be strong and of a good courage, and again and again he is told not to dread, not to be dismayed, but to observe and do according to what is written in the law of Moses.

In another address to Solomon (1 Chron. xxviii. 20), these words of encouragement are repeated, and a further sentence from the same passage in Joshua is added—"He will not fail thee nor forsake thee."

The same chapter in Chronicles has David's address to the people, in which we have the remarkable reference to Jacob's blessing on Judah, which it was natural enough for David to have known: "The Lord God of Israel chose me before all the house of my father to be King over Israel for ever: for he hath chosen Judah to be the ruler; and of the house of Judah, the house of my father; and among the sons of my father he liked me to make me king over all Israel." Compare with this what the chronicler says (chap. v. 2): "Judah prevailed above his brethren, and of him came the chief ruler." The reference is evidently to Gen. xlix. 10, where Jacob is Divinely taught to predict the coming and pre-eminence of the Prince of the house of Judah. It is interesting to notice that David was the first person in whom this prediction was verified; and from his time onward Judah stood at the head of the tribes.

We now come to the parting address to Solomon as given in 1 Kings ii. It seems to be different from any of those already noticed, though it bears a certain relationship to them. David is now an old man, and would doubtless prepare himself for uttering his last charge by recalling words used on similar occasions by holy men of old. Accordingly, he combines some of the last words of Joshua with part of the last address of Moses. "He charged Solomon his son, saying, I go the way of all the earth"—words taken from Josh. xxiii. 14—"be thou strong therefore, and show thyself a man; and keep the charge of the Lord thy God, to walk in His ways, to keep His statutes, and His commandments, and His judgments, and His testimonies, as it is written in the law of Moses, that thou mayest prosper in all that thou doest, and whithersoever thou turnest thyself." So in Josh. xxiii. 6, "Be ye therefore very courageous to keep and to do all that is written in the book of the law of Moses, that ye turn not aside therefrom to the right hand or to the left." Joshua is here passing on to the people the very words which the Lord had spoken to him thirty years earlier (see chap. i. 7, quoted above), and they are themselves a reiteration of Deut. v. 32, where we read, "Ye shall observe to do as the Lord your God hath commanded you: ye shall not turn aside to the right hand or to the left. Ye shall walk in all the ways which the Lord your God hath commanded you, that ye may live, and that it may be well with you." With these passages David combines a reference to Deut. xxix. 9, where Moses in his last charge urges the people to keep the covenant, "That ye may prosper in all that ye do."

There can be little doubt that David knew by heart the prophetic hymn which every Israelite had to learn, and which is so frequently referred to in Scripture (Deut. xxxi. 19; xxxii. 43). There are subtle references to it in his own song of triumph (2 Sam. xxii. and Ps. xviii.), notably in the title of God as the Rock and the Salvation of His people. Once more, in 2 Sam. xxiii., which contains "the last words of David," God is spoken of both as the Rock of Israel and as the God of Jacob, and the sweet Psalmist gives his final testimony to the faithfulness of God and the inspiration of His appointed messenger.

Enough has been said, we trust, to illustrate the fact that David really had a Bible, that he used it, and that he drew from it those substantial truths about the Divine Being and His Word, which lie at the foundation of our own Christian faith. His great mistakes in life came through negligence or forgetfulness of God's Word; but so far as he kept the truths contained in his Bible as a light to his feet and a lamp to his paths, he did well. We have a much larger Bible and a far more wonderful salvation than David had, but it is all too easy for us to fall; and we need constantly to remind ourselves of the old prescription, "Thy Word have I hid within my heart, that I may not sin against Thee."

IN CHICAGO SLUMS.

BY G. E. MORGAN, M.A.

AND how long have you been on the road to glory?" asked a rough-looking fellow of a Salvationist officer who was conversing with him on South Clark Street, Chicago.

"Thirty years," was the response.

"Oh, well, I guess if you have been at it all that time, and have only got as far as South Clark Street, I'll take my chance!" facetiously replied the other.

Such a remark was doubtless beneath the dignity of so solemn a subject; but apart from that, it may be taken to indicate a popular estimate of the locality in which the circumstance occurred.

Like all other large cities, Chicago has a lower as well as an upper crust, in regard to its moral, as also its social, condition. The admixture of many nationalities has much to do with this, their respective standards of right and wrong being as varied as the colours of their skins. While the beautiful buildings and grounds of the World's Fair have earned, and very justly so, the graceful title of the "White City," there lies close at hand a great district which to the casual visitor is a dark, unknown world, teeming with life truly, but morally rather a living death.

Let us go down to where our Salvationist friend was standing, and on the way I will explain the purpose of our visit.

It is Saturday evening, and to-morrow afternoon there is to be a Gospel service in a vast hall, at present used for a military tournament, a spectacle performed by British soldiers, similar to that held in the Agricultural Hall at Islington every year. Around the interior are 5,000 seats, and the arena itself will accommodate 6,000 more.

Who is going to conduct the service?

Why, Mr. Moody, the American evangelist, who has organised a special religious campaign in the city during the World's Fair season. In this scheme he has secured the co-operation not only of many local ministers and friends, but also of some of the world's finest preachers from England, Scotland, Paris, Berlin, Austria, and various parts of the United States, as well as the most effective exponents of Gospel song. Thus is the message of "good-will to men" declared in many tongues to the strangers that sojourn in Chicago, not forgetting the little children, to whom also are given lectures on the life of Christ, illustrated in dissolving views by the works of all the best painters who have studied Scriptural subjects from the birth to the ascension of our Lord.

But here we are at South Clark Street, the beginning of a district assigned to us in which to distribute tickets of invitation for to-morrow's meeting. Look at this group of Chinamen coming towards us. The nearest one has not been in the city long; that is evident, for he is clad from head to foot in consistently native attire. Before long he will probably find himself in one of the numerous "rig" shops, from which he will emerge just as much an American in outward appearance as he likes to pay for. His two companions, apparently, have not made up their minds to be out-and-out for their own attire or for that of the land of their adoption. One of them has tucked up his pigtail beneath a "bowler" hat, and from under his long tunic come forth a pair of trouser-legs, introducing native shoes. The other wears the Chinese skull cap above a profuse pigtail, but the rest of his costume is entirely Western.

We now pass a Chinese tea-shop, the owner of which is a reputed millionaire. On the other side of the street is a house of which the basement is used as an opium den. This fact might have been unknown, except to regular habitues, had it not been made public a day or two ago under the following circumstances:—

The police, acting upon their suspicions, "raided" the premises, and haled the transgressors before the magistrate. Two had punishment meted out to them, but a third raised an ingenious defence. Said he—

"Yes, I was there, I cannot deny it; but not for the purpose you suppose. Having contracted the opium habit, I went to obtain a cure which I heard could be had there."

"Yes," said Mr. Proprietor Chinaman, "he say quite true. He got nasty habit, me cure him; quite right!" In the absence of contrary evidence, the prisoner was released, but the magistrate fears he will hear that defence again!

Passing this region, and another peopled by Italians hard by, we now have what an artist might call a "study in black and white," for here the Southern element is in force, as negro and white man pass each other in the proportion of about two to one. Here are shops, saloons, lodging-houses (more or less respectable) in thick profusion, peopled by stalwart men and Amazon women, while street and gutter are occupied with black little gamins of childhood's every age and size. Here, at any rate, English is spoken, so now we can get to work.

First we enter a second-hand-clothes shop, just such a one as referred to above, where a stranger can in a very few minutes have his appearance completely altered by the exchange of his garments for others of any style—ay, and a wig and whiskers too, should he have any motive for making the transformation more complete. The proprietor is unmistakably an Israelite. An hour ago we should probably have found his emporium closed, but at sunset his Sabbath ended, and he is now quite ready for business. He accepts and reads the card presented to him; he cannot understand why it should bear the word Sabbath instead of Sunday, and is anxious to debate the point.

But as we "have other fish to fry," and must hasten on, we ask him to send one of his household, if his business will not allow him to go himself. So he promises that at any rate the ticket shall not be wasted.

Soon a man on the pavement describes the ticket, and the meeting, and religion generally, as "all humbug," and ourselves as "a lot of fools." "No one ever came back from the dead to say there was any hereafter," he declares. "Well, friend," we reply, "Lazarus and one or two others have returned from beyond the grave, so you see you are not quite correct in your facts. But we need not go back so far as that for proof that Christianity is true. We shall reach the hereafter soon enough, but we have to face this life first. Suppose there were no hereafter, yet have you never seen a man who has ruined his life, and destroyed his business or his home by drink or evil living, who has 'turned religious,' as you call it? He gets a decent coat on his back, his wife loses her black eyes, his children's feet are covered, and their faces look bright and clean. What brought about such a change? His believing in Christ as the Saviour from all his sin. Man, you know in your heart these things are true, and if you have never benefited by them it has been because you would not put them to the test. Get your present and past sins forgiven, live a Christian life here, and the hereafter will come all right."

"Well, if you believe these things, I guess you will be all the better for 'em," with which admission he walks away, putting the ticket into his pocket, and leaving us silently praying that the word may prove to be "fitly spoken" and "in due season."

This little talk has gathered a crowd around us, to which we hand tickets as rapidly as possible ere it disperses. Continuing our errand from door to door and along the street, for the next half-hour we do not meet with any incident that calls for special mention here. Chaff, abuse, good-will and words of cheer, alternate with each other in such proportion as not to discourage us.

Presently we meet with the first rebuff encountered in a saloon. Having made it a matter of principle to address the proprietor or his deputy first of all, we usually secure his permission to hand round our invitations. In this case leave is granted by the landlady. Presently, however, a man whom we had taken for a customer, but who proves to be the landlord, raises serious objection to the proceedings; but being a German, his remarks are less fluent than forcible as he exclaims, "Do not come here to make fool out of yourself, such things in here to bring!" But relief comes from an unlooked-for source, as his buxom spouse bids him lie down and "not insult the gentlemen."

A more serious but not less amusing incident occurs lower down the street. A saloon keeper, becoming enraged at the invasion of his premises for such a purpose, tears up all the tickets he can grab from the hands of his customers, and summons a policeman to eject the perpetrator of the outrage. A burly form in blue promptly seizes the offender, who, however, by dint of a facetious remark, raises a laugh at the so it is that here and there we find those in whom the spirit of opposition prevails; but, on the other hand, many receive us kindly and with the courtesy that the poor often know so well how to show.

One thing is noticeable throughout. Even saloon-keepers and their friends know how to appreciate an honest man, and again and again they express their admiration for D. L. Moody, who for eighteen years officer's expense. This dispels the solemnity of the occasion, and we follow up our advantage by asking the landlord whether, if he objects to his customers going to the meeting, he will not represent them by going himself.

"Ah," he says, "you wouldn't welcome me if I did."

"Indeed we would," we reply; "see, here's a special ticket" (writing a pass to reserved seats on a visiting card).

"Then I'll go," he responds: "that's a bet." (Nor was this an idle boast. Like a man, he kept his word.) Needless to add, we are allowed to repeat our distribution among his customers, and the policeman, somewhat disappointed, resumes his beat alone. And had lived continuously in their city a noble, consistent Christian life. "Oh, we believe in him," they say; "pity there are not more like him. Guess we should all be the better if we followed his lead."

Thankful enough are we for this testimony, which affords opportunity to point from the man to his Master who had enabled him so to live, and to urge that those who thus saw his good works should glorify his Father that is in heaven.

We have at length parted with 3,000 tickets in eight hours,* while similar couples of workers have prayerfully given away 17,000 between them. And what of the meeting itself?

A splendid concourse of 8,000 persons gathered, with a majority of men of all classes, who listened with closest attention to an address longer than is Mr. Moody's wont; and although the hall did not afford facilities for an "after-meeting," some 500 young men responded to a special invitation to remain for a talk collectively. Many of these proved to be strangers in the city, whom the evangelist invited to attend the various services yet to be held during the summer.

Such an audience was the more remarkable seeing that Mr. Moody had already addressed 4,000 in a large theatre during the forenoon. And all this with the World's Fair, 7,000 saloons (public-houses), and the city theatres, music-halls, etc., open as on other days of the week.

This is but a sample of what has been going on all summer, from May to October, four large churches, seven tents, two theatres and numerous other buildings being kept in constant use, securing an aggregate attendance of many thousands on week-nights, and 40,000 to 50,000 on Sundays.

Two noteworthy features of this campaign may be pointed out:—

First, the large preponderance of men (70 to 80 per cent.) in every audience. Second, that Gospel meetings should be crowded by visitors and residents while places of secular amusement are languishing for lack of support.

Is Christianity a failure? Nay, in every land when faithfully represented it draws the people, and proves to be the power of God unto salvation to all who believe.

"MY LORD."

BY A. C. GARDNER.

"MY lord, come here this minute. Oh, Mr. Parker, do you call him; he won't mind me a bit;" then in a rapid descent from threatening to coaxing. "Now, there's a dear little gentleman, come out of that nasty, dirty water, getting your lovely new clothes in such a mess too—do, there's a dear."

"Shan't," was the offender's sole response.

The nurse turned once more appealingly to the gardener, who, leaning on his rake, was an amused spectator of the little scene.

"Mr. Parker, whatever shall I do?" she exclaimed in heartrending tones. "There's three times this blessed day, as sure as I'm alive, he's run away from me. He don't mind one word I say to him. Just look at him now, dancing up and down in that water like an imp of mischief. Oh, I could shake him, I could!"

An irrepressible guffaw only the more encouraged "my lord," who stood knee-deep in a small piece of ornamental water, which bounded one side of a smooth green lawn and had evidently at one time supplied a fountain—the remains of which still existed. The nymph in the centre holding a conch shell on her shoulder had once possessed a very lovely face, but it was sadly disfigured now; the graceful head was chipped and discoloured, and one slender arm had broken short off and had fallen into the shallow water, where the long grasses twined lovingly around it. Little Lord Donne had rested one hand carelessly on this frail support, and with his thick brown curls floating in the breeze was splashing and jumping about to his heart's content, tossing the water into a bright shower far above his head—not that that necessarily implied any very great height, for his small lordship stood but four feet nothing in his once dainty lace socks.

A handsome sturdy little fellow he was, who had never known a day's illness, with well-opened dark blue eyes full of fun and mischief, and a shock of soft hair that no amount of brushing would ever keep in order for more than two minutes together.

The mourning suit he wore, with its crape trimmings and broad sash, was now, alas, thickly bespattered with mud and slime, and in a condition generally calculated to drive any well-regulated nursemaid to despair.

Now, Lord Donne was not as a rule a disobedient child, but, as he argued to himself, was it not too much to expect of any boy that, let alone being made to wear a dress just like a girl's that old Aunt Marcia, horrid old thing, had ordered for him, out in the glorious sunshine he should be expected to walk about like any baby, hand in hand with his nurse, after being boxed up in a stuffy room all the morning, with a lot of nasty, fussy old men, who would pat him on the shoulder and call him a fine fellow, and he five years old, too? No, he was not going to stand it any more; he would have some fun at last. So "Parker," he shouted, "just see if I can't kick the water as high as that woman's nose."

Having achieved that glorious feat, and left the poor nymph shedding tears for the loss of her beauty, "my lord" suffered himself to be bribed out of his damp play-ground by the offer of a red-cheeked apple from the gardener, with whom he was great friends, and soon he was on his knees eagerly examining into the intricacies of the mowing machine.

"Did you ever see such a boy?" Jane exclaimed despairingly. "It's one person's work to see as he doesn't kill himself, let alone keep him clean. What Miss Mona'll say I am sure I don't know. It's no fault of mine! Look at him now, Mr. Parker—indeed and indeed, my lord, if you don't be good, I'll run straight in and tell your—" But here the girl stopped suddenly. There was now no "papa" to be told of his boy's naughtiness, no "papa" to be held up as a threat or a warning; for not more than three hours ago all that was mortal of the late Lord Donne had been deposited with great pomp and ceremony in the family vault.

Something in the nurse's unfinished sentence attracted the child's attention, for suddenly desisting from his new amusement, he sat down on the grass, and, crossing his legs in a little old-fashioned manner, he began eating his apple in a slow, meditative way, his eyes fixed on the clear sky overhead.

The thoughts which had troubled him at his father's funeral were again busy in his brain. Once more, in fancy, he stood by the open grave, looking down awed and wondering into the vast space, all the time pondering within his childish mind how it was possible that papa could get out of the horrid black box some cruel men had shut him in, and up, up through the deep hole so as to be able to fly away into the beautiful blue skies; for cousin Mona had told him that papa was an angel now, and angels, he knew, always had great white wings and flew about heaven—and he had laughed as he stood by the grave as he thought how funny papa would look as an angel, he was so tall and stern; and in all the pictures he had ever seen there were no angels who had moustaches!

Then—he even now felt himself grow red at the thought—he remembered how the clergyman had frowned at him and some of the people had looked shocked. Even Mona, his darling Mona, had seemed grieved, and had held his hand a little tighter.

To laugh at a funeral! and for the person who had done so terrible a thing to be the dead man's only son!

Yet how could those people see into the workings of that little boy's heart; how could they understand how the father, who lay in the massive silver-mounted coffin, could be to his only child a father in name alone, a person to be feared, to be dreaded, not loved, whose only recognition of his son had been a few formal words morning and evening or a cold hand-clasp—never a kiss, never a caress to the motherless little one, in whom the father saw not the helpless babe, but the unconscious cause of his wife's death, that wife the only being in the wide world he had ever cared for.

The doctor's words, "The baby will live, but Lady Donne must die," had in that one moment closed for ever the father's heart against his little son.

"Reggie, Reggie, where are you?" came in clear accents through the still air; and, day-dreams all forgotten, the child threw away his half-eaten apple and ran forward to meet a slender black-robed figure, who was coming swiftly forward, and who knelt on the grass and took him in her arms.

Little Lord Donne, though usually very mindful of his dignity, submitted to her caresses willingly, but looked a little shamefaced when she glanced next from his flushed face to his bespattered dress.

"Oh, Reggie dear!" she began; then changing her tone, "but I won't wait to scold now; I have been looking for you everywhere. Come in with me; someone wants to see you."

On the wide stone terrace a gentleman was standing watching the pair as they advanced.

At sight of him the boy darted forward and clasped him impetuously round the knees.

"It's cousin Rex," he cried delightedly, "my own cousin Rex! Oh, Rex, won't we have fun together now you are come, you and Mona and me! It will be just like old times."

For an instant the young man and the girl exchanged glances: the same thought in the minds of both—like old times! "Would it ever be the same again?"

Just one year ago the three had met for the first time, which was when Mrs. Meredith and her daughter had come to stay at the Park. Now, Lord Donne had never cared particularly for his half-sister Marcia. She had been one of the foremost to object to his marriage, though she had less right to do so than anyone else, being but his mother's daughter by a former husband, consequently no real relation to him at all. He was a man who resented interference, and he never forgave her the part she played then, so, when she wrote suggesting a short visit to him, although he could not in decency put her off, yet he hit upon a plan for making her stay a short one. Knowing her views with regard to her daughter's making a good match, he wrote to his dead brother's only son, a clerk in the Foreign office, cordially inviting him to spend a few weeks at Donne Park.

He knew the young man had not a farthing beyond his pay, and he promised himself some amusement out of the once dreaded visit.

All turned out exactly as he had wished. Mona and Reginald, or, as he was called, Rex Donne, fell in love with each other as promptly as could be desired. Lord Donne took care that they should have every opportunity for doing so, whilst he smiled grimly over Mrs. Meredith's ill-concealed wrath and chagrin. That visit was the one bright spot in Reggie's life; for in the rides, drives and impromptu picnics the happy lovers did not forget the little lonely boy; but it came to an end all too soon; matters at last reached such a climax that one morning boxes were hurriedly packed, and Mona, all tears, was whisked off by her indignant mother, who loudly declared that she had been the victim of a plot, and that she would never set foot in Donne Park again. The next day the dog-cart took Rex to the station, and with him every vestige of Reggie's pleasant time disappeared. From that day to this, the lovers had not met.

After Rex had affectionately greeted little Reggie, he turned to Mona, and took both her hands in his.

"And now tell me," he said, in a tone as if they had parted but a few hours ago, "how and where you have managed to spend the last year."

"In so many different places," she answered, tossing back her bright hair: "France, Switzerland, Germany—mamma was determined to let me see the world and society. We spent the winter in Nice, the spring in Rome; it was there that news reached us of Lord Donne's illness. Then of course we came on here at once, but we were too late to see him alive."

"And after all, did Mrs. Meredith succeed in making you forget me?" Rex asked, ignoring the latter part of her speech. Mona met his eyes for a moment, then her own fell, and a vivid blush overspread her face.

Rex clasped her fingers still more tightly, but said nothing further then.

Little Reggie stood by a patient listener, looking with pleased eyes from one to the other. He had often made a third in similar little scenes.

"Mona looks very pretty to-day, Rex, doesn't she?" he remarked presently, critically surveying his blushing cousin. "She has such nice red cheeks." Whereupon Mona bent down to kiss him and to hide those same cheeks from Rex's gaze.

"And now, sir, give an account of yourself," she said after a pause, during which she was busily arranging little Lord Donne's necktie; "pray what brought you here; and what do you think mamma will say to you?"

Rex drew a comical face.

"Poor Mrs. Meredith! I really do think she would like me well enough if I were not such a terrible detrimental—that is an unpardonable sin in her eyes. And what do you think now, Mona?—by way of a climax, she and I are made joint guardians of this young gentleman! I had a letter from Brown and Jephson yesterday, summoning me here, but I could not get away in time to hear the will read; not that it made much difference, for my name was not mentioned as a legatee."

"Then that explains it," said Mona thoughtfully. "I could not make out what was the matter with mamma; she locked the door of her room so that I should not see her, and she looked so angry when she came out of the library after seeing the lawyers—she pushed me away when I went up to her."

Mona had tears in her eyes as she said this. Her mother might be harsh, unsympathetic, often unjust, but with it all she loved her very dearly.

Rex looked at her compassionately.

"Perhaps she is afraid that I shall make too much of my rights as guardian," he went on, knowing that Mrs. Meredith must have guessed the drift of his uncle's will, and that her daughter had not. "If so, she need not be afraid. You and she together will look after Reggie better than I could; my duties will not begin before his school-days, at any rate, and by that time who knows what may happen? someone may take it into his head to leave me a large fortune."

He was laughing, but Reggie was gazing into his face with very serious eyes.

"Are you very poor, then, cousin Rex?"

"Well, I could do with more money than I have, laddie."

keep one room that we would call Reggie's room, and you should have your own pony that no one else, not even Mona, should ride on——"

"Yes, Mona could," said Reggie, looking at her lovingly. "But go on, Rex—what next?"

"Tea next, laddie, if I mistake not," as a servant appeared from the house to summon his little lordship to the nursery; "no, don't ask Mona to go in with

"Rex replied only by hoisting the little fellow on to his broad shoulder."—p. 27.

"What would you do if you were rich, Rex?" the child continued.

"Well, let me see," Rex answered gaily, falling into the little fellow's humour. "In the first place, I would have a beautiful house, as big, perhaps, as Donne, full of lovely pictures and statues; then I should have plenty of servants, plenty of horses, plenty of carriages, then, best of all—stoop down, Reggie" (he had caught the boy in his arms)—"I must whisper this—best of all, our dear Mona should be the queen of it all; now, isn't that fine?"

"And where should I be, Rex?"

"Oh, by that time you would be a big boy, in school, perhaps, making a lot of friends and learning to play cricket and football, and having no end of a good time, and, of course, you would come over and spend all your holidays with us. We would always

you. You have had her to yourself for the whole of three days; you must spare her to me now."

Lord Donne seemed at first a little inclined to rebel. It had been Mona's custom to have a cup of tea at the same time that he took his; but after a short struggle with himself, he went off obediently, chattering volubly as usual. He looked back once to shout out—

"Make haste and get rich, Rex!"

The others watched him disappear within doors. There was a smile on both faces, for they were very fond of their small cousin, who all unconsciously barred the way for Rex to rank and fortune. Perhaps that thought had more than once crossed his mind. Perhaps he had at times felt inclined to quarrel with the fate that had given so much to a little boy, a mere child, and had left him, so to speak, out in the cold, working hard for his living, and yet not being able to offer a home to the girl he loved. When these thoughts did come—for it would be useless to deny that they came sometimes—it is but fair to add that Rex did fierce battle with them, and never allowed them to gain the mastery over him.

Little Reggie's merry voice had died away into silence when Rex turned to Mona.

"I have many things to say, dear, which cannot be said here. Will you come with me to the old place?"

She suffered him to draw her hand within his arm, and together they walked in silence away from the house with its many staring windows, on and on, following the windings of a little path which threaded its way among a grove of noble oak trees—a path well known to both, and which presently widened into a smooth, moss-carpeted glade. Here Rex stopped and faced his companion.

"Darling!" he said, "here, in this very place, we were interrupted a year ago, when I would have told you of my love. I believed then that though no words were spoken, you knew that I should never love anyone but you; and now, after one look into your dear true eyes, I know that you too are unchanged. Still, Mona, darling Mona, let me hear it from your lips as well. Are you my Mona still?"

"Can you doubt it, dear Rex?" she answered, quite simply; and she let him clasp her to him and press kiss after kiss upon her lips. Then, still with an arm round her waist, he drew her head down to his shoulder, where it rested contentedly.

"A year ago!" he began presently, in half-laughing tones. "Is it possible that twelve months have actually gone by since we last stood here and your mother appeared upon the scene? How severe she was, and how frightened we both were! Darling, what would you do now if the branches of that tree yonder were suddenly parted and you saw her face looking in upon us? Tell me, love, would you shrink and tremble as you did then, and creep closer to me until I could hear your heart beat against my arm?"

"I should be braver now, Rex," she answered, with a swift upward glance into his handsome face. "I should say now that I loved you with all my heart and soul, and that neither life nor death should separate us."

"My own sweetheart," said Rex, softly laying his cheek against hers. "You know, my darling, that I cannot claim you yet," he continued, after a short pause. "That we may have to wait for years even?"

"Yes, Rex, I know it; but I can be patient."

"You will have a hard time of it, dearest," he said, rather ruefully. "Your mother will do all in her power to try and banish me from your memory; and can I blame her? Then there are sure to be lots of fellows only too ready to come forward; fellows with heaps of money too; confound them!"

Mona laughed.

"What a silly boy you are! Now, suppose I began to talk to you of all the pretty girls you must meet day by day in London, girls with lots of money too"—she mimicked his doleful tones—"I have no doubt I might make myself very jealous if I chose." Then she added, more seriously, "Can you not trust me, dear?"

Rex had repented of his words almost as soon as they were spoken.

"I am wrong, dear one, very wrong, I will—I do trust you thoroughly. There, I won't torment myself with such unworthy thoughts any more. Now, darling, I want you to tell me what you thought of my letting you be taken away from me a year ago, with seemingly so little opposition on my part. Did you think very meanly of me?"

"I don't know what I should have thought," said Mona very demurely, "if I had not happened to see your letter to mamma."

"No! did she show it to you?" cried Rex in surprise. "That was very good of her. I never hoped for that."

Mona turned and wound her arms caressingly round one of his, and though she tried to speak playfully, her voice trembled.

"Yes; she said it was right I should see it, and so I read how my dear boy promised that he would not say a word of love to me nor try to see me even, for a whole year. He said that he owed it to the mother of his darling—his darling—he said, Rex, that he should not take advantage of her daughter's youth, and that perhaps, after all, her love for him was only a passing fancy. Foolish boy! as if I did not know my own mind! and then the letter left off by saying at the end of that year—oh, Rex, silly, silly Rex—" her voice faltered.

"At the end of that," cried Rex triumphantly, finishing the sentence for her as he caught her in his arms, "not all the mothers in the world should keep my darling from me if she still cared for me. Mona, the year is up to-day; I knew your whereabouts all the time, thanks to poor uncle Donne, though perhaps his motives were none of the best, and if I had not heard that I should meet you here, I should have followed you to Rome, there to learn my fate. Now, sweetheart, let us delay no longer, let us come in at once and tell your mother all. She may be more generous than we think."

So they slowly moved away from the place which had witnessed so many happy meetings, and side by side wended their way across the wide lawn back to the house.

"Reggie will be pleased, at any rate," said Rex, the first to break the long silence.

"Yes, dear little boy."

"We must tell him of it together, Mona; I wouldn't miss his expression for worlds."

Then they laughed, but not very heartily, for both dreaded the interview with Mrs. Meredith.

Reggie had been eagerly watching for their return from the nursery window, and directly he caught sight of them rushed down-stairs and on to the terrace to meet them.

"What an age you have been, you two!" he called out, as soon as they were within earshot. "Nurse wouldn't let me go and look for you, because she said I ought to be punished for getting my clothes in a mass—and so I timed you by the big clock over the stables, and you have been away a whole hour and a half!"

He looked so aggrieved that the others felt bound to apologise.

"Well, old fellow, we have had a lot to talk about," said Rex; and, "Dear Reggie, I am so sorry," from Mona.

Lord Donne thrust both hands into his pockets, and stared at them solemnly.

Mona felt a little guilty under his gaze.

"A lot to talk about," he said contemptuously: "I should think you had, to take a whole hour and a half! Wasn't it rather mean of you, cousin Rex, when I gave Mona up to you, to keep her so long?"

Rex replied only by hoisting the little fellow on to his broad shoulder.

"What did you talk about?" his lordship next inquired curiously.

"Tell him, Mona," said Rex, looking at her roguishly.

She stammered and hesitated, but could apparently find no words.

Reggie regarded her rather patronisingly from his height, and steadied himself by putting one small hand on her head as she walked beside him.

"Never mind, Mona.—Rex, you say."

"Well then, laddie, I'll tell you one thing I said. I asked Mona to be my wife some day."

"Oh—and then?"

"Why, then I believe I kissed her."

"Oh, that's nothing; I often do. I meant, what did she say?"

"The darling girl said yes, she would marry me some day."

Little Lord Donne was very thoughtful for a moment or so.

"Some day," he repeated presently; "does that mean when you are rich, Rex?"

"Yes, dear boy."

He was so quiet after this that Mona looked at him anxiously.

"You are not sorry, Reggie, are you?"

"Sorry, Mona? Oh no! very, very glad; I was only thinking of something."

"Well, out with it, laddie," said Rex kindly.

He hesitated a little.

"I wanted to know if it is true what Jane told me just now."

"And what did she say?"

"Why, she said that I had lots and lots of money, and that this house is mine, and the gardens, and everything, and that even the shops and the post-office in the village are all mine. It isn't true, Rex, is it?"

The child's voice was trembling, and Rex could see there were tears in his eyes.

"Should you not like it to be true, Reggie?" he asked very quietly.

"Oh no, I think it is horrid," he said, fairly bursting out crying, "that just a little boy like me should have so much, and you be poor. Rex, dear Rex, can't I give it all to you and Mona?"

Rex sat down on the stone balustrade that ran round the terrace, and waited until Mona had somewhat soothed the excited boy; then, seating him on his knee, he spoke—

"Now listen to me, old fellow," he began, "and I will try and make things a bit clear to you. It is true that by the time you are a man you will be very rich indeed; but only think, Reggie, of all the good you will be able to do with your money. You will be able to build cottages for those who have no houses to live in, hospitals where poor people and children who are ill can go and be made well—"

Reggie interrupted him impatiently.

"But you can do all that, Rex, and the sick people won't have to wait so long. Oh do, do take my money."

"My dear little boy, it is quite impossible," his cousin said, trying to suppress a smile. "Why, people wouldn't let you give away your money; and if I took it from you, what do you think would be done to me? I should be locked up in prison for a long, long time, and then what would become of Mona! That would be a fine piece of work! No, no, my boy, we must be patient. I shall go up to London to-morrow, and work like a horse, and perhaps by the time you are a man I shall be rich, too."

He thought he had quite convinced Reggie, and with a slight sigh, got up as if to go into the house, but the boy pulled him down again.

"Is it only because I am a little child that I can't give you the money?"

"That's about it, Reggie."

"And when I am a man, I can do what I like?"

"With a great deal of it, yes."

"But what if I don't ever grow up to be a man?"

Reggie said, in a tone almost of horror.

Rex jumped up quickly.

"I'll tell you what it is, laddie, I am quite stiff with sitting here so long: I am going to have one race up and down the terrace. Now, see who'll get to the last vase of geraniums first. Reggie, start fair; your foot is at least an inch before Mona's!"

In a moment everything but the excitement of the race was forgotten, and when little Lord Donne, all flushed and breathless, his curls streaming behind him, triumphantly came in first, every vestige of the previous conversation had vanished from his mind.

But those last words of his were never forgotten by the other two. "What if I don't ever grow up to be a man!"

CHAPTER II.

FOUR days passed by, and yet the dreaded interview with Mrs. Meredith did not take place, for that lady either was or professed to be so ill that she not only denied herself to her nephew, but kept Mona in constant attendance upon her.

Reggie proved himself invaluable during that time, being a most faithful little messenger to and fro. He was highly delighted with the trust confided to him, and bore himself generally with a great air of importance.

To Rex, however, those four days had leaden wings. The greater part of his week's leave of absence had gone, and save for that one day, he had not even seen Mona. He knew that her mother was purposely keeping her out of his way, and he half-suspected that her illness was imaginary, so he lounged about the place in an aimless sort of manner, firmly determining in his own mind that matters should come to a crisis before he left.

He had taken up his quarters at the village inn: Mrs. Meredith never having suggested his staying at Donne Park, although he was a near connection of hers, and she was generally noted for her courtesy and good breeding—yet, where her daughter's future interests were in question, all else must be forgotten.

Poor Rex was sitting gloomily enough on a garden-chair which he had dragged into the full blaze of the summer's sun; his father's regiment had been stationed in India, where he was born, and his early years were spent there, which may account for his predilection for great heat. He had been reviewing his prospects, not for the first time by any means, and the result had not been satisfactory, for his brow was clouded with care, and his cigar had not only been allowed to go out, but lay unheeded on the gravel path.

No amount of calculation would double his income or increase his savings; the last year he had managed to put by a little, certainly, but such a very little, after all was said and done, and he became very melancholy as the chances of his marriage seemed so remote.

"I don't know what else I can cut off," he said to himself ruefully. "I never drink anything; I'm sure my tailor's bills are small enough—I feel at times positively shabby. There's smoking, certainly!"—here he stooped and picked up the cigar, and looked at it affectionately. He paused, and gave a huge sigh. "Yes, I will do it. I'll do it for her—she's worth any amount of sacrifice. Come, my old friend, I will smoke you to the very end; you are the last cigar I shall have for many a long day!"

He was a little comforted that he had hit upon a plan for saving a few more pounds, and began to feel more cheerful. He then, for the first time, became aware that Reggie was not with him; the little fellow had been sitting on the grass by his side half an hour ago, basking in the July sun with as great an appreciation of it as ever his big cousin had; but he had been so absorbed in a volume of "Robinson Crusoe" that Rex had scarcely noticed him. Now, however, both boy and book had disappeared.

Rex rose up with a slight feeling of compunction.

"He must have run off whilst I was at those abominable accounts," he ejaculated. "Poor child; he has had a lonely life enough; the least I can do is to try and amuse him a bit. I have it! I'll take him for a long ramble; he'll like that, and there's plenty of time if we start at once."

One of the under-gardeners happening to pass by, Rex hailed him.

"Have you seen Lord Donne anywhere?"

"Yes, sir; not a minute ago he was running as hard as he could go towards the shrubbery."

There the young man hurried, but for some time he looked in vain for the child. He was turning away when the sound of sobbing attracted his attention, and, pushing aside some overhanging bushes, he at last discovered him.

Flung face downwards on the grass at the foot of an arbutus, there Reggie lay, crying as if his heart would break, his whole frame convulsed with grief.

Rex stood still in utter astonishment. Was that the merry, mischief-loving little light-hearted boy, with whom tears at all were a rare occurrence, who was weeping in such a strange, unchildlike manner? He scarcely knew what to do, and longed for Mona to be there—still, it would never do to let the little fellow cry on; he must do something.

He went up to him, and kneeling by his side, put one hand gently on the bowed shoulder.

The boy started as if he had been shot.

"Oh, Rex, is it you? Please, please go away," and he tried to hide his tear-stained face with both his small palms.

Rex put his arms round him and drew him to a sitting posture.

"Tell me what it is all about, laddie. Hush, dear boy! don't sob like that—you frightened me. There, stay so, with your head on my shoulder for a minute or two, and by-and-by you can speak to me."

"Oh, I can't tell you, Rex; I can't tell anybody."

He was getting so agitated that his cousin refrained from pressing him; he only said quietly—

"Do you know, Reggie, that if you cry any more you will be quite ill! and you wouldn't like that, would you?"

He was not prepared for the answer.

"I would, I would," the child said energetically.

"Oh, I would like to be very, very ill."

Rex was really shocked.

"Reggie," he began, very gravely, "you must tell me what has happened. I don't like to see my dear little boy so distressed. If you don't tell me yourself, I must take means to find out."

If he thought that would rouse him he was mistaken, for Lord Donne never moved.

"Has Jane been unkind?"

The child shook his head.

"Have you done anything naughty, then, that you are afraid of being punished for? Ah, that's what it is, I'll be bound! Come, laddie, don't be afraid; old Rex will beg you off—no matter what it is. There! that's a bargain."

"No, Rex, I can't tell you—I wish I could—but it's no use." The disjointed sentences came in gasps: "I haven't been naughty—it isn't that—but oh, I do wish I were dead."

Rex saw it would be only cruelty to torment him further. The first burst of grief having somewhat subsided, he seemed worn out; so, taking him up, he carried him into the house, and delivered him into Jane's charge with strict injunctions not to leave him; then, hoping it was only some exaggerated childish trouble that would disappear by the morrow, he walked rapidly towards the inn, for he suddenly remembered that he had several business letters to write which must be sent off by that day's mail.

The letters took up more of his time than he had anticipated. Truth to tell, thoughts of Reggie and his grief, would come continually between him and the paper; and he had scarcely finished them when his landlady came in to lay the cloth for his dinner.

"What, dinner already, Mrs. Jennison!" he said in a tone of annoyance as he looked at his watch. "I thought I should have had time to run up to the Park."

"Yes, sir; it has gone six, but there's no such hurry for them letters; the post don't go out till half-past, and my Sam won't take five minutes going to the office."

"I have positively been three hours over them," said Rex to himself, as he unfolded his table napkin. "I do hope that dear little boy is all right; he quite worries me. Hark! Mrs. Jennison, what's that?" he cried suddenly; "it sounds very much like a runaway horse!"

"Yes, sir, it do," said the woman, going over to the window and peering out; "Lor', sir, whatever can be the matter? It's one of the grooms from the Park, and he's coming here, I do believe."

In another moment Rex had flown down-stairs, and was outside just as the man, panting and almost breathless, drew rein by the inn door.

"Accident up at the house, sir," he gasped out; "Lord Donne, sir; I'm just on my way to the doctor's," and was off again at full speed.

Rex never waited for his hat, but bareheaded as he was ran through the village and up the lane which led to Donne, almost before the words were out of the man's mouth. The park was traversed in a very few seconds, and with one bound he was up the stone steps and into the hall.

There the first thing he saw was a group of frightened servants, conspicuous among whom was Jane, who was weeping bitterly, her apron to her eyes.

Mona came swiftly forwards to meet him, her face as white as death.

"They have not moved him," she began, speaking hurriedly. "He is there, just where he fell."

"How did it happen?" Rex asked briefly.

"He was sliding down the banisters, and must have turned giddy, we think; but all we know is that there was a scream, and then a crash, oh, such an awful crash!"—Mona shuddered—"the sound rings in my ears now."

Rex went quickly to where the little fellow lay. Someone had placed a pillow under his head, and thrown a rug across him. He looked very much as if he had just fallen asleep, save that his cheeks were too pale, and he was so quiet, so very quiet.

As the young man gazed at him, the thought struck him for the first time what a very lovely woman Lady Donne must have been. They always said her son exactly resembled her.

He knelt down and placed his hand upon the child's heart: he fancied it beat, but was not sure.

He looked questioningly into Mona's face.

"He moaned when we tried to raise him," she said in a low voice, the tears falling down her cheeks. "Oh, he lives—he must live; he can't be very badly hurt!"

As if in answer to her words, Reggie at that moment unclosed his eyes.

"Do you know me, laddie?" said Rex, bending over him.

Little Lord Donne looked at him in a dazed manner.

"Old fellow, it's Rex—you know Rex?"

"Yes, I know Rex," the child repeated, as if he were saying a lesson.

Just then the doctor appeared, a good-tempered-looking, red-faced little gentleman, who had known Lord Donne from babyhood.

The first thing he did before making his examination was to administer a restorative which brought the colour a little back to the white cheeks.

"Well, young sir, and pray what new mischief have you been up to? Sliding down the banisters, eh? Ah, that's it! If ever I have any children, I shall buy a house where there are no banisters. What are you laughing at, eh?"

"What a funny house!" Reggie said, in a weak little tone.

The doctor went on talking as he rapidly passed his hands over the child's limbs.

"Well, how do you feel? As if you could run up-stairs and come sliding down again, eh? Where are you hurt? Come, tell me."

"My foot hurts," said Reggie; "nothing else."

In a moment the shoe and sock were off, and a large bruise was discernible on the delicate flesh.

"Pooh! that's nothing," said the doctor, "not even the skin broken! Now, see if you can move."

The boy tried to obey, but could do no more than raise his head. He sank back with a sigh.

The brisk little man was watching him intently.

"Ah—hum!" he ejaculated, as he saw the failure; "does your back feel bad?"

"No; only I feel so heavy and funny altogether, and my head is just like it was that time when I drank all the wine out of the decanters."

There was a tiny gleam of fun in his eyes.

"Ah, I remember; nice young rascal you were then, and a nice job I had to make you take the emetic."

"You won't give me medicine now, doctor, will you?"

"No, no; don't be afraid: I shan't give you medicine," said the doctor cheerily.

A close observer would have discovered that the cheerfulness was forced, and Rex, who stood the nearest to him, was almost certain that he saw tears in the little man's eyes.

As he rose after his examination, Mona went up to him.

"It's nothing very serious, is it, Dr. Farmer?"—she was feeling reassured by his manner—"Reggie will soon be about again, I hope?"

"Nothing very serious, my dear young lady!" he exclaimed, as he drew her a little aside; "but, indeed, it is VERY serious—very serious!" he repeated.

"Is he going to be very ill, then?"

"He will not be long ill," said the doctor, laying a stress upon the word.

"Doctor, you don't mean—you can't mean—" Mona gasped out as she seized his arm.

"Hush! he must not be agitated," he said, warningly, guessing the right way of calming her, "you will only hasten the end!"

The poor girl gave a faint groan, and staggered back. Rex's arms were open to receive her, and they tightened round her protectingly.

Presently she raised her head.

"I will be calm now, Dr. Farmer; I won't give way again. I must learn all there is to be done."

"That's brave," said the little man, approvingly. "Now all you have got to do is to keep him and yourself as quiet and composed as possible; he will suffer no pain—he will go off as peacefully as if he were falling to sleep."

"And when will it be?" Rex asked, knowing that Mona could not put the question.

"I do not know exactly: you see, the back is broken, and there are internal injuries besides; I cannot tell how far these may extend. He may die early in the night—more possibly before morning approaches. He will certainly not see another day."

"Die in the night—this night?" Mona asked, in a tone of such utter horror, and with such white lips, that the doctor turned sharply to Rex.

"Better take her out and give her some fresh air; she will break down in a minute; then let her have a good cry—that will relieve her."

"You will stay here, I presume?" said Rex to the doctor anxiously, as he prepared to follow his advice.

"No, no; I can do nothing, or I would—and there are some pressing cases in the village yonder—I can do no good here. I will see if I can move him up-stairs, where he will be more comfortable, and then I must be off. Sad business, very—nice little boy, too."

Under his supervision Reggie was carefully placed on a mattress, which was then carried up-stairs and placed on the bedstead in his own little room, a snug little chamber facing the west.

Then the doctor approached to take leave.

Reggie's little hand seemed quite lost in the doctor's large palm.

"Well, sir, I've got to say good-bye. Lots of other sick folks waiting to see me."

"What were you all talking about in the hall?" the child asked, without answering his remark. "Was it about me?"

"Heyday, what's all this! Can't we talk about anyone else, pray?"

He tried to speak carelessly, but he could not meet the little fellow's penetrating gaze.

"You were talking about me," Reggie said confidently, "and I believe I am going to be very ill, Dr. Farmer. Am I going to die?"

The doctor blew his nose vigorously.

"Dying, indeed! and what do you know about dying?"

"I don't know much about it," the child said, looking with great solemn eyes full in the doctor's face, "but I know I should like to die."

For once in his life, Dr. Farmer was at a loss for words; his eyes wavered and fell.

"It would be better for everybody if I died," the little fellow went on; "and Mona says that Heaven is, oh, lots better than here; and then, mamma is in heaven you know."

"Ah—hum! yes, of course."

"I heard you tell Mona, 'before morning,'" Reggie went on persistently; "was that about me too? was I to die before morning?"

"There, there, there, I can't stop talking any longer. Good-bye, my little man: God bless you."

Yes, actually the cynical old doctor, who was more than suspected of holding very peculiar, if not positively atheistic views, said "God bless you," to the little boy who lay there dying.

It was as well none of his supporters were there to hear him.

Then he stooped down and touched the child's lips with his grizzled moustache, a thing he had never done before, and hurried from the room.

On the threshold he met Mona, outwardly at least composed.

"Don't weary him with much undressing," he said, as he stood aside to let her pass; "and one thing more. You are spared a great deal; the child knows he is dying."

The evening was very still and warm. The windows were thrown wide open, but not a breath of air stirred the lace curtains or fanned little Reggie's brow.

The sun was sinking in all its splendour behind the distant hills, and the sky was flecked with tiny cloudlets of purple and crimson.

The child had not spoken for a long time, but lay quietly with one hand fondly clasped in Mona's.

Rex stood a little in the shadow of the bed, and all three were silently watching the glorious sunset.

There were no tears—but few sighs. Though all knew well that little Lord Donne would never again see another day draw to its close, yet all was so calm and peaceful that there seemed no place for grief.

Suddenly the great clock over the stables struck eight.

"That's my bedtime," said Reggie excitedly, "and, Mona, I haven't said my prayers."

"Say them now, dear."

"But I can't kneel," he said, with a little sob in his voice; "it won't seem like prayers."

"Never mind, my darling—the dear Lord knows you can't help it. See, I will kneel for you."

"Yes, that will do," he said, contentedly; then, folding his hands together, he closed his eyes. Rex hid his face, too, and for a short time there was perfect silence in the room.

Presently Reggie stirred, and gave a sigh of satisfaction.

"I said my hymn, too, to-day; I don't always, you know, but I thought I had better when I was going to die; and, Mona, wasn't it funny—you know how the last verse goes—

"Here let me wait with patience,
Wait till the night is o'er,
Wait till I see the morning
Break on the golden shore."

Isn't it exactly as if it were written on purpose?"

Mona could only stoop and kiss him.

"Rex," he said by-and-bye, looking up into his cousin's face, "you will marry Mona very soon, won't you?"

"Yes, dear boy, if you wish it."

"Oh, I do, I do, so much—and you will be very happy, won't you?"

"Don't you know how we shall miss you, darling?" Mona answered, with a little break in her voice. "We can't be very happy just at first."

"Then as soon as you can," he said, rubbing his cheek on her hand. "Promise you won't miss me for very long, or I shall be sorry I am going to die, not glad."

"Glad!—oh, Reggie!"

"Yes, dear; you know what I mean; for then Rex will have my money."

Mona looked up frightened into Rex's face.

He came forward and bent over the bed.

"Reggie, my boy, how did you know—who told you I should have the money—afterwards?"

The boy answered rather dreamily—

"I heard Jane talking about it to-day—was it to-day? it seems so long ago—she was talking to Morgan, the gardener, who squints. I was on the other side of the hedge."

"And what did they say?"

"Jane said you were in love with Mona, and then Morgan said it was a pity you were not 'my lord,' for then you would have plenty of money and could marry her; but now you were as poor as a church mouse, and must just about hate me—a little brat of a boy—for standing in your way."

So long a speech tired the little fellow, and he lay back panting on the pillows; but he evidently had something else which must be said, he looked so earnestly in Rex's face.

"When you found me to-day—you know when—I had just heard them. I couldn't tell you then, but I can now."

"And do you think I hate you, laddie?" He tried in vain to steady his voice.

"No, Rex—oh, no, dear Rex!" was the eager reply;

"I never thought it; but I couldn't help being glad when Dr. Farmer said I should die. It wasn't wrong, was it? but I was glad!"

The young man drew a long deep breath, and his troubled gaze for one moment met Mona's. There was an expression in her eyes of almost terror-stricken horror as with parted lips and clasped hands she leant forward. Had the suspicion momentarily occurred to her that what had happened was not purely accidental?

Perhaps he read something of her half-framed thought, for he bent quickly over the child once more.

"Reggie, my boy, you never told me how this came about—this tumble of yours, you know. How did it all happen?"

The little white lips quivered, and large tears welled up into the big dark eyes.

"Oh, Rex, I was so naughty. I am so sorry now—

"Nothing, my darling," he replied gently. "Do you not see that he is happy in the very knowledge that we shall owe all to him—that he has given me my wife? Don't let him see your tears, love; it will sadden him, and he is dying so peacefully."

So they returned to Reggie's side, and for a long, long time no one spoke.

Mona now and then whispered in the child's ear.

"Yes, sir—my lord, I mean."—p. 33.

but I was running away from Jane. She was wanting to brush my hair, and she does pull it so; and I knew the quickest way was to slide down the banisters. I'd done it hundreds of times before, and never got hurt. Rex, don't be angry with me; I'll never do it again."

The old unconscious childish promise! How strange it sounded now!

Rex laid his lips tenderly on the little fellow's brow.

"I'm not angry with you, laddie—never think that. There, don't speak any more for a bit. Forgive you, dear boy? yes, with all my heart and soul!"

Then he went over to Mona, who was trying to suppress her sobs.

"Oh, Rex, how cruel of them—how cruel!" she said, piteously. "If he had only not heard those servants talking so heedlessly, so wickedly! Oh, what can we do?"

and he answered in the same tone; but Rex could not catch a word of what they said, only after each sentence he saw the little face grow more calm and tranquil.

And so, one by one, the last beams of the sun faded away, and all became grey and chill.

Mona rose and gently closed the windows, but no one suggested lights; it seemed as if they wished to make the day as long as possible. Was it not his last?

"Rex?" said Reggie once more, after a long silence.

"Yes, laddie."

"Isn't that Thomas outside?"

"Yes, my boy, I think so."

"Please, I want to see him."

So the old servant was summoned and stood respectfully near the door, looking with pity and awe at the dimly defined figure of his little master.

"Thomas, do you know I am going to die?"

The man felt a choking in his throat, and could not answer until another more peremptory "Thomas!" made him say reluctantly—

"Yes, my lord."

"Then by to-morrow morning Mr. Donne will be 'my lord' instead of me."

"Yes, my lord," repeated the man, in wonder this time.

"So I want you now, before me, to call him 'my lord,' just once, so that I may hear, or else I shan't ever, and I do want to."

There was an awkward pause; Thomas fidgeted about uneasily from one foot to the other. At last, willing to humour the little boy's wish, Rex gave some trifling order, to which the man responded—

"Yes, sir—my lord, I mean!" and fairly bolted from the room.

Reggie closed his eyes with a sigh of relief.

"That's right!" he said, in a tone of great satisfaction; "now I don't think I want anything more."

As the night advanced, his mind began to wander, and then the cousins learnt how much the idea had taken hold of him that he was better dead, better out of the way; that he was only a little useless boy, and that he was "in Rex's way—in Rex's way," as he pathetically reiterated again and again.

Poor Mona's tears fell thick and fast as she listened to the feeble voice; even Rex's caresses and entreaties were for once powerless to assuage her grief; it was in vain he tried to soothe her.

At about three o'clock the dying boy's delirium vanished, but the look in his eyes made Mona send for Aunt Marcia, who came in feebly crying and wringing her hands. She had begged that she should not be summoned unless it was absolutely necessary, as she could not look upon pain, and her nerves were so highly strung that she felt she should be useless in a sick-room.

As soon as she saw the little white face lying back on the pillows, she wailed out—

"Mona, how can you stay there and watch him die?" and forthwith went off into a fit of hysterics.

Mona bent over Reggie anxiously as Mrs. Meredith was taken from the room; she so feared that the noise had disturbed him; but he had evidently seen and heard nothing of what had happened; he lay there quite quietly, with his eyes closed.

Once he spoke, but so softly that she had to place her ear very close to his mouth to catch the words.

"Before morning," he said, "before morning!" and then she knew he was referring to the doctor's words.

Suddenly he opened his large eyes to their fullest extent and looked with a rapt expression into the beautiful face leaning over him.

"It is almost morning, Mona!"

"Yes, darling, almost."

Rex went to the window and drew aside the blind.

"Not almost, dear boy, but quite. See! the morning has come!"

And, indeed, the short summer's night had ended, the first streaks of dawn already appeared in the sky—but for Reggie there was no daybreak on this earth. For him

" . . . the morning Broke on the golden shore."

THE WORKING MEN OF THE BIBLE.

HARVESTERS AND FISHERMEN.

(From a Tomb at Ghiseh, temp. 17th Dynasty. Slab now in the British Museum.)

AS we turn over the pages of the Bible we cannot but be impressed by the number of working people mentioned in it, and with the variety of their occupations. To be sure, there is also frequent mention of many kings and queens, princes and kings' daughters, lords and leaders. But before we come to these, as we turn over page after page, and note the scenes described on them—the far-off land, the distant age, the glowing Eastern skies—we read of many working people of different kinds. There are husbandmen, those who tended flocks, fed cattle, tilled the ground, and sowed seed; there are those engaged in vineyard operations, such as labourers and vine-dressers; there are workers in most of the building trades, builders and master-builders, masons, carpenters, hewers of wood, smiths, diggers of wells, and tent-makers; there are hunters, warriors, soldiers, trumpeters, horsemen and footmen; there are those who go down to the sea in ships; and many others following more miscellaneous occupations, such as gold-smiths, silver-smiths, copper-smiths, engravers, embroiderers, potters, weavers, interpreters, soothsayers, minstrels, musicians, butlers, stewards, cup-bearers, watchmen, porters, messengers, drawers of water, task-masters, writers, and a town-clerk.

At first a golden sun lights up the land, and shows us fields and flocks, and we come to mention of Abel as a keeper of sheep, and Cain as a tiller of the ground; and among the immediate descendants of the latter we have word of Jabal, the father of such as have cattle; of Jubal, the father of all such as handle the harp and organ; and of Tubal-Cain, the instructor of every artificer in brass and iron.

The building of the ark is the first structural operation described, which is followed by that of the altar Noah built on the subsidence of the waters. This patriarch, however, is specially mentioned as a husbandman; and among his early descendants is Nimrod, the mighty hunter. The tower of Babel is the earliest permanent erection recorded. When Noah's descendants settled in the plain of Shinar they said, "Go to, let us make bricks and burn them thoroughly"; and when they had found slime for mortar, they said again, "Go to, let us build us a city and a tower whose top may reach unto heaven," with the result with which we are all familiar. There were other cities erected in those old times, for though Abraham is said to have moved his tent, and to have sat in the door of his tent, when he and Lot parted the latter went to the cities of the plain; and Sodom is described as having a gate and a street, and Lot's house in it as capable of defence from an angry crowd. The digging of wells must have been a frequent operation at this period, as we read of the process being undertaken over and over again, owing, sometimes to the malevolent filling of them up again, and sometimes to the removal to fresh pastures. "And Isaac digged again the wells of water which they had digged in the days of Abraham his father, for the Philistines had stopped them after the death of Abraham."

As we turn a few more fluttering leaves,

(From Central Edifice, Nimroud)

we pass the despatch of Eliezer of Damascus, Abraham's steward, to find a wife for Isaac; and his group of tired camels lying round the well at evening, and Rebekah's appearance and acceptance; and then the fortunes of her grandson Joseph take us to Egypt. Here we see another aspect of work. The Hebrews were employed in making bricks, and when Moses and Aaron asked Pharaoh to allow them to go a three days' journey into the wilderness that they might sacrifice, that monarch refused, and commanded the task-masters to make the brick-makers work under harder conditions. "Ye shall no more give the people straw to make brick, as heretofore: let them go and gather straw for themselves. And the tale of the bricks, which they did make heretofore, ye shall lay upon them; ye shall not diminish ought thereof: for they be idle; therefore they cry, saying, Let us go and sacrifice to our God. Let there more work be laid upon the men, that they may labour therein; and let them not regard vain words." And in the hot glaring sunshine the people had to scatter themselves abroad, and try and gather stubble instead of straw. And then, after signs and plagues, the desert is reached, and the great host of Israelites enters into it. After a time, after the wanderers had come to Elim, where were twelve wells and three score and ten palm-trees, and continued their wanderings, a sanctuary was built and an ark of shittim wood, calling for workmanship of a high order. "And all the women that were wise-hearted did spin with their hands, and brought that which they had spun," and both men and women brought bracelets and earrings, and rings and tablets as offerings; and in particular Bezaleel the son of Uri, and Aholiab the son of Ahisamach, were filled with wisdom and understanding and knowledge to teach others all manner of work of the engraver, of the cunning workman, of the embroiderer, and of the weaver, for the enrichment of this sanctuary.

It is, however, after we have turned over many more pages, some bright, some grave, with incidents such as the Midian cities all on fire, Jericho with its walls cast down, the giant Og overthrown, Deborah from beneath the palm-tree bidding Barak fight with Sisera, Samson lifting the city gates, Ruth gleaning, Hannah mourning her childless state, and the deeds of Samuel, Jonathan, Saul, and David have all been told, that we come to the account of the greatest of the structural works of these old times, the building of the Temple at Jerusalem.

The glory of this edifice consisted in its situation, disposition, the richness of the materials employed, and the extent of its courts, rather than in its size. It was only about a hundred and fifty feet long and a little more than a hundred feet wide. But to this centre came thousands and thousands of workmen from all parts. We are told there were three score and ten thousand that bare burdens, and four score thousand hewers in the mountains. Ten thousand men were sent to Lebanon for cedar every month, to stay there for a month and then return for two months, in rotation; and Hiram, King of Tyre, sent many more of his own people. "And the house, when it was in building, was built of stone made ready before it was brought thither: so that there was neither hammer nor axe nor any tool of iron heard in the house while it was in building." And for seven years there were workers busy with stonework, fir planks, and cedar work, brass work, and gold work, and especially engaged in carving the cedar with knops and open flowers, and overlaying much of it with gold. Then for thirteen more years there were workmen employed on Solomon's own house, and on another for Pharaoh's daughter whom he had taken for a wife, hewing and sawing stones, raising rows of cedar pillars and lines of cedar beams on the pillars, and casting brazen enrichments. Hiram, a widow's son from Tyre, was filled with wisdom and understanding to work all works in brass; and the seventh chapter of the Book of Kings specifies his labours very particularly, and states that he cast the pillars, chapters, nets of checker work, the lily and pomegranate work, the twelve oxen that supported the molten sea, the lavers, shovels, and basins, in the plain of Jordan, in the clay ground between Succoth and Zarthan. Over and above these works, there was a wall built round Jerusalem at this time, and Solomon made a navy of ships, so that the workpeople were not immediately disbanded on their completion.

Before a street can be made, we know there must be many workmen employed upon it, bearing burdens, digging, lifting, levelling, smoothing, and placing stones. We read of many streets in the Holy Scriptures, in which these labours must have been expended, such as the street of Beth-Shan, whence King David took the bones of Saul and Jonathan to re-bury them; the streets in Damascus where the vanquished King of Syria promised the victorious Ahab he should make; the streets of Askelon, where the news of the death of Saul and Jonathan was not to be published, lest the daughters of the Philistines should rejoice; the streets of Moab, in which there were to be lamentations; the streets of Jerusalem, that were the scenes of so much that we think of with beating hearts. And we read of one street with a name, mentioned in the vision of Ananias concerning the conversion of Saul:—"Arise, and go into the street which is called Straight, and inquire in the house of Judas for one called Saul, of Tarsus"; and of streets and lanes of cities, and of men standing at the corners of streets. There is word, too, of pavements, of pavements of stone, of others of red, blue, black, and white marble; of pavements by the side of gates; of a paved court with thirty chambers on the pavement, in the vision of Ezekiel. Here and there we come to mention of palaces and pavilions, of winter-houses and summer-houses for kings; of parlours—Eglon was sitting in a summer-parlour when Ehud came to him with the dagger; and Samuel took Saul and his servant into a parlour, and made them sit in the chiefest place among thirty others that were bidden when they went to him to ask which way they should go to find the asses that had strayed from the lands of Kish. Thus we get sight of groups and knots and companies of men ever at work.

We see, too, everywhere workers planting and pruning vineyards, pressing grapes, cultivating gardens of pomegranates and fig-trees and fruits, and labouring in fields of plants and herbs and tender grass, with hemlocks here and lilies there—"Consider the lilies of the field." We see men leading or driving strings of beasts of burden, camels, dromedaries, asses, and horses. "Make a new cart, and take two milch kine, on which there hath come no yoke, and tie the kine to the cart," said the diviners when the Philistines asked them what they should do with the Ark of the Lord, and were counselled to send it to Beth-Shemesh. "And the kine took the straight way to the way of Beth-Shemesh, and went along the highway, lowing as they went, and turned not aside to the right hand or to the left; and the lords of the Philistines went after them unto the border of Beth-Shemesh. And they of Beth-Shemesh were reaping their wheat harvest in the valley; and they lifted up their eyes and saw the Ark, and rejoiced to see it." Is not this a pretty picture? We read of women grinding at mills, milking sheep, goats, and cows, churning. Jael brought forth butter in a lordly dish, as well as milk when Sisera asked for water. We know the wise-hearted ones spun, and that Sisera's mother, when she cried through the lattice that he was long in coming, expected that he would bring home a prey or prize of needlework of divers colours on both sides. "She shall be brought unto the king in raiment of needlework," says the Psalmist of the king's daughter. Everywhere there is a note of industry; everywhere work in course of execution. Everywhere, too, sunshine, much cattle (the King of Moab rendered to the King of Israel a hundred thousand lambs and a hundred thousand rams on one occasion), drawers of water, wells, palm-trees. Everywhere seers, soothsayers, and diviners. Harps, psalteries, and cymbals sound; burnt offerings lade the air; men bow their faces to the ground.

On several pages we may see references to the potter and his art. Jeremiah was told to "Arise and go down to the potter's house"; and when the potter marred his work, and made it over again, the word of the Lord came to the prophet, saying, "Canst I do with you as this potter? Behold, as the clay is in the potter's hand, so are ye in Mine." And, again, the prophet was told to get a potter's earthen vessel, and explain to the ancients of the people the desolation that was in store on account of the sins of the people. "Then thou shalt break the bottle in the sight of the men that go with thee. And thou shalt say unto them, Thus saith the Lord of hosts: Even so will I break this people and this city, as one breaketh a potter's vessel."

The hosts, the armies, the chariot cities, the "prancing horses and jumping chariots" of Nineveh, the countless horsemen and footmen, the navies with their shipmen, fill our minds with further impressions of life and strenuous effort in this delightful land. The contemplation brings before us the words of Paul, the tent-maker: "Study to be quiet, and to do your own business, and to work with your own hands."

HOW JESUS WAS RECOGNISED AT THE SEA OF TIBERIAS.

BY THE REV PROFESSOR W. G. BLAIKIE, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S.E., EX-MODERATOR OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.

"Therefore that disciple whom Jesus loved saith unto Peter, It is the Lord."—ST. JOHN xxi. 7.

AFTER the resurrection of Jesus the disciples had left Jerusalem and returned to Galilee, in fulfilment of their Lord's instructions (St. Matt. xxviii. 10). While waiting for Him there, their means of living seem to have run down, and it was necessary to replenish them. It was hardly fitting to return to the occupation from which Jesus had called them away, and had they been seen slaving at it, their enemies might have asked in scorn: How came the disciples of a risen Lord (as they alleged) to be reduced so low! Whether fitting or not, Peter, having made up his mind that there was no help for it but to take to their boats and their fishing-tackle again, said firmly to his companions: "I go a-fishing." Accustomed to follow his lead, they say unto him: "We also go with thee." Down they step to the well-known quay, or creek, where lay the boat in which their Master had so often been with them. Out they pull to the parts of the lake where in such a night fish might most readily be expected to be found. Down go the nets on this side and on that, but each time they are drawn it is with a fresh disappointment. The whole night is spent in unavailing labour, and with the return of light the chances of success wax feeble. It is not merely the ordinary disappointment of fishermen they feel; but another pang, very natural in their circumstances—the disciples of a risen Saviour cannot succeed even in catching a few fish!

Meanwhile, in the grey haze of the morning, a man appears on the sea-shore, who asks them whether they have got anything. It is probably an early traveller, who wishes some fish for his morning meal. Their answer is a short monosyllable: "No"; as if they did not wish to say much about it, or have much to do with this inquisitive stranger. But though they would gladly be quit of him, he is not disposed to be quit of them. "Cast the net on the right side of the ship," he shouts, "and ye shall find." Has he observed from his place on the shore the movements of fish in the water, that he speaks so confidently? Anyhow, they obey him, perhaps with an inward grumble. No sooner have they cast the net than they find themselves unable to draw it for the multitude of fish. Instantly a vivid thought flashes into the mind of John. He divines at once from what source this unexpected supply has come. He casts one earnest gaze towards the beach, and the form that shapes itself to his eye through the twilight answers to the thought that has rushed into his heart: "It is the Lord!"

How did he recognise Him? Not by material tokens, for after His resurrection Jesus was not identified at first even by those who knew Him best. Mary took Him to be the gardener; the two disciples on their way to Emmaus knew Him not till just as He vanished from their sight; and when He first appeared to the eleven they were terrified, and supposed they had seen a spirit. It was by inward marks that the beloved disciple now recognised Him—by the out-beaming of his heart—by love-tokens with which he was well familiar, and which led him to conclude infallibly that it was the Lord.

1. One of these love-tokens was His sympathy. They were in an evil case, in actual bodily want, and the one available means of relieving their wants had proved an absolute and utter failure. It is precisely at this moment that Jesus comes to them. He knows their trouble, understands the disappointment, the anxiety, the bitterness of their hearts, and hastens to relieve them. And the beloved disciple knows that this is the feeling of Jesus, and knows that it is this feeling that has drawn Him to the spot and brought to their net such an abundant supply. Who but Jesus could have felt for them so tenderly?

And what a blessing it is for all of us to have a Divine Master who is ever moved by the spectacle of distress, ever thrilled by the cry of need! Whatever be the cause of grief to any of us, this great Son of Consolation is tenderly concerned about it. Be it terrible bodily pain, or starvation, or guilt, or despair, or shame, or the cruelty or the ill-conduct of those we love, Jesus Christ is full of sympathy. "The Spirit of the Lord hath anointed me to bind up the broken-hearted." But, alas! it is true now, as it was in the days of John the Baptist—"There standeth One among you whom ye know not." Men and women wander weary and heavy-laden through this world, craving sympathy, and often in vain: yearning for someone to take a charitable view of their case, and say a kind word that will hold them up when on the border of despair. Oh, if they would but believe in Jesus, and open their ear to His gracious words—"Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest!"

We can hardly wonder that men and women, blinded by the god of this world, fail to apprehend the deep compassion of Jesus Christ. But we may well wonder that His own children often show so little faith in Him in their times of trouble. No doubt Nature will often assert itself, and the confession will go forth—"O my God, my soul is cast down within me!" But let it only be for the moment. "We have not an high priest that cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities." Let us rally our sinking hearts by the thought that in all our times of want, disappointment, and trouble, the most tender-hearted of all beings is at hand. "God is near thee; therefore cheer thee, sad soul."

2. Another love-token by which the beloved disciple would recognise Jesus was His bountifulness. A dozen fish of average size would have been a welcome sight; but a hundred and fifty-three "great fishes" were something marvellous. They were enough to satisfy all present wants, and, moreover, the price would furnish a store for the maintenance of the disciples till the Day of Pentecost, when ample means would be otherwise provided for their needs. Already, they had had many proofs of the bountifulness of Jesus. When He went about healing all manner of sickness and all manner of disease among the people; when He turned the five loaves and two fishes into food for five thousand, or the seven loaves and the few little fishes into food for four thousand; or when, at Cana of Galilee, He converted the water in the six water-pots into wine of the best quality, He just gave effect to the Divine bountifulness of His nature. His heart was large, and was ever devising liberal things. John instinctively felt that no one but his ever-generous Lord would bestow a gift on so princely a scale.

How wonderfully expressive were those short utterances of the lips of Jesus in which He conferred the choicest blessings—gave pardon to the guilty, cleansing to the leper, sight to the blind, and even life to the dead! They form a very galaxy of gems, stars of the first magnitude, that make the four Gospels a very firmament of glory. "Son, be of good cheer; thy sins be forgiven thee"; "I will; be thou clean"; "Ephphatha, be opened"; "Maid, arise"; "Lazarus, come forth"; "O woman, great is thy faith; be it unto thee even as thou wilt"; "Verily I say unto thee, this day shalt thou be with Me in paradise." "Who is this that cometh out of the wilderness like pillars of smoke, perfumed with myrrh and frankincense, with all powders of the merchant?"

And can any of us have any real want which He is not able and willing to supply? We are exiles from Eden—it has gone from us, never to return. But what other garden is this that blooms for us fairer than even Eden, as it came in fresh beauty from the hand of its Creator? What inheritance is this, 'incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away,' of which every follower of Jesus receives the title-deeds! It is a blessed habit to think much on the large-hearted generosity of Jesus. David found Araunah a princely giver, bestowing his gifts with the large generosity of a king. Let us ever think of Jesus as a royal Giver, who delights to do generous things, and keeps nothing back from us except for our higher good.

3. A third token by which John might have recognised Jesus was His faithfulness to His promise. Had He not said that He would go before them into Galilee? and had He not directed them to wait for Him there? Yes; but perhaps they never thought He would meet them while engaged in the rough work of fishermen. He would meet them while at prayer or singing the songs of Zion, but not while baiting their lines or hauling their nets. Why not? At Jerusalem He had met them in the upper chamber on the evening of the first day of the week, but here in Galilee He meets them at the sea-shore, in the very midst of their worldly occupation. It is true the Lord is very specially pledged, when two or three are gathered in His name, to be in the midst of them. But He does not disdain our worldly callings. The boy or girl puzzled over a difficult task, or groaning over a treacherous memory, will not pray in vain if light be asked for the understanding or retentiveness for the memory. Only, if we appeal to Him in such a case, we must do it in faith, in the full belief that He is interested, and ready to help us in every time of real need. "After I am risen," He said to the disciples, "I will go before you into Galilee." And He might have added—although it was deemed better to keep this from them—"I will appear to you in the very thick of your worldly toils, when you have been toiling all night and have caught nothing."

4. Perhaps we may add a fourth token by which Jesus might have been recognised—the miraculous draught was the repetition of a former miracle, wrought in the early days of His ministry. On that occasion He had directed Peter to launch out into the deep and let down his net, and the multitude of fish caught was more than two boats could contain. And it is remarkable that several more of our Lord's greatest miracles were repeated—the feeding of the multitude, the stilling of the storm, the raising of the dead. Why was this? To show that it is not on single or solitary occasions that His grace flows, but that whensoever the need recurs, then also is His bounty ready to give the blessing. Well may we take up the refrain of the Psalm, "For His mercy endureth for ever." "As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be." And well may we be thankful for this quality of sameness in the operations of our Lord. This stream never runs dry. "The mountains shall depart and the hills be removed, but My kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of My peace be removed." "Having loved His own that were with Him in the world, He loveth them to the end." "Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever."

GARTH GARRICKSON—WORKMAN.

THE STORY OF A LANCASHIRE LAD.

CHAPTER I.

HE had grown up without thinking about it; and stepped out of the Mechanics' Institute one wet April evening, just such a chip of the rock stratum of the English nation as one often sees in Lancashire. Tall, strong, though not big; a dark head carried erect; steady eyes; a firm mouth; a careless swinging gait; clad in homespun; and guiltless of gloves—or umbrella, in spite of wind and rain—that was Garth. He ran down the steps and turned to the right, splashing through mud and pools all unconscious, his brain busy with a problem unsolved by the class he had just left. A short walk along the street and he came to an iron gate between the brick buildings—a school on the one hand, the out-sheds of a huge mill on the other. It was shut, the little lodge closed and deserted for the night. He drew a key from his pocket to unlock it, but found it on the latch; with a sharp look at the lodge he closed it after him, locked it carefully, and passed on up the private road.

It was lonely up here, and dark. Presently he broke into a whistle as if for company; a melodious whistle and incongruous. This is hardly the man you would imagine whistling an opera air. What should he know of Gilbert and Sullivan?

Nothing at all; and he had never thought of its origin or cared until one day, when he was indulging about the mill, a girl had said: "Hey, Garth Garrickson! Yon's a theayter song. Weer didst hap on't, lad! Hast bin t't theayter?" Whereupon the "lad" had flushed, refrained, and walked away: for, if you please, he had never entered such an edifice in his life, and was as little likely to do so as to tell where he had "happed" on his little tune, which he henceforth reserved for such solitude as this.

Solitude! The road—in fact a broad walled-in carriage-drive—wound up the shoulder of a bleak hill. He had shut out the town with the gate; it lay beneath, on the one side, the lights glimmering weirdly in the dark. On the other hand stretched a wide reach of bare country, over which the wind swept freely—a fresh wind, if wet—quite another than that in the town below. Along the top of the hill lay a deep shadow as of trees, and from the far end a single light twinkled.

Garth swung on, his step longer, his whistle livelier, his air less preoccupied—thoughts dispersed by the breeze, perhaps, as he advanced. He passed a tall chimney which, connected by some under-world mystery with the mill below, grew out of the ground with startling incongruity on his right. Further on, the walls gave place to hedges, bushes, and trees, and soon the rough road became the white, smooth, well-tended drive of a gentleman's country place. Beyond, the house rose in solitary dignity—a large stone house—impressive in its stateliness and the beauty of its site: the town might have been miles away instead of close beneath the hill.

But Garth was not bound for the Hall. Crossing the road, he was just in the act of passing into a narrow by-path which led up behind, cutting off the sweep of the drive through the grounds, and joining it again above, when he heard wheels; a carriage came swiftly behind him. He let it pass without a glance, and was going on his way, when the window nearest him dropped suddenly, and there was a call: "Garth! Garth!" The carriage stopped.

Garth turned, abruptly uncovered, and strode to it; a dainty hand was put out to him.

"How are you? How is all doing?"

"Pretty well, Miss Mildred."

He had taken the hand deferentially, and let it drop. His tone was calm enough, but there was a startled breathlessness about him: he forgot to cover his head.

"We—we did not expect you returning——"

"No; I was taken with Heimwey yesterday—packed up and came straight away. Garth! I am glad to be home—I'll stay awhile now! Isn't the air sweet! Put on your cap; you'll take cold," with a fleeting glance at the thick, dark, wind-stirred hair. "Is my father at home, do you know?"

"Well—no, Miss Mildred, I'm afraid not. He went to Glasgow to-day."

"Oh dear me! and I wired—yesterday. There'll be no one to welcome me."

"Mrs. Williams must know—the carriage was at the station."

"So it was," more hopefully; "but," less cheerfully again, "the gate was locked."

"I locked it; I beg your pardon, Miss Caryl. I did not know," a little confusedly. It was no business of his to lock the gate, only Garth had a little way of straightening the world.

"What! you locked me out of my own land?" with mock severity. Garth did not reply. He had apologised; that was enough. Another quick glance—into his eyes now—and—"Well, good-night," seriously. "Give my love to the mother, and tell her I will come to tea to-morrow. And, Garth, be home early and bring the books and tell me all about it. Good-night."

"Good-night, Miss Mildred." Garth gave the sign to the coachman—uncovered again, and the carriage drove away.

He went on; but his step was slower, his eyes on the ground; his whistle silent now; the absence of mind returned in force until, reaching the point where the narrow path opened into the drive again, he met the carriage once more, empty now, driving round to the stables. Then he woke up, settled his cap, dug his hands into his pockets, and quickened his pace.

"Mildred, wandering in, had surprised him—and herself."—p. 43.

His way lay now along an avenue, under that line of trees which crowned the hill at right angles to the drive up which he had come. Looking over the wall on his right—the boundary wall of the estate—he could see the distant lights of tag-ends of the town, the glow of furnaces, and, further still, the paler glare of other towns—the southernmost towns of Lancashire. On the left was darkness, but Garth did not need to see the land beyond the trees—dipping first, then rising again to a higher hough—the last outswell of the Derbyshire hills, mapped as Cheshire. On he went until he had almost reached the gate at the end of the avenue.

Just within it, on an elevated level, stands an old house—a quaint old house, built of such solid stone blocks as house-masons of to-day object to handling—of fair size, battlemented, grey with age. No door at all to be seen on this side: windows only, large lofty windows—high from the ground—in one of which a lamp was shining to-night. Since 1806 a motto on the wall has been patiently saying, "Fide, sed cui vide" (Have confidence, but see well in whom thou placest it.)

Garth looked up as if he heard it in the dark, sprang up the half-dozen steps to the higher ground, and passed round the corner of the house. Behind is a bare grassy enclosure, but a narrow line of flags between grass and door; two doors there are—heavy, iron-studded; the windows low and long. And here again is a writing on the wall—clear cut in the smooth cope-stone of door and kitchen window, "Better stay here all night than be lost in the snow: 1807," and thereby hangs a forgotten tale.

Garth passed under it and went into the house. This was his "bairnname," a healthsome spot in which to grow to manhood on the outskirts of iron Lancashire and Robin-Hood-land.

A moment later he entered his mother's parlour. "Better stay here all night than be lost in the snow!" All the furniture was of the plainest, the tables stained deal, the chairs most of them mere wood, and yet everything looked at home and comfortable. The table-cloth and curtains, though faded, had been a good colour, and harmonised still with each other and the old threadbare carpet; the chintz-covered cushions of easy-chairs and sofa were soft; the few ornaments, though of the cheapest, were not unsightly, and two articles in the room were superior enough to give an air, quite of gentility, to the rest—the reading-lamp, which was new and handsome, and the harmonium, the case of which was real walnut wood. Moreover, the books on it and in the shelves above were in sets, and well bound; the old clock in the corner was amiable of countenance and cheery of tick; the prints on the walls were good; the lamp shed a soft light; the fire crackled briskly; and everywhere was a spotless cleanliness, an immaculate polish, an air of cheerful peace most resting to the eye and spirit. Yes, "Better stay here all night than be lost in the snow."

Nor was the room inhabited only by peaceable chairs and tables; in the rocking-chair between the warmth and light of fire and lamp, her fingers rapidly knitting, an open book on the table before her, sat a most cheerful animate being. A lady, emphatically, whatever her station, was Mrs. Garrickson. Only those who knew his mother understood Garth. In appearance chiefly neat; smooth dark hair drawn tidily down the sides of the face in the days when little combs held bunches of curls from tumbling over pretty eyes and cheeks, and worn so ever since; dark bright eyes, clear fresh complexion, lips anyone might kiss; a plain black dress, a bit of white at the neck, a becoming cap, a black silk apron.

She looked up as the door opened—the thoughtful face brightened.

"Well, Garth! you are late, my son."

"Yes, mother," kissing her; "the class was late."

"Are you wet?" feeling his coat. "Hadn't you better change?"

"Oh, no; I shall be going to bed directly."

"Are you sure? You were reading at 1.30 last night, Garth; you had no business."

"I know it; I was busy. I'll be sooner to-night; I'm tired," a little wearily.

"No doubt. Janie!" going to the door and calling, "just go up-stairs and bring Mr. Garth's grey coat and a pair of socks from his drawer.—There are your slippers under the chair. I've news, Garth; Miss Mildred's coming home."

"She's come, mother. I have seen the carriage."

"Have you seen her?"

"Well—yes—I have," as if confessing. "She stopped and spoke in passing; sent her love to you, mother, and said she'd come to-morrow."

"To tea, did she say? That's right—that's a good girl; not a bit of pride or conceit about her; just as simple as when she was a little thing toddling about the house."

"That is all the more reason for care, mother. I am not sure about the pride. She is proud enough with some folks—that cousin of hers, for instance."

"He is not a good man, Garth, that's the reason. Here is your coat. Was she looking well?"

"Miss Mildred always looks well," he said, with a man's want of perception; and, having got into his dry coat and socks, he took up his book, and no more was said.

CHAPTER II.

WHEN Garth came in from work next day he found Miss Mildred and his mother placidly working and talking together, the tea-table ready set, with snowy cloth, best china, and various favourite cates and dainties to do honour to the guest who could best give honour by being her homeliest here.

She was homely, happy, entirely charming. In London but a day or two ago she had been the admiration of many, in very different circumstances and surroundings; for Mildred was beautiful, accomplished, passably brilliant, and on occasion utterly captivating, but no one had ever seen her just as she was now. In childhood this had been more her home than her father's house, and though absence and the years had a little straitened old freedom, she was still never so fascinating, because never so entirely at home, so frank, so free from self-consciousness, as she was here.

As Garth entered she held out her hand as to a cousin, and smiled as not to a workman.

"That's right, you are in good time; now we will have some sensible talk. I have just been telling your mother, Garth, that one of my greatest London trials is the conversation."

"Trials! You meet trials in London!" sitting down and leaning forward, elbows on knees, to look at her; and not even his mother detected the trembling in his frame that he was resolutely subduing. "I thought you enjoyed it all."

"So I do just at first. The change is pleasant, and the shops, and the stir of life; but I soon vary, and long for home."

"But you must meet many clever people, Miss Mildred."

"Oh yes—very clever! Quite too clever to descend to the level of such provincial wit as Mildred Caryl's; or perhaps they fear cheapening their worth by a too common exhibition of it. My experience is that clever people are extremely foolish in society."

"Perhaps modesty has a little to do with it, love," observed placid Mrs. Garrickson; "they are too public to be natural."

"Yes, it must be embarrassing to be lionised," reflected Garth.

"To you it would be, Garth—yes. I can fancy it," looking into his eyes with laughter in her own; "but all are not your kind of lion. My belief is that most clever people are terrible shams. Just here and there is the real thing, but as a rule the luminary has by no means so much inward light as outward polish, created by mere friction—yes, and easily rubbed off. I would rather have downright honest ruggedness than unreal polish."

"So you grew tired of London?" quietly.

"Yes; I said I was not feeling well, that late hours did not agree, that the influenza was coming our way—no end of excuses; but in truth it was Heimwey. The trees will be budding directly, and I wanted to watch them. I wanted my hills—'hills draw like heaven,' you know. I wanted my own people, I grew tired of strangers," almost passionately.

"Well, love," Mrs. Garrickson said soothingly, "your own people are very glad to have you. We've missed you; it's been quite lonely. Here's Janie with tea.—Garth, get her a chair; she'll be better for a cup of tea."

But Garth turned the chair Mildred had just vacated round to the table—"She prefers this, mother."

"Yes, thanks, Garth; you always know my likes. What! is all the honey not gone yet?"

"That's the last. I managed to save it, though Garth was for eating it many a time."

"You greedy thing!"

"Now, mother, I only asked for it once or twice, and not again when I knew 't was all there was."

"Well, eat it up between you as you always did, and have done with it. Say grace, Garth," and the laughter was strangled to becoming sobriety.

"Now, what has been going on at the school?"

Mildred asked, as soon as her wants were supplied; and then the talk became more serious, and entirely between these two, while the uninitiated mother sat and drank her tea, and waited on them both in unenlightened content. When the cloth had been cleared it still went on, books were brought out—account-books and others—and she sat on one side of the table and rocked herself and knitted, and they sat on the other adding up columns, counting pence, and talking very near together and in perfect freedom.

Since Mildred had been a tiny child it had been thus; they had grown up so, these two, with this placid woman—the mother of the one, the foster-mother of the other—keeping watch always. When Mildred had been a week old her mother had given her into these warm hands, closed her eyes as if for sleep, and gently died. Mary Garrickson had carried the baby home and laid it down in the cradle her own boy was just outgrowing, vowing that while she lived the mother-care should be equal between them; and through all the difficult years she had kept that vow. At first she had been left in undisturbed possession, and the babies had cried and cooed in concert, toddled and tumbled about the floor and the grass outside in blissful oblivion of life. No other children came, and Mary lost her husband; but her heart was satisfied, her hands full with the two. Then as they grew to years of discretion the children were parted. Mildred was taken home and a governess provided, Garth went daily to a town school; and yet they contrived to be much together, for Mildred was much alone, and her old home always seemed the real one. On fine half-holidays they were always out rambling and scrambling about the country together, no one, unless now and then a scandalised governess, ever interfering.

Later Mildred was sent away in quest of education. For awhile their paths diverged, but in spite of all were still on one level. She was Miss Caryl of the Hall, he her father's bailiff's son, whose mother had been her mother's confidential maid, yet all their lives they had been friends. And the caste dye was not so deep as it seemed; their fathers had once been of one social shade, educated in one school, workmates in one mill, when the mule and jenny were young. But the one—the less talented—had risen to own the mill, and its owner's place and daughter; the other, through mere ill-health, had sunk, until, for pure old-fellowship's sake, his sometime workmate had made him his bailiff, given him the old house on the estate; and he had won the young housekeeper of the Hall.

On Tom Garrickson's death his wife had been allowed to keep her home, and through her boy been helped as she might in other case not have suffered to be helped. On his death-bed her husband had reached across the gulf of years and social distinction, and given his son into his old friend's care, and Mary had had to submit.

In his own way that friend had fulfilled the trust; he had sent the lad to school, never inquiring how he got on, and then given him work in the mill, promoting him from time to time as carelessly as he would have dropped him had he proved worthless. He had certainly helped Garth more than he suspected; and in the least suspected way the most.

At the Hall was a capital library, which he did not himself at all affect. By the merest accident he had one day good-naturedly given the lad free access to it. That library had probably been Garth's salvation. He used it the more readily, it must be owned, because he could get to it without the knowledge of a soul. On the first floor of the Hall the front half of the house communicates with the back—the servants' quarters—by one of two doors opening on to the half-way landing of the large staircase, which coming up thus far, in a broad flight, divides here, and ascends in two narrower ones to the corridor above; the second door is that of the library. So that Garth, slipping up the back stairs, had but to step from one door to the other to reach his sanctum, apart alike from both halves of the house.

Here he had come and read in undisturbed peace, until, one wet occupationless Saturday afternoon in the holidays, Mildred, wandering in, had surprised him—and herself. From that day the old childish intimacy, a little lessened of late years, had been resumed, and with profit to both.

Of mental culture Mildred had the more. Her advantages had been many, her natural capacity was fine; but what Garth lacked in advantage he made up in pure native force, will-power, and dogged industry.

All the opportunity he had, he made the most of, attending evening classes and studying in spare time. There were few men of Mildred's acquaintance so really well informed, few with whom she could converse with so much pleasure and intelligence. What was their drudgery was Garth's recreation—their boredom was his El Dorado. He knew nothing of the topics politely supposed suitable to the young-lady mind, and saw nothing unsuitable in philosophic, scientific, or political ones—to Miss Mildred at least; he knew, or thought he knew, her mind too well. And to him Mildred's gravest side was always readily presented, for it was the only one on which they could come within touch: they lived in such different worlds. How often Garth stood inside that room upstairs holding the door slightly ajar listening to the rich voice singing—"theater songs" and others—to guests in the drawing-room, or watching gay couples passing in the hall below, no one ever guessed, nor how grimly he would close the door, lock it against possible intruders, and return to his books. That was the mere shell of her, that gay creature down-stairs: the Miss Mildred he knew was another sort—and as yet there was no pain anywhere.

And when Mildred left school and came home as mistress of her father's house the ground had widened. Her home life did not afford scope for her; the house-keeper being retained, her mistress-ship was a sinecure; her father, engrossed in business and public functions, did not require her. At first she had idled about the place, roamed and driven about the country with her dogs, paid and received visits, and ill-used her piano; but soon this changed. An accident at the mill led to a visit to a distressed home; that led to others; a philanthropic zeal seized Mildred which might have run to wild waste, but for Mrs. Garrickson's quiet sense, and Garth's practical wisdom and patient guidance. A mother's anxiety for wildly inclined sons led to the forming of a night-school in an unused "shed" of the mill. Girls' practical classes followed, mothers' meetings, men's clubs, children's Band of Hope and entertainments—a perfect ramification of schemes, which could only be kept workable by rigid restriction to their own workpeople, and by dint of very persistent and real labour. "Mester Caryl" was the nominal president of the whole, but he took little heed unless called upon. But few helpers could be had among the older, better class, and more reliable workpeople; the whole management rested on this committee of two, and the quorum was Garth. Mildred supplied the "bright ideas," the funds, the prestige; Garth the practical ability, the calm-browed judgment. If Mildred saw quickest, Garth saw deepest, furthest, most; his practical knowledge of the people was of untold value. With all her talent and influence, Mildred could have done nothing without him. He, the thing once started, could work it easily alone—as he had just demonstrated; in her absence all had gone smoothly and prosperously.

"You are really commander-in-chief, Garth," she said, as they gathered the books together. "I had better leave the management to you, I think."

"Oh no, Miss Mildred—that would not do now you are returned."

"Thank you; that's the nicest compliment I've had since I went away. I wondered sometimes what you would say if you heard some of the things said to me out there, Garth," looking at him. "Are you not well? You are thin—"

"Oh, yes—I'm well enough," Mrs. Garrickson looked up.

"He's working too hard, Missie," slipping into the old baby name, "and he won't take time for meals:

he will have a book at table, and forgets his plate, and reads again at night till one or two o'clock."

"Oh, Garth! How bad for you! and at the mill again at five. Shocking!"

"But I must."

"I suppose so—"

"Whirr, my merry spindles
These looms o' wern they be no swindles.
Whirr, my merry spindles,
Fr' morn till th' night!"

But you needn't read until two o'clock, or one, or twelve."

"I'm not in the small room now. I'm overseeing in the large one, and don't go down till eight."

"Oh, that is better! It was too much for you."

"Not at all; it was quieter—more peaceable;" and Mildred knew he would hear not another word about his work, his reading, or any of his affairs.

"Will you play for me awhile now?—I must go soon," she said, resettling herself in the low chair she had abandoned for business; and Garth went obediently to the harmonium and drew up the stool.

Garth's father had been musical, as many Lancashire men are; and Garth had inherited his harmonium and his talent. How he had picked up his knowledge no one quite knew. When promoted as a child to music-lessons, Mildred had, in very conceit and love of domineering, taught him his notes; but her patience had failed of more. A hint here, a question there, a fine ear, and hours of patient war on the old instrument, had done the rest. He sat now and rolled out grand sweet harmonies, while Mildred lay back with shaded face, and Mrs. Garrickson put down her work, and regarded her gravely.

Presently Garth began to sing in a clear musical man's voice—and what? Listen—

"Mid pleasures and palaces though we may roam,
Be it ever so humble, there's no place like home!
A charm from the skies seems to hallow us there,
Which, seek through the world, is not met with elsewhere.
Home! home! Sweet, sweet home!
Be it ever so humble, there's no place like home!"

Mildred dropped her hands and raised her head with a quick turn, a sudden glad smile: the light in her face was exceedingly gentle. In the refrain her voice joined his—better trained, by far, but not so rich—of smaller compass evidently, and with a minor note very unlike his full, swelling tones.

In the second verse too she joined—

"An exile from home splendour dazzles in vain;
Give me my lowly thatched cottage again,
The birds singing gaily that came at my call,
Give me them with the peace of mind dearer than all!
Home! home! Sweet, sweet home!
Be it ever so humble, there's no place like home!"

Tears gathered as they ended. Garth detected them in the voice, bent his head to listen, glanced over his shoulder to look, but could see nothing. Mrs. Garrickson could: they were fringing the long lashes now, but they would dry there; Mildred would not own them.

"Sing, mother!" she cried, as the harmonium paused. "'The Land o' the Leal' now, Garth," and the little impromptu concert they often happened upon in this way proceeded: Mrs. Garrickson's sweet tones joining with the happiest effect, until the old clock added its own musical voice, chiming nine.

Garth closed the harmonium in silence—he was always the first to know when it was time for Miss Mildred to go—and came across to the hearth. Mildred rose.

"That has done me good!"

son said, "But, love——" and stopped. Garth flushed to the eyes.

Mildred did not notice; she went on—

"I thought of it in London. I met a girl who spent all her days so, and her evenings in singing at mission-rooms and poor houses: and I quite made up my mind to take it up here, and to throw the room at the mill open—on some evenings."

Still there was silence. Garth had turned away,

"Mildred lay back with shaded face."—p. 44.

"Was anything the matter, love?"—just what Garth wanted to say.

"Well, yes, something was—never mind—nothing—oh, mother!"—meeting Mrs. Garrickson's twinkling eyes—"don't laugh at me: I have been so homesick. I have made two resolutions: never to go to London alone again, and to make myself thoroughly busy among the poor."

Mrs. Garrickson sobered.

"And haven't you been doing that, Missie?"

"Not systematically, as a daily business—which is what I want. I did think of hospital nursing, but it is so much more confining, and—and—it would take me away from home. So I shall just set to work where I am—get a habit, grey or dark blue, and give four days or five a week to it."

Both mother and son were startled. Mrs. Garrickson and was standing with his back to them, looking into the fire.

"Have you really considered it, dear?" Mrs. Garrickson said at length. "Have you asked your father?"

"N—no; I have not seen him. Don't you approve, Mrs. Garrickson?"

"I think your father won't, love."

"But ought one's father to decide for one?"

"No; but you should decide for him—not against."

"He cares nothing about my affairs."

"That's no reason you shouldn't care for his. Miss Millie, had you decided this after careful weighing of every consideration, I should uphold you; but it seems to me you've been hasty.—What do you think, Garth?"

Mildred looked at him, eagerly expecting his championship.

Garth turned him about slowly, and he was twisting something in his fingers: his eyes were bent on it.

"I think," he said deliberately, "it is not to be considered for a moment at the present time."

"Oh, Garth!"

"Oh, I don't think that, my son: I don't go so far as that. I think Miss Mildred should consider, and ask her father. Then, if she still feels so——"

"I think feeling a very poor guide, mother; judgment should decide these things. It would not answer for that sort of work to be taken up so by an irresponsible person; there should be some sort of committee, I fancy: and I don't suppose a committee would employ Miss Mildred. She is young, she has no training, all her education has gone another way. She is not strong constitutionally, and her father would not allow it. I think this the mere reaction from weeks of unusual excitement; and now she is back in her natural sphere, she will be all right."

Garth's auditors looked at him in astonishment: one in crestfallen disappointment. He spoke with a decisive emphasis he rarely used, addressing his mother, but looking neither at her nor at Mildred, and twisting and turning what he held until it snapped in his fingers. He laid it down, looked at her now, and said more gently—

"Missie, you are doing a great deal."

"But nothing in the daytime—nothing systematic."

"You go to old Pack and the rest."

"That is different; and there are all those streets of miserable people."

"Not so very miserable: they've no need, if they'll be sober and work. Indeed, you'd find most houses empty in mill hours."

"But at night——"

"You could not go at night; and as for the room: if Mr. Caryl would admit the public to the mill—which he would not do—you could not control such an audience."

"You would be there."

Mrs. Garrickson looked up quickly. An odd expression came into Garth's face, a stern, proud, sorrowful reproach. He turned round again to the fire.

"I think, love," Mrs. Garrickson said, "that you might ask your father, and see what he says. He's a good man, and would consider such a thing. Now Janie will bring some coffee——"

"Oh, no, thank you: it will be waiting at home. It is late!"

"Well, if you're sure—— Get your gaiters on, Garth, it's raining."

"I am sorry you do not approve," Mildred said, with a little dignity, while Garth was gone; and she donned her plain felt hat and rich, fur-lined jacket, both characteristic of Mildred Caryl. "I made sure of sympathy."

"And you have it, dearie. I think myself Garth was a little strong, and you mustn't think too much of it—young men don't always know.—That's right, my son"—as Garth appeared in the doorway, capped and gaitered, and ulstered to the chin. "Take care of her, and see that ye fall not out by the way!" smiling, as she and her foster-daughter kissed each other.

CHAPTER III.

THERE seemed no improbability of their doing so. Little was said at first: it was raining and blowing hard. Mildred had enough to do to keep her balance, and Garth would not offer help until he saw she really needed it. Then he took her umbrella and held it for her, firmly, screeningly, but distantly, and that was the most he would do.

Both found the difficulty rather an advantage. Mildred was annoyed, and he, knowing it, conscious also of wisdom and rectitude, and by the nature of him entirely indisposed, carefully abstained from anything in the way of apology. When the trees thickened shelteringly and silence became awkward, it was Mildred who spoke.

"You don't think me very foolish, Garth?"

"Not very."

"I had a very special reason; and you know I am very lonely."

"Very lonely!" How that little plaint appealed to him Mildred could not guess. He walked on a little while in silence, and then said: "But I don't see how this would help it; you could make no friends among those people, and you would lose many you have."

"None I greatly care about, Garth," quietly; "I have been thinking I would rather withdraw——"

"You must not!" he said emphatically, almost impatiently.

Mildred looked up startled, and then, indeed, he apologised with a sudden sweet smile: "Excuse me, Missie!"

"Don't, Garth—tell me just what you are thinking."

"Well, you know what mother said of your father—you——"

He was abruptly interrupted. Pursuing their sheltered way, they had for the nonce forgotten the wind, until, emerging on the exposed corner where the avenue curved round to the drive, they were met by a boisterous blast, which effectually scattered his sentence, their ideas, and their persons. The umbrella dragged Garth one way, Mildred was driven helplessly another, until, managing to get his impromptu sail furled, Garth overtook her, and after a few minutes' hard struggle they succeeded in weathering the corner.

It was as if they had stepped into a diving-bell. On either hand were high sheltering hedges; just beyond, the house rose tall and stately; outside, the wind shrieked and whistled; overhead, the branches swayed and cracked; at their feet, a few dead leaves scarcely eddied. Mildred was laughing and panting, her eyes dancing, her hair blown about her face; Garth had saved his cap by catching it off, and stood bare-headed holding her, for he had seized her with none of that unreal polish she had deprecated a while ago, and forgotten to set her free. A moment he stood so, laughing too, partly at her; then a change swept over his face, a sweet tenderness curved his lips, his eyes softened, deepened; he made a quick, almost convulsive, movement as if to draw her to himself. Then he raised his bare head skyward—the smile died, the face hardened, he loosed her, put on his cap, and turned away, remarking, "I am afraid your umbrella is broken, Miss Caryl."

"Never mind; it's an old one, Garth." As they reached the house-steps—and her voice was a little hesitating and very sweet—"I had some flowers to take to mother, and forgot them; will you wait a moment, and I'll get them?"

"Willie will bring them when he brings the milk in the morning, thank you, Miss Caryl." Garth would not wait in his master's hall.

"Very well. Good-night," and she held out her hand; but he did not seem to see it, just pulled off his cap and was gone before the door opened to admit her.

Mildred's face sobered; she entered the house very slowly; she preferred honest ruggedness, she had said, but she had not meant Garth's ruggedness—to herself.

She entered a room on her left, prettily furnished, and designed with a special view to cosiness, for Mildred loved her ease at her inn—when there; but the room was a scene of desolation—fireless, and in all the dust and disorder of neglect. She looked round displeasedly; for though anything but orderly herself, she insisted on the maids being so. "Elizabeth!" she called.

The neat-capped woman who had admitted her appeared.

"Yes, ma'am."

"Tell Emma," severely, "that the morning-room is not fit to be seen."

"A fire is lit in the drawing-room, miss."

"You know I never use the drawing-room in the master's absence," and she turned away in dignified displeasure. "Call the rest to prayers," she added; then Elizabeth vanished. Mildred laid aside her hat and cloak, changed her shoes, after a hunt for truant slippers, and crossed the hall to the drawing-room.

Here was a different scene. A large fire glowed in the deep, wide hearth; tinted chandelier globes shed a soft warm light through the large, handsome room; luxurious lounges, soft rugs and carpets, rich hangings, pictures and bric-à-brac filled it. After all, Mildred's home was no lowly thatched cottage; she felt no charm from the skies hallow this spot; the splendour did not dazzle at all, and she certainly felt exile enough at the moment. She stood on the hearth looking into the glowing coals, trying to conquer a miserable sense of loneliness which oppressed her; then, moving to the door leading to the next room, passed in. This was the dining-room, and here the servants were already ranged on chairs at a distance, the books ready placed. To read prayers nightly had been her mother's custom, and Mildred steadily adhered to it. But it was the only vestige of apparent mistress-ship to which Mildred could lay claim; though all behaved with decorous respect to the master's daughter, the real mistress was the housekeeper, Mrs. Williams, and all knew it.

They said good-night now in all respectful civility, as, prayers over, they passed out; but in their own hall a discussion began, for the call had found them at supper, which of all things servants hate to have interrupted.

"What's she doing out so late, I want to know?" one said, trying to warm her cold coffee at the fire; "she wouldn't if her pa was here."

"Oh, she would; he wouldn't know."

"Or care if he did."

"Well, I shan't go in again."

"Then you'll lose your place, Emma," from Mrs. Williams. "I'm not over-religious myself, but prayers is usual, and anyone not conforming to the rules in this house goes at once," and she left the room, which she had entered casually and unobserved.

Emma looked a little scared, but returned to the charge.

"She was at Mrs. Garrickson's, and out with the son. I saw them come down the drive. She's always with the Garricksons."

"He wasn't at the door," from Elizabeth.

"No; you bet!" with a knowing nod.

"Emma! Emma!" in a chorus of dismay.

"My word!" from Elizabeth. "You'd better not let Mrs. Williams hear of this. You'd be out of the house in an hour."

"And as for Miss Caryl!" and there was a general gasp.

"I don't care," sulkily. Emma was not "well suited," and she was angry just now about the morning-room. "She should mix with gentlefolks if she belongs to gentlefolks——" But the prudent Elizabeth would have no more—Emma had to hush—now the mischief was done.

Mildred meanwhile sat solitary in her luxurious drawing-room, with idle hands and busy brain, thinking of the evening, and feeling a little sore at the extinction of her plan—for it was extinguished. She did not care about it now; she would not do it now, she knew, and her woman's wit began to discover why and what had dictated Garth's verdict. "Pride of race, pride of place"—so like Garth!—and her reverie became very still and deep.

She woke at last; the fire was almost burnt out, the gilt clock was chiming eleven. She had forgotten to order coffee, and Elizabeth, supposing she had had it, and quite too well bred to intrude, had brought nothing; and now all were in bed but Thomas, who waited to turn off the gas. She went to the dining-room, found a biscuit or two in the sideboard, and munching these—for she had taken nothing since six o'clock—went coldly, wearily up-stairs.

CHAPTER IV.

"GARTH," Mrs. Garrickson said at breakfast next morning, "I am a little sorry you were so decided with Miss Mildred last night; she'll give it all up now, and it's a pity."

"Why, mother?"

"Because if she had asked her father he might have allowed."

"She could have done no good, mother."

"It might do her no harm. Of course she proposed too much; but a little. Her life is trifling, and her father must know it—he's a good man, and sensible."

"You don't see him at the mill."

"What's the matter at the mill?"

"He is hard."

"To you, Garth?"

"Oh no; I mean in general."

"You must excuse it. If you could remember him would know this would disgust him. It was by way of declaring her principles."

So this was Miss Mildred's special reason. Garth had risen from the table and was putting on his boots.

"A moment he stood so, laughing too, partly at her."—p. 46.

as I can before he lost his wife, you would. It was hard to work his way up for her year after year, and then lose her in a few months so; he's a good man, for all that. Besides, as to Miss Mildred, there might be another reason; it struck me it might be her cousin. From what she said, I gathered that he proposed marriage to her in London and wouldn't take refusal. I believe she just ran home away from him—and she

"Her father would approve of that marriage," he said, without looking up.

"I don't know; he does not approve of cousins marrying."

"But there's the keeping together of this and the Irish estate."

"I don't think he cares; it's a very poor one. I was wretched the month I kept that house. Besides, you know he is a Home Ruler," with a merry glance at her son. Irish politics were wont to excite him. "I believe he would rather have someone who could manage the mill."

Garth finished his lacing in silence, stood up and stretched himself; then with a preliminary stamp or two, said, "Well, good-bye, mother; I shan't be up to dinner—you can send it down;" and atoning for this autocratic ordering with a kiss, was off.

A minute after, Mrs. Garrickson heard the large gate clash, and peeped through the window just in time to see him pass from behind it and run down the field-path.

This, she knew, joined, a little lower down the hill, the lane which ran parallel with the avenue, and, dipping under the drive, met the steps and the private door which led steeply down from it on the other side, and was really, if anything, a shorter route to the mill. But Garth had never gone this way, preferring the privacy of the avenue and drive, and being a little proud of his privilege of using them. She looked at the clock; he was not late. What inscrutable beings sons are!

"AWAY TO THE WEST."

BY F. M. HOLMES.

SETTLING DOWN ON BOARD.

WELL, and what can you do?" "Oh, anything, sir."

"What! can you make a watch?" "Oh no-o-o; not a watch."

"Can you milk a cow, then?" "Oh yes, sir."

"How many could you milk in an hour?"

"That all depends, sir."

"Could you milk twenty?"

"Yes, sir"—confidently.

"That is good milking; have you carried off first prize for milking?"

Beginning to think he has made a mistake, he cautiously answers, "No-o."

"Now, come, have you ever milked a cow in your life?"

"Well, sir, I cannot say as I have, but I don't mind trying."

The object of this cross-examination is now partly achieved. It is to discover something of the man's character, and also, if possible, what he really can do.

He wants to emigrate, but the gentleman questioning him intends to accept only those who are likely to prove good emigrants. And, as usual, the man or woman who can do everything, can—when it comes to the point—do nothing.

This man has a grain of common-sense in him, and he soon climbs down from his high horse. "I know little, but I am willing to learn," betokens a far better frame of mind as regards Canadian farming than, "Oh yes, I can do anything!"

Then about the money. Ah! the money. What a wonderful hindrance to many a grand plan is the money! Yet the management of money is a better test of character than the weaving and dreaming of plans.

"I can pay something to the expenses," says our friend.

"Good, that is right," replies his questioner; for this is the Self-Help Society, and Mr. E. W. Gates, its secretary, seeks to lead those who apply to him to pay something themselves.

"So you really are not too particular as to what you do at first?"

"No, sir."

"And you will take service with a farmer out there for a time, so as to learn something of the work and ways of the country?"

"Yes, sir."

"And you can pay part of the passage-money yourself?"

"Yes, sir."

"Then fill up the application form, and your case shall come before the Committee. We have over fifty honorary agents in various parts of Canada to whom we send our emigrants, and who have usually work waiting for them on their arrival. So you can begin that way, and afterwards you can take up a grant of land for yourself."

This good man having withdrawn, another appears. He is a young fellow, who has evidently been too much petted by his mother. He has apparently never done any hard work in his life. When he left off sucking his thumb he took to sucking his walking-stick. He is not vicious—simply weak and pappy through foolish petting, and his father wisely thinks it would be well for him to emigrate if only he would turn over the proverbial new leaf in so doing.

What is to be done with him? Clearly Mr. Gates cannot accept him as he is. But will he throw aside his kid gloves and his foppish airs, and go to work on a farm for three months? The Self-Help Society are enabled to send certain applicants to a farm where they may be tested and trained before winging their way to the West. Will he go there?

DISTRIBUTING KITS.

Yes, he will go.

There is no real vice in him; and looking ahead we see that freed from enervating influences, and with steady discipline behind him, he will learn to earn his bread and do useful work. Most likely he will make a successful emigrant.

"Oh! I don't believe in emigrating," exclaims Mr. Finnick. "It is played out. Why, there were the Wheakbax—they went—cost 'em a heap o' money; took up ground in a dead-alive place, and found that farming didn't pay there any more than here. Faugh! emigrating is a mistake."

"Is it, though?" exclaims Mr. Sturdyman. "Young Jack Goahead did not find it a mistake. He went over to Manitoba, got work from the neighbours till he felt his own feet, took up 160 acres, and is now doing well. It all depends on the sort of persons who emigrate—that is my opinion."

And no doubt Mr. Sturdyman is right. Persons who are able and willing to work on the land and to engage in agricultural pursuits are as a rule the people to emigrate.

So the person who can milk a cow is likely to fare better than the surgeon who can set a limb. A hard saying, perhaps, but a true one—so far at least as Canada is concerned.

There is emigration and emigration. Wholesale and indiscriminate deportation of thriftless and unsuitable persons is strongly to be deprecated. They are "dumped down" on a foreign shore, only to drag out miserable lives and become a burden on their adopted country.

But there is another kind of emigration—the emigration of hard-working and suitable persons, who will adapt themselves to their surroundings, and shape out a bright and happy future under the British flag abroad.

It is this kind of emigration that we understand the Self-Help Emigration Society seeks to promote. Its emigrants must show some capacity for self-help. Further, it tries to advise them as to the best course to pursue, and sends them to its correspondents, who help to give them a start in their new country.

So that this large number of people we see crowding Euston platform to-night are all going over the water to friends—so to speak—instead of being "shot" on to a foreign shore, hardly knowing where to go, or what to do.

It is a motley assemblage. For the most part its members look very respectable, and keep their feelings well under control.

But not all. You do not like to see two great fellows kissing one another, and neither do I. But these two men might never see each other again, and under the overwhelming excitement of the moment the icy English reserve is thawed and the calm English reticence gives way, and the osculatory practice is performed in the crowd, as though they were women; but most of these good folk have their own feelings to consider, and not much notice is taken.

The hour of departure is at hand; the meeting is over in the board-room, and a substantial supper has been disposed of. We try to make ourselves as comfortable as we can for the long night journey. A good many endeavour to occupy corners. When they were children they objected to being put in a corner; and in later days folks do not like to be cornered in the affairs of life; but there is a great demand for corners now, and happy is he that hath one.

Parents, too, are busy making arrangements for their children—for the party includes persons big and little, and of almost all ages. The luggage, largely labelled, is all locked up in the capacious vans; the North-Western guards and porters, adepts in the management of departing crowds, have got all the travellers into the carriages, the whistles sound along this platform of many partings, and at a few minutes past midnight the heavily laden train slowly steams away.

"Hurrah! hurrah!" shouts the large crowd that is left. "Hurrah! hurrah!" echoes under the wide glass roof. The powerful engine is gathering speed, and away we pass into the night.

It is well that the last word in London, and almost the last in England, should be such a hearty English cheer. And were not the emigrants' ears ringing also with words of hearty encouragement and hope, heard by some of them at the spirited meeting in the board-room, and should they not look forward to the future with happiness and bright expectation? So if there are tears in their hearts, they keep them off their faces.

"Now I hope there will be no trouble this time," remarks one of the officials. "On one occasion a child died in the train; or rather," he corrects himself, "it did not die."

"A wonderful baby, that!"

"It was like this," he continues, laughing. "There was a mother and a child in one of the carriages with an older woman, and when we got some distance down this child had convulsions—got into a fit or something. The old woman declared it was dead—she had brought up ten children and she ought to know!"

"Whereupon, of course, screaming and hysterics followed, as was but natural, and when the train drew up at the next stopping station, attention was directed to the carriage. The station-master made the family alight—they could not go on with a dead child on board."

"But presently, when they began to lay it out reverently, and so forth, behold, it commenced to cry, and showed most unmistakable signs of life!"

"In fact, it became all right again, and the worst that happened was that their passage to Canada was delayed for a week. I was told nothing about the matter till we got to Liverpool."

Moral: A woman who has brought up ten children alive is not the best person to give a certificate of death.

Well, happily, nothing of the sort happened on this occasion, and in the cold light of the morning we duly arrived at Alexandra Dock station, most of us fresh as larks. Some of the young men protested they had not slept a wink, though their bright appearance would seem to belie their statement. The curious objection that some of us have to own that we have succumbed to sleep manifests itself, you see, even in a night emigrant train.

And now a great phenomenon presents itself. There is no trouble about luggage. Mr. James Wright, of the North Western's passenger department, sees to that; and while Mr. E. W. Gates leads his little "family" of 150 emigrants to a neighbouring café for a substantial breakfast, the North Western and Beaver Line officials between them convey the tons of luggage down to the ship, whose Blue Peter flying high aloft proclaims she is about to start. So the most anxious matron who ever troubled about her "things" can breakfast in leisure and in peace.

"Now we will go down to the ship and have our kits given out," is the instruction, and away in groups, following one another, some carrying parcels of luggage required on the voyage, they make their way to the dock.

On the quay under cover are the kits. These mysterious equipments become, on closer acquaintance, very simple. They consist of a paillassé and pillow, a shining tin plate and pannikin, and a knife, fork, and spoon. They cannot be called dear at three shillings and sixpence, and they remain the property of the emigrants themselves. Neither can the blankets which the Self-Help Society supplies be regarded as high-priced at four shillings.

Answering to name, the emigrants receive their kits, and laden with these household goods, they walk on to the big liner and are directed to the steerage.

Then commences the important business of the selection of berths. And behold, what a number of strange faces throng around. Norwegian and German are here. These people have come from the Continent by way of Hull, and they form a remarkable testimony to the high position of Britain in the carrying trade of the world.

"Why," we ask, "should all these foreigners crowd over to England to journey to America by a British ship?"

"I suppose it is our Merchant Shipping Act," is the reply. "It provides the regulations as to space, and so on, under which passengers travel. A friend of mine once voyaged to South America in an Italian emigrant ship, and described the overcrowding as shocking."

The Board of Trade officers inspect the ship before she sails, pass the food taken on board, and pass the people also, to see that none are suffering from infectious disease.

MEDICAL INSPECTION.

A GROUP OF EMIGRANTS.

One by one the emigrants file before the medico. Apparently he sees them not, but, suddenly he pounces! He has noticed a child apparently sickening for measles, and it is enough. Voluble though the mother may be, she produces no effect. The child cannot be allowed on board, and with its mother will probably be taken to the workhouse infirmary.

Stern though these regulations may appear, they are but cruel to be kind. Imagine the state of the steerage, or even of the entire ship, with a thousand souls on board, and infectious disease appearing as undesirable cargo! Hence the medical inspection.

So, whether the agents of the British shipping companies are unusually brisk, or whether there are so many more British ships afloat, or whether the regulations under which they sail are so satisfactory, a goodly number of foreign emigrants cross the Atlantic under the Union Jack.

The quarters for women and children are quite separate from those of the men, though the married men are permitted to take meals with their families in their quarters during the day. The berths are, as usual, in two tiers, and sometimes five in a row. Near by are the benches at which the meals are taken. Funnels from above supply plenty of fresh air below decks, and there is a covered way up-stairs round the sides of the vessel, where in wet weather the passengers can sit or gaily take their constitutional.

An impatient little tug is fussing at the bows, and soon the big ship is hauled and warped out of dock. We pass by famous liners at almost every turn. Here is the Teutonic, which held the blue ribbon of the Atlantic for speed; there the Alaska, which has also won that proud distinction in her time; not far off, in the river, lies the Cunarder Etruria. In these wonderful nine miles of docks, and on the broad bosom of the Mersey, you can see scores of big steamers, bound for pretty well every part of the world.

Neatly the pilot and the captain take the vessel through the narrow opening of the docks and out into the river. Here she waits for the Board of Trade inspection, and here some of the saloon passengers come aboard by a tender.

Sometimes it suits the officials' convenience best to clear straight out from the docks, and the inspection takes place before the fussy tug gets to work. Then the emigrants file on board one by one from the quay, before the medical officer. To-day we lie anchored in mid-stream for a while.

It is surprising how soon the emigrants begin to settle down. What appeared to be endless confusion an hour ago is now straightening out into something like order. Everything is found to be quite clean; berths and companions are now pretty nearly all chosen, and people begin to walk about at leisure and inspect the ship, or sit down at their ease.

Here are a couple of women quite at home. They evidently cannot quite decide whether they are out of doors or under cover. So they compromise the matter by taking off bonnet and shawl and appearing in a woollen bodice—I believe that is the right name, though I speak warily of feminine apparel—over their dress. The bodices are bound with gay ribbon, and they flash like a meteor from afar. The owners thereof march about with much satisfaction.

Presently the bell rings for dinner, and the stewards go about with great cans of savoury-smelling soup. There is a pleasant scent, too, near the kitchens. The emigrants appear to stand a chance of faring better on board than many of them, as a rule, have done ashore.

In the saloon is Captain Carey. His name and that of the ship, the Lake Huron, remind us that he saved one of the fine vessels of the North German Lloyd Line a few months before, by towing her a considerable distance into port. Arbitration recognised his services to the extent that the Beaver Line, which owns the Lake Huron, was awarded £10,000, of which a large amount was distributed among captain and crew.

Captain Carey is a modest, unassuming man, somewhat short in stature, whose eyes, an unobservant spectator might say, seem to see nothing. Yet we venture to affirm that nothing escapes them. He is quiet, keen, and brave. The plucky captain has won hosts of medals, of which a rascally burglar deprived him.

But the tender alongside grows impatient. She blows her whistle, or rings her bell, and all visitors to the Huron must depart.

Down the gangway they troop, and its steepness reminds them how high the ship's sides rise out of the water. What a huge floating village she is, with her eight hundred or thousand souls on board!

The last farewells are said; hands and handkerchiefs wave; and away steams the tender. Soon the big liner will sail also. Her strong bluff bows will soon be cutting the water, and her solid appearance and record of good work done all indicate that she will carry her hundreds of emigrants quite safely to the Land of the Setting Sun.

May it prove to them, as it has to many before them, the Land of the Rising Sun.

INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

NOVEMBER 19TH. IMITATION OF CHRIST.

To read—Ephes. iv. 20—32. Golden Text—ver. 32.

INTRODUCTION. Ephesus was an important city on the west coast of Asia Minor, famed for its great Temple to the heathen goddess Diana. St. Paul stayed there two years at the end of his second missionary journey (Acts xix. 10.) This letter was written by him to the Ephesians from Rome while a prisoner. It contains the deepest teachings of religion as well as minute practical instruction for different classes of people. To-day's lesson gives some practical duties for all Christians.

I. THE NEW MAN. (20—24.) What is it?

A new learning. Before, taught to worship idols; Now have learned the truth revealed in Jesus.

He is the Son of God—likeness of God the Father. He is the only Saviour for the sin of the world.

A new conversation, or manner of life.

Before, they had been afflicted with evil spirits. (Acts xix. 13.)

Now filled with Holy Spirit. (Ephes. iii. 16.)

Before, had practised witchcraft. (Acts xix. 19.)

Now, eyes enlightened to know God. (Ephes. i. 18.)

A new spirit. The old nature vile and corrupt.

The new nature lowly, forbearing, and holy. (Ephes iv. 2.)

II. PRACTICAL DUTIES. (25—32.) Put away—

Lying—hateful to a God of truth. (Prov. xii. 22.)

The devil the father of lies. (St. John viii. 44.)

Gehazi, Elisha's servant, punished. (2 Kings v. 27.)

Ananias and Sapphira struck dead. (Acts v. 5.)

Must tell truth, whole truth, nothing but truth.

Because of mutual relations to each other.

Anger—i.e., unrighteous anger, with sin in it.

For it is joined to clamour and evil-speaking (Ephes. iv. 31), and to strife and contention. (Prov. xxix. 22.)

Moses punished for angry words. (Num. xx. 12.)

Opposite virtues are kindness, forgiveness, etc.

Highest example is God's forgiveness of man.

Theft. Incurs wrath of God on all connected. (Zech. v. 3, 4.)

Example, Achan after taking of Jericho. (Josh. vii. 24.)

Opposite virtues, hard work, honesty, bounty.

Corrupt talk. A mark of the ungodly. (Ps. lvi. 3.)

Proceeds out of man's evil heart. (St. Mark vii. 23.)

Rather should speak good and useful words.

Words should be kind, pure, gentle, and true.

III. REASON. To sin in these ways grieves God's Holy Spirit. Notice three things about Him.

He is Spirit of holiness—cannot dwell in impure heart.

He is a true Friend—must not be grieved.

He seals forgiveness—must not be driven away.

LESSONS. 1. Create in me a clean heart, O God.

2. Take not Thy Holy Spirit from me.

NOVEMBER 26TH. THE CHRISTIAN HOME.

To read—Col. iii. 12—25. Golden Text—Ps. ci. 2.

INTRODUCTION. St. Paul did not found the Church at Colosse, and probably had never been there. (ii. 1.) But he wrote this letter while a prisoner at Rome, being anxious about some things he heard of the Colossian Christians. To-day's lesson teaches some general and special duties.

I. GENERAL DUTIES OF CHRISTIANS. (12—17.)

They are chosen of God, and beloved by Him.

Therefore must imitate Christ in His life.

Humility. Christ took lowest place to save man.

Kindness. Christ ever went about doing good.
Long-suffering. Christ bore with Jews three years.
Forgiveness. Christ forgave His enemies—healed Malchus' ear, restored St. Peter to His favour. (St. John xxi. 15.)

Love (charity). Highest and best of all graces.
 Christ out of love died for ungodly.
Peace. Because are all members of one body.
Wisdom. Must teach and admonish each other.
 Must study the words and spirit of Christ.
Praise. The heart should be full of gladness.
 St. Paul and Silas sang hymns in prison. (Acts xvi. 25.)

Thanks. All works to be a free-will offering to God, done in His name and to His glory.

II. SPECIAL DUTIES OF INDIVIDUALS. (18—25.)

Wives. To submit—as far as is consistent with their higher duty to God.

Husbands. To love wives as Christ loves the Church (Ephes. v. 25), i.e., bearing with and forgiving faults.

Children. Obedience in lawful things. (Ephes. vi. 1.)
 Rebellious sons liable under the law to be stoned to death. (Deut. xxi. 18.)

Christ obeyed as a Son of God. (Heb. iii. 6.)

Servants. Obedience to lawful masters.

Service to be given heartily, as in God's fear.

Christian servants are servants of God.

He gives good wages to His servants.

But punishes masters and servants who do wrong.

He gives a present happiness and peace.

He promises a future reward of bliss.

What a happy household where all do their duty as thus described!

III. LESSONS. 1. Let brotherly love continue.

2. Do all to the glory of God.

3. Blessed are the people who have the Lord for their God.

DECEMBER 3RD. GRATEFUL OBEDIENCE.

To read—St. James i. 16—27. Golden Text—1 John iv. 19.

INTRODUCTION. St. James, the writer of this letter, was one of the twelve apostles, and the same who was called "the Lord's brother"—being his cousin. (Gal. i. 19.) He was the first Bishop of Jerusalem, and as such presided over the first Council. (Acts xv. 13, 19.) The Epistle is addressed to Jewish Christians, but is suitable to all.

I. GOD THE GIVER OF GOOD. (16—18.) His Name, God, means "the good one."

Are not to think sin is God's work.

God's gifts to men are all good and perfect.

He is giver of common every-day blessings.

Light, food, health, all His gifts alone.

He is as it were a Sun—source of all life.

With Him is no change—He is ever the same.

He also gives special blessings to His people.

Israel led through wilderness safely.

St. Peter preserved from sinking in sea.

Apostles delivered from prison. (Acts v. 19.)

Christians begotten again in Christ Jesus designed to be the first-fruits of God's creatures.

They have blessings for this life and the next.

They are to bring others to the same blessings.

II. MAN'S DUTY TO GOD. (19—25.) (a) Swift to hear. What?

God's voice in nature—All tells of Him.

His power seen in storm, earthquake, etc.

His wisdom in ordering of differing parts.

His love in flowers, fruits, etc., for man's comfort.

God's voice in conscience. Speaks to heart.

If not listened to, heart gets hard.

God's voice in Bible—able to save souls. (21.)

(b) Slow to speak. Why?

Because words reveal thoughts—these too often evil. God hears and remembers. (Mal. iii. 16.)

Tongue is full of deadly poison. (James iii. 8.)

(c) Slow to wrath. Vengeance is Mine, saith God.

May not cherish anger for injuries received.

Rather learn to forgive wrongs.

(d) Be doers of the Word—not hearers only.

Easy to hear, listen, be pleased—and forget.

Like a man forgetting his own likeness.

But a diligent student of God's Word will frame his life accordingly, and be blessed.

Remind of Bereans who searched the Scriptures (Acts xvii. 11), and Timothy who knew them from a child.

III. TRUE RELIGION. (26, 27) What it is not.

Mere talk, even about good things.

Even preaching in Christ's Name. (St. Matt. vii. 22.)

What it is. Outward—ministering to others.

Inward—keeping self untainted by the world.

Living in the world as not of the world.

LESSONS. 1. Blessed is the man that feareth the Lord, that delighteth greatly in His commandments.

2. God seeth not as man seeth.

DECEMBER 10TH. THE HEAVENLY INHERITANCE.

To read—1 Pet. i. 1—12. Golden Text—Col. i. 12.

INTRODUCTION. This letter is addressed to Christians living in various parts of Asia Minor. St. Peter wrote it from Babylon on the river Euphrates. It is full of hope and encouragement as to the Christian life here and hereafter.

I. CHRISTIANS CHOSEN BY GOD. (1, 2) How?

By His foreknowledge of their accepting salvation.

Where? All over the world—those who believe in Christ.

To what? Obedience to God's commandments.

Daily cleansing from sin through Christ.

To all such St. Peter sends his salutation.

Desires that grace and mercy may be theirs.

II. CHRISTIANS' BLESSINGS IN RESERVE. (3—5.)

An inheritance in God's Kingdom of glory.

Notice its nature. Incarnate—no more death.

Unfiled. Nothing unholy can enter.

Fades not away. In its joys—they are lasting.

Reserved—or laid up as a treasure well guarded for those kept by God's power from falling.

III. CHRISTIANS' PRESENT TRIALS. (6—9.)

What?

Temptations to sin. Devil always active.

Trials of faith and constancy by persecutions.

But all working out a good purpose.

Faith being more precious than gold, its trial by fire will have more glorious result.

What will be the reward of tried faith?

Praise—"Well done, good and faithful servant."

Honour—"I will make thee ruler over many things."

Glory—"They shall walk with Me in white."

Even now have joy in believing.

Faith produces love, and love gives joy.

Present salvation—future glory.

IV. CHRISTIANS' GRACE FORETOLD. (10—12.)

By whom?

By prophets of old who foretold coming of Christ. Christ's sufferings foretold by Isaiah. (Is. liii. 6.)

His glory by David—Psalmist and Prophet. (Ps. ex. 1, 2.)

They spake under guidance of Holy Spirit.

The same Spirit teaches God's ministers still.

The same grace given to God's children.

LESSONS. 1. God has called us to holiness. Are we obeying the call?

2. God has provided for us a home. Are we seeking it?

3. They that will live godly must be tried. How are we enduring temptation?

THE WORK OF THE GREAT FLOOD.

BY MARY HAMPDEN, AUTHOR OF "THE HEIRESS OF ABERSTONE," "LUNA GORDON'S STEWARDSHIP," ETC.

CHAPTER I.

MILLMERE FARM was the property of a woman. Its late owner, Richard Barford, had left it to his elder daughter, and Mary was competent to undertake the charge. As Lena, her younger sister, often declared, "Mary was as good as a man any day!"

Not that there was anything masculine about the girl's appearance or character, unless an unyielding will be considered unfeminine. She did not make up her mind upon any question hastily, but when she had formed an opinion, and her sense of duty obliged her to express one, no amount of persuasion or argument availed to shake it. This self-reliance was the result of her training; she had been her father's counsellor and housekeeper for many years; and even her enemies—for Miss Barford was not universally beloved—agreed that that father would have left fewer debts behind him if he had taken his daughter's advice instead of merely listening to it.

One August afternoon Mary stood alone by the window of the farm-house parlour, her eyes resting upon the view of the Millmere land.

And the landscape spread out before her was beautiful indeed. This was the time of year when the Fen-country looked its best, with golden corn-fields stretching for miles and miles, with scarcely a break.

No hedges marked out the fields; scarcely a tree showed, except the low elms and pollard-willows which clustered near the farm itself. Far away, a long line of waving sedge crossed the land, telling that a river or canal flowed there between the huge grass banks, raised some ten feet above the level of the fen.

The sunshine glinted on the golden grain, and the summer sky was of the deepest blue, fading to amber on the western horizon, for day was drawing to an end.

Mary's own face was in the shadow of the window-curtain; she seemed apart from the brightness of nature.

Yet it was a face which smiles would have made rarely beautiful; the features were almost faultless; the eyes were a rich brown, like the hair which waved smoothly on her brow; the mouth it was which told of the trouble at her heart, for its lips trembled.

In her hand was a letter.

Her sister entered the room and came behind her, laying a caressing hand on her arm. Lena was only twenty, six years younger than Mary, but the latter's brow showed lines which Time had not traced; which were due to the anxieties of her position. Lena was not easily impressed, while Mary had known both joy and sorrow in her short life. The sisters would have been strikingly alike had their expressions not been different.

"Well, Mary, was it a nice letter?"

"You may see it, dear; you know I have no secrets from you."

"It is not worth while having a lover, if his epistles don't cheer you up more than this one has done."

A smile—not a very merry one—crossed Mary's face.

"A long engagement takes the romance out of a lover's mind, Lena, so his pen cannot produce a love-letter at all."

Lena looked up quickly, then gave all her attention to the sheet of paper covered with small writing.

There was silence in the room.

Outside, where Mary's gaze was still fixed, there were a few signs of life. A flock of wild geese rose screaming from between the high banks which enclosed the river; a horseman travelled slowly along the green drove or roadway which the bank sheltered; and a herd of shaggy little fen-ponies scampered across a distant tract of marshy pasture-land.

"Lily spoke more insulting words, as they passed through the churchyard together."—p. 59.

"Richard wants you to marry him at once, Mary. He seems very impatient, to judge by his letter; and yet—and yet——"

"And yet he does not care for me as he once did."

Mary ended the sentence herself, and only a very keen listener could have detected that there was a quiver of emotion in her low voice.

"I didn't like to say that, but it was what I meant. What are you going to do?"

"Answer him as I have answered so often," was the firm reply. "We are too poor to marry at once."

"Mary!—You wouldn't let anyone else call the owner of Millmere Farm poor! You know it is the richest land in the county!"

"I shall only be poor for a few years, dear, until father's debts are paid; but Richard will not wait till then."

Lena's cheeks flushed with indignation.

"Why doesn't he find work to do himself? What is the use of living upon his father, and grumbling at you because you keep him waiting? If I were you, Mary, I would give him a good scolding!"

"I shall soon have an opportunity—here he comes. I have been watching him all across the fens."

The rider had crossed a small bridge which led from the level, drove over the bordering ditch and into a road which ran through the corn-fields. Reaching the outer gate of the farm garden, he tied his horse to the fence, and walked up the path between the tall sunflowers.

Mary went out to meet him.

Lena, left alone, shrugged her shoulders with an impatient gesture, and took up the sewing from her work-basket.

"Poor old Mary!" she thought to herself. "Richard Linn is growing tired of her; even the people in the village say so, and Lily Carr more than hinted as much. Well, it is lucky that she takes everything so quietly. Some girls would half break their hearts at being jilted. I know I should!"

Of the strong feelings which are sometimes hidden by a quiet manner Lena did not think. She had only lately come home from school; and, though she loved Mary, almost despised her for her submission to a humdrum existence. Miss Barford did not seek the society of the village, as did Lena; she lived in her work, and it was certain that the farm prospered in her care.

Richard Linn, the youngest son of another Fen landowner, was reckoned the handsomest man of the county. This reputation had not improved his disposition, which was self-appreciative to a degree. Three years ago he had won the heart of Mary Barford, less by his fine eyes than through a winning manner that he could assume at will—a manner which had led her to believe that she could influence him for good as no other woman would ever have the power to do.

For a while she had been absolutely, radiantly happy in her engagement, then disenchantment had begun. It was not that she loved her promised husband less, or shrank from the discovery of his many faults, but she noticed that her wishes, her opinions, had no longer the least effect upon him, and in matters of conscience she could not help being conscious of his want of sympathy with herself. This was a man who made a point of church-going, yet who let that outward observance begin and end his religion.

With Mary's brave resolution to pay to the last farthing those debts of her father's, of whose very existence she had been ignorant during his lifetime, Richard Linn was greatly displeased.

Lena scarcely looked up when, after an hour had elapsed, her sister re-entered the room.

"Have you given him the scolding?" she asked unconcernedly.

"I have given him his freedom," was Mary's quiet answer.

CHAPTER II.

THE weeks passed, becoming months, and the Fen-country lost its beauty with the cutting of the corn. The land looked distressingly cold and bare without its golden covering; distance seemed greater across its monotonous level; while grey skies merged into grey mists, which rose to greet the autumn from the marshes as yet undrained.

A change, not unlike the change in Nature, had come over Mary Barford's life. She had lost the romance which had made the world seem in sympathy with her, which had been the cheering influence of her every hour and day, yet which had deserved a higher title than that of mere romance. Her love had been a virtue, her joy in it a part of her religion; for she had meant to be Richard Linn's good angel.

Millmere Farm, in its lonely isolation, was seldom visited by distant neighbours, though Lena often contrived to obtain the young society which was congenial to her, for she went to stay with friends in the nearest town—a cathedral city. Mary, left alone on these occasions devoted her energies more and more to farming. One friend of her own she had, and only one, and he was too busy to be able often to ride over to see her; for he was curate of the rambling parish, and lived at the rectory beside the little old grey church, many miles away from Millmere.

The Rev. George Keith heard of Richard Linn's broken engagement, and resolved to visit Millmere himself as soon as he could be safely spared from work for an afternoon.

When he saw Mary again, she told him, with a simplicity natural to her, that she was unhappy, restless, with too much time upon her hands, and asked him to tell her of some work to do.

He advised her to visit several poor families not far from Millmere, the men of which were employed at an engine-house where the reclamation of some fen-land was in progress.

So it happened that Mary and Mr. Keith met more often than before, for these homes were also in his parish.

Gradually he grew to love and honour the pale proud girl whose quiet manner he was sure covered many emotions. She never complained of young Linn's desertion, nor of the suffering which ill-natured gossip caused her. For gossip, once set afloat, will travel, even over the Fens, whose human inhabitants are separated by such wide distances.

The month of November came, and Lena, returning from one of her visits, brought news with her. Richard Linn had become engaged to Lily Carr, and the Carrs were moving before Christmas into Broad Drove Farm, not half a mile from Millmere.

Mary heard the news in silence. Lena scarcely realised that it might pain her sister to know the truth.

One day while walking along the Drove, Mary and Lily Carr met.

Lily was a little fair girl, not a little affected, and she had always disliked Mary. The Carrs and Barfords had quarrelled years before over a quarter of an acre of land, which both families claimed, and Lily, whose father had failed to gain the lawsuit which had impoverished him, had, from her earliest years, been jealous of Mary's superior fortune.

"I suppose you've heard of my engagement, Miss Barford? Aren't you going to wish me joy?"

Mary, who had been about to pass the girl with a bow of recognition only, was obliged to turn and pause.

"I hope you may both be happy," she said gravely.

"Oh, I don't doubt it! Poor dear Richard needs cheering up after your cruel treatment of him. Not but that he is thankful to have escaped you—you really were too shockingly good for him, he says."

"Mr. Linn could have asked for his freedom before I offered it to him, had he wished to do so."

"Oh! no gentleman cares to ask a girl to release him. He gave you any number of hints upon the subject, according to his own account, but you would not take any of them."

A dangerous light came into Mary's dark eyes, but she paused before answering, and during the pause her wrath died down. With a quiet word in parting, she went on her way again.

Further down the Drove she met Mr. Keith. He had just been to the home she was going to visit, and he walked with her some way on his return route.

The girl knew that the hot tears which had flooded her eyes a moment before had left their traces upon her face, but she did not shrink from the keen glance of her companion—it was at once sympathetic and respectful. George Keith was no longer a very young man; he had known sorrow himself, and the record of pain nobly endured was visible in the exceeding gentleness of his expression.

"You are in trouble, Miss Barford. Is it some passing annoyance only, or some matter in which a friend might sympathise?"

"You will despise my weakness if I tell you it is merely the effect of wounded pride! I have just met Lily Carr—"

"And she tried to triumph over you? She is to be pitied, poor child—for she is only a child."

"His strong arm supported her and her burden into the welcome shelter."—p. 60.

"Pitied!" cried Mary. "It is all I can do to keep from hating her!"

George Keith was silent. He knew when words are of less value than abstinence from words. Left to her own reflections, Mary grew ashamed of her bitter admission.

"I am wrong—foolish and wicked!" she faltered, "but I cannot bear to be told that he wished for his freedom long ago—that I have deceived myself all the while. Oh, it is hard to learn that!"

"He has played with Love," said Mr. Keith softly: "played with and lost Love, for which some men into whose lives it has never come would have——" He broke off abruptly; adding, in a changed tone, "Miss Barford, the people in this world who never pity themselves are the most to be pitied!"

"I am sure you are right," she answered, a smile crossing her face in response to a smile upon his.

CHAPTER III.

MARY BARFORD did not guess George Keith's secret. She was grateful for his friendship, feeling that she might rely upon his advice always, and began to look forward to her chance meetings with him as to the happiest incidents of her quiet existence.

Quiet though that existence was, it brought her many temptations. At times she felt so utterly dispirited and lonely that she forgot to be thankful for the very benefits of solitude—its freedom and leisure. She was her own mistress, able to rule her life as she pleased; and it possessed opportunities—as what life does not?

Her greatest trial was the immediate neighbourhood of the Carrs. She met Lily often, and the girl never failed to speak some sarcastic word which would strike painfully home to the pride of the woman Richard Linn had jilted.

Mary scarcely knew herself in those days. She had fancied herself calm, even-tempered, not easily roused; yet now passionate rebellion would surge up in her heart—a wild longing for revenge upon this creature who had the power to humble her, seized her at moments. In a second the longing would pass, but as surely did it return again, bewildering her by its vehemence.

Lena Barford accepted an invitation to spend Christmas with friends at a distance, so Mary was left alone at that festive season: alone, with her own bitter thoughts to harass her.

were to be married at the commencement of the new year, and she had sent Mary a mockingly polite letter, inviting her to be present at the ceremony: "Do come, for it will not be perfect without you," she had written. "Poor dear Richard is so grateful to you for having set him free at last!"

This letter had roused all Mary's passions. She was tempted to wish that some great misfortune might overtake the girl—she felt that had she seen evil threatening her she would not have raised a finger to avert it, but would have rejoiced. This was the cloud brooding over her Christmas: this her worst enemy, against whose attacks she armed herself with prayer.

On Christmas morning, in the old grey church, she conquered in her conflict with self; she learned anew the message of peace, and took its teaching home to her heart.

Though Lily spoke more insulting words to her as they passed through the churchyard together, she wished her "a happy new year" sincerely.

"You look different, somehow, Miss Barford. I hope you're getting over your disappointment?"

"I do not regret any part of the past," was Mary's quiet answer.

She had many friends among the poor, and their greetings made her realise that no one on God's earth need be lonely. Mr. Keith came out also, and his smile and fervent hand-clasp cheered her.

"Are you all safe at Millmere?" he asked. "After these heavy rains the local prophets always predict disaster; and the weather will be bad again before long, I fear."

He glanced at the lowering sky.

"I will warn the bailiff," said Mary. "We did not suffer much in the last flood; but oh! Mr. Keith, what will the poor folks in those tumble-down cottages near the Works do if another comes?"

"We shall have to go out in boats and save them," he replied, smiling. "Perhaps the Carrs at Broad Drove run the most risk, for I hear that their house has been pronounced unsafe; the foundations are giving way."

Before Mary reached home the rain had begun again violently, yet with a steadiness which boded ill for the future. She could hear the waters of the canal rushing with hollow thunderous noise within the banks.

All day the danger was present in her thoughts.

That night, as she sat alone in the parlour of Millmere, the servants of the farm came hurrying in with fright written on their faces.

"Oh, miss! the bank's burst up Willard Drove, an' the water's comin' down like a torrent!"

It was true. All ears could hear a sullen roar, which waxed louder every second.

The bailiff had been warned in time, so Mary had nothing to lose; but her fear was not for herself, but for the Carrs and the poor of whom Mr. Keith had spoken.

Another hour had gone by, and the Fens were submerged. The scene of devastation was terrible: thousands of acres were lying feet deep under the water, flocks and herds were destroyed, houses levelled, many lives lost.

Now that the first violence of the torrent had abated, boats were out, men were busy in the work of rescue, but they were a few compared to the many needed; and every passing moment increased the peril of those who clung to the roofs of their homes, for another bank lower down the Drove was cracking, and could not hold out much longer against the volume of water pressing on it.

In one of these boats was Mary Barford. Not heeding the warnings of her servants, she had set out by herself as soon as possible.

"I risk only my own life," she thought: "and it is not a precious one—not worth half as much as the lives brave men are risking to-night: men who have wives and children to think for."

And she reached the Broad Drove Farm only just in time. The walls were staggering under the weight of the flood; only the top floor was above the water, and the inhabitants were crowding at the windows, watching, in terrible dread, for aid to come before it was too late.

Again and again Mary guided her boat between the farm and Millmere; nor did she rest even then. She had saved the lives of her enemies, sheltering them beneath her own roof. As she rowed away the last time with her human freight, she was glad to relinquish the oars to men's hands.

And looking back over the waste of waters, the roof of the Carrs' home was no longer visible.

As Mary re-entered her own house, Lily flung herself weeping into her arms.

"Oh!—you have rescued us—and I have always been horrid to you! If I had been drowned I should never have been able to tell you I was sorry! This morning, when you wished me happiness, I repented. Oh! Mary, Mary, can you forgive me?"

But Mary Barford could not rest satisfied with the work she had already done. Mr. Keith's words rang in her ears. Speaking of the families who lived near the engine-house, he had said, "We shall have to go out in boats and save them."

Again she set out in her boat, grateful that her early training had made her absolutely competent to guide it—she was more skilful with the oars than many of the fenmen themselves. And when she reached the submerged homes, she found George Keith had kept his word: he was rescuing the women and children from their peril.

"Miss Barford—you here?" he cried, his voice sounding clearly across the water. Mary had a lantern fixed in her boat so that the light fell full upon her face, making it easily recognisable, though the night was dark.

She rowed close to his boat.

"Can I help you?"

"There are two children left in the last house—they are at the window; bring them to the old windmill by the engine-station."

She nodded assent, understanding his meaning. The old mill had weathered many floods, for it was raised high upon an artificial mound.

"Be as quick as you can!" she heard him call as he disappeared in the darkness.

She seized the terrified children, and bent to her oars bravely, for there was a strange tremor going over the water, an increasing force in the swell as it rose and fell, and she knew the meaning of that message as clearly as she had understood George Keith's words.

The current was almost overwhelming by the time she reached the ladder of the disused mill, and saw his face watching for her.

His strong arm supported her and her burden, the tiny children, up the steps and into the welcome shelter. The rescued were all together on the highest floor of the mill.

Mary was trembling as she leaned against the wall; he saw, by the light of the lantern she now held, how pale was her face, yet what a tranquil happiness was in her eyes.

"Mary, I thought you would delay too long—that I had lost you for ever on earth!" he cried, pressing her hand in both his own.

She answered him with a smile of perfect satisfaction. "We have done our utmost, and He will do the rest!"

As their eyes met, his love was a secret to her no longer, and she realised that the past romance was dear to her no more—that all her deepest affection she had given unconsciously to this man, who was so worthy of her best.

"Dear love, the peril is not past. The mill may not stand—we may all perish!"

As he spoke the flood came down again over the desolated land, with a roar as of rage at finding itself cheated of many a victim.

The darkness shut out the view, hiding the horrors of the hour, but a crashing sound told of the ruin which was being wrought.

George Keith and Mary Barford waited for the end, not knowing when it might be.

But when morning dawned, grey and chill, showing a scene of devastation almost unequalled even in the Fens, the waters had done their worst, and lay still over the land, with scarcely a ripple, only long stretches of white foam remaining to tell what their might had been.

The fearful night was past, God's sunshine appeared in the sky by noonday, and the flood went down inch by inch.

It was a memory from which neither George nor Mary ever parted—that night of peril when, in the passing of a moment, their love for each other had first been declared.

That labour of rescue was not the last work of charity they did together; for the poor of that parish, in all their sorrows, have now no better friends on earth than George and Mary Keith.

TEACHING THE TEACHERS:

A SKETCH OF A MODEL LESSON.

MR. J. COLQUHOUN.

(From a Photograph by Mr. Fred Viner, Southwark Park Road, S.E.)

"I THINK I must give up my class."

"Oh, why?"

"Well, really, children receive so much teaching now-a-days in the week, and are so sharpened up in the day-schools, that—that—"

"Sunday-school teaching wants more preparation than you can bestow?"

"Well—yes."

"Certainly I agree that it should be very different from what it was," answered her companion; "but I think that children require just as much of what I call religious teaching as they did in the days before Board-schools overspread the land."

"Yes, I suppose so," said the younger teacher; "but I really think that persons with more time for preparation than I have would do better."

"But there are so many helps for teachers now in their work," replied her friend; "and it is not so much, I think, the elaborate preparation that is required as an attractive and interesting style of teaching, and also the selection of the right kind of thing to say. That is, you should seek to grasp the right principles of teaching rather than burden your mind with a mass of elaborate details. So, however, I judge from attending the Wednesday Evening Model Lessons at the Sunday-school Union."

"Oh, what are they?" asked the young teacher, with interest.

Her companion thereupon explained, as the two strolled along together through one of the London parks for a Saturday afternoon walk:—

"Every Wednesday evening," she said, "a Model Lesson, or a Preparation Lesson, is given to an audience of teachers in the lecture-hall of the Sunday-School Union, at 56, Old Bailey. The Model Lesson is given on alternate Wednesdays, and, as often as possible, by a practical teacher of long experience in day-schools and also Sunday-schools. The lesson is given to a class of children selected from a school near, who are dismissed at the close—say, at about twenty minutes past eight—when the teachers present are permitted to discuss and criticise the lesson. The giver of the lesson then replies, and the whole meeting closes promptly at a quarter to nine. So it will not be too late for you to reach home easily in good time."

"That is a great consideration for me," said the other, "especially as I have to be up early the next morning."

"Well," continued her friend, "this Model Lesson Evening is designed especially for younger teachers who may not have been able to obtain systematic training, and is calculated to help them in their work. The subject taken is the International Lesson for the next Sunday."

"Oh yes, we teach that," interrupted her companion.

"And on the Preparation Lesson Evenings members of the 'Teachers' Circle' meet to submit outlines, define words, frame questions, and give information. No fewer than ten, and sometimes thirteen, fully qualified teachers take part in these evenings."

"And do many teachers attend?" asked her friend eagerly.

"Oh yes; there are generally large attendances, principally of young teachers. In fact, these training lessons have become quite an institution with the Sunday-School Union. They are never missed for a week, except for a holiday. They are under the Training and Examination Committee of the Union, and Mr. James Colquhoun, the secretary to the class, has arranged the programme for nearly fifteen years. Come to one, and see how it is conducted."

In consequence of this conversation, the two friends appeared at the next Model Lesson of the Union. Their visit being just before Easter, the subject was the Resurrection of Christ, and the teacher for the evening, Mrs. M. Lewis—formerly Miss M. A. Ryder, of the Stockwell Training College—had procured a model of a sepulchre, which was like a large hole in a rock, with a huge round stone to roll before it down an inclined groove.

A picture of Christ appearing to the women in the garden hung near by, while a large map of Palestine adorned the front wall of the room as the friends entered. Mrs. Lewis sat at a small table before the audience, and round the table were gathered a class of girls, selected from St. Sepulchre's Church, near Holborn Viaduct.

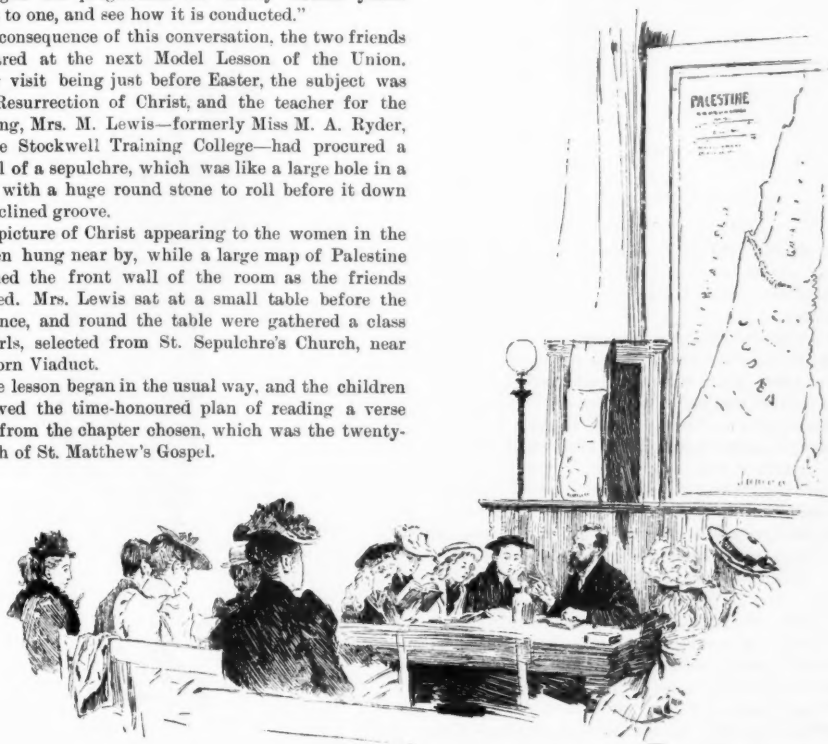

The lesson began in the usual way, and the children followed the time-honoured plan of reading a verse each from the chapter chosen, which was the twenty-eighth of St. Matthew's Gospel.

Mrs. Lewis then began to give the lesson, which took the form largely of a running comment on the verses read, with, however, plenty of question and answer on the part both of teacher and children—the former repeatedly putting queries to arouse and maintain interest, and the children asking questions—no doubt, for information.

Verses of hymns, too, would be introduced, and sometimes verses of the lesson read aloud by the class together, Mrs. Lewis leading. In fact, so strongly was the question form of giving the lesson and of making the comments utilised, that at length nearly every remark made by the teacher was put as a question.

The object of this, no doubt, was to maintain interest and elicit replies. Some of these might look trivial if set forth at length in cold print; but yet, when spoken in a brisk and kindly manner to a class of small children, they would sound very differently. Another point, too, should be noted by teachers: viz., that of paraphrasing the Scripture language into the words of to-day, so that the meaning should be quite clear.

Now, here is the lesson; but it must be borne in mind that the manner of its delivery is second in importance only to the matter itself. Upward tones of the voice should be cultivated in distinction to downward inflexions, the latter, when continuous, having a tendency to cause weariness and depression, or possibly to convey the idea that the lesson is coming to an end before its time.

The object and aim of the lesson were chiefly to teach the power and glory of the Resurrection. This great act was the climax of Christ's work: it was the miracle which declared Him "to be the Son of God with power" (Rom. i. 4).

For the sake of clearness in the teacher's own mind, Mrs. Lewis's notes show that the lesson may be divided into five parts, which were not, however, set forth as such to the children under the heads of first, secondly, etc. These general divisions were—I. Death; II. Life Hidden; III. Life Manifested; IV. Life Imparted; and V. Lessons of Life.

At the outset the attention of the class was arrested by picturing out the scene of the Resurrection.

"The background is very dark, and in the distance rises a cross—now empty—standing between two others. A funeral proceeds, and mourners follow.

"Why, here is a strange thing: the crucified 'malefactor' is being buried as a king; 'great precautions' too are being taken to keep this dead man in his grave (see St. Matt. xxvii. 62-66; and also St. Luke xxiii., 50-56, which the children should refer to and read).

"Passing on now to the second division—Life Hidden (see St. John xii. 24)—the forefront of the picture becomes light, forming a great contrast to the dark background. The dawn appears, the token of the rising of another sun to rule the day. And what a day this was to be!—the day of the Resurrection of Christ from the dead. There were early visitors at the tomb, who rose before it was light, intent on some errand. They were timid, trustful, and good.

"Who were they? and why had they come?

"St. Luke says they had brought spices, which they had prepared; and for the use of spices, see 2 Chron. xvi. 14, to which the children should refer and read.

"Then came a great earthquake—the earth being all alive and giving up her dead; and the same things happen as in Acts xvi. 26, to which again the children refer.

"An angel of light descended and rolled back the stone from the door of the sepulchre. His authority for what he did and his defiance of the powers of darkness may be expressed in that word 'sat'—he sat upon the stone, like His Master, who was sitting in the heavens 'laughing' at the impotency of those who would keep Jesus in His grave (Psalm ii. 4). The appearance of the angel was a terror to the watchers. They had found their task too hard for them."

"Now, what were the guards doing?" asked Mrs. Lewis.

"They were asleep," hazarded a child, very naturally.

"Oh! indeed," said the teacher. "Look at the fourth verse. They became as dead men: they were afraid. How foolish of God's enemies to think they can fight against Him! He has only to make an earthquake, and they become as dead.

"But to the women the angel became a ministering spirit. 'Fear not ye,' he said; 'your errand is a good one.' But when Christ was on the cross," said the teacher, "bearing the punishment for our sins, no angels attended Him. . . .

"Why?" Mrs. Lewis asked the children. "Why is God right to make us die? Why?"

No answer.

"The wages of sin is death," said the teacher solemnly. "Death is the punishment for disobedience. Jesus took the sting from death. God was satisfied with what Jesus had done for us, and rolled the stone away and let Him out.

"Now let us go on a little further; read the next verse all together. The angel instructed their faith in Christ's own words (see St. Matt. xvi. 21; also St. Mark ix. 10). He also confirmed it by showing the empty tomb, 'Come, see the place where the Lord lay.' You children say sometimes, 'You do not believe a thing.' Ah! I see by a smile that you do. You say, 'Seeing is believing!' So the angel was good enough to say, 'Come and see.'

"But he gave them something to do. Ah! that is the way when you begin to wonder and doubt: get to work. He gave the women a commission (see seventh verse): 'Go quickly, and tell His disciples that He is risen from the dead.' Thus these women became apostles to the Apostles—a great honour to woman. She was the first to transgress, but the first to publish the remedy for sin in a risen Saviour.

"Now, why did he say," continued the teacher, "'Lo! I have told you?'" It means this: 'I have delivered my message to you; see that you carry it out;' and the women hurried away at once—as you do to your mother when you have good news.

"And they had such a reward! What was it? Jesus appeared to them. We do not know how He looked; but how did He treat His friends? I have heard of a lady who became rich, and treated her bosom friends so coldly, that they said, 'Oh! we shan't go to see her any more.' But how differently did Jesus treat His friends! He said to them, 'All hail!' And oh, what a beautiful meeting that was!

"Where had Jesus been all this time? On the spot, no doubt, but hidden to earthly sight. Now His life was manifested to them. He was the Living One (Rev. i. 18), and He was seen by the women—where? In the path of duty. Learn, then, that Jesus is nearer to us than we think when we are doing our duty.

"'All hail!' are words of cheer—meaning, 'Peace, or Rejoice; there is no cause for fear;' and He told them (verse 10) to instruct His brethren to go to Galilee, where they should see Him. He had never called them 'brethren' before. Then why now? (Rom. viii. 29.) To show that He was forgiving and tender with those who had deserted Him. These devoted and faithful women must then be sisters of Jesus (see St. Matthew xii. 50).

"Now, why was Galilee appointed as the place of meeting? He had predicted it (see St. Matt. xxvi. 32), and it was probably a more retired spot for the Shepherd to meet His flock.

"The verses also are full of hope in death for the believer in Christ. He gives 'the blessed hope.' To the ancient saints death and the grave were full of horror and uncertainty. Our Saviour has abolished death by destroying him 'that had the power of death: that is, the devil' (Hebrews ii. 14).

"How was this done? Christ, in dying for sin, paid the sinner's debt. As the sinless one, Jesus Christ had no business with death, which is the wages of sin, yet He lay in the grasp of death in the prison of the grave; but on the third day God sent His angel to open the prison door and discharge the prisoner, who had paid all, to the last farthing. Satan has now failed. Are we afraid of the old serpent without his sting?

"Satan cannot keep us in the grave, for he is bound himself. The grave is now a 'sweet bed of rest' to the believer (1 Thess. iv. 14). Jesus says, 'Because I live, ye shall live also' (St. John xiv. 19). 'Christ the firstfruits, then they that are Christ's at His coming' (1 Cor. xv. 23). 'The great sheaf has been waved before the Throne as the "earnest" of the mighty harvest' (Macduff).

"Now, dear girls, the all-important lesson is, Are you in earnest? Do you believe in Him? Which of you will go to glory when you die? The friends of Jesus like these women. Are you a friend of Jesus? He is the firstfruits; you will come after. Are you in Christ? Do you believe in Him? Then to you Jesus will say in the prospect of death: 'All hail; there is nothing to fear.'

The lesson being completed, the children shake hands with both teacher and chairman, and depart a little time before half-past eight. The meeting is then thrown open, and anyone may speak on the lesson.

There is not much discussion to-night. One speaker offers a few remarks, some of which exhibit a different view of certain passages; others give additional hints which teachers may use; and the impression of the whole proceeding is that an intelligent young teacher might pick up a number of very useful ideas and hints for the following Sunday's work, not only of what to say, but how to say it.

So, at least, thought the lady who had been present for the first time. "Yes, I think I shall be able to do better now," she said to her friend as they left. "I can see my way more clearly. I must give almost as much attention to the manner in which the lesson is delivered as to the lesson itself. I must try to make it interesting and real. Yes, I will not give up my class just yet, at least."

THE COUNTRY PARSON'S LIFE.

A TALK WITH THE REV. AUGUSTUS JESSOPP, D.D.

BY RAYMOND BLATHWAYT.

DO not know a more delightful change than that which one experiences in passing from the noisy, crowded, intensely modern streets of London to the deep secluded retreats of an old-fashioned country rectory. Within a few short hours one passes from the new world to that which is the old: modernity is lost in antiquity, noise is merged in silence, and hurry and bustle are changed for a perfect calm.

Such, at all events, were the thoughts that came into my mind as I stepped down from the carriage which had been sent to meet me, at the door of the rectory of Scarning, Norfolk, which is the very centre of that land of Arcady, with the dainty descriptions of which

Dr. Jessopp has so delighted his London admirers, and over the surrounding parish of which he has for many years presided as rector—for he is that Shepherd of Arcady, concerning whose personality much has been conjectured, but of which in truth so little is really known. And how sweet a retreat! The grey old church tower hard by, rearing itself to the sunny skies, dominating the quiet churchyard, over the long grass of which waves of sunshine and of shadow are passing all day long. And the light is on the great fields stretching all round, streaming down upon the narrow lanes through which now and again a stray inhabitant of Arcady, regardless of the world of stress beyond him, takes his slow and leisurely way. For it is still a quiet and a simple life for many of them, despite the changes wrought even in the most secluded country districts by the advent of the School Board teacher and his many new-fangled theories and ideas. And the Shepherd himself—an ideal country parson—a tall, slight, handsome, silvery-haired man high up in the sixties, but yet in the prime of his busy and scholarly life. Of all men whom I have met, Dr. Jessopp struck me perhaps as being the most thoroughly a type of his class. He is to his finger-tips the cultured, broad-minded, highly bred clergyman of whom one reads now and again and whom one now and again comes across in real life. A man of wide experiences, of many friends, with a mind stored not only with the ordinary treasures of the high scholarship, but with innumerable bits of out-of-the-way knowledge which are ever ready to his hand, and which are forthcoming on a tongue of singularly rich and vigorous expression. And his surroundings are so in harmony with the man himself and the golden courtly life of which he is so richly the inheritor. The charming ivy-covered old house, with the beautiful grounds and smooth green lawns around it, the deep cool staircase, the stately library lined from floor to ceiling with the books which form the collection of a lifetime, and from the oriel windows of which one catches an occasional glimpse of a sun-flecked, shadow-swept garden: it is all so quiet, so old-world, so thoroughly English—you feel that still, within those walls, despite the growing sameness and monotony of life which my friend Mr. Stead denies, and which nevertheless is surely coming, there is yet a beautiful variety left in the world. And there is the Lady Shepherd herself, whom her husband describes far more accurately than I may venture to do, as the neatest and the most passionately loyal person in the whole world, and whose collection of autographs is her pleasure and pride.

As we wandered through the pretty gardens or sat in his beloved library—Dr. Jessopp and I—we discussed the curious effects of civilisation upon the parishes and the dwellers in the parishes of rural England. In Norfolk, perhaps less than elsewhere, you find little to disturb the conviction that Hodge is Hodge: a rather mindless person, with but little individuality to differentiate him from his brethren. I am well aware that in the south he is supposed, and especially by his great discoverer, Mr. Thomas Hardy, to be widely different—a man of like passions with his more highly educated and more fortunately placed brethren: Mute Miltons, potential Cromwells. But in East Anglia he is a very literal unimaginative person indeed, and I do not know that Dr. Jessopp said much to alter that idea.

"However much the School Board may have improved them intellectually—and undoubtedly it has effected a great work in that respect—the Norfolk labourer remains a singularly stolid and unimaginative person. Nor has he seriously improved in his mental attitude towards the great social questions of the day. He seems incapable of striking out a line for himself. But education strongly tells, and especially amongst the women, who stay longer in the schools. I wish it were possible to establish lending libraries more frequently than is the case at present; but our distances are too great. Books would be a better influence than certain newspapers, from which they draw all their politics, hot and strong. Books would widen their outview, which at present is still narrowly selfish; they have no care for anything but their own interests. Every big burning question of the day is seen through their own glasses—How will it affect me?' If the carrying of any public measure meant a shilling a week extra in their pockets they would vote for it at once. You cannot realise how the world and its mind is focussed in the little country hamlet. The English parish, like King Arthur's Round Table, is but a 'mirror of the great world beyond.'"

"But what," I asked, "are the chief influences for good in rural England, Dr. Jessopp; for surely there are some?"

"Well," he replied, "speaking from my own experience, I should say that, in the first place, there is the clergyman, who to a greater extent than ever is taking the place of the absentee landlord as a man of position and of culture, and who is the only man who must spend in his parish all that he gets out of it, and a great deal more besides. Here, for instance, is a parish of 3,000 acres, and I'll be bound that not £100 of the rent paid ever returns to the parish. While the landlords' rents go out, the clerical incomes stay in the parish. The rectors' wives keep, as it were, registry offices, to which the village girls come for situations. The feeling, therefore, that was so strong against the country clergyman only ten years ago is, I am convinced, slowly dying down. And then there is the influence of the schoolmaster. I cannot tell you what I feel as to that influence. Oh! that clergymen in general would trust their schoolmaster," continued the rector with great energy. "He moulds the people more than anyone I know. In this parish, for instance, in their education, in their pleasures, in their whole lives, he has his prominent share. The religious spirit, from one cause or the other, is slowly dying out in the agricultural labourer, and there is nothing to replace it. I would encourage anything, therefore, that would help to restore that spirit of piety which was certainly far more common thirty or forty years ago than it is to-day."

"And as regards their outlook upon the world beyond, Dr. Jessopp—do they realise at all that idea of 'the nation within the parish,' of which a Shropshire vicar has written so eloquently?"

"Ah!" slowly and thoughtfully replied my host, "that is a difficult question to answer. As I said before, a Norfolk labourer's view of the questions of the day is limited to how far they affect him personally. As I have said on paper, so I say again: the dwellers in the city cannot understand what is meant by a village community; and yet the thing exists even in this nineteenth century, when all our changes and reforms have done their best or their worst to obliterate every vestige of its ancient existence. You can never persuade a Norfolk man that it does not matter where he was born and where he is buried. He is for ever connected with his own parish. On the other side of the brook yonder there lies another parish; he entertains some contempt, some jealousy, some aversion for the dwellers in that parish. His view of the world is the same. Locally he is intensely patriotic: from a broader point of view, he doesn't understand what the word means; and that is where the difficulty comes in in dealing with the great labouring question. You cannot generalise, you must particularise and individualise; our country parishes are in danger of suffering from the philanthropic quacks who are going up and down with one panacea for all ills, but what is medicine to one rich man is poison to another. The dweller in Arcady is intensely individual, and he must be treated as an individual; broad lines of conduct are of no avail so far as he is concerned."

"How different from Tennyson's theory, that 'the individual withers and the world is more and more!'" said I.

"Quite true, so far as the world in general is concerned, and so far as the individual is regarded by the world; but not true in our rural districts, and quite untrue anywhere, as the individual is regarded by himself. It is only human nature that oneself is the most important person in the universe to oneself. My argument still holds good that nowhere is the selfishness of human nature more faithfully mirrored than it is in the country parish. Practically, however well it may sound in theory, there is no such thing as the 'Nation in the Parish.' As Mrs. Gamp observes," continued Dr. Jessopp, with that faculty of exactly appropriate quotation for which he is so delightfully remarkable, "'we lives in a walley, and we must take the consekens.'"

"And what do you consider the best qualifications for the clergy who have to deal with the dwellers in this 'walley,' Dr. Jessopp?"

"Emphatically that they should be better and more directly trained than they actually are—and more widely trained too. I don't despise Greek and Latin—very far from it—and, indeed, I think the tendency of our younger clergy is not towards a very high classical attainment; but I do want to see a greater knowledge of social problems, of social economics and the like. To deal with these people you must be one of them. I always think of the old Oxford don preaching to a small country congregation from a manuscript sermon, a sort of dry theological essay, and who, after he had laid down the law pretty strongly, looking into the upturned and astonished faces of his audience, thus addressed them—

"'Ah! I know what you're thinking about; but don't you turn round and quote Irenæus to me; it won't do.'"

"No; the parson for the rural parish, and, indeed, for any parish, for the matter of that, in these days should be an example of devotion to his parish—of devotion that is qualified by what has well been termed 'sanctified common-sense.' It is complained that a country clergyman's life is 'lonely,' 'isolated.' Well, if it is so, it is the life of the very Christ Himself, who went through the villages, teaching, journeying towards Jerusalem—a picture of our life, teaching in the villages; but continually drawing nearer to our Heavenly Home. I have said somewhere in my writings, that when the new rector of a country parish locks himself in his church and tolls the bell, it has been said that it is his own passing bell that he is ringing. That he is shutting himself out from any hope of a further career on earth; that he is a man transported for life to whom there will come no reprieve. This is a dreadfully wrong view of the country clergyman's life, if there is nothing more and nothing higher. There is not, it is true, the excitement that there is in the life of a town parson, but there is just the same responsibility.

"A clergyman went to a Wiltshire village from a large town parish.

"After the work I had in London," he said to a shepherd upon whom he was calling, 'I feel as if there was nothing to be done here.'

"Ah, master," replied the man, 'it takes a good man to look after a hundred sheep.'

"It was a beautiful answer. John the Baptist in the wilderness had his duties as clearly defined as the High Priest in the great Temple. 'John did no miracle, but all things John said were true, and many believed on him there.' Country clergymen must not be like 'hulks laid up to rot at ease,' for it is by the country clergy, I am sure, that the most pressing problems of our agricultural districts will come eventually to be settled. And, without any high-falutin, for which I have a great horror," smilingly added the clergyman, "the country parson must rise to a sense of his responsibilities. Much depends on them; but I don't think they all realise how much. It was once suggested to a farmer that the parish church wanted restoring.

"Maybe," said the farmer; 'but we shall first have to restore the parson.'

"And this is very true."

The conversation at dinner and after dinner passed into lighter topics: the influence of Tennyson upon modern thought, and especially on religious modern thought.

"Tennyson I knew well," said the rector; and his wife continued, "Let me show you a copy of his last work, 'Demeter, and Other Poems,' which he gave me."

I asked Dr. Jessopp what were his favourite books, and the men who had influenced him most.

"I don't know that there are such things as favourite books," he replied; "so much depends on one's mood of mind. Coleridge always delighted me, but"—pointing as he spoke to a fine engraving of the present Bishop of Oxford, Dr. Stubbs, the historian—"that's the man of all others to me. No Englishman in my judgment has ever united such enormous learning with such perfection of style—such a mighty grasp of mind and such incomparable simplicity of character. I have been all my life a great student. Do you know what my favourite recreation is?" he went on, as he crossed the library to reach down a pile of very ancient MSS. records—records of some adjacent monastery, which dated back to the fourteenth century, written in very crabbed and much-contracted monastic Latin, but which he nevertheless deciphered as though they were the English of to-day. "There," said he, "when I am too tired to go to sleep or read I copy those. I have written reams upon reams of them. They give you most curious glimpses into the commercial, domestic and social life of the Middle Ages."

We fell upon scholastic and critical accomplishments. Said my host, as he walked up and down the room—

"A critic is a cocksure sort of person. The man who never makes a mistake is a fool: for he is a man who has never had the courage to strike out a path of his own. The man who pursues mere accuracy as the be-all and end-all of life is fit only for a schoolmaster. That is why I rather resent being termed an antiquary. A typical antiquary can discourse with you by the hour on a wimple, a mitre, the exact epoch of some utterly worthless seal. They are only means to an end, not the end itself. An accurate man never inspires others. That is why I like Carlyle. With all his irritating exaggerations, he was yet too whole-souled and thorough-going to be pedantically accurate. I knew personally three dandies who lived in Norwich, and who established what they called 'A School of Dress.'

"See that coat walking over there?" said one of the donkeys to his brother-donkey; "who is it inside it?"

"The man was nothing; his coat was everything. That is a picture of a certain kind of scholarship. That is the type of pedant I hate."

"GOTT SENT HER."

STAND op, my little frent, and let me look at you. How many years haff you? Ach! haff you no tong, then?"

The little creature so interrogated was seated on the old German's doorstep in the sun. She had been there for hours, Julia, the maid-of-all-work, told him, and nothing would move her.

He repeated his question, but she continued to stare out of a pair of wondering blue eyes, and was quite dumb to all his advances.

"Where is your muzzer, my dear?"

That word was magic, and his queer English perfectly intelligible.

"Rosy's mammy has gone to London—she will come back for her soon."

The little voice was musical, and the gold curls beneath the quaint sun-bonnet bobbed round her pink cheeks to emphasise her words.

The old German left her and called to Julia, a buxom country girl, with good-nature dimpling all over her fat red face.

"Wat can we do with this little childer? Do you zink the muzzer will com' back?"

"Lor', sir, it's to be hoped so!"

"Bott I haff heard that sometime in England the muzzer do not return, and you haff to drain op the little one yourself. We will see what Heinrich will say."

Julia opened her mouth and shut it again, and peeped at the little object of discussion sitting in the sun as still as a mouse; and she thought for her part the babe might stay for ever, and she'd do her best for the poor neglected brat.

She peeped through the doorway again, and noticed the child was certainly not a pauper's offspring—she was carefully dressed, and as clean as a new pin.

Twelve o'clock struck, and the click of the garden gate announced the return of Heinrich from school. He was a tall, handsome lad of some fourteen years; like his father in the dreamy sweetness of his expression, but of a stronger, more masterful build; and there was a token of intellectual promise on his broad brow, and a world of thought in his dark eyes.

Flip, a frisky fox-terrier that was the boy's shadow, had spied the little visitor first, and with a dog's delight at something apparently more helpless and weaker than himself, he sprang round her with sharp, joyous barks, and finally knocked back the sun-bonnet in his eager desire to lick the bright curls, and show his patronage.

But Rosy was unaccustomed to such liberties, and pushed him from her with angry dignity.

"Rude doggy—go away!"

"You lovely little being! Where did you drop from? Down, Flip!"

Heinrich held out his hand, and Rosy wriggled, then got up slowly and put her plump little fist in his kindly grasp.

"Who is she, father?"

The old German was watching the meeting with a pleased smile.

"Her muzzer left her here this morning, and no-poddy knows anyzing more."

Heinrich whistled.

"But I suppose she'll come back before the night."

He lifted the child in his arms, and carried her into the house.

"Rosy hungry!" she cried, when she saw the smoking dishes. "Boy feed her."

He unfastened the bonnet-strings and the little cape, and kissed the soft little arms that locked themselves a moment round his neck, and then proceeded to feed her from his plate.

The German sat opposite, gazing at the picture they made with an artist's delight, and sighed that his hand could no longer work. And Julia made up her mind Heaven had sent the child, and immediately commenced preparations to fit her into the tiny house. And when tea was over, she ran to the village to spend her savings in a few necessities for the child's comfort, and came back to take possession of her.

But Rosy was fast asleep in Heinrich's arms, and he would not have her disturbed. The lad had pushed his books away from him, and was gazing across the sea, entirely absorbed in his new treasure.

It was the old story. Rosy's "muzzer did not com' back," and Rosy was thrown on the mercy of the kindest beings that ever breathed, and into the danger of being entirely spoilt. No one had the heart to correct her, and her wilfulness was so pretty that they would not have had her different for all the world.

She was a wild little creature, that loved to roam window and dashed away before she was missed. No whistle called her back that day, and Heinrich, in consternation when he returned from school, refused to eat his dinner till he had found the child.

"She must be ponished," the German said, when the lad came back late in the afternoon with a dripping bundle in his arms. But Rosy looked at him defiantly, and clung the closer to her protector ; by herself on the seashore, sockless and shoeless, when the tide was low, and to chase the butterflies across the rippling sands. And the old German would sit at his window watching her, and reminding her from time to time that she must not go out of sight by a shrill whistle he kept for the purpose. Only Heinrich had the slightest control over her ; from the first she had shown her preference, and his word was always law.

"Proceeded to feed her from his own plate."—p. 63.

One day when the wind was blowing a great gale, and the rain swept over the hills, she was told she must not go out, and Julia had tried to occupy her with pastry-making. But Rosy got weary of picking holes in lumps of dough, and when Julia's attention was called off, she slipped through the and from that day she gave them no more cause for anxiety.

As time went on she submitted to be taught to read and write, and Heinrich gave up all his evenings to the task. And then she began to realise her power, and ruled him with absolute sway. As soon as her hand could hold an oar he had to teach her to row, and when the fishing seasons came she insisted upon spending half the nights in the fishing boats.

So the years flew, and Julia taught her to make the blue serge gowns that had at last to cover the pretty legs ; and with the long dresses came long musings and awakening thought. In what relationship did she stand to these people ? By a freak of memory she had no recollection of life apart from them; and when she questioned the old German he would answer—

"Ach! you mustn't zink about such zings, my lofe; Gott sent you to us, and it is goot for us to be togezzer."

But at last she made up her mind to question Heinrich.

He had developed into a strong man, and was earning his living as usher in the grammar-school at X—, three miles away. How his soul loathed the drudgery only himself knew. But the sacrifice of his dream of a student's life at Leipzig he gladly made for the sake of the two who were dearer to him than any distinction the cultivation of his intellectual powers might have brought him. Nevertheless, the picture of "the might-have-been" could not be entirely effaced, and it was before him in all its rosiest colours the evening Rosy sought him to solve her questionings.

Her quick glance at his wistful look across the sea set her wondering in a new direction, and when he looked up with a smile and asked her what she wanted of him, she threw herself on her knees beside him and cried out—

"Tell me what you see, Heinrich."

He started, and put up his hand to pull off the net Julia made her wear, and to let the rich gold hair fall in its beautiful masses round her shoulders.

"Shall I tell you? Well! I see a great throbbing city where men and women are struggling and straining for what is greatest and best; and the more they strive the more they find to gain—the greater the great becomes, the better the best."

"I know," she interrupted; "I have read about it. And there is a huge, big school there where you can learn everything you want to know, and become great and splendid yourself. Heinrich! you must go there! And you shall be greater than them all!"

"Hush!" he whispered. "We were talking about dreams."

He wound the gold locks round her throat and tilted back her head to gaze into her face. And then he realised for the first time her exceeding beauty—how Nature was moulding her with every grace and charm of womanhood. And he bent and kissed her. And her woman's heart leapt in her bosom at the touch, and all her being moved to his.

"Heinrich!"

She gazed into his eyes, half-fearful, half-wondering, and caught up her hair in the net again, and waited for him to speak.

"Rosy," he said at last, "it is you who must go away from here. You must go out into the world and see other men and women. You will be a very beautiful woman, and there is a great future before you."

"I can do nothing," she answered, "and I only want to be beautiful for—for your sake. But I will go, Heinrich. I will go!" she went on passionately. "Why should I be a burden, a stumbling-block, because I am a woman? I am strong, and I can work."

Then it was that she discovered she possessed the gift of a rich voice. They had always loved to hear her sing in her wild, childish joy; but, after that night, strange new impassioned notes thrilled from her voice and filled the little cottage and the hearts of the listeners with lovely amaze.

And a piece of fortune decided her destiny.

Among those who had heard her sing outside her home was the organist of the village church, and one evening he came to beg her to lead the choir the following Sunday; a great singer from London was coming to stay with the squire, and the best must be done for the honour of the village. A look from Heinrich told her to consent. And when the day came she took her place behind the rustic lads, glad to put her power to use.

And the result was, the London singer gave his host no rest till he had taken him to the cottage on the cliff and brought him face to face with the beautiful singer.

In a moment Heinrich knew her fate was sealed—that the man before him was already his rival. Young, handsome, and gifted, how could she resist what would of necessity be the outcome of the k.v.sh admiration he poured unrestrainedly upon her? He made his request then and there. If they could find her a home in London, he would give her lessons and fit her for a great career.

There was a flush of joy on her face.

"Oh! shall I make a lot of money?"

"If you are a success you will doubtless be rich."

"I will work hard; I want to be very rich," she cried, throwing her arms round the old German's neck. "Let me go!"

"Wat do you zink, Heinrich? Can we let her go?"

"Yes, she must go," he said quietly.

And so it was arranged. A home in a family was found for her, and Heinrich took her there.

"Will you promise, darling, to come back to us if you are the least unhappy?" he said anxiously, at the parting.

"How brave that would be!" she laughed. "No, Heinrich, I shall wait to be happy till I am with you again."

And he sighed, almost wishing he could believe that.

Her letters that came to them very often were burning with hopes and gratitude. Her master was so good to her; London life was so wonderful; and people could be almost as great here as they could in Leipzig. Ah! Heinrich must go there! Soon she would be earning enough money to keep herself, and then she would be no more expense to them. And Heinrich did not answer that that was bitter news to him; that so long as he could earn for her he hugged the idea that she was more his than anyone's.

And then came the date for her début. Oh! if they could come! But the old German was ill, and Heinrich could not leave. But he walked to the nearest town the next day to get the London papers, and read the accounts of "the singularly beautiful and superb new contralto" with burning heart and flushed cheeks.

Her letters came less often now; she was full of engagements, and was working harder than ever, and—wasn't it ridiculous?—she had received two proposals of marriage! But she had no time for love or lovers.

Three years passed by, and the singer came to the village again. He brought them vivid accounts of her success, and the great impression her beauty was making.

"One day," he said condescendingly, "I shall make her my wife. But not till her name is ringing through the world and can rank with mine."

Heinrich clenched his hands and looked him keenly in the face.

"You shall only marry her for love of her," he said.

"She will not marry wizout lofe, our little Rosy. Gott sent her to us, and I zink she would rather com' back to us and be poor again."

"Well, well," the singer laughed, "she has a decent sense of gratitude, I suppose, and every penny she earns is practically mine."

Heinrich sprang to his feet.

"You shall be paid back every farthing, if I have to work the flesh off my bones to get it. She shall never marry you—never!"

"That must be her decision," the singer sneered; "and I have heard little whispers of growing rich in order to send somebody to Leipzig."

"That! Is that her idea?"

"What a clefter childer it is!" the old German cried, laying his hand on Heinrich's shoulder to suppress his vehemence. "Bott tell her we do not want for money. Heinrich here will be ver' rich when I die—he has not heard, bott I haff saved—I haff been selfish not to let 'im go before—bott I was lonely!"

Heinrich's arm was round his father's neck.

"I would never have left you, and I never will."

The singer went back to London, and he did not tell Rosy these things; but he brought her gradually to understand the debt he expected her to pay, and then her position flashed upon her. If she married him, the sacrifice would be supreme. If not, all the money she was making must be given to him, and her darling project thrown to the winds.

"I could not return to you penniless."—p. 72.

She decided; and he did not wait till she should become famous—Heinrich's wrath had been ominous, and he did not mean to lose her.

"When we are married I will take you to them," he said caressingly. "You must not tell them a word about it till the day, my queen. Your friend Heinrich was a little bit in love with you himself once, you know, and we won't let him anticipate the pain he may feel, poor fellow!"

That was generous. And she let him caress her cheek, but she shuddered away when he attempted to kiss her lips. Heinrich had been a "little bit in love" with her once, and no one should wipe out the memory of the kiss he had given her the night he had awaked in her woman's soul.

On the day fixed for her marriage there was a storm raging over the little village by the sea, and the old German watched for his son's return from X—in nervous apprehension. The news from Rosy had not reached them till the ceremony must have been over, and Heinrich had gone to his work without making a single sign.

Julia watched her old master anxiously all day, and had failed in her efforts to make him eat or rest. Towards the evening he grew more feeble, and his restlessness increased. Heinrich was later than usual, and suspense became intolerable. He opened the door and looked out, and a gust of wind blew the lamp from his hand and shattered it to pieces.

Julia rushed forward at the noise, but too late to stop him flying from her in a fit of frenzy. She shrieked after him and tore into the darkness; but madness was upon him, and lent him lightning speed, and she was obliged to give up the chase and return; and it was not until midnight that Heinrich and the villagers with their lanterns came upon him at the foot of the cliff. He was lying dead in the arms of a woman. They carried him back, and the woman followed. No one noticed her, and it was not till they had undressed him and washed the poor bruised corpse—he must have fallen from the cliff, they thought—that Heinrich remembered how they had found him, and went to look for the woman.

She had thrown off her bonnet and cloak, and was pacing the little sitting-room in an agony of sorrow. Her golden hair had fallen round her, and her face was wet with tears.

"Rosy!"

She was on his breast, and not till he had held her in a long, agonised embrace did he remember—

"Where is your husband?"

The voice was hollow, and he pushed her from him, but his grip was on her wrist.

"Heinrich! Heinrich! pity me! I ran away. Oh! Heinrich! I could not marry him. I left him all my money—and I only meant to have one last look at you—through the window—one last peep at the sea. I could not return to you penniless. And then the dear father—I found him lying there—oh! Heinrich, he was alive! He kissed me—and I told him——"

Her sobs choked her, and Heinrich stretched out his arms.

"My darling! Mine, mine, at last! We are alone in the world, you and I, but we will never part again. My love!—Oh! my father, if you could know of my joy!"

"THE BACK" AND "THE FACE."

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A.

F men would only put their conduct towards God into an equivalent in earthly, every-day action—if they would only, so to speak, embody it—I am sure they would be very much surprised, and I daresay in many cases very much shocked.

I think it very probable that the reader of these lines—supposing him to be a man who does not care for God—would at once repudiate the idea that he was turning his back on Him, if I were to say to him, "That is what you are doing."

"Why," he would say, "you're not giving me the credit for being a gentleman, much less a Christian. No gentleman would deliberately turn his back on anyone, unless he wanted of set purpose to offend him; and even if he found himself accidentally sitting with his back to anyone, he would move his chair."

There are many people who would be shocked at the idea of not showing respect to God, who yet are turning to Him their back, and not their face. The prophet taxes some with doing this: "And they have turned unto Me the back, and not the face" (Jer. xxxii. 33).

There are many who do not give to God even the common civility they give to their fellow-men. Imagine a man coming into a room, and taking no notice of you, but simply planting his chair before you, with his back to you. Imagine a man turning round on his heel, and turning his back on you, the moment you spoke to him. You would be very justly offended. You would say, "What a boor!" But imagine a man doing this to the Sovereign! Why, we can scarce think of such a thing at all; and yet this is what many hundreds of thousands—aye, and millions—of people are doing to God.

The very utmost that can be said for many is that they turn sideways to God. If they would not think of absolutely turning the back to Him, they certainly would not think of turning the face; but nowhere can I find this half-and-half position towards God an acceptable one. "Because thou art neither hot nor cold, I will spue thee out of My mouth." All who do not turn the face to God are accounted to have turned the back.

Before I speak about "turning the face," concerning which there are many delightful things to be said, all of which, dear reader, may belong to you, I must say a little more about this dreadful subject of turning the back to God.

You see the thing can be done, for He Himself says so: "And they have turned unto Me the back, and not the face" (Jer. xxxii. 33). And the act is one of complicated evil. There is gross disrespect in it; and there is repudiation—as much as to say, "I will have nothing to do with Thee"; and there is non-receptivity—as though we said, "No matter what Thou sayest, I will pay no attention to it. It isn't worth listening to."

And there is non-response: "I won't answer Thee." When a man turns his back on us after we have spoken, it is as much as to say, "What you have been saying is not worth noticing."

God tells us how He will deal with us. We may think that, as we will have nothing to do with God, He will let us alone; that the worst that can happen to us is that He will have nothing to do with us, but will leave us to ourselves, which is the very thing we want Him to do; but if we think this we make a great mistake. There were some people who tried this, but just because of this, they came to fearful grief. "Therefore thus saith the Lord God of hosts, the God of Israel: Behold, I will bring upon Judah, and upon all the inhabitants of Jerusalem, all the evil that I have pronounced against them: because I have spoken unto them, but they have not heard; and I have called unto them, but they have not answered" (Jer. xxxv. 17).

Remember that this turning of the back will not be all one-sided. God will do to us as we do to Him. As we turn, so will He turn, too. "I will show them the back, and not the face, in the day of their calamity" (Jer. xviii. 17). "My face will I turn also from them" (Ezek. vii. 22).

There are many who would utterly repudiate the idea of their turning their back to God, and yet they are doing this all the while.

If you are not taking the Lord Jesus Christ as your only Saviour—taking Him as God's whole and sole way of life—then you are turning your back on Him. If you choose the world and its ways before Him, then you are turning your back on Him. If you wish to live in any sin, then you are turning your back on Him, just as the prodigal did when he went into a far country. If you resist all the speakings of the Holy Spirit within your heart, and turn away, and look upon them as intrusions, then you are turning your back upon God. If you are saying that by-and-by you will attend to the concerns of your soul, but not now; and if God by His Holy Spirit is saying now, "Behold, now is the accepted time; behold, now is the day of salvation" (2 Cor. vi. 2), you are turning your back to Him.

If you are doing this, now is the time to give it up. Do not have a neck like an iron sinew (Isaiah xlvi. 4). The call is to "turn"—to turn the face to God—to the face of God. "Return again to Me, saith the Lord" (Jer. iii. 1) to those who had sinned in a way for which there was no forgiveness with man. "And I said, after she had done all these things, turn thou unto Me; but she returned not" (Jer. iii. 7).

You see, God's call is to "turn." It is not because a man has turned his back on God that he is to remain thus turned away. The past need not be fatal. God is waiting to be gracious. He calls upon the wayward ones to turn. If your back is turned towards Him now, He says, "Turn round to Me; and you shall see My face looking on you with pity and love." Ah, dear friend, do not be afraid to turn round because then you must meet the face of God. You think that you shall see nothing there but a face of just displeasure; but no matter how far you have turned from God, the same word comes to you that came to Israel: "Turn ye unto Him from whom the children have deeply revolted" (Isaiah xxxi. 6). If you will turn at God's reproof, behold He will pour out His Spirit upon you, and will make known His words unto you (Prov. i. 25). Say with the prophet, "Turn Thou me, and I shall be turned" (Jer. xxxi. 18), and remember what will happen if a man turn not. "If he turn not, He (God) will whet His sword; He hath bent His bow, and made it ready" (Ps. vii. 12). That man is in a position of terrible danger, who has turned to God his back and not his face.

But we have brighter things to speak of than these. There are other words which are spoken by the Psalmist: "When Thou saidst, Seek ye My face; my heart said unto Thee, Thy face, Lord, will I seek" (Ps. xxvii. 8). When God tells us to turn our face to Him, then it is that we may behold His face. Moses was not shown the face of God, but we have the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ (2 Cor. iv. 6). "No man hath seen God at any time. The only begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, He hath declared Him" (John i. 18). We can turn our face to the face of God, in the face of Jesus Christ.

Now what is it to turn our face to God? and how should this be done?

A man may be said to turn his face to God when he wants to know God's will and God Himself—when he wants to have communion with Him—when he wants God to look at him—when he longs not to be shut out from the presence of God—when he feels that, the more he can get of the knowledge of God, the happier he will be.

There are many who are willing to acknowledge God—they would be shocked at the idea of their not being God-worshippers—but they do not want God too near them; and they do not like to come too near Him.

Now one must come close to behold the face. "I will behold Thy face in righteousness," says the Psalmist (Ps. xvii. 15). The face is generally the index of the mind; and they do not want God to see too clearly what there is in them, nor do they want to see too clearly what is in God. As long as all is vague, and dim, and undefined, they can get on well enough; but they do not want to see God as clearly as possible, or that God should too clearly see them.

If this be the case, dear reader, with you, you are not really turning your face, your full-face, towards God. You may be turning your side-face, but that halfway turning will be of no use. The turning must be full and honest; it must say, "Lord, I want to know Thee; and I want Thee to know me." "Turning" is a positive act. God says that He will act in turning: "My face also will I turn from them" (Ezek. vii. 22); "I will show them the back, and not the face" (Jer. xviii. 17). And we must act; we must do something decided. If you have never done anything decided, you must do so now. You may have to make up your mind—then do make up your mind. It is God's complaint (in Hosea v. 4) that the people would "not frame their doings to turn unto their God." Daniel set his face unto the Lord God (Dan. ix. 3). The Psalmist said, "I entreated Thy face with my whole heart" (Ps. cxix. 58, marg.). There was no half-and-half in their action.

Indecision—half-and-half work—is what is ruining many. They are neither hot nor cold; they do not wish to belong to Satan at all, but certainly they do not want to belong decidedly to God. If this be the case with you, if you are a presenter of a side-face to God, take the decided step at once, and do not be afraid. Do not fear to look upon God—as far as you may, to behold His face; and do not fear that He should fully behold yours. In honest face-turning there is no cause for fear. "Pour out thine heart," says Jeremiah (Lam. ii. 19), like "water before the face of the Lord"—the face of God will never be turned away from a poured-out heart.

Decision, then, decision is called for in turning our poor faces to the holy face of God; and now how shall this be done?

Very humbly. In the beautiful hymn, "Veni Creator," which begins—

"Come, Holy Ghost, our souls inspire,
And lighten with celestial fire;
Thou the anointing Spirit art,
Who dost Thy sevenfold gifts impart," it goes on to say—

"Anoint and cheer our soiled face,
With the abundance of Thy grace."

"Our soiled face!" I often repeat those words—I adopt them; I like to say them. And then one may pass on from them to something about the face of God; "Make Thy face to shine upon Thy servant; save me for Thy mercies' sake" (Ps. xxxi. 16). It may be that we feel we must hang our heads while we turn our faces, but we may do both at the same time.

Satan would make use of our very humility to keep us from turning the face to God. He would say, "Look at your blurred, soiled face; is that what you are going to turn towards God? Do you think that He will care to look upon such a spectacle as that?" True, we have to say with the Psalmist, "My confusion is continually before me; and the shame of my face hath covered me" (Ps. xlii. 15), but let us remember that it is just the humble and the contrite heart that God will not despise (Ps. li. 17). The poor publican turned his face, though he would not "so much as lift up his eyes unto heaven," and he was received. Ah! how many children have to come to parents with very blurred faces, and very humble looks! They have been doing wrong, and they know it; and now that they return they must bring these faces with them.

And it is just because they will not do this that so many stay away from God. They forget the great blessings that there are in humility—how God will save the humble person (Job xxii. 29), and how He will not forget their cry (Ps. ix. 12); how He hears their desire (Ps. x. 17); how the high and lofty One Who inhabiteth eternity, Whose name is Holy, Who dwells in the high and holy place, dwells also with him "that is of contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite ones" (Is. lvii. 15). Everything is in favour of the humble, therefore if we feel humbled, so far from the feeling keeping us away from God—making us turn our face from Him—it ought to make us feel all the more certain of acceptance in turning our poor, sad, and soiled faces to Him.

And this, trustingly. God does not want to see only fear upon our faces. This is not what honours Him. No wonder that we are so unwilling to turn to Him, if our opinion about Him is such a hard one; if we think that all we shall see in His face are anger and determination to punish us for our sins. We shrink from looking on such a face as that; it is to us what Mount Sinai, all on fire, with thunderings and lightnings, was to the Israelites.

This is not what God is calling for. He is asking for trust; and the trust is just belief in the reconciliation by Jesus Christ—that God is waiting to be gracious; that He willeth not the death of a sinner, but waits to be gracious.

I do not wonder that those whose only view of God is that He is a condemning God, should refuse to turn their faces to Him. They do not want to see what they think they shall alone see. Like Cain, they want to go out from the presence of the Lord. But God reveals Himself in Jesus Christ; and how did the face of Christ present itself to poor sinners when He was on earth? It never turned away from them. It never looked unkindly upon them. When Jesus turned and looked on Peter, on his final denial of Him, even that was not an unkind look. If it had been, Peter would never have gone out and wept bitterly; he would have been far more likely to do what Judas did—go out and hang himself.

Let us turn our faces then to God in Christ with trust. Let us say with the Psalmist, "I will direct my prayer unto Thee, and will look up" (Ps. v. 3). "Unto Thee lift I up mine eyes, O Thou that dwellest in the heavens. Behold, as the eyes of servants look unto the hand of their masters, and as the eyes of a maiden unto the hand of her mistress; so our eyes wait upon the Lord our God, until that He have mercy upon us" (Ps. cxliii. 1, 2), and it shall be with us as it was with those mentioned in Ps. xxxiv.: "They looked unto Him, and were lightened: and their faces were not ashamed" (verse 5).

There must first of all be simple trust; and then there may come expectation, and hope. God can never see any face turned to Him in trust without so looking upon it as to enkindle in its eyes expectation and hope. Trust is, after all, only a means to an end; the first step to our being conditioned for blessing.

It puts us in a receptive state. I do not think that God wills anyone to turn the face to Him, and look at Him, without expecting something from Him. We honour God by expecting from Him. If we look at Him as He is to be seen in the face of Jesus Christ, and expect nothing from Him, we have misread His countenance. We have not seen the kindness that is there; we have not been encouraged by it, we have lost by our want of perceptive power.

We may be sure that God likes us to read great things in His countenance. Great expectations honour Him. It would be very dishonouring to Him if we were to think that He was worth nothing to us—that it would be no good to look for, or expect, anything from Him.

This ought to encourage us to expect. It is entirely a different case very often with our fellow-man. Man does not like us to expect from him. Perhaps it is because his means are small; perhaps it is because his heart is still smaller. People who want are often not very welcome to their fellow-men, but they are always welcome to God.

But we very often do not feel this. We come to prayer as if it were unacceptable, or, at any rate, as if there were not already in God readiness to meet us; as if He were not waiting to be gracious. We are straitened not in Him, but in our own selves; we think He is turning or turned away from us, whereas, in truth, He is turned towards us.

Let us, then, at once turn our faces to God. If we have turned our backs upon Him, it is of the Lord's mercies that we have not been consumed. In those infinite mercies He has borne from us what no earthly monarch would have borne: He has been patient and longsuffering; He still says, "Look unto Me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth" (Is. xlv. 22). He is "waiting to be gracious."

And let it be remembered that, if we will not turn the face to God willingly, a time must come when we shall have to do this, whether we like it or not.

It may be a time of mingled mercy and judgment—terrible judgment, like that spoken of in Ezekiel xx. 35, where God says, "I will bring you into the wilderness of the people, and there will I plead with you face to face"; or it may be a time when God compels the poor soul to look upon His face, and see the wrath that is there, before that face be hidden from it—in which hiding is darkness which may be felt; but in either case, "now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation." The face of the Lord is turned toward us—oh! let us not turn our back on Him.

Shall we turn our back on the One of Whom the prophet says, "Thou hast cast all my sins behind Thy back" (Is. xxxviii. 17)? Shall we turn it on the One Who, for our sakes, gave His back to the smiters—the One, the story of Whose sorrows on our behalf is this, "The ploughers ploughed upon My back, they made long their furrows" (Ps. cxxix. 3)? And all this that we might realise that the face of the Father is no longer turned away from us, but that He is lifting up the light of His countenance upon us.

Lord, to Thee I turn. On Thee I look—with shame, it is true, but with adoration, love, and hope. Thou hast said unto me, "Seek ye My face," and I answer, "Thy face, Lord, will I seek."

SHORT ARROWS.

NOTES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND WORK IN ALL FIELDS.

DOING ONE'S BEST.

OW often we are unreasonable in the standards which we set for those under us, and especially for children. It is not that we are tyrannical, it is not that we would knowingly and willingly require too much—it is because we do not think. We are often in reality expecting the impossible. "It is a great mistake," says Madame he was reproving, when, with sincerity which convinced him, he said: "Indeed, sir, I have done my best." One child's best is not another child's best; nor is one man's or one woman's. God sets before all the one standard—perfection; but He measures the capacity of each, and puts His own value on that whereunto they attain. What gracious allowances would we make, what reasonable expectations would we form, if we did the same!

OUR TRAIL.

Though men don't see it, their sin always leaves behind it a trail which will be sufficient as evidence to condemn them in judgment. Such trail is often invisible to the eyes of man, but is plain to the eye of God. A burglar a short time ago carried off a quantity of valuables, and not content with this, he carried off a bag of corn. There was a minute hole in the bag, and a grain dropped out now and then; and by these he was tracked, and he was arrested with the stolen goods in his possession. It might help some to keep from sin, if they felt sure that

Guyon, "to fret at the absence of perfection in those we love, when they appear incapable of being perfect. We must submit meekly to what God Almighty sees and suffers patiently." We set one standard for all, and are impatient with the one who falls short of it, and often treat such as if they had not done their best. Arnold, the great schoolmaster, said that he could take off his hat to the boy whom they will leave the evidences for their condemnation behind them.

THE TEST OF YEARS.

Let us only make something really good, and we do not know how long it will endure, or when it will come forth. A curious box was found amongst the ruins of Pompeii. It was of marble or alabaster, about two inches square, and closely sealed. When opened, it was found to be full of a pomatum, or grease, hard, but very fragrant. The smell somewhat resembled that of roses, but was much more fragrant. The perfume prepared in the first century was good in the nineteenth. Let us do something that will stand the test of years—that will last. It may lie in abeyance for a long time, but it will eventually have its day.

"I HAD A FRIEND."

"What is the secret of your life?" asked Mrs. Browning of Charles Kingsley; "tell me, that I may make mine beautiful too." He replied, "I had a friend." If a good earthly friend can thus benefit us, what shall we say of the influence on our lives which can be exercised by the Heavenly Friend, who sticketh closer than a brother?

"WE LOVE THE PLACE, O LORD."

We have heard it said, "The young go to church because they are told, the middle-aged from force of habit and duty. But the old go for the rest, and to hear more of that land whither they are hastening." There is a look of rapt attention on an old man's face as he strains his ear to catch the words of life—his clothes may look poor, and on earth he may have no home. What matter? He has loved His Saviour here below, and soon he will leave this cold sad earth and be "forever with the Lord."

"THE QUIVER" HEROES FUND.

Our readers will be glad to hear that another instance of saving life by a member of the Swansea Police Force has been brought to our notice. On the 14th August last, P.C. Thomas Tucker was called to a fire in Tontine Street, which, happily, was not of a very serious nature, and he quickly succeeded in extinguishing the flames. The room in which it originated, however, was full of dense black smoke, and, although the officer had been told that it was quite empty, he searched the room at great risk of being overcome by the dense smoke, and eventually found, by feeling with his hands, a little boy who was almost suffocated, and would soon have been past all help. This is not the first life which Tucker has saved at a fire, and he fully merits the Bronze Medal of THE QUIVER Heroes Fund, which we have sent to the Mayor of Swansea with the request that he will take the earliest public opportunity of presenting it to him.

ALONE IN A CROWD.

The dreariest of all solitudes is to be alone in a crowd. London has five millions of inhabitants; and yet we may be utterly lonely in its streets. Lord Bacon truly says, "For a crowd is not company, and faces are but a gallery of pictures, and talk but a tinkling cymbal, where there is no love." Why we feel so lonely in the midst of thousands is that no one amongst them loves us, or cares for us. We have more real company when with one we love, than when with a thousand who are indifferent to us, and we to them. And so, there will be no solitude and no solitariness in heaven; for there all love, and all are loved. A lonely one would be a curiosity there ; for all the inhabitants of that blessed land will be members of one and the same family—the family of God.

OUR COMMON HUMANITY.

How little do we know of those whose occupations and associations greatly differ from our own ! A young officer in the Guards or a fashionable beauty are the same flesh and blood as the rough people who spend their lives upon barges, and yet they are separated by every thought, feeling, and act of their lives. One class has seen much of the world in luxurious steamers ; the experience of the other only extends to the banks of the canal on which they have been dragged in the slow barges. One class has had an expensive education, the other has but a limited acquaintance with the three R's. One class has had to resist the temptations of luxury, the other those of coarseness. Still, there is not one only, but there are several touches of nature that make both classes kin. They experience friendship, and love, and all other feelings of a common humanity. Every time that they say the Lord's Prayer they acknowledge that they are children of the same Father. Without, perhaps, thinking or knowing of it, each class is useful to the other. Ought it not to be their conscious, deliberate effort to help each other more ?

WEEDS AND SEEDS.

The great mischief of weeds is that they have seeds. As early as the time of Alexander II. of Scotland a man who let weeds go to seed on a farm was declared to be the king's enemy. In Denmark farmers are compelled to destroy all weeds on their premises. In France a man may prosecute his neighbour for damages who permits weeds to go to seed, which may endanger the neighbouring lands. No man can keep his evil to himself. It will travel in some way, just as the seed does. Some seeds travel by means of wings, like those of the thistle, and some are carried long distances by birds ; but in one way or another they get to long ranges beyond their original habitation. No man can limit the sphere of his own influence for evil ; once let it flower and seed, and what he has done in England may sprout up in New Zealand ; what he has done to-day may be reproduced an hundredfold twenty years hence. Let us remember that every doer of evil is "the King's" enemy. Our evil does not stop with man ; it goes on to God. It is bad enough to be an enemy to man, but terrible indeed to be an enemy to God.

FOR TEACHERS AND OTHERS.

How often do we hear the complaint of the Sunday-school teacher and Bible-class leader that it is frequently a matter of great difficulty to procure an apt illustration or a telling anecdote with which to emphasise and enforce the lessons they are endeavouring to impress upon the young and eager hearts around them. This want is well supplied in a volume entitled "Tools for Teachers" (Elliot Stock), which has been compiled by an old Sunday-school teacher, the contents of which he collected and used himself, and has now issued in order that they may do service in a much wider field. The work is well arranged, and consists of anecdotes, illustrations and legends, bearing upon such subjects as God's Love, God's Providence, Conscience, Purity, Reverence, and should prove in every way a valuable companion to all who are engaged in teaching the young.—In this connection we may also draw attention to a new "Dictionary of Quotations" (F. Warne and Co.), in which the compiler, the Rev. James Wood, has collected and arranged the choicest thoughts of the greatest and wisest men both of our own and of bygone times, together with well-known proverbs, mottoes, etc., in the original English, Latin, French, and other languages. So far as we have been able to test it, the work seems thoroughly representative and complete, and it is unnecessary for us to point out the many advantages of such a dictionary to every preacher and student. The concordance at the end of the volume is especially valuable, and affords an easy reference to every quotation included in the work.—We also have before us "The History of London," by Mr. Walter Besant (Longmans and Co.), written in his easy, bright style, and evidently intended as a text-book for schools; and a new edition of "Economical Cookery" (Hodder and Stoughton), which will be welcomed by every housewife who wishes to combine variety with economy.

"ONE OF THE CHIEF AIMS OF LIFE."

A gentleman of wealth, in sending a contribution to the fund for the relatives of the men who lost their lives in H.M.S. Victoria, wrote :—"I shall be very pleased to undertake the charge and education of one of the young girls thus left destitute, by placing her in a suitable home, of which there are many, and my daughters will gladly look after and 'mother' the child for the rest of her life. I believe many parents would gladly avail themselves of this opportunity to do the same. It would not only aid helpless orphans in the best possible way, but encourage our own children who live in luxury to help and look after those who are not so fortunately placed as themselves, which should be one of the chief aims of life." What this gentleman here says about encouraging children who live in luxury to help and look after those who are not so fortunately placed as themselves should be noted and remembered.

WRONG POSITIONS.

Some people think that if they are all right in themselves it does not matter what positions they take up. They rely upon themselves, and think that they cannot be influenced by this or that; and therefore that they will be all right anywhere. But the influence of position is often very great—we do not mean as regards its place in society, but in its moral aspect. Take two pieces of wood, saw them from the same section of a tree; they will possess entirely different characteristics when used in different positions. For example, a gate-post will be found to decay much faster if the butt-end of the tree is uppermost than it would if the top were placed in that position. The reason is that the moisture of the atmosphere will permeate the pores of the wood much more easily the way the tree grew than it would in the contrary direction; for the pores of the wood invite the ascent of moisture and repel its descent. Some staves of a bucket will be dry while others are wet, though they all came from the same tree, and for this same reason. Influence of position is often very great. Wrongness of position will sometimes account for what would otherwise be unaccountable in a man. And just as the habits and nature of the tree in life cling to it in its death, so will it be with man. He whose nature is not changed of the Holy Spirit, will find clinging to him in the positions of the other life that which formed the law of his being in this one.

EXERTION.

Emerson says, "Skill to do comes by doing, knowledge comes by eyes always open, and working hands; and there is no knowledge that is not power." If people only remembered how much depends upon themselves, they would often be more active than they are. The excellence they would attain to they would try for, and that indeed is the only way by which it can be got. Skill to do comes by doing. Success is often the child of many failures. There is wonderful power in the little child's song, "Try, try, try again." The German proverb, "Roast partridge does not fall into a man's mouth," is a true one. No, friend, you must load the gun, and shoot the bird, and light the fire, and twist the bird about before it, before the roast partridge finds its way into your mouth.

GOD IN WHAT IS AT HAND.

That saying is true: "Tis the unfamiliar that charms the fool, whereas to the wise man the nearest thing is often the most Divine." God is indeed near us in very common ways, and very ordinary circumstances, and very common things; but we do not look for Him just because they are common. Some will recognise him in the lofty mountain, in the mighty ocean, in the roar of the thunder, in the flash of the lightning, but He is as truly to be seen, for those who have eyes to see, and to be heard by those who have ears to hear, in the blade of grass, in the dew-drop, in the spark. Let us not look for Him only in the history of nations, but in that of our own homes and lives. It was not in the roll of the thunder that He manifested Himself to the prophet, but in the still small voice.

PREJUDICE AND JUDGMENT.

False judgments often proceed from prejudice. And they often proceed from certain rules which we propose to ourselves, and to which we adhere rigidly as if they admitted of no exceptions. We are not willing always to take things on their own merits—not always ready to judge righteous judgment. And this often leads us into folly. We have read of a school of virtuosi in Florence who would not think much of anything unless it was old. Michael Angelo, the great painter and sculptor, determined to give these gentlemen a lesson. So he made a statue of a sleeping Cupid, which he stained so as to imitate an antique; then he cut off one arm, and had the statue buried in a vineyard. He arranged that it should be discovered in due time, and when all the works of modern artists were pronounced to be trash in comparison with this one, he quietly produced the arm, to the great confusion of the critics. Prejudice warps judgment—the man who sets up an arbitrary standard is pretty sure to go wrong.

TEMPTATION EVERYWHERE.

We sometimes think, when living in a large city, that we should be free from worry and the temptations of this anxious, hurrying age, if we had for an abode a cottage in the country, under the shade of protecting trees. Well, we should only have exchanged city temptations for the different but not less trying ones that attack people in the country. No change of circumstances—nothing but the grace of God—can enable us to resist temptation. A bad-tempered person can make even a lovely country cottage miserable.

FAILURE AND SUCCESS.

Long failure does not always mean failure to the very end. Sometimes success comes all at once, and when we are least expecting it. The Señorita, a very rich mine, was discovered by a poor broken-down miner, who had prospected all his life without any result. He took refuge under a tree during a storm, and while picking over the ground to pass the time till the clouds rolled by, he uncovered a rich vein of pure silver. In one moment he had made a fortune, and the clouds indeed rolled away from him. With many of us as the poet says, "The hour that is darkest is the hour before dawn."

FOR THE WINTER EVENINGS.

Stories of daring and adventure always appeal to a boy's mind, and where such tales are wholesome and manly they are often productive of good influences and impressions, apart from their value as recreative reading. We have just received such a story—"Fergus MacTavish" (Hodder and Stoughton)—which relates the early life of a trader's son in North-West Canada, and tells of the many strange experiences and thrilling adventures which he passed through. The story, though bright and vigorous, has a healthy Christian tone throughout, and, with its attractive illustrations, makes an admirable gift-book, and one which will be thoroughly appreciated.—Mr. Fisher Unwin sends us a volume of short stories by Mrs. Hartopp, entitled "The Heart of Montrose," some of which have been published previously in various periodicals. This probably accounts for the somewhat unequal quality of the stories, all of which, however, are pleasantly written and very readable.—Those of our readers who have thus far followed the Rev. F. B. Meyer's "Scripture Biographies" will need no pressing to turn to the latest of the series, "Joshua, and the Land of Promise," which has just been issued by Messrs. Morgan and Scott. Mr. Meyer tells the story of the life of Joshua in his simple though forcible style, and the result is a very helpful volume, which forms a worthy companion to its predecessors.—We have also to acknowledge the receipt of "Memorials of a Beloved Mother" (Nisbet and Co.) and the ever welcome annual volume of The Herald of Mercy (Morgan and Scott).

LETTER-WRITING.

The older we grow, the more afraid are we of the pen in the matter of letter-writing. It does nearly as much mischief as the tongue. The better we are able to use it, the more cause have we to be afraid of it. The more neatly and incisively we can put a thing, the more the danger of our doing so mischievously. It is sometimes hard to avoid operating, when we are conscious that our instrument is sharp, and that we can make a clean cut. An old gentleman with a wise fine head, calm face, and benevolent look, begged a postmaster to return him a letter which he had dropped into the box. To do so, as everyone knows, is illegal; but, won over by the old gentleman's importunity, the postmaster complied on full proof in comparing the writing, etc., being given. Then with a beaming face the old gentleman tore the letter into fragments, and scattering them to the wind exclaimed, "Ah, I have preserved my friend!" The fact is, he had written a letter in a state of irritation, which was probably unjust and hurtful, but which he had wisely recalled. It is a good thing to sleep over what we have written—many a letter slept over will be a good deal modified in the morning, or perhaps not sent at all.

RESULTS.

Because results do not present themselves before us in bulk, we little realise what is often going on—going on in our own lives and characters. This little act and that are so mixed up with the even flow, or it may be sometimes with the rush of life, that we take no note of it, though there it is. The amount of sediment carried to the sea by the Thames in a year is 1,865,903 cubic feet, and it is estimated that the Mississippi deposits in the sea in a year solid matter weighing 812,500,000,000 pounds. And all this solid matter nowhere seems as solid, but just a part of the river itself. And thus, solid matter, be it of good or evil, is being borne onward to the great ocean of eternity, on the perhaps uneventful flow of our lives. Where we see nothing there is much; what for eternity shall that "much" be?

AN INSTRUCTIVE MOTTO.

Very instructive is the motto of the town of Glasgow: "Let Glasgow flourish by the preaching of the Word." In recent years, the motto is commonly shortened to, "Let Glasgow flourish." This curtailment spoils all, for it is the Word of God producing truth, purity, and honest dealing that builds up a city and causes it to flourish.

INVISIBLE INFLUENCES.

We can often see plainly enough the influences under which persons act—sometimes the influences of persons, sometimes things; but the influences which are seen and which can be traced are as nothing in comparison with those which can be neither seen nor traced. During a brilliant display of Aurora Borealis some years ago the mainsprings of no fewer than 3,000 watches broke in London alone. During the atmospheric disturbances which take place in the summer a large proportion of the watches worn by persons living in the districts in which the agitation takes place either go wrong or stop altogether. The mainspring of a watch was known to break into twenty-eight pieces during a storm which took place in Bradford some time ago. The electric light has done a great deal towards magnetising chronometers. The most powerful influences upon both our bodies and our minds are generally the least observed—the least suspected. And so there is all the more reason for our putting ourselves daily under the care of the One to Whom no secrets are hid, and Who only can defend us from all ill.

QUESTIONS.

1. In which of his Epistles does St. Paul give us a rule of life as to our social relationship with one another?
2. What does St. Paul mean by the expressions "Old man" and "New man," which we find oft-times mentioned in his Epistles?
3. What does St. Paul say should be the great bond of Christian society?
4. Quote proverb which shows God's abhorrence of untruthfulness.
5. What is known of Ephesus, where St. Paul founded one of the seven churches mentioned in the Book of the Revelation?
6. What is the principle of obedience which all are to render to those in authority?
7. Where was the city of Colosse situated?
8. Quote some words from St. James's Epistle where he tells us that the Christian must be as careful of his words as of his deeds.
9. In what way were the inhabitants of Berea an example to all earnest people?
10. To whom did St. Peter write his Epistle?
11. Quote a passage in which St. Peter speaks of Heaven as man's inheritance.
12. In what words are we told by St. Peter that the prophecies of the Old Testament have reference to the Redemption wrought by Christ?

"FIFTY YEARS SINCE OUR WEDDING DAY."

HER GREAT TROUBLE.

BY RINA.

"Is anything the matter, children?"—p. 81.

I.
WHY were they staring so?

The schoolmistress raised her aching head, and looked with amazed eyes at her pupils. Often, on hot summer days like this, the young minds wandered far from their lesson-books. Often indeed were the children inattentive, but seldom did they show it thus. They were letting the lesson slip out of their minds, and yet staring at the lesson-giver. It was strange.

The schoolmistress had not seen them act in this fashion since the news of her coming marriage was first spread. They had stared at her then, she remembered. Perhaps they had been wondering whether life, with a schoolmistress as wife, would be one long lesson, with no Saturday holiday.

But they had got used to the idea now. Their parents were collecting money to buy a presentation clock—pardon! I should say, a "timepiece." The children themselves had often climbed over the palings and wriggled through the hedge to peep at the cottage where "teacher" was soon to live. And little Annie Parker had raised her inquisitive nose up to the village dressmaker's window—hanging by her eager hands to the sill—and had seen "teacher" standing inside, in her slip-bodice and petticoat, being fitted for her wedding-gown.

All that was an old story. Why were they staring now?

A thought struck the teacher, and she looked round quickly at the window behind her—perhaps Dick was there. But no; all that met her view was an ash bough, brushing against the panes.

How silly of her to think!—and Dick had been on night-duty at his signal-box. He must be at home and asleep now.

The fact remained—What ailed the children?

The schoolmistress furtively rubbed her face with her handkerchief, fearing she had a smudge on her nose.

* * * * *

School was over. Instead of vanishing like leaves before the wind, the older children lingered in the porch.

There was quite a little throng on the doorstep when the schoolmistress came out herself.

She turned her back on them, and stooped to lock the door, feeling all the while in every nerve that their eyes were still fixed on her. Her hand trembled, she had a racking headache, and she was very weary: just in the state to be upset by this astonishing scrutiny.

Straightening herself, she faced them all.

"Is anything the matter, children?" she asked.

They had no answer ready; some giggled, and some, she noticed with dismay, looked troubled. There was an air of sulky triumph on the face of Bill Smith, the most troublesome boy in the school; and there was a piteous downward curve about the mouth of little Martha West. Then someone said, "Nothing;" and the little crowd dispersed.

The schoolmistress walked quickly home to the dingy semi-detached abode that she was soon to change for the sunny cottage down the lane.

She rushed to her looking-glass and inspected herself.

No: her face was clean—only rather pale; and her hair was not sticking up oddly, but lying perfectly smooth.

She could not understand it. At one moment she forgot her headache in thinking of it, and in the next it ached all the harder because she was troubling herself about this matter.

She put both hands to her brow, but they were burning hot, and she let them drop again.

"I will go and see Mrs. Roberts," she said at last.

Putting on her hat, she walked slowly down the road. There was one woman standing at a cottage door. On seeing the schoolmistress, she darted in, and came out again with another.

Passing on with averted head, the schoolmistress could feel that they were watching her. She quickened her pace, and almost ran up the short path to Mrs. Roberts' door, letting the gate swing to and fro, unlatched.

Generally it took two or three knockings to gain admittance. Mrs. Roberts suffered from toothache, and wore a knitted scarf twisted round her head; and unless she was specially on the alert, it took a good deal of noise to reach her ears.

But this afternoon the schoolmistress's first uncertain tap brought Mrs. Roberts to the door; and there was an ominous hurry in her step as she scuttled down the stairs and across the flagged kitchen.

"And so it is you, Miss James!" she said quickly, dragging her visitor indoors. "I had a feeling you would come; for I said to myself: 'Helen James knows that I am her friend; and since her own people live many a mile away, whom should she come to in her trouble but me?' Sit you down, my dear."

"In my trouble?" repeated the schoolmistress, with a little gasp of fright.

Mrs. Roberts was pushing her into an arm-chair, and patting her with two large sympathetic hands.

"Poor dear! But I always said it would be a pity if you married beneath you," she was murmuring.

In these parts, unless a young woman can justly be accused of marrying above her position, she is generally held to have chosen below it.

The schoolmistress struggled to her feet. What had happened? Those awful trains! Had Dick been run over and killed? But no; a signalman ought to be safe—in his box.

And as Mrs. Roberts stood there, preparing to condole, her visitor could have shaken her in her eagerness to find out the mystery.

"What is wrong?" she cried.

Immediately Mrs. Roberts screwed her face into an expression of immense prudence. The schoolmistress shivered. This thing, whatever it might be, was not to be lightly told.

"My dear, have you not heard?"

"Nothing, nothing!"—and her voice quivered with dread.

Mrs. Roberts made a dash at the kettle, and set it on to boil. Then she began to bring out cups and saucers, though they nearly slipped through her excited fingers as she carried them from the cupboard. She was trying to remember that, excited as she was, this was not the sort of excitement to be enjoyed.

"Sit you down and rest, my dear," she said, over her shoulder. "I'm not going to say a word till you have had a cup of hot tea. There is nothing like Smith's one-and-elevenpenny for putting heart into one."

She pushed her visitor back into the chair, and went on putting spoonful after spoonful into the teapot. There should be strength in this brewing, at least.

The schoolmistress waited in an agony of suspense, thankful when at last the kettle boiled over.

But Mrs. Roberts was in no hurry. She held a cup of scalding tea to the teacher's mouth, and after forcing her to take a gulp, said—"Stop till I cut you a piece of bread and butter."

Then the teacher rebelled.

"If you will not tell me what has happened," she said, with white lips, "I will go and find someone who will."

Mrs. Roberts gave in at that.

"My dear, you will know it only too soon," she said, shaking her head, and possessing herself of her visitor's hands: perhaps by way of preventing her escape. "However, it is best that you should hear it from one who always feels like a mother to you, and who will never breathe a word to a soul about how you take on. Ah, poor thing! and it is only yesterday I passed by the cottage, and saw how smart it looked, and thought that the roses would be out on your wedding-day. And I said to myself—'Helen James will be a happy woman this day week.' And now——"

She paused. She was looking for fitting words with which to come out with the startling climax.

"Yesterday," she said at last, "Richard Saunders came from his night-duty at the box, and instead of going home to bed, took the first train in the morning and went off somewhere——"

The schoolmistress wrung her hands.

"There has been an accident? He has been killed! Oh, Dick, Dick! he will never come back to me."

"No, there has been no accident. I could almost find it in me to wish there had been," said Mrs. Roberts sharply. The schoolmistress looked at her in wonder.

"Yes, he came back right enough, by the six-fifteen train at night. But—don't being a station-master soon; but others did not think as you did, my dear) when one of the porters pointed to the woman beside him, and said, laughing—'Have you changed your mind, and fetched another wife, Saunders?'—all for a joke, you understand.

"She coloured up like anything, but Saunders himself said 'Just so,' and walked on with her, leaving go fainting, Helen James; he is not worth it. He came back, and he brought a wife with him!"

The schoolmistress sat perfectly still, without uttering a word. Perhaps she could not speak; her fingers pressed deeply into the padded arms of the chair she sat in, and her eyes dilated.

Mrs. Roberts congratulated herself on the quiet, sensible way in which the teacher was taking it; and went on—

"It is all over the village. One of the porters told me as he passed on his way home from the station. He stopped at the gate when he saw me in the garden; I expect he could not keep it in till he got home.

"The train came puffing in, he said, and Richard Saunders got out. Then he turned as cool as you please, and helped her on to the platform. He was marching out of the station with his high-and-mighty air (you used to think it a feather in his cap that he kept himself to himself, and would have nothing to do with folk, just because he had good hopes of them all staring after him. He was carrying her box, and Saunders was written on the label, with something very like a 'Mrs.' before it.

"They went straight to the cottage, and she stayed there all night. It is his week of night-duty, so he had to go off to the box; and nobody has seen him to-day. I suppose he is keeping out of people's way. He has good reason to hide himself."

Mrs. Roberts stopped in her headlong tale for want of breath, and looked anxiously at her visitor; then she seized her hand, and squeezed it encouragingly.

"That's right, my dear. Take it quietly. Don't forget that you are worth a dozen of him," she said cheerily.

"The schoolmistress could feel that they were watching her."—p. 84.

Then the schoolmistress stood up, shaking in every limb.

"No, no; it is not true!" she cried. "Why do you tell me this?"

Mrs. Roberts bristled up.

"There is his own-word for it," she said shortly.

The schoolmistress moaned. "I cannot believe it: I will not! It is not true; it is not true!"

She pushed past Mrs. Roberts, and hurried down the path, treading recklessly (as that good woman observed) upon a border of pansies. But her rapid feet did not do much harm.

"Where are you going, Miss James?" called Mrs. Roberts shrilly from the doorstep. But the schoolmistress did not answer; she did not rightly know herself.

On she hurried, like one demented, while Mrs. Roberts stood at her gate and shook her head dismally, as she told herself that Helen James had gone out of her mind. Had she?—Perhaps.

There was a singing in her ears, and a strange turmoil in her brain. She did not know whither her feet were moving, and only came to herself to find that she was standing against the palings of the rose-encircled cottage that she had hoped would be her home.

With her white face pressed close to the fence, the schoolmistress gazed within.

The flowers that Dick had planted, while she stood by with the watering-pot, were budding now. The rose-tree over the door was blooming, and its branches were supported by bits of red cloth nailed across them—Dick had nailed them up last week, and she had stood at the foot of the ladder, tearing up the strips of cloth.

Even the curtains she had hemmed were at the windows.

* * * * *

Looking at the cottage, the same as it was when she and Dick last visited it together, the dread went out of her eyes.

"It cannot be true!" she murmured, with a gasp of relief.

It was just then that she saw a face at the window. She held her breath and watched. It was a bright, vivacious face, with shiny fair hair frizzed all over the forehead. Quickly it passed out of sight, and then the door opened.

The schoolmistress held on to the palings for dear life. She felt as if she could not stand alone while she watched the stranger in the doorway looking out with a smile of satisfaction. Her skirt was pinned up above her petticoat, and her arms—pretty, plump arms—were bare. She set down the broom she was holding, and lifting up the door-mat, shook it, without seeming to see the miserable face watching her from the fence, or to hear the piteous moan that came from the watcher's parted lips. No. She let down her skirt gaily, and picked the only white rose in the garden to stick in her bosom. Then she went in again, humming a song that the schoolmistress recognised dimly: it was Dick's favourite song.

Slowly the schoolmistress turned away, and walked up the lane, with her head bowed and her hands clasped.

The cottage was no place for her now—Dick's wife was there!

She crept back to her dwelling by a side road, for she could not face the village curiosity just yet.

Her eyes were misty with tears as she pushed the door open and went in; but she could still see a bit of paper lying on the floor. It must have been pushed under the door by someone who had come while she was out. She stooped and picked it up; there were a few words written on it in pencil—

"I am sorry you are out. I have something to tell you. Mind you are in to-morrow afternoon when school is over.—DICK."

With her eyes blazing now, she tore the paper into shreds.

"How can he dare to speak of coming and telling me? Can he face me after what he has done? Does he want to insult me further—after hurting me so?" she sobbed, burying her face in her hands.

II.

MORNING came. The schoolmistress awoke with the sun, and watched its rising with a sad heart. What would happen? She could not go on living in the same place with Dick and his wife—to meet them face to face, and then to see all the people pitying her—ah, no! she could never bear it.

"But I shall fall ill," she told herself, ready almost to welcome the faintness that was creeping over her, "and then mother will come and take me home, and I shall never come back again—never!"

With an effort she gathered herself together, and started for the school, looking at nobody, speaking to nobody, scarcely daring to lift her head.

The children stared as much as ever. It was bitter at first, but after a while she took no notice. She felt so utterly crushed that it did not matter.

The afternoon drew on. At last school was over, and the teacher, with downcast eyes, made her way home.

She locked the door after her. Dick might come, but he should not be admitted. He might think she was not in, or the neighbours might tell him that she was—she did not care. Only she dared not go out, for fear of meeting him face to face.

She sat down by her bedroom window, and took a piece of sewing in her hands. But she let it slip to the floor immediately, for it was a part of her wedding outfit.

With her hands idle—save for their nervous claspings and unclasps—she gazed down the road.

By-and-bye she saw two figures approaching, walking close together and talking earnestly.

Dick was coming, and—oh, insolence!—bringing his wife!

With angry eyes and bursting heart the poor deserted bride watched them. How pretty the woman was! What a bright face she had!

Scarcely knowing what she did, the schoolmistress leaned back, and looked at herself in the glass. She saw pale tear-stained cheeks, miserable eyes, and swollen lips. Her hair (ah! for the golden fluffiness of that woman's head!) was straggling, lank and untidy, over her brow.

"I am ugly," she said to herself, with a sigh; and she plunged her face into the hand-basin. But while she was brushing her hair she stopped short.

"They will not see me," she said; "does it matter how I look?" And she twisted up her hair with listless fingers, and went back to the window.

They were at the gate now. Dick was holding it open for his wife to pass through, and smiling on her in a way that made the schoolmistress clench her hands in pain.

"She picked the only white rose."—p. 86.

Then she hurried down the narrow stair to draw down the blinds of the lower windows.

She had got that of the front window pulled down just as she heard them on the doorstep; and she fled into the back room and sank into a chair, with her eyes on the door.

Through the crack between the door and the threshold she could see his boots, and two restless somethings of shiny leather that must be his wife's shoes.

He knocked. The schoolmistress gasped, but made no sound. Again and again he knocked, but she sat there, still and silent. Then she heard him go next door and ask if she had gone out. He came back quickly.

"They say she is in, Jenny," she heard him say. "How strange that she does not hear!"

"Perhaps she is asleep, Dick." Oh! how those light-hearted tones rang in the ears of the miserable woman trying to stifle her sobs in the back room!—"Let us both knock together and waken her."

The sound echoed through the narrow house, and must have been heard from one end of the row to the other. Still the schoolmistress did not respond.

Then she heard Dick saying, in tones of what sounded like real concern—

"She must be ill. Can anything have happened? She is all alone, you see."

"Does he think his treachery has driven me to put an end to myself?" murmured the schoolmistress hysterically, hiding her face in her hands to choke back the sobs that would come when she heard his voice.

He had stopped knocking—had he gone?

She was listening anxiously, when all at once the window beside her was pushed open (oh, foolishness! she had forgotten to fasten it), and, lifting her head in dismay, she found herself face to face with her faithless lover.

He looked at her in astonishment.

"What is wrong, Helen?" he asked quickly, preparing to squeeze himself in through the window. But she put out both her hands to keep him back.

"Do you dare to ask me?" she cried.

"What have I done?"

Yes, there was Dick speaking to her, asking her what was wrong—and on the other side of the house his wife was standing, tapping the doorstep impatiently with her shiny boots. Oh, the insolence of it all!

The schoolmistress felt for a moment—only a moment—that she detested him.

"What—have—you—done?" she repeated slowly.

"Yes: I don't understand it. All the way coming here everybody turned out to look at me, but nobody spoke to me. They stared at me as if I were a convict, and when I came near turned their backs. And now you shut yourself up like this, and speak to me as if you took me for a serpent. What does it mean? Are you going to throw me over? It looks like it."

"She found herself face to face with her faithless lover."
—p. 87.

He was angry: the schoolmistress could see that; and even in her wretchedness she found time to wonder. Then she rose, and with an unsteady hand tried to shut the window.

"You have no right to speak to me!" she stammered; "and it was cruel—oh! so cruel—to bring your wife here!"

"My wife!"

There was more than indignation in his voice. He caught hold of the hand with which she was trying feebly to push down the window, and held it fast.

But she was goaded beyond all bearing, and burst out with hot words of reproach.

Dick's wife, standing at the door, must have heard her speaking, but she did not come round. Perhaps she did not like to present herself until her husband fetched her. No doubt she was properly shy.

And when the schoolmistress stopped and looked up defiantly at her faithless lover, before melting into the tears that would come soon, Dick laughed.

Then he became graver.

"You might have had more faith in me, Helen," he said.

"What need of faith?" she cried. "It cannot make true false, nor false true."

"Listen," said Dick: "I wanted to give you a surprise; and I did not like to see you wearing yourself out putting the cottage to rights. Oh yes, it was all very well nailing up rose-trees and planting flowers; but when it came to scrubbing and polishing—and you said you would not trust even that to a charwoman—I thought of a plan.

I did not say a word to you, but I went off and fetched her"—he jerked his head in the direction of the door—"and all yesterday she has been cleaning up at the cottage. I brought her down this afternoon, thinking what a nice surprise I had made for you—and you treat me like this!"

"Who is she?" gasped the teacher, with a rush of hope.

"My sister!"

It was too good to be true. The schoolmistress tried to fight off the hasty gladness that was filling her.

"But you told them at the station——" she began.

"Oh, that was a joke!" explained Dick impatiently.

"How was I to know that the idiots would take it for gospel?"

The schoolmistress put both hands to her disordered hair, then, moved by a sudden impulse, hurried to the door and flung it wide open.

She kissed the startled woman on the threshold—not Dick's wife, thank Heaven, after all!—and her eyes were shining, not with tears, but with relief.

And yet she was very much ashamed of herself.

* * * * *

"Richard Saunders has only himself to thank," said Mrs. Roberts later on, after the village had been electrified by seeing Dick, and his "wife," and the teacher going down the road with happy faces—together. "When a young man keeps himself above his equals, and passes everybody with his high-and-mighty nose in the air, he ought to give warning when he condescends to make a joke."

The teacher only laughed; her trouble was over.

LONELINESS AND ITS CURE.

BY THE REV. CANON F. R. WYNNE, D.D.

"Not alone, because the Father is with Me."—ST. JOHN xvi. 32.

WO subjects are brought before us in this sentence—human loneliness and Divine Fatherhood: the poor child's desolate cry, "I am all alone," and the father's reassuring voice, "I am with you still." The Lord Jesus felt deeply the natural human desire for love and companionship. He knew that the time was coming when all earthly friends would forsake Him, and when He should have to taste the bitterness of the worst kind of loneliness—desertion. Looking forward to that period, He says, "I am not alone, because the Father is with Me." The presence of the Eternal Father is His support in loneliness.

Following, then, the leading of our Lord, I propose to consider the trial of loneliness and its alleviation.

1. It is well for us to bear in mind, first, that many forms of human loneliness are more or less imaginary, morbid, or self-imposed. There are people surrounded with kind friends who yet, with a sickly self-pity, like to fancy themselves alone in the world. Our French neighbours speak with a touch of scorn of "misunderstood women," who are annoyed that people will insist on seeing them as they are, and not as they like to imagine themselves to be. And so they play at loneliness. They are not really lonely: they are just a little silly. And ill-temper sometimes makes a self-imposed loneliness. Angry irritation keeps a person at a distance from his fellows in sullen resentment. He cherishes the sense of solitude, and likes to consider himself ill-used. His isolation is the form in which he avenges imaginary wrongs. And ill-temper produces loneliness in another way. Disagreeable manners drive friends away. If you are impatient of contradiction, if you are easily offended, if you let every annoyance you feel amidst the thousand rubs of life show itself in a cross face or cross voice, you will not be a pleasant companion, and in the natural course of things you will be left a great deal to your own company. Self-conceit, overweening opinion of your position or talent, obstinacy, assumption of any kind—these faults all alienate you from others. You must win sympathy and regard, and if you do not win them you cannot have them. If you let yourself be unamiable, you will be disliked.

And loneliness sometimes comes from selfish indulgence. You are wrapped up in yourself and in your own interests. You cannot trouble yourself to think of other people, or try to please them, or cultivate their companionship. And so, by your own act, you become isolated. A selfish youth, a selfish manhood, leads by sure degrees to a lonely old age.

From a deeper cause comes another and a sorer loneliness, but still a self-imposed loneliness. Students of modern science will know what I mean. A habit may easily be formed of so concentrating the attention upon material phenomena as to leave spiritual phenomena unrecognised. And thus the naturalist frequently glides into being a materialist. Half unconsciously, he puts aside God out of his universe. He goes through the world seeing everywhere "beautiful and well-ordered" things. But he feels neither reverence nor gratitude. In all this marvellous order and reign of law, he sees no design, no thought, no wise purpose. There is mechanism in nature, but no love, no "soul of the world," nothing for the heart to honour. In consequence, the materialist is intensely lonely.

Nature is to him like a beautiful face that he had admired and loved, but has found out to be only the face of an automaton. It had once seemed as if under the gleam of those eyes there was splendid purpose: it had seemed as if those smiles, and that coming and going colour, and that wistful and winsome look betokened a mind that thought and a heart that loved; but he has found out—or fancied he has found out—that all is worked by machinery: that instead of heart and soul, there are only a series of self-adjusting springs and revolving wheels. Such is Nature to the materialist, and in her presence he must be lonely, for there is nothing for his heart to love.

2. Thus far we have thought of loneliness that results from our own faults and mistakes. But there is much loneliness that we go through, though we have not caused it. Our Lord's character and aims brought Him loneliness. He was so much before His time and above His companions in thought and purpose, that even His nearest friends could not understand Him. His loneliness did not begin when all forsook Him and fled. Through His whole life people were "offended" at Him. They disapproved of Him. The disciples who forsook all to follow Him gave Him but scant sympathy, and with regard to all that was deepest and most cherished in His heart He was left quite alone. Leaders and pioneers in the realms of thought almost always experience similar loneliness. The glimpses of new truth which they see sooner and clearer than others are generally dreaded as heresy by their contemporaries. Being in the vanguard in the army of advancing thought and knowledge, they have to bear the first brunt of the battle. Their originality of mind, their fearlessness, their determination to say exactly what they think, and nothing else, draws down upon them the suspicion and dislike of ordinary people.

But even when we are not leaders of thought we can be left lonely through our companions' want of sympathy. One who wants to live an earnest Christian life in this world is very often rather isolated. People do not understand him, and do not much like the tone which, however gently and modestly expressed, is, they feel, a reproach upon their coarser and more commonplace life.

And there is the loneliness produced by sorrow. Some sorrows are shared by others, and there is a certain companionship in bearing them together. But some are, from their nature, secret sorrows, which none can really enter into except the sufferer himself. "The heart knoweth its own bitterness." And a great sorrow always brings with it great loneliness. When the storm blows, all the trees of the wood bend their moaning branches together; but when the thunderbolt falls from heaven, one tree is stricken, and is left standing alone, bare and blackened. Thus when the great bereavements of life come, though many may feel, and many kind hearts sympathise, there is one whose life henceforth must be lived in loneliness.

And then there is the loneliness of death. Friends may smooth the pillow of the dying, may hold his hand, and whisper words of love while the life is flickering away. But each must go out into the darkness alone—alone into the mystery! Alone into the awe and wonder of the disembodied state! Alone to face what lies beyond the gate of Death! Alone, and yet not alone. "The Father is with Me," Christ says of Himself. "The Father loveth you," Christ says of His people. The Father's love lights up that dreaded gloom. Where our Father is there is no darkness. At His presence the clouds remove. Unto the godly there ariseth up light in the darkness. This is the remedy which the Lord Jesus gives for all human loneliness. He knew well what it was to be alone, isolated from other men in the world, misunderstood and deserted, treading the wine-press alone, a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief, enduring a burden of agony that none could share. Here was His solace: "The Father is with me"; and thus He cheers us in our solitude. He reveals to us God. He makes us know that we have a Father. Is there a God that loves us and cares for us? "O that thou wouldst rend the heaven and come down!" cries the old prophet. "We are puzzled!" cry our human hearts. There is much that makes us long for a Father; there is much that makes us hope for Him; there is nothing in nature that makes us quite sure of Him. But Christ Jesus does. His only-begotten Son declares to us the Father. His unique and wonderful Life: all those outward events which are connected with the Incarnation of the Word, with His miracles and resurrection: all those inward experiences of our hearts which are connected with the witnessing of His Holy Spirit—they reveal to us the Father. They tell us in many ways, as our Saviour's message: "The Father Himself loveth you." And He who reveals to us the Father reconciles us to Him. "God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto Himself." Christ teaches the erring and sinful man that there is no barrier between him and the Father. He, by His atonement, has broken down the barrier, and so the call of the Lord Jesus rings through the world—"Come unto Me; He that cometh unto Me I will in no wise cast out. He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father; and the Father Himself loveth you."

Let nothing drown the music of Christ's revelation in our hearts. My Father is with me: I am not alone. When tempted, I am not alone. The Father is present, and is a spectator of my struggle. When difficulties come upon me, and I seem left to struggle alone—so many things to drag me down, no voice to cheer me onwards or upwards—my Father is with me. I cannot see Him. His voice is "too still and small" for the outward ear, but He is beside me. His right hand upholds me. When my spirit is sad and disappointed, when in my great sorrow it seems as if nothing could really comfort my heart—then the Father is with me. O charm to drive away the power of darkness. "The Father is with me!" O solace to the poor wounded spirit, "The Father is with me!" O light for the desolate and broken in heart, whatever is taken away. "The Father is with me!" Have you grasped this precious revelation? You who live in happy homes: you whose lives are easy and free from want: you whose wishes are fulfilled, and upon whom life smiles brightly—have you taken to heart this truth, "My Father is with me"? Learn it now. Dwell on it now. Let it give a deeper meaning to your prosperous life, a deeper earnestness to your way of feeling and acting. "The Father is with me wherever I am." And then when the storms begin to blow, and the great billows break upon you, and in the rush of the salt waves you taste at last the bitterness of suffering, then you will know as a comfort which nothing can take from you: "The Father is with me."

SOME OLD ILLUMINATIONS.

FOR centuries, not only in our own country, but in other parts of Europe, and in parts of Asia and of Africa, men were employed daily in copying manuscripts, week in, week out: year in, year out. There were many copies to be made of those that were accepted by scholars as desirable possessions; and now and then, one by one, new manuscripts were produced, and thus the materials upon which the copyist employed his art were ever increasing in extent. Some of these scribes worked in dim long-ago ages, in the hot glare of Egyptian sunshine; some in the shadow of the temples and groves of ancient Greece; others, later, in the rich glow of Lombardic plains; and others, again, in the cool and green of lands and islands farther north. Some of them, perhaps, sat in cells in solitary silence; some may have swelled the retinue of Byzantine emperors. In later times, we know, many of them sat day by day in the cloisters of our cathedrals and abbey churches, in small compartments made for their convenience, called carrels.

A PAGE FROM THE "BOOK OF KELLS."

We may still see specimens of Egyptian papyri in the British Museum, and in several of the principal European libraries on the Continent. In the great library in Paris there are Persian, Indian, Arabic, Siamese, and Chinese manuscripts of much interest. In the Vatican library there is a superb collection of ancient examples gradually gathered together from many sources during the last five hundred years, consisting of 23,000 manuscripts, Hebrew, Samaritan, Coptic, Æthiopian, Syriac, Persian, Armenian, Slavonic, Iberian, Chinese and Indian. In Vienna and Venice, too, there are very early manuscripts still carefully preserved; and many libraries in minor Continental cities can boast of riches of this description. Now and then, in the course of many years, a zealous scholar, or patron of learning, sent agents to the East to collect as many of these treasures as they could gather together, as in the instances of Lorenzo the Magnificent and his son; and so it has come to pass that, although whole libraries have been destroyed by fire, and there have been always the wear and tear of time, and the cruel and careless ravages of ignorance and neglect at work, we are still in possession of the results of much of the labours of the scribes of old. Occasionally, the world of scholars is even now startled with the news of a fresh find. Of these latter-day acquisitions a Syriac version of the Four Gospels, found at the foot of Mount Sinai, is the most recent. Napoleon in his victorious career sent some of the most valuable examples in the Vatican collection to Paris; but on the occupation of the city by the allied armies, these, as well as other works taken from other libraries, were restored. One of the Vatican manuscripts, thus returned, was a copy of Virgil made in the fourth century, with fifty miniatures in it, including a portrait of Virgil.

In connection with our present subject, some of the most interesting manuscripts preserved in the Vatican at the present day are the following: a Bible written in the sixth century in uncial, or large round characters, which contains the oldest version of the Septuagint and the first Greek version of the New Testament; a Greek version of the Acts of the Apostles, written in gold, and presented by the Queen of Cyprus to Innocent VIII.; the Four Gospels written in the year 1128; a Hebrew Bible, for which the Jews of Venice are said to have offered its weight in gold, without avail; and Commentaries on the New Testament, enriched with fourteenth-century miniatures by Niccolò da Bologna. In the Paris library are preserved some prayer-books of the fifth and sixth centuries, a prayer-book of Anne of Brittany, and another that belonged successively to Charles V., Charles IX., and Henry III., and which bears their signatures. In the monastery of San Marco, Florence, there are illuminations from the hand of Fra Benedetto, the brother of Fra Angelico the famous painter, that are considered to have reached the utmost height to which this branch of art has ever attained.

Below one manuscript, curiously, another can, occasionally, be traced, showing that the scribe had been induced to sacrifice previous labours for fresh ones. Such a manuscript is called a palimpsest. Under a version of St. Augustine's Commentary of the Psalms, for instance, may be seen a still older Latin MS., the Cicero de Republica. The library of a Benedictine monastery at Bobbio was composed almost exclusively of palimpsests. Some early manuscripts are written on rolls, or scrolls. Square pages came into use in the days of the Byzantine emperors. As every page presented a new field for ornamentation, we may conclude that this innovation materially conduced to the development of the art of illuminating.

Our own old Irish illuminated manuscripts are second to none. The superb eighth-century "Durham Book," now in the British Museum, and another famous MS., known as the "Book of Kells," now in the library of Trinity College, Dublin, are assuring evidence of the delicate skill attained by the early Irish illuminators. Some authorities are in doubt whether these old Irish artists were indebted to those of Lombardy for the particular style of decoration that they used, and that grew so intricately under their hands, or whether the Lombardic artists were under obligations to them for the first thought of it; and some think that the idea of illuminating reached the Irish scholars from Italy, and that then they inaugurated their interlacing complicated entwinnings, terminating in grotesque heads of animals and birds, which were afterwards taken up by the Lombardic scribes. What is sometimes called the school of Charlemagne, or the Frankish or Western school, adopted the curious fancy of enlarging capital letters to such an extent that some of them measure two feet in length. At the close of the tenth century there was a style of illumination in vogue that was called opus Anglicum, in which style a copy of the Gospels was made for Canute the Great, which is still in existence. It is thought that up to this time the scribe made his own decorations, but afterwards the artist seems to have been a different person, for whom blank spaces were left for him to fill in. Eventually the backgrounds of such spaces were gilded, and the artist's enrichments stood out on this golden ground with gorgeous effect. In later centuries, when the great Italian masters had brought the art of painting to perfection, and their influences and aids had developed the art of illuminating to its utmost finish of delicate beauty, and to the level of its most alluring refinement, the invention of printing turned men's minds in other directions; and the illuminator's vocation became a thing of the past. Whilst it lasted, it gave us priceless presentments. In the little pictures introduced so lavishly we may see indications of the architecture, costumes, weapons and implements, furniture, manners and customs of the different centuries. They are as mirrors or crystals, in which we have but to look to find the most curious and precise information concerning those who passed on their way to the portals of the life eternal so long ago.

It is interesting to think of the old illuminators sitting at their tasks in their carrels in the cloisters of our cathedrals, overlooking the green central square they called the Paradise. In the north walk of the Durham cloisters we may see, not only traces of the carrels, but of a shelf close by where books were kept—probably for general reference. In the north-west angle of Worcester cloisters there is a winding stair which gives direct access to the library. In the grand cloisters at Gloucester there are traces of twenty carrels. St. Dunstan is accredited with having inaugurated the practice of the art of illuminating at Winchester. Nothelm, another Archbishop of Canterbury, was so skilful with his pen and brush that he was deputed to visit Rome and examine the modes of operation pursued there, that he might instruct his own countrymen on his return. Herman, a Norman bishop of Salisbury, wrote, illuminated, and bound books. The Anglo-Saxon bishops on the drear island of Lindisfarne are reputed to have occupied themselves with writing and interlining and illuminating; and we know the venerable Bede dictated to a scribe with almost his last breath. We may picture their ordinary seclusion, their heads bending over the growing page, their steady hands, their little stock of colours and pencils; the means by which they prepared the surfaces of the vellum for their work, erasers, and the like. And, curiously, by the aid of some of their own vignettes, we may see several of the contrivances to which they resorted for the most convenient execution of their labours.

In the Paris library are manuscripts with drawings of the illuminators, seated in chairs that are furnished with sloping desks or boards, extended from arm to arm, with lecterns by their sides spread with books, hour-glass, eraser, and ink receptacle. To keep a book open at a particular place they had weighted markers fastened to the edge or sides of the lectern, which they placed over the leaves they wished to keep displayed. Sometimes they merely laid the weights thus attached upon the pages. With all these resources at command the industrious, self-communing artists sat, year in, year out, vying with each other as to the beauty of their work, the ingenuity and elegance of their ornamental designs, and, doubtless, also as to the accuracy of their text.

Down in our southern counties the orchards bloomed and fruited, the fields were ploughed and reaped, and still they laboured on. In the north the great seas beat against the shores in wintry storms, and lapped as lightly on them in summer's prime, and the mantles the moors put on were changed from gorse to heather, and then to embrowned bracken, year after year, and still there were always these scholars at work. The Saxon writer Aldhelm, in a letter to Eadfrid, who had returned from a journey to Ireland, praised the Irish scholars, and then said that Theodore and Adrian shone like the sun and moon at Canterbury, and that Theodore was surrounded by scholars, some of whom came from Ireland. The work of a particular century is identified by the character of the alphabet used. That of different countries is told by the same means as much as by the style of the illuminations.

In the library belonging to Hereford Cathedral are two hundred and thirty-six ancient manuscripts. They are bound in book fashion, and are chained to the shelves of the bookcase in which they are deposited by iron chains about three feet long. The oldest is a Latin version of the Four Gospels in Anglo-Saxon characters. It is written on a hundred and thirty leaves of vellum, cut nine inches long by about seven inches in width. Each Gospel is preceded by a title-page, on which a graceful initial, twining and terminating in heads of birds and beasts, and richly coloured, extends from the top to the base of the page. In the thousand years that have passed since the transcriber came to the last word, only two pages have been lost. The colours used are red, yellow, and purple; and the ink is still dark, except in a few places where damp has affected it. This copy of the Gospels is thought to have been the gift of the last of the Saxon bishops, Ethelstan. There is also a thirteenth-century copy of the Gospels, in which there is a representation of St. Mark, who is seated and in the act of writing, besides a large number of initial letters. And there is a fragment of another copy written in the fourteenth century. Among these treasures, too, is a large folio copy of the Bible on vellum, evenly written in double columns, with fifty-seven lines in each column, and with illuminated initials in blue and red; and there is another known as Wycliffe's Bible, written about 1420.

In some of these manuscripts there are fly-leaves made out of still older writings: and on some of these leaves there are verses and scribbings—probably written by their various owners. In one volume there is a curious entry, made in the days of Canute, to the effect that on a certain Edwine claiming some lands that he declared to be withheld from him by his mother, she, in the presence of several Thanes, bequeathed all her lands, money, clothes, and property to her relative, Leofleda, and by leave and witness of all the folk the transaction was recorded in a book of the Gospels. Several of the Hereford bishops left books to this library, and one of them mentioned that his bequests should be chained in the cathedral. Some of the other cathedrals are also rich in manuscripts, as Durham, Lichfield, and Winchester particularly. The library of Lambeth Palace should not be left unmentioned. Trinity College, Dublin, has seventeen hundred manuscripts. The British Museum has upwards of fifty thousand.

Leland, the antiquary, records a bequest of manuscripts to the library of the Grey Friars, in the metropolis, amounting in value to 2,000 gold pieces. Among similar incidental mention of such accumulations may be noted a catalogue of the contents of the library of Hulne Priory, in Northumberland, preserved among the Harleian MSS. in the British Museum. In this repository, we read, there was a Bible in white boards that was the gift of the Archdeacon of Northumberland; a second copy that was the gift of the Prior, and which was borrowed by Lord Percy and retained by him till his death; and there were also the Four Gospels bound in white leather, the Epistles of Paul, in a bag, and commentaries on the Gospels, Psalms, and the Apocalypse, homilies and meditations—in all a hundred and fourteen manuscripts. The Epistles of Paul that were kept in a bag were probably written on a roll.

We may conclude there have always been scholars, here and there, to whom these works of olden art have been valued at their worth. When printed books first came into use, and their novelty caused the old works to be laid aside, these true scholars carefully and quietly gathered them together. Sir William Dugdale, Garter King-at-Arms in the reign of Charles the Second, mentions in his diary—or his almanack, as it was then termed—as one of the joys of his long life, the privilege he enjoyed in being permitted full access to a superb collection of manuscripts made in his day. In our own time every example is carefully preserved, not only in our public institutions and the libraries of our corporations, but in those of nobles and gentlemen. In the library of Alnwick Castle, for instance, there is a splendid illuminated MS. of a large size and brilliant colours, not closed and locked out of sight, but opened, under glass, to show two of its sumptuous pages. Only a short time ago a generous donor presented to the British Museum a book that was once the property of King Philip the Second, and was brought from Spain about thirty years ago, when the authorities, it is said, endeavoured, unavailingly, to purchase it for two thousand pounds, and which is of fifteenth-century workmanship, and full of exquisite miniatures of marvellous colour and delicacy of execution. Nor has an appreciation of the labours of the old illuminators abated among those who can still produce similar work. One of our princesses may be said to have taken up their pencils and followed in their wake in the production of a book of painted pages, though the style of design and mode of execution differ from theirs as one century differs from another. The late highly gifted Marchioness of Waterford, in conjunction with the Countess of Tankerville, also designed and illuminated a very handsome book, in their manner, within the last few years.

In an old chronicle, written by Asserius Menevensis, it is set down that Osburga, the mother of King Alfred, showed him a Saxon poem beautifully illuminated, and promised to give it as a reward to the first of her children who was able to read it; and that he studied so diligently as to become entitled to the prize, which was accordingly awarded to him. This incident brings home to us the scantiness of the facilities for acquiring knowledge in those old times, and the extra merit of the industrious pursuit of it in the face of the difficulties with which it was surrounded. Asserius Menevensis was the friend, tutor, and biographer of King Alfred. When he wrote out this little incident, which so many transcribers of his annals have copied, it was as though he was holding up a veritable illumination to show us the pith of the times.

Looking back to the period of the earliest sacred manuscripts, we may take it for granted that as Moses was instructed in all the knowledge of the Egyptians he could read their papyri. There is only one book mentioned before his time, which is the book of the generations of Adam; the second book to which allusion is made is that which he was commanded to make as a memorial that Amalek was to be put out of remembrance. When he asked for forgiveness for the backsliding Israelites, he said, "If Thou wilt, forgive their sin; and, if not, blot me, I pray Thee, out of Thy Book, which Thou hast written." Another early book is alluded to in Numbers as the book of the wars of the Lord. When Samuel proclaimed Saul king, he told the people the manner of the kingdom, and wrote it in a book. Rolls are also mentioned. King Darius ordered a search to be made in the house of the rolls for record of any decree by Cyrus the King as to the building of the new temple at Jerusalem, and the restoration of the vessels taken from the old one when the Jews were carried into captivity. Ezekiel's mission was made known to him in a roll of a book written within and without. Job's curious wish that his adversary would write a book, and the preacher's comment concerning the writing of books having no end, present further aspects of the subject. Writings are frequently mentioned, the most of those who loved the Lord. In the Gospel according to St. Luke we are told that when Jesus went into the synagogue at Nazareth on the Sabbath Day and stood up to read, there was delivered unto Him the book of the prophet Esaias, from which He read a certain passage, and then closed it and gave it again to the minister. The Apostle Timothy writes that a cloak left at Troas should be sent to him, "and the books, august of all being the tables given to Moses for the Israelites after their deliverance from Egypt and arrival near Mount Sinai, of which we read, "And the writing was the writing of God," and "it was written with the finger of God." Malachi gives us word of a book of remembrance in which was written the names but especially the parchments." As we turn from this backward glance at the labours of the oldest scribes and artists, it seems superfluous to suggest that some of their works must have been in the Apostle's thoughts when he wrote "especially the parchments."

CHAPTER IV.

MISS FAGAN and her cat were dining. Miss Fagan sat facing a window from which one could see some distance up a road which led to the woods—for No. 32 was a corner house, and its rooms mostly had two windows. The dining-room being at the back of the house, both its windows looked into that side road, but one placed corner-wise commanded quite an extensive view.

Scott sat on the table near his mistress's right hand, and fed daintily off bits she laid on his plate from time to time. He took his meals much more daintily than she did when they were alone. Miss Foster objected as much to see Scott perched on the table as she did to have her cream-jug emptied for Twist's benefit. But Scott, being a cat who loved justice, longed often for the human gift of speech that he might say—

"See now, I live with my mistress, Clara Fagan, because she bought me with money, and because she feeds me regularly, and gives me a warm, soft bed at night. Why should you object to our eating at the same table? I do not make my paws greasy, as she makes her fingers sometimes, by taking bones in them; I do not bolt my food greedily, as she does often when we are alone; I do not put bits of meat and things, that I have left on my plate as not to my liking, for the servant: so why should I not sit on the table? I return to the floor to wash my face when I have finished eating; and there I am again to be preferred to my mistress—for, except in the morning when she rises, she does not wash her face all day."

Scott's reproving glances frequently said this and more, when Miss Foster took tea with Miss Fagan, and objected to his saucer of milk being placed on the table-cloth; but Miss Foster failed to understand him.

"Poor thing! I don't suppose she ever studied Persian!" he would say to himself with a complacent purr, coiling his fine tail around him to show its size. "Now, I understand their language perfectly; but I don't believe either of them ever knows what I wish them to hear from me."

He was Persian from the tip of his pink nose to the end of his great tail—a handsome tabby with silver-grey chest, and such a fine ruff round his haughty little head!

While he discussed fried sole in his own dainty fashion, Miss Fagan disposed of three fair-sized fillets, and rang the bell for the stewed kidneys that were to follow. While she waited, her eyes roamed out of the window and up the road just in time to see two figures come out of the woods; and when they came nearer she recognised them as belonging to Miss Foster's new companion and Captain Warre.

"So!"—and Miss Fagan's thin lips closed with a snap that made Scott look up to see if she were catching flies; but the flies had nearly all gone for that year. "Does Miss Foster wait dinner, I wonder, until her companion chooses to walk in? She knew Captain Warre before she came here—so Amelia Foster says. Well, I shouldn't wonder if she did! How slow they are to part! I'd give something to hear what they are talking about!"

It would not have enlightened her much, though it would have raised her curiosity to boiling pitch to have heard those concluding remarks.

"I owe you a good turn, you know," Lilian Paule was saying, very earnestly, "and I shall be only too glad to find I've paid it. Now, you'll do it, and not draw back, won't you?"

"Ye-es—only I must say I'm doubtful——"

"Pooh! 'Faint heart never won fair lady,' you know."

"Just what my father said to me a week ago," and he smiled.

"You'll call to-day?" she continued.

"Yes, I'll call; I don't believe she'll see me."

"I bet you she will. Don't come any further; it's as well we shouldn't be seen together. Good-bye. Miss Foster will be ready to shake me for being so late; but how was I to know I should lose my way?"

Captain Warre returned home through the woods, and Miss Paule hastened into fuller view of Miss Fagan's peephole, and was sharp enough to guess that she had probably been noticed while taking what seemed a lingering farewell of Reginald Warre.

"Now I come to think of it, we shook hands twice, and that little cat will have seen, and she will make the most of it. How I detest her! The cat and the mistress ought to change places in that house—both are as selfish as they can be; but there must be something honest and high-minded about Scott, or that little dog Twist wouldn't chum up with him so. He won't let Miss Fagan touch him, I notice—little Twist won't."

She turned the corner and received a volley of barks from Mr. Twist's small mouth as she passed Miss Fraser's garden.

"You're no use, Twistie! You bark alike at friend and foe. Shut your mouth, little dogums—shut your mouth, sir!—Oh, Miss Foster, I'm so sorry to be late. I lost my way in the woods, and was fast losing myself when Captain Warre came along, just at the right moment. He said if I had gone on the way I was going, I should have reached a place called Purle by about two o'clock. It was one, then, by his watch. He very kindly brought me right out to this road, close here. I can't tell you how sorry I am!"

Her smiling penitence soon thawed Miss Foster, who had found the last two hours woefully dull. She had a cold, and would not venture out, so had told Miss Paule she had better take a walk by herself to keep her in health.

Nothing but a cold ever kept Miss Foster in the house. She always declared she expected a bad cold as autumn crept on; and then she nursed it so well that she was free from a second attack for the whole of the winter.

Calling that afternoon at Long Reach, Captain Warre met Miss Fagan coming down the garden path. He raised his hat, and paused a moment to criticise the weather.

Had Lillian Paule been present to tell him that Miss Fagan had been doing her best to instil doubts of his single-mindedness into Drusy Weston's heart, he would have preferred, instead of discussing the weather, to have told Miss Fagan what a mean specimen of womankind he thought her.

In ignorance of the evil she had tried to accom-

"The Misses Weston at home?"

"Yes, sir," and Ellen smirked beamingly as she showed Captain Warre into the drawing-room.

They had seen him coming, of course, and Drusy had stood her ground with a burning little patch of crimson in each cheek.

"Don't be afraid that I shall run away this time, Margery. What a conceited little fool he must have thought me to take his attentions seriously! I might have known men of his class cannot live without the amusement of breaking as many hearts as possible in the course of a year. Not that he is likely ever to break mine!"

"I am fortunate to find you both in."

plish, he passed on up the path and rang the hall-door bell.

It was strange that neither Mrs. Pearson nor Miss Fagan should have reflected, before giving their mischievous tongues full license, that Captain Warre was as likely to suffer as Drusy herself by their mischief-making. Mrs. Pearson had been led on through dislike to the feeling of superiority over herself which the Weston girls unconsciously made only too evident to her narrowest of narrow minds.

Miss Fagan took up the ball she—Mrs. Pearson—had set rolling, out of jealousy, because she knew Miss Fraser had been admitted the day before to the downstairs sanctum at Long Reach. In fact, it was a two-sided jealousy, for it took in Miss Foster, because she was able to afford a companion—a luxury not to be thought of by Miss Fagan; and therefore the unfortunate companion was sure of No. 32's unquenchable enmity.

And up went the thoroughbred little head as Reginald Warre's voice was heard without.

"I am fortunate to find you both in," he began, in his pleasant, manly way, glancing with undisguised admiration at Drusy, who, being in a royal rage with the whole world, but particularly with him and herself, was looking marvellously pretty, her eyes shining like stars and her cheeks crimsoned with angry blood. "I have come to say good-bye," he continued, "for my father, as well as myself. He was coming with me, only Rickard came in and detained him as we were starting; so he desired me to convey his apologies and farewells. We leave for town in the morning—my aunt is not well."

"Lady Vanborough? I am sorry—she is not seriously ill, I hope?"

Drusy spoke sympathetically, yet with a something in tone and manner that made Reginald tell himself he had been worrying for nothing.

She hadn't been rendered uncomfortable by the nonsense that had been floating about the town, or she would not look like that at him—as cool and possessed as Lilian Paule herself.

"Not seriously, thanks; only the doctor recommends her to keep to the house for a few weeks, and she finds it dull. So we are going to try and cheer her up a bit."

"I hope you will succeed."

And that was all Drusy seemed inclined to say.

But Margery, carefully refusing to meet her sister's eyes, said—

"We are going up the day after to-morrow to get Phil's house in order by the time she comes back. Dr. Kershaw has to return on Saturday—a short honeymoon, isn't it? We find it even duller without her than we had expected, so we shall stay some time at Norwood—not with her, though; newly married people don't want other folks always about the place, you know. We shall board with some people Dr. Kershaw knows."

"How strange that you should be going, too!" Captain Warre pulled his moustache and looked pleased. "I hope we shall run up against you somewhere."

"That is most unlikely," Drusy put in hastily. "London is not like Winchmore, you know. Here everyone knows everyone else; but in town it is so different. A hardworking suburban doctor's circle of friends is hardly likely to touch Lady Vanborough's circle at any one point."

He felt snubbed; and asked himself what he had done to deserve it.

Such a comical expression of suffering stole over his face that Margery nearly laughed. It was rather amusing altogether, she thought. Here were she and Drusy running away to avoid Captain Warre and all the absurd (that was Drusy's word) rumours afloat; and here was Captain Warre running away—possibly because he guessed Drusy would rather not see much of him just at present—and they were both going to London. Well, London was big enough to hide each from the other; only it was evident that—in spite of Miss Fagan's broad hints about Miss Foster's companion—Captain Warre was as anxious to meet Drusy in town as she was anxious he shouldn't.

"But you will be going into the Park, and so on?" he suggested.

"It is uncertain. We shall be too busy to go anywhere." This from Drusy, of course.

"At first, perhaps. But later?"

"I don't know. We have not decided. It will all depend."

"On what?"

"Oh! On—on—several things. Philippa for one. She will probably prefer to spend most of her time at home, for Dr. Kershaw will not be able to get away very often."

"I suppose not."

His unfortunate moustache came in for a tremendous amount of tugging. This girl was more unapproachable than ever. He felt he might as well have remained at home, in spite of Lilian Paule's advice.

Margery tried to make conversation; but, as she could not be expected to talk for all three, she failed lamentably. Drusy entrenched herself behind her pride until she became monosyllabic; and this had such a crushing effect on Captain Warre that he was not a bit better. Ten minutes of this sort of thing was about all even Margery was capable of enduring. Thus—Margery: There was a lovely tide this morning. Were you out?

Captain Warre: No; I was not out this morning.

Margery: Drusy and I walked as far as Pen Point. The waves were grand out there—weren't they, Drusy?

Drusy: Very grand.

Margery: It was not a sight to be missed, I can tell you, Captain Warre, even by us residents; and you are here only occasionally, you know.

Captain Warre: That's all.

Margery: Do you know if it is decided to build a lighthouse on Pen Point?

Captain Warre: I really don't know.

Margery: It ought to have been built long ago: don't you think so?

Captain Warre: Certainly I do.

Margery: What was it you were reading about it in last week's Gazette, Drusy?

Drusy: I don't remember.

When Reginald Warre had taken his departure, Margery stretched herself and yawned, with the feeling that she had done a hard day's work.

"I would rather address a meeting—a political meeting—than I would be compelled to make talk for you two again. Next time Captain Warre comes I shall go and sit on the stile in the orchard, and leave you to entertain him, Drusy. A nice lively couple you are, upon my word! I don't blame him for turning his thoughts to Miss Paule by way of a change; at least, she has plenty to say for herself."

This was Margery's revenge for the "difficult" quarter of an hour Drusy had given her.

CHAPTER V

"PHIL ought to be a happy woman, if ever there was one!" exclaimed Margery, when she and Drusy had finished inspecting Mrs. Theo Kershaw's new home.

"Happiness isn't ruled by oughts," murmured Drusy dreamily, coaxing a "Gondolied" out of the Broadwood grand the young doctor had himself selected for his wife. "She deserves something—much—by way of compensation for accepting the position of a perpetual sneeze. Ker-shaw! Just listen! One might as well be called Kashoo, or Arashoo, or any other involuntary sound."

Drusy had brightened wonderfully during the few hours since she had left Winchmore and its objectionable gossip behind her. Margery regarded her with great satisfaction that their experiment should, so far, have succeeded.

While the piano was still yielding its sweetness in response to that tender touch—now evoking a melody of Rubinstein's—a carriage of some sort stopped at the door, and a masculine voice was heard inquiring if the Misses Weston had arrived; and Theo Kershaw's little "Buttons" ushered a big man into the drawing-room, under the name of "Dr. Fergusson."

The girls knew this was the man who had taken Theo into partnership on very easy terms—himself being well-to-do, and Theo only a poor struggler in the ranks.

"Kershaw wrote me that you would be here to-day. I have run in for a moment to apologise for not meeting you at Paddington; but I really could not get away."

"Indeed, we never expected you to meet us—did we, Margery! Of course, you are extra-busy, with Theo away."

Drusy laid her slender hand in his, and looked up with smiling confidence into his deeply set blue-black eyes. His skin was fair, and his hair and moustache were light—a sort of tow-colour; but his eyes looked very dark. They had heard so much good of this big Stuart Fergusson that they felt they must begin to like him at once.

He glanced from Drusy's tall slender figure to Margery's compact one.

"She's the stronger of the two," was the first comparison he drew as he sat down and began to talk. A physician to his fingertips, it was always their health he thought of first, when making fresh acquaintances. "I hope Kershaw's wife is more like her than the other; but I don't think he'd be wicked enough to marry a delicate woman."

In less than five minutes the three felt thoroughly at home with each other.

"It was arranged that we should come and see that all was cosy by the time Phil got back," said Drusy presently; "but we didn't know then how dull Long Reach would seem without her. Long Reach is the name of our house, you know. It seemed almost unbearable—didn't it, Margery? So we decided we would stay here some weeks. Not here—not at this house, I mean—Theo and Phil would wish us further;" and she stopped to laugh a little. "We are going to board with some people called Thornton. Theo has written to them about it, and we are going to see them in the morning. Do they live far from here, do you know, Dr. Fergusson?"

"About five minutes' walk. You go down this road and take the first turning to the right, then the first to the left, and there you are—about the tenth house along; it's called Admaston."

"Buttons," who was a capital substitute for a parlour-maid, and did not require such high wages, brought in tea; and, when he had drunk, thirstily, two cups, Dr. Fergusson took his leave.

"I like him immensely, Margery; don't you?"

"Yes, I do. He is big, and strong, and gentle; and the combination is pleasant. How small his hands are for such a large man!"

"Yes, they are. Well, as we shall, I suppose, see pretty much of him, I am glad he is what he is."

"Can't help seeing pretty much of him, if we only

"I trust you won't particularly object to my company," said Dr. Fergusson.—p. 102.

meet him once in a twelvemonth," murmured Margery frivolously. "Shall we be lazy this evening, Drusy? We have all to-morrow and part of Saturday to work in; and everything is in such apple-pie order that there is not half as much to do as we expected, is there?"

"No; except that the apple-pie order is too excessive to be allowed to remain. I want to upset things a bit, and make them look homelike."

"Well, we can do that to-morrow. Go on playing, there's a dear; I am just in the mood for music."

Ten minutes later, when Drusy looked round—suspicious of the perfect silence—Margery's brown head was nestling against the ruby-coloured cushions on the couch, and Margery herself was in dream-land.

"Wollaston" looked the picture of comfort, and a very ideal home, the young bride thought when she entered it, with her husband's whispered welcome in her ears, and her dearly-loved sisters waiting to greet her.

"Everything is perfect!" she declared. "You knew just what I should like, Theo."

"Drusy and Margery have shifted things a bit, so that they don't look so uncompromisingly stiff," he replied. "I was here a whole week alone, you know; the maids and the upholsterer's men had arranged it all to their liking, and I declare I hardly ventured to lounge, however tired I felt; the things looked so reproachfully upright and correct, somehow. I used to shy the cushions about, and see if that made any difference; but it didn't a bit."

Dr. Fergusson came in to dinner, but said he could not stay long, as he had a friend coming to spend Sunday.

"Eden, you know," he added, for his partner's edification.

"Eden? Oh, Phil will like to know him. It's the scribbler I told you of, Phil—a clever fellow, and capital company."

"Perhaps"—Phil spoke timidly: it was the first invitation she had given in her new home—"perhaps Dr. Fergusson will bring him to-morrow, and introduce him to me."

"Bring him to dinner, Fergusson; and tell him to be in good form, as three ladies will be present."

"Rather a change from our bachelor gatherings," smiled Dr. Fergusson.—"Thanks, Mrs. Kershaw; I will bring him—he'll be delighted to come."

Mrs. Thornton's boarders took possession of their rooms that night; but they did not trouble her much next day, for, after morning church, they went to "Wollaston" and remained there until evening.

Dinner was at two o'clock. At a quarter before two Dr. Fergusson arrived with his friend, a man of eight-and-twenty or thirty, bearing a striking resemblance to Reginald Warre—indeed, at the first glimpse of his figure, as she watched him from the window, coming up the garden path, Drusy's heart gave a jump, and began to beat rapidly; but a closer inspection revealed points of difference. Mr. Eden wore nose-glasses, and had a thick crop of closely curling hair. Moreover, his clothes lacked that military cut—or inevitable something—which was part and parcel of Captain Warre's appearance; also Mr. Eden seemed blessed with higher spirits, though there was a similarity, even in voice and laugh, to Captain Warre which made Drusy, at least, think often of him during the day. His name, too, was Rex, which is used as short for Reginald.

"Fancy a fellow getting christened 'Rex' and nothing else!" he said whimsically. "One might as well be a dog. My godparents evidently thought I was born to a crown! Well, it's not much trouble to sign, anyway."

"And won't give your wife an occasion to stumble in the marriage service," said Dr. Kershaw, with a glance at Phil. "Do you remember, Margery?—I, Philippa Gertrude, take thee, Theodore Wilfred K-Kennedy—"

"Be quiet, sir!" commanded Phil. "I hope it is not many unfortunate brides who have to get through such a name—Theodore Wilfred Kennedy Kershaw—did you ever hear such a mouthful?"

"You hadn't to say 'Kershaw,'" her husband reminded her.

"I had to say quite enough!" was the crushing reply. "Come, sisters mine, we will leave these gentlemen to discuss the doings and misdoings of Parliament on the opium question. I know Dr. Fergusson is a politician, and I am grateful to him for not mixing politics with his dinner."

But neither Parliament nor anything else claimed the masculine attention very long after those three seats at the dinner-table had been vacated. Theo Kershaw soon made a move, and the others were willing to follow.

Drusy had taken possession of the Broadwood, which was giving forth Beethoven's "Sonate Pathétique" in answer to her fingers' skilful touch; and Beethoven well rendered is not to be despised.

Theo went straight to his wife, who had found a corner behind the heavy curtains in the bay window.

A moment's hesitation on Dr. Fergusson's part, and Rex Eden glided into a seat by the piano.

"Kismet!" murmured Stuart Fergusson under his tow-coloured moustache; and straightway he took possession of the largest chair in the room, after moving it nearer to the one Margery had taken.

"You don't mind having me near?" he whispered, as she looked up a moment, rather impatiently, he thought.

A smile broke over her face, like a gleam of sunshine.

"Of course not," she whispered back. "Why should I?"

"I won't talk," he promised, "except between the pieces."

And then he fell to studying her small head with its crown of brown curls, and her soft white neck, and her good-tempered looking mouth; and he decided that Margery Weston was not at all beautiful, scarcely pretty: the very reverse of his ideal, who was tall and stately, and unmoved by human passions and weaknesses; who had golden hair, and calm blue eyes, and perfectly curved lips.

No; Margery Weston was the reverse of all this. She was just an ordinary girl to look at; and probably ordinary, too, in the way of being partly good and partly bad.

She was the sort of girl to take the fancy of many men, but—and as this thought came to him, Dr. Fergusson looked at her with more interest still—she would only care for one out of the many. He could not tell what made him think this; but he not only thought it, he felt it. And that one she would love with a tenderness and passion his ideal would never be capable of feeling—would look down on, possibly, as being "bad form."

"Yet," thought this grave man of medicine, "I think I should like my wife to love me like that. Good heavens!—what would I not make her life if she did! I would—Stuart, don't be an old fool! You are thirty-three, you have grey hairs, and you are a regular old bachelor—an antiquated fogey, who has actually had a touch of gout. Out upon you, idle dreamer—middle-aged man! . . . What are those two at the piano saying, I wonder? How can that girl talk while she plays? Margery can't even talk while she listens."

CHAPTER VI.

DRUSY could talk easily, as a rule, while she played modern music. Beethoven was another matter. It was Rex Eden who was doing the talking; she was only listening, and listening, and listening, and saying to herself that she understood now why she had felt drawn to Reginald Warre. There was much in him that was in sympathy with herself; but he had lacked much, too—lacked a great deal that Rex Eden appeared to possess. Now, he had a soul that music could move to swift invention, though he said afterwards that it was not invention at all—the music had drawn the words out of him.

While she played he painted pictures with his tongue—painted them so plainly that she saw all he described, heard all his words suggested; and so she played, on and on, and he talked to her, and neither seemed to tire.

Margery wondered what had come to her sister—was she never going to stop?

Just then Dr. Fergusson leaned forward, and whispered in her ear—

"Do you believe in affinities?"

She smiled, and the smile became a laugh—a soft, subdued laugh that attracted no attention.

"What a ridiculous question! Why do you ask?" she whispered back.

"I only wanted to know—that's all." But he was smiling, too—especially with his eyes. "Those two behind the curtain, there, and those two at the piano, and you and I quite out of it—you bored to death, and I—"

"And you?" she repeated.

"And I so sorry for you," he concluded softly.

"You needn't be—I am not bored at all. I would ask you if you were; but, of course, you would say no. I am well entertained; I can listen to music for ever when people play like Drusy. She does play well, doesn't she?"

"Very well. And you?"

"Oh, I play, of course—but not like Drusy. I manage the accompaniment of the few songs I know, and I can get through one or two simple airs."

At that moment Drusy changed her subject—gliding, by a few improvised chords, from a bit of the "Stabat Mater" to a quaint hymn tune.

"My very own!" she said to Rex Eden.

And again Margery said to herself—

"Will she never tire? What has come to her to-day?"

Stuart Fergusson leaned towards her, and asked most humbly, in the lowest of undertones—

"May I talk a little? Nature never meant me to be silent for long at a time; my tongue gets cramp if I am."

Margery choked down a laugh.

"Well, what do you want to talk about?"

"Mrs. Spottletoe."

Margery turned and looked at him; his face was as grave as a mustard-pot, and his eyes rested on Drusy.

"Mrs. Spottletoe?" she murmured questioningly.

"Surely she was an ancestress of your sister's?" he said solemnly, looking at her now without a twinkle in his eyes.

"Surely this big man talks a lot of nonsense!" said Margery to herself. Aloud she continued: "Drusy is not so thin as all that, Dr. Fergusson; she is slender, certainly, but I think her figure most graceful."

"Thank you," was all his reply. "You have told me two things I wanted to know, without my having to ask directly. You read Dickens, and you are fond of your sister."

"Why, of course—to both." Margery's eyes opened a little.

"No 'of course' about it. I was dining somewhere about a month ago, and I had to take a very fashionable young lady in to dinner. She could talk I knew, because I had more than once seen her 'go the pace' (excuse the slang; it is hers, not mine) with more fortunate men; but I, somehow, was out of it, and we were getting stranded on that worst of all coasts to near at a dinner party—Silence—Silence utter and unbreakable. I sought in my mind for the pilot that should sail us into deep water again. I tried to be original, but failed. All it occurred to me to say was—'Which do you like better, Sam Weller or Mark Tapley?' She looked at me; she looked me up and down; she looked me down and up; and then replied severely—'I have never met either. Stay, though!'—suddenly brightening—are they two of your horses? It is a fact, really, Miss Margery. That young lady was not ashamed to own that she hadn't read Dickens."

They all attended evening service, with the exception of Dr. Fergusson, who had to see one or two patients. Theo offered to see them instead, but his "senior" would not hear of it.

"Be happy while you may, my dear fellow," said he, with his genial smile. "You shall go into harness again to-morrow morning."

Margery tried hard not to feel there was a something missing as the five started for church. She walked with Phil and her husband, who were as happy as it is given to mortals to be; so happy that they wanted to make the world brighter for everyone they met. Margery, coming under the direct influence of this desire, could not complain that she was neglected; and she did not want to change places either with Phil or with Drusy, who was marching on ahead with Rex Eden as contentedly as if she had known him all her life. Yet Margery was conscious of that only half-divined sensation of there being something missing. She thought vaguely of the walk to church at Long Reach. Was it that she was hankering after? Did she want to cover the same ground she had covered week after week, with a few exceptions, all the years of her life? Was she longing for a sight of the old church tower, with its clock, which was generally ten minutes late?

But no; she did not wish to be back at Long Reach; she did not wish to be anywhere in particular; on the whole, she was quite satisfied to be walking to church at Norwood with her two sisters, and Theo, and Mr. Eden. Of course she was satisfied; why should she not be?

Only when, in the hymn before the sermon, a tall, big man, with a tow-coloured moustache, came quietly into church, and took a vacant seat not far from them, things seemed more complete, somehow.

"We shall be equal numbers walking home," thought Margery; "Theo and Phil will be glad to be alone." And then she listened reverently to the text, and gave her attention to the sermon.

"I trust you won't particularly object to my company, Miss Margery," said Dr. Fergusson, taking possession of her and her books in the porch, the other four having paired off as a matter of course. "It is only natural that Kershaw and his wife should like to be side by side every minute of their time; and it looks uncommonly as though Eden considered it as natural for him to monopolise Miss Weston. I don't complain, but you may. I am rather a large person; it is quite possible to get too much of me."

"Don't you think it would be wise of me to speak plainly?" asked Margery, smiling a little, for all her voice sounded so very business-like. "If I say merely, 'Indeed no! please do not think your company wearies me,' it would no doubt sound quite correct; but you might not believe I meant what I said. So I say instead—I know how good you have been to Theo; he would not have been in a position to marry for years to come, had you not taken him into partnership. I am as fond of him as if he were really my brother; and I can see that he and Phil are very happy at being together. Therefore, Dr. Fergusson, I already feel grateful towards you, and the gratitude does not impose a burden on me as being a debt I must pay. And now, perhaps, you won't think it necessary to make any more polite speeches, etc., etc."

He laughed so heartily that she joined in; though she could not see there was anything to laugh at in what she had said—she had meant every word.

"I won't be ceremonious any more, Miss Margery. What has that shabby old dame Fate been about that she did not introduce us years ago? You are as honest and plain-spoken as I like to be myself when I meet people who—read Dickens."

After that, knowing how he loved his work, she got him to talk of it; and the time passed quickly enough for both.

When they had partaken of a light supper, Drusy rose to fetch her hat.

"You won't mind our going now, Phil?"

"You are to please yourselves as much as if you were at Long Reach," declared Phil. "Go when you like, and come when you like: you know how glad I am to have you here."

There was much wishing of good-nights: and then the young husband and wife closed the door on their guests, and returned to the drawing-room arm-in-arm, each conscious that, though the whole world departed from their doors, there would be no loneliness for them so long as they were together.

Drusy and Rex Eden led the way again. He began to speak of their next meeting.

"I shall have to leave by an early train in the morning: and my diggings are quite at the other end of London—up Hampstead way. I have a mind to shift."

"You haven't answered the question I asked you as we went to church," said Drusy, not venturing to discuss the matter of their next meeting, lest she should betray the fact that she would be looking forward to it almost as much as he professed to be.

"Oh, I write articles and things for a magazine or two: and one evening paper. I make enough to keep me going. Fortunately I don't depend entirely on my own exertions: there are a few thousands put out to nurse against the day when I see the chance of starting a house of my own."

"You live alone in lodgings?"

"My father is with me at present. To-day he is spending with friends. He goes away on Tuesday or Wednesday, so, after that, my evenings will be my own."

"Drusy! Where are you going, dear?" Margery's voice reminded Drusy that she had passed Admaston.

"A clear case of it with both!" murmured

Fergusson, bending to look into his companion's face as they passed a lamp-post. "You don't look very pleased."

"I am not sure that I am. I think I half wished—but, there, I must not tell you of that: it is not my secret."

"If I had a sister—" said Dr. Fergusson musingly: "I had one once; but she died years ago—had I one now, of your sister's age and temperament, I think I would rather give her to Eden than to any man I know."

"Thank you, Dr. Fergusson. Well, I must try and be glad; if it is to be."

"If it is to be! Five important little words, aren't they? Good-night! Good-night, Miss Weston."

CHAPTER VII.

"I DON'T care much for going about," observed Drusy, after a day spent partly in shopping and partly at the Doré Gallery—where they had come face to face with Captain Warre, who was wandering about alone. "Doré is rather heavy entertainment: don't you think so, Margery?"

"No, I don't: and I have known you enjoy him before now. You are tired, that is all; and you didn't like Reginald Warre turning up. Confess, now! Hadn't that something to do with it?"

"Perhaps. I wish he was not such a dutiful son: it is so tiresome to know that he intends carrying out his father's wishes, or trying to do so. I think I will stay at home—here—another day, Margery, when you go anywhere."

"Unless someone else happens to be present who can monopolise you," retorted Margery.

That Somebody had not put in an appearance for several days; and when he next entered the drawing-room at Wollaston, where Phil liked her sisters to spend most of their evenings, Drusy felt half afraid of the sudden rush of joy she experienced.

He sat down by her in the corner where she had established herself with a book; but she had not read a line. Hidden from the others by a large screen, she had given play to her thoughts—safe from all observation.

Phil was trying some new music; and under cover of a rattling March, Rex murmured in Drusy's ear—

"What have you been doing since Sunday? It seems years since I saw you."

"We went up to town on Monday, and did the Doré Gallery."

"Oh, yes; Fergusson told me. You met an old friend there?"

"Scarcely a friend. The Warres of St. Onans are a cut above the Westons of Long Reach. And this was Captain Warre—the heir."

"Were he heir to a kingdom, he would not be above you," said Rex in a tone that set her pulses throbbing. "How long have you known him?"

"All my life. But we have not met often, you know. He was at Harrow, and afterwards at Oxford; and then he went abroad with his regiment more than once. His father wants him to resign and settle down at St. Onans; and I think he ought."

"Speak to me, Drusy."—p. 106.

"Because he would be more at Winchmore? Is that what you wish?"

"I didn't say I wished anything; and certainly I don't wish that. Not that it matters to me—anything that he does."

"You don't like him?"

"Oh, yes, I do. But, as I said just now, he is a Warre of St. Ouans, while I am a Weston of Long Reach. Our paths in life can only touch now and again, at no important parts."

"What is he like to look at?"

"Take off your glasses—make your hair straight, and you have him almost exactly."

"Humph! Like me, is he? I ought to feel honoured to resemble closely so important a person as a Warre of St. Ouans. But don't let me waste time talking of him; tell me about yourself—what else have you been doing?"

"Nothing."

"All day Tuesday?"

"Nothing."

"All day Wednesday?"

"Still nothing," she laughed merrily. "Really, I did nothing but mope and wish the weather would clear. Of course, I ought to have occupied myself with making things for the natives of the South Sea Islands——"

"They wouldn't wear 'em, if you did!" interrupted Rex.

"Well, for our own English poor, then."

"Their parents would pawn or sell the things. Fancy such people getting hold of anything you had made! But what have you been doing to-day?"

"Again, nothing—except to try and paint the weather we had yesterday and the day before, and the fearful mud it produced."

"You are fond of painting?"

"Yes, rather."

"But music comes first?"

"Oh, yes. What a pretty thing Phil is playing now!"

"Like a breeze on a hot summer day, isn't it? It is skimming along a common and finding its way into a wood where there are hundreds of ferns, and the fronds shake themselves gently as it reaches them, and they listen for the messages it brings from far away. Now it is out of the wood again, nearing a garden where the flowers bow down to greet it. And now it is making for that open window, where a girl bends over a letter she has had from her lover; the breeze stirs the little rings of hair on her forehead—she has black hair, like yours—and it tries to read her letter, but can't do it without rustling the paper, and she puts her hand over the pages and closes the window to shut out the breeze. And now the little thing is tired; listen! how weary it sounds—sobbing faintly on the air as it rises, rises, rises, until it reaches yonder cloud, and sails away with it, sighing peacefully, having found a resting-place at last."

The music ceased—dying away in the softest whisper, the murmuring voice at her side became silent, and Drusy drew a deep breath.

"If you write as you talk—do you?"

"I suppose so—sometimes."

"I should like to read what you write. How people must like to listen to you—they do, don't they?"

"I think not much; I can't talk to everyone—you alone draw it from me—what the music says, or the silence, or the noise of the streets. I have been wishing you were with me these three days: there was no one to tell my thoughts to. Your very presence inspires me. I feel a different being when I am with you."

His voice dropped to a whisper—as the music had done. She could hear the heavy throb—throbbing of his heart, and feel his quick breath on her cheek.

Afraid of—she knew not what; longing to be silent, yet dreading what might happen, she rushed into ordinary every-day speech.

"Has your father gone?"

Rex drew in his breath and pulled himself together. Almost had he spoken of the love that was consuming him; and, had he spoken, he might have lost her for ever—so he told himself as he answered her question.

"He went this morning. It has been an eventful day for me. First, I had to get up an hour earlier than usual, because my father wanted to leave by a particularly early train. Then my landlady turned crusty because I forgot to wipe my boots last evening before going up-stairs to my rooms. I wanted an excuse to change my diggings; so I gave her a week's pay, and packed up my traps. After a long morning's work and a very indifferent luncheon, I hailed a cab and got in with all my bags and things, and had myself driven to Fergusson's house. That cost me—I won't tell you how much. Leaving my traps in the hall, I sallied forth in search of rooms, and ran up against Fergusson himself. He settled the matter for me by insisting on my being his guest until I find something to suit me. So now I am a near neighbour of yours."

"Are you? Where does Dr. Fergusson live?"

"About three minutes' walk from your place; the house is called Ellesmere."

The next evening Rex arrived, carrying a violin case.

Margery clapped her hands.

"I thought you must play some instrument, Mr. Eden—you seem so thoroughly musical. Now I shall look forward to some lovely duets. Drusy began to learn the violin last year, after being 'fired' by hearing Sarasate; but she couldn't find a teacher to her liking at Winchmore."

"They were all talk and no soul," protested Drusy. "I tried three—two at Winchmore, and one who used to come once a week from Fishley to give lessons at a school. But neither of them pleased me, so I gave it up."

She had never told even Margery that Reginald Warre had had as much to do with her giving it up as had the incompetent instructors. Captain Warre had confessed to a preference for the violin over any other instrument, had owned to having studied it himself, and, on one occasion, when Margery was not present, had suggested diffidently that, if agreeable to Miss Weston, he might bring his violin some day and try some duets.

Apparently, it was not agreeable to Miss Weston, for then and there she declared her inability to play, and her intention of not wasting further time on the subject.

Now Rex Eden went further than Reginald Warre had dared to go. As he took his instrument from its case with tender, loving touch, he said in eager undertone—

"Have you got it still? Your violin?"

"Yes; at home."

"Send for it, will you? And see if I should satisfy you as a master."

She had no doubt whatever about it, for her heart owned him proudly as master of herself and her whole life; if they parted that night never to meet again, the memory of this past week—of the hold he had gained of her innermost thoughts—would be with her always, influencing her entire future; she knew this well enough, but all she said was—

"I must hear you play first."

"If you like my playing, will you send for it?"

"I will think about it," she promised; and there was no fear of her breaking her word, for she thought of little else all the evening.

The first thing he played was a delightful little bit of Sarasate's. Drusy had heard the great violinist give it at the concert she had attended. Rex Eden's rendering was, of course, inferior, but his soul was in his finger-tips for the time being, and he had the power to carry his audience whither he wished them to go.

Drusy did not join in the thanks that were showered upon him as the last note died away; she looked at him with shining eyes—the girl lost for the moment in the musician.

"Will you teach me? Will you, really? You have genius; none of those others had anything but talent; talent can make correct sounds, but only genius can make the sounds live."

"I was mistaken for once," thought Dr. Fergusson; "it is not so much delicacy of constitution as a sort of nervous genius of her own that gives her that fragile appearance; she looks half a spirit at this moment. If those two marry, and no meddling stupid makes mischief between them afterwards concerning worldly matters, they will live in heaven while still treading this prosaic earth. As Rex himself would say—their souls have met and touched. Just look at them now! Their humanity is a thing forgotten by both; love has done wonders for Rex; I never knew he had a spark of genius in him. Oh, you stupid! Why couldn't you keep that out of your eyes?"

For Rex, being the first to come back to things material, recognised the perfect beauty of Drusy's face, transfigured as it was in that great moment of supreme delight; and an expression of worshipful admiring love stole into his eyes, under which Drusy's drooped and fell, while a warm blush spread over her face and neck. She shrank back and sat down by Phil, who took her hand and patted it gently, feeling touched, as the others had been, by the little scene enacted before them by these unconfessed lovers.

"Margery, sing something, dear."

Margery, understanding as well as though Phil had said so, that she was to sing to give Drusy time to recover herself, moved to the piano, and selected "The Garden of Sleep." Rex, with a hot glow in his cheeks, established himself by her side to turn over the leaves.

CHAPTER VIII.

A WHOLE month had passed since the Westons left Long Reach for Norwood. The four weeks seemed to have flown for both of them. Drusy had sent for her violin, and had had many a lesson from Rex Eden. She practised laboriously—yet that is not the right word to use, for there was nothing laborious about it; she loved it too well for that—and it was evident that, in time, her skill with the violin would equal that she already had with the piano.

There were frequent musical evenings at Wollaston, and often they went up to town for a day, occasionally meeting Captain Warre, who seemed to like getting about alone; and, twice during the month, Stuart Fergusson had given little dinners—dinners that proved a great success. Rex Eden was still domiciled at Ellesmere, and his aid was invaluable in "getting up things," as Fergusson put it. It seemed likely that those two would continue to live together for a time; Fergusson missed Theo, who had been at Ellesmere almost up to the day of his marriage.

When the month was up and Margery suggested that, now Phil had thoroughly settled down in her new house, it was time for her and Drusy to think of going home, Rex Eden "spoke." Drusy broached the subject of their possible departure when she and Rex were alone for half an hour one afternoon. She wanted to see if he would appear sorry to lose her, and would say something about going to Winchmore when she had returned there. But she had not anticipated the sudden rush of words that were poured into her ears—words Rex could no longer refrain from speaking, now he knew he was going to lose her; he felt he could not bear such a loss, and told her so in the first words which occurred to him.

"You have aroused the best part of my nature, Drusy; I feel a different man this last month from what I was before; and if you leave me quite alone I shall slip back into the darkness, and be utterly lost. But you will not do this? You will take my love and myself, and make the best of us both, won't you, darling? I love you so dearly that I cannot picture myself living without you; you are the loadstar of my existence—the very light of my life—the only woman in all the world I ever felt a tenth part of such love for. Speak to me, Drusy! Do not make me feel you are annoyed at my vehemence! Do not say I have spoken too soon! We have been so much together these four weeks; it has been more like four months, hasn't it? I mean that if you stayed at Long Reach always, and I stayed here, we might even know each other four years, or forty, without drawing one-half so close to each other as we are now. For you feel that we are close, don't you, dear? You seem to be here—right in my heart; for you are never out of my waking thoughts. But why am I talking so much, when you might have told me by now what I am longing to hear—that you are not angry with me for saying all this, and that you—oh! Drusy, say it, darling! say you love me a little?"

He took her hands, and bent low to hear the words Drusy was trying to whisper. But her heart seemed to have risen to her throat; she felt almost choking with its rapid beating, and no words would come.

"Say something!" he implored. "Just one word! Call me 'dear' or 'wretch,' or something to let me know what you mean! Or drag away your hands if you don't want to speak: I shall understand."

But her hands remained in his; and as he clasped them tighter in his joy she got out one word—just his Christian name.

"Rex!"

"Darling! Say that, too, Drusy, and then I will wait for the rest; say 'Rex darling.'"

The first plunge had been made: and now it was a little easier to do as he asked.

"Rex darling!" And with those words her face got hidden on his shoulder: for he had released her hands to fold his arms about her.

Thirty minutes of that sweet solitude, and then Phil and Margery entered the room.

"I may tell then!" murmured Rex. "Ahem! Mrs. Kershaw—that is to say, Phil: and Margery, too. I may call you that now, both of you, mayn't I? You see, Kershaw calls her Drusy; and it's the same thing, isn't it?"

"I suppose it is, as you say so," replied Phil, smiling, while Margery laughed outright, and gave Drusy's arm a loving squeeze. "But you don't explain exactly what—"

"Oh, but you understand all right: you needn't be so hard on a fellow. If you were a man you would know my head feels all in a whirl still, though we have been engaged for the last half-hour haven't we, Drusy?"

Drusy nodded, smiling happily.

"Well, all I can say is," returned Phil, "that if you didn't put things more clearly to Dru than you have just done to us, it does her great credit to have caught your meaning."

"Oh! she understood without any words at all—at least, she would have done so if I hadn't said any—wouldn't you, Drusy? Isn't somebody going to congratulate us? I'm dying to say 'thank you!'"

"I congratulate you with all my heart!" said Phil and Margery together: and Phil added, "If you are only as happy as Theo and I, you will think the world a lovely place."

By the time Rex had said enough 'thank-yous' to satisfy him for the moment, Theo and Stuart Fergusson joined them, and expressed warm approval when they heard the news.

Next morning's post brought, curiously enough, a letter from Miss Fraser, containing news of Reginald Warre. As a reflex of the writer's mind and character, part of the letter is worth giving—

"The most important person of this immediate neighbourhood, after myself, is Twist. I have had to take him to the dentist; and I desired the bill to be sent to Mr. Maver. If a grown man of his years chooses to be baby enough to suck toffee, that is no reason why he should tempt Twist to eat it, to the detriment of his teeth and comfort: the poor beastie was howling with toothache. There was a phonograph man in the town at the time, and by the expenditure of a spare coin or two I persuaded him to take down Twist's howls. Then I arranged with the people who live next door to Thomas Maver to give the man a night's lodging, and to let him sleep in a room adjoining Mr. Maver's bedroom. I became mischievously disposed for the time being, and begged the phonographist, or whatever he calls himself, to sit up for a couple of hours that night while he set his machine at my poor Twist's howling.

"I was told afterwards that Tom Maver caught a severe cold through opening his window and shying things at an invisible dog supposed to be situated in his front garden: next morning the servant picked up three pairs of boots, two hair-brushes, a cake of soap, and various books on the grass-plot under her master's window. I did not quite understand why he was so persuaded the animal was in the garden until Mr. Phonographer explained that he had ventured to exceed my wishes and place his invaluable machine outside his window. I felt so gratified at his entering thus fully into the joke that I begged his acceptance of a guinea in excess of the sum we had agreed on.

"Thomas Maver doesn't speak now when he meets me: I think he knows all. But he has paid the dentist's bill, and I fancy he won't waste any more pop-stuff on Twist.

"Scott is far too noble an animal to be house-companion to a creature so small minded as Clara Fagan: she pulled his tail the other day till he squeaked, just because she was in a fury with some human thing she dare not touch: so Scott, rightly resenting such behaviour, has come on a visit to Twist, who welcomes him with a hospitality that I rejoice to see.

"Animals done with, I may descend to man.

"Captain Warre has not by any means settled down yet. He appears by fits and starts, remaining only a few hours at a time; and those hours have been passed so much in the company of Amelia Foster's companion, that it is rumoured he is paying his addresses to her, and that she intends keeping them permanently. His father is still away.

"As for Amelia Foster, if she is not contemplating matrimony she is taking to flirt in her old age most disgracefully. George Harrison is there most days; and yesterday I saw a rocking-chair carried in—a sign that he intends to prolong his visits.

"Clara Fagan I have now little to do with. She has formed an unholy alliance with that vulgar Mrs. Pearson. They are always to be seen together.

"And now, my dear, when are you coming back? Long Reach looks mournful without you, and your old nurse is getting too fat for want of something to worry over. Miss Drusy had better catch a cold, or something, and come home to be nursed, or the poor soul will soon be unequal to mounting the stairs.

"Twist says he should like a walk. He and Scott desire their respects to you both.

"Your sincere friend,

"BETTY FRASER."

"What jolly letters she writes!" said Margery, after reading it out for Drusy's benefit. "I wonder if there is any truth in that report about Captain Warre and Miss — what was her name?"

"Paule," said Drusy. "I hope there is, and then I shall feel quite satisfied that—that he only wanted to please his father. I always thought it was that, and nothing more, you know, Margery."

"Well, time will show; I can't help sharing your hope. When are we to go home, Drusy? I suppose you won't be able to tear yourself away just yet!"

"We might stay another week, don't you think? Rex won't like my leaving in too much of a hurry. He will be here presently for some violin practice; he said he should take a holiday this morning."

He arrived as she finished speaking.

"What! not through breakfast, you lazy girls? Had mine nearly an hour ago. Fergusson wanted to be off early. There's voluminous correspondence!" as he caught sight of Miss Fraser's closely covered sheets.

"You can read it while we are finishing our breakfast," said Margery, tossing the letter across the table to him; "it will keep you quiet."

"I never had a sister," he observed, taking up the letter, "but I perceive one of her self-imposed duties is to snub her brothers. 'Betty Fraser,'" he continued, glancing at the signature: "that is one of the old ladies you speak of sometimes, I presume!"

"The one with the dog," explained Drusy.

Having had things thus far made clear to his comprehension, Rex began to read; but soon stopped to roar with laughter at the account of Miss Fraser's revenge on Mr. Maver.

"What a game old soul! She must be worth knowing."

"She is capable of doing some very comical things," said Margery; "but she is so kind-hearted you can't help liking her."

"The Major Foster of African repute is her brother, Rex; he was knighted for some particularly valorous deed. He is General Sir John Foster now."

"He her brother? Why, I know him—that is, I have met him; though I don't suppose he would remember my name."

He resumed his reading, not speaking again until he reached the end, though a queer look passed over his face once or twice.

"Did you notice the bit about your double?" asked Margery, as he returned the letter. "You see he appears to be contemplating matrimony also."

"Evidently. Do you know the young lady?"

"Very slightly. She was still a new importation when we left home. She is rather what Dr. Fergusson would describe as an Automatic Fashion-plate."

"Yes? Then she'll probably know how to spend her husband's money—when she gets one. That letter is quite a little peep into Winchmore life. I shall look forward to meeting Miss Fraser."

"She is far and away the best of the Fates, as she calls herself and the other two," said Drusy. "Mr. Maver's name is not so complimentary; he likens them to Macbeth's Witches. I remember asking him once where the likeness came in, and he said he always mixed up thunder, lightning, and rain in his mind with Macbeth's witches; and Miss Fraser answered to Thunder, Miss Foster to Lightning, and Miss Fagan to Rain, because her tears come at a moment's notice. Miss Foster, you know, looks colourless and spiritless, but she can be very terrible on occasion, while Miss Fraser, you can understand, is capable of being a bit stormy."

"Rather an interesting trio, certainly. But, Drusy, you are not going to hurry back?"

"We were talking of it just before you came. We shall stay another week, at least."

"Only a week? But what is there to take you back at all? Let me go down and fetch your old nurse and lock up the house!"

"What an idea! Why, there are heaps of things to go back for—aren't there, Margery? But we need not decide this moment. Let us have some music, Rex."

THE BEST SERMON.

THE sermon "dull—no eloquence"—"you'd heard it all before"!

You too, sir, found it "commonplace, the same thing o'er and o'er;

No rhetoric, the diction poor, of logic none at all"? And yet, methinks, the Truth spoke in each word that he let fall!

You wish you had for preachers "some more satisfying men—

The Reverend Mr. Sounding Brass—as fine with tongue as pen;

Or Mr. Tinkling Cymbal"? They are orators indeed!

Oh, yes! But would they satisfy so well our sorest need?

He at whose words you're carping has a heart of purest gold!

"Not eloquent"? His actions make his words of weight untold!

So hard to preach, yet louder speaks than books of sound advice,

His life of loving sacrifice—a sermon beyond price!

THE WONDER OF A BIRD'S NEST.

(GOD'S HAND IN THE BOOK OF NATURE.)

BY THE REV. B. G. JOHNS, M.A.

THE simple beauty of a bird's nest is a matter of such common talk, and one so well known to all who love to wander in the woods and fields, as to need no further comment. But though there are many who have by chance admired its beauty, yet out of these thousands few have noted as it deserved the wonder and mystery of the whole contrivance; the graceful skill shown in the structure, the art with which it is often concealed, and the patience with which it is always watched and guarded.

For, indeed, why should it so happen that one special class of God's creatures should be so gifted with taste and ingenuity, and what seems a true sense of beauty, that their handiwork would often tax the utmost labour of man to rival, far more to surpass? Or why, again, should birds build nests at all? Why not simply arrange a few chance sticks or leaves, in the hedgerow, and there leave the few dainty spotted eggs to be hatched, and the young brood to be brought up, fed, and nursed as they best may be? Many other creatures, indeed, provide for, and bring up, their young in this hasty fashion, as if utterly destitute of the wonderful instinct which guides the feathered race. And yet, out of all the thousands of birds who, in this and almost every other land, fill the summer air with songs of joy and love, there are scarcely any that do not build a tiny house and home for their young that has a beauty and completeness of its own.

Each one bird, too, builds after an exact type and fashion of her own; and to this she keeps with unflinching regularity. As a rule, also, the smaller and more insignificant birds are the very ones whose nests betray the greatest art and grace of construction.

But no one bird-builder ever copies her neighbour. No tiny wren sets to work at her dainty house after the fashion of the swallow; no chattering, busy starling imitates the blackbird or the thrush; no long-tailed tit forgets the traditions of her own family, or even dreams of a mossy house like that of the robin or the chaffinch.

Each, in fact, contrives and builds, and adorns her nest in that exact way which the wise and good God first taught to the feathered creatures of His hand. The beauty, the fashion, the perfection of the whole structure are from Him, the one source of all that gladdens the eyes, and wins the ear, and rejoices the heart of man, in the fair world that lies round about him.

This year, just as the time for pairing and nesting began, came the long and terrible drought which prevailed in one part of Hampshire for twelve weeks, and the poor birds had a hard time of it. Blue skies and blazing, unbroken sun-shine, and air of intense and sultry heat, day after day, and week after week, almost without a cloud, and absolutely without a drop of rain, though crowned with all the full splendour of summer, by degrees deprived them of every chance of food. Few flies or insects were to be found, and the ground at last was baked into a solid mass, out of which not a worm nor a beetle could make its way. Very few swallows appeared, and even these few vanished after but a short sojourn, to seek for food in some moister and more genial air, if it could be found. But the nightingales came as early and in as great numbers as ever; and, however scanty food might be, began practising their spring-tide love-songs with undiminished vigour. All day long, in the fierce, scorching heat, they sang with loud and happy voice, as if all were well, and would be well, though the grassy turf was burnt up into dusty brown, the leaves on the trees were withering away without strength to unfold, and far and wide by meadow, hedgerow, and wood, not a drop of water was to be had.

Long before April came to an end, the work of nesting had begun; and day after day, all down the avenue of green branches that lines the dusty turnpike road, hidden away in the thickest shade he could find, you could hear some happy bird singing to his mate busy down below in the thick tangle of bramble and wild rose and shaded grass, where the nest was to be. So many, in fact, were the nests in this one half-mile of wild hedgerow that, hard as it sometimes is to find a nightingale's nest, it was now an easy matter. So beautiful are the eggs, of rich olive brown, and so simply beautiful is the nest, that once seen they can be mistaken for no other. Come with me for a moment into the thick shade among the larches, and there hidden away among the tufts of grass and withered nettle—lies the dainty prize. The outer edge of the nest is mainly made up of the brown, withered leaves of last autumn, the inside being lined with softer and finer shreds that look like skeletons of the red bramble leaf, a morsel or two of wool, and a few strands of horsehair.

You might easily pass it by in the open hedgerow as a mere chance cluster of withered grass, or even here in the shade, were it not for a glimpse you may get of the soft grey and brown wings spread over the precious treasured eggs. Keep perfectly still, or creep out as softly as you made your way in, and the song of the joyful bird, keeping watch above, will go on as happily as ever.

Only a few hundred yards away from this very spot, outside the gate of the Vicarage, facing the high road, is a small letter-box, built into the wall, about a foot high, the slit in it for the admission of letters being five inches by one, and the floor about nine inches by six. Into this narrow space are dropped about a dozen letters and newspapers every day; and here, in this quiet retreat, a long-tailed tit has regularly built her nest for the last fourteen years, as spring-tide comes round again, and the woods wake up once more into active life. The same one bird cannot, of course, have built here all these years—at the most but two or three—but a tit of the same species, and I doubt not of the same family, has always chosen this odd little dark corner for her nursery—and is here now once more. What can have led bird after bird to make such a strange choice I cannot say; possibly some recollection of the old home, and the happy days of safety spent there. Be that as it may, the fact remains. Within easy reach, not fifty yards away, are at least a score of far more convenient spots for a safe and quiet lodging; but this year, again, in due season, the old letter-box was invaded, and preparation began for a new brood.

On the first day of April, 1893, in the very midst of the long drought, came the first sign that the work had begun. On opening the box, at 7 p.m., to put in a bundle of letters, I saw at the further right-hand corner of the little chamber a few tiny sprays of green moss, which there remained unadded to for about a week. Then, at odd intervals, day by day the little busy mother added a morsel of wool, a scrap of moss, a bit of withered, dry grass, a few threads of coloured worsted (pulled from an old piece of carpet thrown by chance on the dust-heap), a bunch of soft feathers, more green moss, and, last of all, to line the nest, some pieces of grey and white rabbits' fur—for which she must have searched far and wide through the wood.

The whole thing was as warm, dainty, and perfect a nursery as could be well devised: being about six inches in depth, and filling up a corner as remote as possible from the daily and perilous avalanche of letters through the tiny window in the opposite wall. Up to May 1st nothing was done but the gradual building-up of the quiet little house and home for the future tits. But, to-day, May 22nd, on which I write, the happy mother is quietly sitting in her dark corner, and with careful wings covering up the tiny white eggs, speckled with dots of rusty pink, in the snugest of all possible snug nests. If you are very careful and very quiet, you may unlock the box, and take a peep at the little bird—her long black tail stretching over the nest, and her bright black eyes eagerly on the watch against all intruders but the harmless sheets of paper which often surround her—and at times actually fall upon her outstretched wings.

When this latter catastrophe happens, she sometimes gets very angry, and more than once has so bitten and torn the envelope of a letter, that it had to be taken out and replaced; on two separate occasions, indeed, so great was her fear of injury to her precious eggs, and so fierce her anger, that the intrusive letter was actually seized on, and in some way or other cast headlong through the narrow slit out into the dusty road. There, luckily, it was picked up and restored to its place.

Still, however, in spite of all these difficulties, in spite of the darkness, and the heat, and the crowded space, there sits the patient nurse, intent only on obeying the instinct planted in her race by the Creator's wise ordering, and resolved to do her duty as a brave little affectionate mother. The long drought has now at last broken up. We have had a few refreshing showers, and in a week or two, when the young birds are hatched, there will be no lack of food of all kinds.

But, if there be hundreds of birds here in the green woods, thus intent on caring for their young with constant and unbroke affection, I am just now reminded, by the cry of a wandering cuckoo, of another feathered creature that seems utterly destitute of all such feeling and all such loving care. The whole character and appearance of this strange bird are full of mystery and apparent anomalies—i.e., features hard to be explained by any known law. It is difficult to understand how any bird of such strange habits ever came into existence among a race of creatures noted for habits, ways, and instincts which the cuckoo defies.

YOUNG CUCKOO IN HEDGE-SPARROW'S NEST.

NIGHTINGALES AND NEST.

In the first place, he is in colour and plumage far more like a hawk, and yet lives entirely on insects.

He cares little or nothing for his wife—no more than she does for her young; while his mate herself builds no nest, makes no provision for her offspring, but cunningly lays her egg in the nest of the harmless skylark, or tree-pippit, and there leaves it to take its chance amongst strangers, like some hapless foundling.

Strangest of all, the young cuckoo himself is born with a special contrivance in the structure of his back for ousting the young birds (among whom he finds himself) out of the family nest, of which he then takes entire possession. But no sooner is this effected than the poor foster-parents bestow all their time, love, and labour in caring for and bringing up the ungainly and greedy intruder, who is never weary of swallowing the abundant store of dainties provided for him.

Nothing can be a stranger or more touching sight than to watch a couple of kindly small birds—wag-tails, larks, or hedge-sparrows—entirely devoting themselves to the welfare of a surly stranger, twice their own size, on whom they lavish all the affectionate care which would have been otherwise spent on their own lost children.

Whatever, indeed, may be wanting in the cuckoo as to natural affection, here appears in the foster-parents with double strength. The instinct of loving, unselfish care planted in them by the hand of an all-wise Creator, cannot be destroyed or stayed, but must find vent in some kindly and instant object. If their own brood be gone, they will tend the outcast wandering intruder, so unlike themselves, and so widely separated from them by race, habits, and plumage. Let him be what he may, he is in need—his wants shall be supplied.

Some day, perhaps, wise men may discover more about the cuckoo and his strangely mysterious life and career. Meanwhile, let us be content with the words of an old writer, who, knowing nothing of science, says both wisely and well:—

“As for the poor, forlorn cuckoo—who shall explain the mystery and wonder of her strange ways? With the face and feathers of a hawk, she eateth no flesh; she layeth eggs, but buildeth no nest; and is without a home and without children—a mere vagrant, a wandering voice in the woods! He only Who made her knoweth why and what she is.”

THE BOY WITH THE LITTLE HEART.

A STORY WITH A MORAL FOR SMALL-HEARTED PEOPLE.

BY THE REV. JOHN TELFORD, B.A.

THERE was once a boy who was never happy unless he had his own way. When father or mother told him to do anything he did not like, an ugly “I won’t!” crept out of his lips, and a frown clouded his face.

No one liked him. His playmates found him selfish; his master could never get him to be obedient unless he was scolded or punished. People called him “the disobedient boy.” He scarcely ever did what was right, cheerfully, with a smile and a pleasant word. He was a puzzle and trouble at home and at school, among his playfellows, and wherever he went. His mother often wondered what she could do to make him better and happier. She heard her friends say—

“What will that boy do when he grows up?”

Nobody cares for him now, but he will become more selfish and unbearable by-and-by."

And this made his mother very sad.

One day when she was thinking about it, a veil seemed to drop, and she looked right into her little boy's heart. She saw a tiny chamber quite filled up by a discontented boy, crying, "I want this," "I like that."

She had heard those words till she was weary, but now she knew that her child's heart was full of self. There was no room in it for father or mother or friends. He never thought he would like to please them, but just lived for himself.

It was a bitter thing for that loving mother to see inside her boy's heart. But she knew God could help her, and she asked Him to make the child's heart bigger and let her creep inside.

That evening he was very troublesome. "I won't!" "I won't!"—she counted it more than twenty times; every time she heard it she seemed to get a glimpse into the selfish little heart, but she prayed for patience and went quietly on.

When bed-time came she tucked him snugly in and knelt at his side. The sharp little eyes saw tears trickling down the cheeks, and noticed how tired and sad mother looked. The Father in heaven was answering prayer.

As the mother knelt by his bed, the little boy seemed to look right into her heart. He saw himself there, saw his father there, learned what all the kindly deeds and words of the past meant. He understood how much he was grieving her who loved him, and began to feel ashamed of his cross and selfish ways.

Just then he fell asleep. In his dreams he heard an angel ask: "Shall I show you your heart?"

The little boy was rather frightened, but replied that he would like to see it.

As he began to see how little room there was in it for anyone beside himself, a blush covered his face. He ventured to ask whether there was no medicine for the heart. His mother had been reading to him about the chief Sekomi, who sat in Livingstone's hut one day absorbed in thought.

At length in pompous tones he said to the missionary—

"I wish you would change my heart. Give me medicine to change it; for it is proud, proud and angry—angry always."

Livingstone picked up his New Testament and was about to tell the chief how it might be cured, when Sekomi interrupted—

"Nay, I wish to have it changed by medicine—to drink, and have it changed at once; for it is always very proud and very uneasy, and continually angry with someone."

He would not wait to hear of the remedy, but rose and left the hut.

That story seemed running in the little fellow's mind as he dreamed. The angel told him that the medicine for his heart was love—love that would make room there for others as well as himself. The boy offered a little prayer and dreamed that the old evil tempers vanished from his heart.

It was the beginning of better days. Every morning the little fellow wondered how he could bring a smile to his mother's face. He thought about her far more than about himself, and kept back the angry look or impatient word, so that his home became the happiest in all the town.

But his heart was not big enough yet. He had a Bible of his own which he prized very much. One evening he picked it up and read that verse—

"God so loved the world, that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

Whilst he stopped to read it again, a veil seemed to fall from his face, and he looked right into the heart of God. He saw how much our Father in heaven loved him, and began to think what he could do to please Him. He fell down on his knees asking for a blessing. It was a far richer blessing than he dreamed of getting, for God opened the door and came into that boy's heart.

As days went by, his heart became bigger still, and all the world crept in. He had a smile for everyone. He never seemed tired of saying a kind word or lending a helping hand. People called him the boy who went about doing good.

As he grew older the love in his heart made him long to be a missionary. He sailed far away to live among savages, where there was no white man near. But the love in his heart covered him like a shield. Angry passions died away wherever the friend of the poor and sinful and helpless came. He taught the savages about Christ, and won their hearts for Him, so that the whole tribe among whom he laboured learned to live holy lives. Then he "fell asleep," and went home to see his Saviour.

This is a parable for boys and girls; but how many true stories might be made to illustrate it? If you will read the Life of David Livingstone, you will find how his heart was enlarged as Robert Moffat told him about Africa, and will see how he lived and died for that Dark Continent.

"I am a missionary," he said, "heart and soul. God had an only Son, and He was a missionary and physician. A poor, poor imitation of Him I am, or wish to be. In this service I hope to live, in it I wish to die."

David Livingstone's great heart still seems to beat with love as we stand in Westminster Abbey and read those words he wrote from Africa a year before he died—

"All I can add in my loneliness is, May Heaven's rich blessing come down on everyone—American, English, or Turk—who will help to heal the open sore of the world."

May God enlarge our hearts that we may run in the way of His commandments, because love for Him and all the world is continually prompting us to do good.

CHAPTER I.

A HAPPY HOME.

THE Ambrusters' home was situated next door to the Felwich Bank, in the High Street of the little town.

The Ambrusters had not a large income, John being only a clerk in some neighbouring cotton-mills, but they shared a wealth of contentment. Four little mouths had to be fed out of the income, and Jackie, Milly, Nelly, and Tom were children with healthy lungs and appetites. Sometimes the young men working at their desks in the bank next door would hear peals of baby laughter, crows, and screams of merriment; then they would look at each other and laugh too—for laughter is very contagious—saying, "Those little beggars, the Ambrusters, are at it again! What a pandemonium!" When they went home they would often pause by the gate of the villa to exchange "Good-nights" with the golden-haired children who were romping on the lawn, and Jackie, the eldest, would ask triumphantly, "Didn't we make a noise to-day, just?"

The Ambrusters themselves thought that noise the sweetest of all possible music.

One morning in May, Helen, Mrs. Ambruster, was bustling about her household occupations as usual, when the little maid-servant announced that two gentlemen had called to see Mr. Ambruster.

"I told them he wouldn't be home until half-past twelve, ma'am, and they seemed dreadfully disappointed. One of them said something about 'having come such a long way, and all for nothing'; so I asked them into the parlour, and came up to tell you."

Helen was mounted on some steps, engaged in tidying out her linen cupboard. She looked thoughtfully down at the puzzled face of the little maid.

"You did quite right, Jane. I will come and speak to the gentlemen myself. By-the-bye, do they look like gentlemen?"

"Oh, yes, ma'am; they're dressed most respectable, and one of them's got a long white beard."

Helen smiled. She only paused to smooth back some ruffled curls of her pretty fair hair from her forehead, then ran down-stairs as lightly as a girl (indeed, she was only twenty-six), and entered the parlour to question the strangers as to their business with her husband.

The two men were standing by the window; the younger might have been the confidential secretary or clerk of the one with the long white beard. It was the latter who turned to greet Helen.

She noticed that he had a most benevolent expression and very pronounced features.

"My husband will be home again for lunch," she said, in her brisk clear voice. "Could you call again—in the evening you would be sure to find him—if your business is of importance?"

"It is of the greatest possible importance, being connected with—er—a valuable patent."

"We have come from the other end of England," put in the young man impatiently, "so we cannot call in again at Mr. Ambruster's convenience."

"Why not go down to the mills and see him there?" Helen asked.

"We do not wish our proposal respecting the patent to reach the ears of the mill proprietors just at once," said the elderly gentleman. "It is most unfortunate—most unfortunate! We are obliged to take the twelve-fifty train from Felwich."

"Then, will you wait? My husband is always punctual, he is sure to be home by half-past twelve; and you would have plenty of time to—discuss business and yet to catch your train."

"If Mr. Ambruster is late we shall have lost our morning for nothing," said the young man surlily. "Well, do as you please, Ardern."

His companion turned to Helen with a smile of gratitude.

"You are really most kind. We shall not inconvenience you by remaining?"

"Not in the least. I am sorry you should have two hours to wait; but there is the morning paper, and you will find some books on the table. I will let you know directly my husband returns."

Helen went back to her work, then dusted the china in the rarely used bijou drawing-room, and finally went up-stairs to the nursery to give her children their morning lessons.

Some time later Jane reappeared.

"If you please, ma'am, it is half-past twelve by the parlour clock, and the gentlemen say they can't wait any longer."

"So late! Well, they must go, then. Tell them how sorry I am they should have been disappointed."

"John is never late, as a rule; I wonder what can have happened?" thought the little woman as she put away the school-books and released the weary children.

When John returned, she told him about the strangers, and he laughed.

"My dear Nell, they only wanted to persuade me to help them sell some wretched patent to my employers, I expect. And they made quite a mistake, for I am rather early to-day. Oh, I see—your clock is half an hour fast!"

"How vexing!" cried Helen. "I should like them to have seen you, dear, for they had come from the other end of England on purpose."

"I didn't know my fame extended so far," laughed John. "Never mind, Nell; don't worry over them; I daresay they were far from honest. I often have people of the kind looking me up at the office."

"The patent wouldn't have been something you could really have made some money out of, John?"

She made the inquiry timidly, because she hated to hurt John's feelings, and she knew it would remind him of some debts which were their great trouble: debts which had been contracted in earlier times, when future repayment had seemed to offer no difficulties. Of late business had declined, and John's savings invested in the Mill Company had not brought in the income expected of them. To pay the interest on the debts was as much as he could do now.

The smile faded from his face as he answered—

"The patent was probably worthless, dear heart!—And don't drag the skeleton out of our cupboard so often; it will be bad enough when it stalks out of its own accord!"

"What will you do then, John?"

"If nothing else turns up, we shall have to sell the villa and go into lodgings."

Helen's eyes filled with tears, but she was too brave to let John see them. It was only to her young sister, that evening, that she poured out the tale of her sorrow.

Jenny Milbourne was as pretty as Mrs. Ambruster, but of a more delicate style of beauty. Both had flaxen hair and grey dark-lashed eyes, but Helen's cheeks were rosy, while Jenny's were pale.

"The dear little home!" cried the younger, stroking her sister's hand; "no wonder you can't bear the thought of leaving it. Has John asked Ralph's advice!—Ralph is so clever!"

Ralph Scott, secretary to Mr. Soames, the manager of Felwich Bank, was Jenny's accepted lover. He was a fine, handsome, honourable young fellow, but only the girl's love could have led her to suggest his capability of assisting John Ambruster in his difficulties.

Helen wiped away her tears resolutely, and kissed her sister.

"We won't think about the trouble till it comes," she said: "that was John's advice to me only this morning. He says that something may turn up to save us from it."

Jane put her head in at the door at this instant.

"Please, ma'am. I can't fasten the parlour window, for the hasp's broke right off."

"Dear, dear!" exclaimed Helen; "nothing but breakages! Well, Jane, it shall be repaired to-morrow, and we must hope no robbers will take advantage of the opportunity to-night. If they did get in, they wouldn't find many valuables to steal," she added.

"Except the dear children!" suggested Jenny.

Helen's thoughts were effectually diverted from troubles.

"The darlings! They are indeed worth their weight in gold!" she murmured.

CHAPTER II.

PARTED.

"WHAT a miserable wet day!" said Helen next morning, as she stood by the window, looking out.

John was finishing his breakfast before going away. He had to take train to London, having business to transact in the City.

Helen's glance was straying over a not very cheerful prospect, for, the room being a back one, the view from the window was composed of roofs and chimney-stacks, and dead walls belonging to the smaller houses of the country town; one or two tree-tops appeared among these, but nothing to suggest green lanes and flowery fields.

"It is dreary," John assented. "Not as bright a month of May as one we can remember, when I first paid court to a golden-haired little girl who worked most assiduously in her father's garden. Do you recollect how vexed I used to be when I saw your tiny hands struggling with great spades, and hoes, and rakes, eh, Nell? And what a lecture you gave me one day on the value of industry!"

"Yes; I called you a great lazy fellow, didn't I, John?"

"Muvver, is papa a great lazy fellow?" asked a little voice from under the table. Jackie's cherub-like countenance appeared at the same instant from among the folds of the white cloth.

Helen drew the boy out, sat down on the couch, and lifted him on her knee.

"No, my pet; of course he isn't!" she answered emphatically. "He's a great, industrious, courageous, patient, kind, gentle-hearted man. And we love him dearly, you and I, don't we?"

"Yes, dreadfully much!" was the decisive reply.

The family group was a happy one, John and Helen smiling into each other's eyes, and the child blissfully enthroned on "Muvver's" knee, stroking her cheek with his little fat hands.

Peace seemed to reign in the home, yet at that very instant Sorrow crossed the threshold.

"What is that noise down-stairs? I hear voices," said John, pausing in his meal to listen.

"Perhaps those two strangers have come back about the patent."

"Pwaps it's Mr. Scott," suggested Jackie. "Only, if it is, he'll be howwably disappointed 'cause Auntie Jenny's not here!"

Mother and father laughed at this; and Jane's face, wearing an expression of dismay, was thrust through the doorway.

"Oh, ma'am! oh, sir! they will come up, though I've told them it must be a mistake; an' they've found where the hole was made in the parlour wall, an' they're going——"

"Let me explain, Mrs. Ambruster," said an elderly gentleman, stepping forward—Helen recognised Mr. Soames, the manager of the bank next door. "We act upon authority; and though I regret the necessity of arresting Mr. Ambruster——"

"Arrest John?"

The little woman moved across the room, and stood between the policemen, Mr. Soames, and her husband.

Her eyes, so mild as a rule, were sparkling now with indignation, her hands were clasped together over her throbbing heart.

"How dare you speak even of arresting John?"

"Muvver—Papa—send away the wicked bad men!" cried Jackie, turning from one to the other. But, for the first time in her life, Helen was deaf to her child's cry.

John recovered his equanimity more quickly than did his wife, and rising from his chair, approached Mr. Soames, whom he knew slightly.

"This is some mistake, but I recognise that it is no fault of yours. You speak of arresting me. May I ask with what crime I am charged?"

The frankness of his face, the dignity of his bearing, impressed everyone present. John waived back the officer who presented his warrant, and waited for Mr. Soames' reply.

"I will state the matter as plainly as possible, assuming that you know nothing of it. Last night one thousand pounds in gold was stolen from a small safe in the bank, and examination shows that the thief or thieves obtained entrance by making an aperture in the wall of your parlour, behind a heavy book-case. My men have searched the room in question, and, as they will tell you, have found the empty gold bags and a missing cash-box secreted up the chimney."

"But I know nothing of this!" cried John. "Had I wished to commit a burglary—and my character will prove the improbability of such an event—should I have acted so clumsily? How could I have hoped to escape detection? The charge is preposterous!"

"Stay a minute, and reflect," said Mr. Soames. "You will find that the charge is not without fact as a background. You were about to leave Felwich, Mr. Ambruster!"

"I was; but not for purposes of flight."

"I am dealing with facts only. You sent your servant early this morning to summon to the house a builder and carpenter of the name of Jones—a man who is greatly indebted to you—whom you have helped ever since his release from prison, six weeks ago."

"You mean to insinuate that I wished Jones to repair the wall secretly, before the robbery was discovered?"

"I insinuate nothing. Thirdly, you are seriously involved in debt, Mr. Ambruster."

"Let me speak!" cried Helen. "Only yesterday my husband told me that he might have to sell this house if he could meet his liabilities in no other way. Would he have said that if he had meditated stealing money?" There was a scornful ring in her voice, though it trembled. "The carpenter was sent for to repair the fastening of the window, which is broken. Two strangers came here yesterday to see Mr. Ambruster about some patent, and they stayed two hours in the parlour; may they not have broken the window-hasp on purpose, in order to effect an entrance in the night for the purpose of breaking through the wall into the bank?"

"These are questions which can only be answered by a public trial," said the manager. "Two gentlemen came to me yesterday about a patent, and went besides to several friends of mine in different parts of the town; there seems no possible reason to connect those strangers with this robbery. We can find no sign to suggest that any person entered your house from without during darkness; the ground of the garden is absolutely free from footmarks. I regret annoying you, my dear madam, but my duty compels

John took his wife tenderly in his arms, and gazed proudly into her pale face.

"My love, my dear brave Nell, keep up your heart while I'm away. God knows I am innocent; He will take care of me."

"Shall we ever prove your innocence? Oh, John, John, we have been so happy here! That it should have come to this!"

"Nell, you will keep on hoping, even when things look worst, for the children's sake!"

"I will try, dear," sobbed the little woman.

"I see a man: I'll take care of muvver!"

John kissed his child, then bent his lips solemnly to his wife's cheek.

"Good-bye, Nell. God keep you!"

She scarcely realised that he was gone until she heard the door of the villa close, and felt Jackie's fingers pulling her hands from before her tear-blinded eyes.

"Muvver, don't cry. You've got me, you know; and papa will come home again soon, I know, 'cause he never stays away long from us, does he?"

"Let me explain, Mrs. Ambruster!"—p. 115.

me to see that John Ambruster is taken into the keeping of the law."

"Will you leave us alone one minute?" asked Helen, choking back a sob which would rise rebelliously in her throat.

Mr. Soames stepped outside the door, and the policemen moved into the window alcove, looking away from the interior of the room.

CHAPTER III.

RECOGNITION.

Two young people were strolling together by the bank of the Fell, the rapid river which winds almost round the little town of Felwich, and whose waters gurgle melodiously among tall bulrushes and pink arrow-head, beneath the drooping branches of fair silver willows.

The man and girl walked some way in silence, the shadow of sorrow on their faces telling of the sympathy existing between them—telling also that their last words had been saddening ones. He was so much taller than his companion that she could not see his expression unless she threw her head right back and gazed upwards—and this she did as with mutual impulse they paused beside a bridge that crossed the river. The sunshine played upon her upturned face and glistened in the gold of her hair.

She was Jenny Milbourne, and the man was her betrothed, Ralph Scott.

"It is no use deceiving ourselves with false hopes, Jenny. It is a year now since poor Ambruster was sentenced, and what good has come of waiting? If you had married me then, as I begged you to do, we might have persuaded your sister to leave Felwich. I am not so much attached to my post in the bank that you need have hesitated to accept my offer, and I could easily find work elsewhere. Since Mr. Soames behaved so badly to Ambruster, I have hated taking his money."

"You have no concern with him as a private individual—you are merely secretary to a bank manager. Ralph, I cannot leave my sister, neither can I let you share our disgrace."

There was a may-tree growing by the bridge, and the young man ruthlessly stripped it of its sweet white flowers: his nervous hands scarcely knew what they were doing, for in his mind was the bitter knowledge that he had mistaken the promise the future had seemed to offer him. He had planned how he would overcome Jenny's scruples, and persuade her to leave Felwich, where her brother-in-law's disgrace was matter of common talk; he had pictured a happy home to himself, where she would learn to lose the half proud, half-humbled, wholly-pained look which her eyes had worn since John Ambruster's imprisonment. Now he had pleaded, and her answer was always the same: "I will not leave my sister, neither will I let you share our disgrace."

"Oh, Ralph, don't think me hard."—p. 118.

It was hard upon him; yet Jenny felt that she was doing no more than her duty. The love of the two sisters had been great since their childhood, and now Helen had need of all Jenny's fond sympathy and encouragement.

She had moved from the old home, the villa having been sold to pay John's debts, and was living now in lodgings with her children; and the young aunt helped her to train Jackie, Milly, Nelly, and Tom in the love of the God who was the mother's best Comforter.

This May-time, verging upon June, young Scott had pressed his suit constantly, and it was with the intention of giving him a final answer that Jenny had come out with him into the peace of the open fields, where there was no murmur of human voices or gaze of human eyes, only the song of the Fell, and the innocent faces of the summer flowers.

The girl's heart was full of sorrow, but her courage did not fail her.

"You speak too confidently of finding work elsewhere, Ralph. From your present position you may rise to be a partner even in the bank, but if you go where you are not known you lose all you have gained. I cannot spoil your prospects."

"What is my fate to be, then, Jenny? To win wealth and lose you? Then I shall be poor indeed!"

There was love in his eyes as they met hers, and she laid her hands supplicatingly upon his arm.

"Oh, Ralph, don't think me hard, unfeeling! I am unhappy too, but I dare not yield. How could we build our happiness on the misery of others? If you can wait for me—when John comes home I can leave Helen: not till then; though I shall still bring shame upon the man who marries me!"

"No, no, dear; even if John were guilty, it would be no fault of yours."

"But it is not fair that you should be bound by a promise; you ought—"

"Jenny! Jenny!" he cried quickly, "don't speak as though I could ever part from you. We are bound by the love we share, more than by any word or vow. No time, no trouble, can be strong enough to snap that tie, my darling."

So Jenny no longer tried to shake his constancy, nor thought it her duty to give him back the engagement-ring which shone upon her finger.

She thought, as she went home, how much heavier the trial would have been had she been less sure of her lover's fidelity, and while she thanked God for this, she realised yet more keenly how terrible was the sorrow of her sister. John would return some day—that was true—but with a blight upon his whole life, a stain upon his character. Would he ever be proved innocent of the crime for which he was paying the penalty? To hope so seemed too sanguine.

That evening she told Helen of her talk with Ralph, and the two women tried to comfort one another.

Little Mrs. Ambruster seemed to have aged many years, though only one had elapsed since her husband's trial. Even Jackie noticed the change in her, and asked, with childish vexation, why "Muvver look so dweadfully tired" now? and "why she didn't sing any more pwetty songs?"

"Mother will be happier when papa comes back," Jenny used to answer, in a whisper.

Next day an event occurred: an event of great importance. Helen was out walking in the town, when, as she passed her old home, she saw two gentlemen come from it. The villa had been to let for some time, and now the bills were being taken from the windows.

As the two men came along the narrow pavement behind her she heard them discussing the terms upon which they had taken the house, and a slight intonation in the voice of the elder sent a thrill of excitement through her. She had heard the tones before, and she had good reason to remember the occasion.

Entering a shop door, she turned, and eagerly scrutinised the men as they passed her by unconsciously; one was clean-shaven, but she recognised the pronounced features. He was the elder stranger who had called to see her husband about a patent on the day preceding the robbery at Felwich Bank. The young man with him was unknown to her.

For some seconds the little woman's heart beat tumultuously fast, and her brain refused to do its work, but she recovered herself quickly, and thought clearly upon the subject of the discovery she had made.

Was this merely a coincidence? Was the man innocent of all she suspected? Yet, why was he beardless now? Why had he taken the villa?

Suspicion mastered her mind, and she acted upon the belief that here was indeed the man for whose fault John was imprisoned. She sought out Ralph Scott—it was the dinner-hour at the bank—and persuaded him to come for a walk with her; and then, in the solitude of open country, she appealed to him to aid her.

CHAPTER IV.

A WIFE'S WISDOM.

"I KNEW you wouldn't refuse me. I believe you would consent for my sake; and there is Jenny to be considered."

The young man's gentle, respectful sympathy had long ago found its way to little Mrs. Ambruster's heart. He pressed her hand as they parted to-day, while the clock from the Town Hall struck two.

"Thank you for trusting me. A man who would refuse your request would be a mere brute. But, dear Mrs. Ambruster, don't let yourself hope too much. You know that a clever lawyer failed to find the least proof against this man before, and the fact that he has taken the house may mean nothing."

Helen closed her lips firmly.

"I will remember your caution; and you will let me know all you do? I suppose the new-comers will not take possession until midsummer?"

"You shall know everything," said young Scott reassuringly.

It was now the first of June. The twenty-four days passed as slowly as days do for the end of which a woman longs. Helen's hopes and doubts kept up a continued struggle for supremacy over her; sometimes the one triumphed, sometimes the other.

She did not confide her secret to Jenny, and Ralph also abstained from doing so, for neither of them wished to subject the young girl to a possible disappointment.

Ralph hoped less often than did Mrs. Ambruster. He knew that justice does not always appear to be achieved by events as mortals view them; while the wife wondered every hour of every day how it was possible that her John's honesty should remain unproved: how it was that every man, woman, and child did not cry out, as her own heart did, against the great injustice which, in this case, had been perpetrated.

But at last midsummer came, with its glory of perfect luxuriance; flowers were lavish of their perfume, only the balmiest of winds ruffled the rich foliage of the trees; there was a wonderful atmosphere of satisfaction about the whole warmed world. It was a time when Hope seemed natural; and Helen, forswearing discretion and Ralph's warning, let herself rejoice in the happiness which she felt must be coming.

Even young Scott's prudent scepticism as to the result of his exertions in Mrs. Ambruster's cause was shaken somewhat when he heard that the villa had been taken by a gentleman—a widower with an only son, of the name of Calmour. If Helen was right, and this was indeed the same man whom she had heard addressed as "Ardern" only a year ago, the change of name would tell greatly against the assumption of his innocence.

On midsummer day the new tenants moved into the villa, which had been furnished, under their orders, by the local tradesman. Ralph, through the bank windows, watched their coming.

That night Mrs. Ambruster amazed Jenny by her unusual gaiety.

"Nell darling, I haven't seen you like this since—since our poor John went away!" cried the girl, startled into speaking upon the usually forbidden subject of the sorrow which neither forgot for a moment.

Helen kissed Jenny's pale wondering face, and cried over her a little—not tears of absolute grief this time.

"Deary, we may have John home again soon, with his character cleared for ever from the stain bad men have dared to cast upon it! My poor, brave, noble John! I feel certain that God will not let him suffer much longer. Help me to pray, darling, and He who is all-merciful will surely listen!"

Mrs. Ambruster could not rest that night. She sat alone in the dark, and waited in trembling eagerness for morning; as dawn broke she crept softly into the nursery, and bent above each of her sleeping children.

How peaceful they looked—Milly especially, and little Nell.

Passing into an inner room, the mother found a pair of round blue eyes watching her. Jack stretched out a beckoning hand at once.

"Muvver, I thought it was you cweeping about," he whispered, rubbing a rough head of golden curls against her encircling arm; "an' I knew you wouln't go away without comin' in to me. Has anythin' wunnerful happened? You do look so—so—nice again!"

She laughed softly, and laid the little head back on the pillow.

"Go to sleep, my boy; it isn't time yet for young eyes to be open: even the birdies are still asleep; only before sleeping say just two little prayers, dear—one for mother, and one for papa—poor papa, who has to stop away, but who loves us all so dearly!"

Little Mrs. Ambruster went back to her own room, and, pulling aside the corner of the blind, sat by the open window, looking out into the street. There was a smile on her face such as it had not worn for months.

Gradually the town began to awaken with the sunrise; smoke rose from cottage chimneys, and men passed down the street on their way to their work in the country.

One quick step stopped before Mrs. Ambruster's window, and recognising it, she looked out, showing her face in the early rosy light.

"Ralph, I knew you would come——"

Her faltering voice could not speak the question she longed to ask, but the young fellow answered it.

"All's well!" he cried—"you were right. There was an attempted robbery at one o'clock this morning, but we've secured the thieves. Ambruster is cleared—at last!"

"So it was you who set Scott to watch all night in the bank—you who recognised the man! Oh, Nell, what a lot I owe to my wife's wisdom!"

"No, dear; for if Ardern had escaped, people would still have known that you were not to blame for the first robbery. But yet I like to think that God helped me to make your innocence undoubted. The confession of the thief is the very kind of justification I would have chosen for you."

For John Ambruster was home again, the hero of the hour in his native town, the possessor of all the neighbours' goodwill. He could choose now what position he would occupy for the future, for many were the posts and situations which were offered to him. His return had been publicly celebrated, yet the welcome which was dearest to him was expressed in Helen's radiant smiles, and in the clamorous rejoicing of his children.

"Papa's comed home for evver an evver!" cried Jackie, in his shrillest of blithe tones; "and muvver will always look nice an' happy, an' never cwy again about anythin'!"

"John and Helen, I want to tell you some news!"

Jenny was the speaker; she had stolen into the cheery parlour of the villa to which the Ambrusters had returned, and was leaning over the low sofa where Jackie was seated between his parents.

"Ah, Jenny? the news is not novel, is it?"

"No," laughed the girl, blushing at the same time; "but I think it will come true at last."

"She means that Mr. Scott is goin' to be my uncle!" explained Jackie sagely.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

DECEMBER 17. THE GLORIFIED SAVIOUR.

To read—Rev. i. 9—20. Golden Text—Phil. ii. 9.

INTRODUCTION. This book was written by St. John, the Apostle and Evangelist, in the Island of Patmos, where he had been banished by the Roman Emperor Domitian about the year 96 A.D. At the beginning there is a description of the glorious manifestation of Christ, and His message to the Seven Churches of Asia Minor.

I. THE MESSENGER. (9, 10.) Who was he? John, the beloved disciple, Bishop of Ephesus. A brother to all Christians in tribulation. A sharer in Christ's sufferings and patience. An exile in banishment in lonely Patmos. A sufferer for witnessing to Jesus and His word. A hearer of voices of spirits in heaven. A witness of visions of another world. Was in an ecstasy, or trance, on the Lord's day. As was Ezekiel when he saw Visions of God. (Ezek. i. 1.)

II. THE VISION. (11—16.) The voice.

Alpha and Omega—first and last letters of the Greek Alphabet—i.e., the beginning and end—the Everlasting One.

The appearance. (a) Seven golden candlesticks. Remind of the seven lights of the Temple. (Ex. xxv. 37.)

These represent seven churches of Asia Minor.

Christ is with them to keep their light alive.

(b) The Son of man. Long garment as of a priest. (Lev. xvi. 4.)

Golden girdle as worn by kings and priests.

Head and hair white and bright—mark of purity.

Eyes like fire—piercing sight—noticing sin.

Feet like brass—shining with glory.

Voice like much water—loud in judgment.

Seven stars—angels (or ministers) of churches.

Two-edged sword. Word of God to pierce the heart (Heb. iv. 12) and avenge His servants' wrongs.

Face like sun—utmost possible brilliancy.

All this together marks character and work of Christ.

His Person—holy, pure, and glorious.

His office—as Priest to atone and plead for men.

As Judge to condemn wicked, vindicate just.

III. THE MISSION. (17—20.) Given by Christ.

He has conquered death and the grave.

He has power over Paradise (Hell or Hades).

Shown by His promising entrance to the thief on the cross. (St. Luke xxiii. 43.)

He rules supreme over death.

Shown by His own rising from the dead.

St. John must write all he is shown, and send it to the angels of the Churches—the appointed rulers.

LESSONS. Christ is God—believe in Him.

Christ is Priest—go to Him for help.

Christ is Judge—prepare to meet Him

Christ is Saviour—flee to Him.

DECEMBER 24TH. THE BIRTH OF JESUS CHRIST.

To read—St. Matt. i. 1—11. Golden Text—St. Matt. i. 21.

INTRODUCTION. To-day's lesson deals with the visit of the Wise Men from the East to the Infant Saviour. His actual birth is told in the first chapter of this Gospel, and more fully in St. Luke ii. 1—20.

I. CHRIST SOUGHT. (1—8.) Notice :—

The place of Christ's birth. Bethlehem in Judaea.

A small village, six miles south of Jerusalem.

As prophesied by Micah 400 years before.

The time. Herod the Great was king—now old.

Had issued decrees for a universal census.

Each family to go to their own city. (St. Luke ii. 3.)

The visitors. Wise Men from East, probably Persia.

Noted for their knowledge of astronomy.

Had noticed a bright and unusual constellation.

Perhaps knew of Balaam's prophecy of a star (Num. xxiv. 17), and of Daniel's prophecies while in Babylon. (Dan. ix. 26, etc.)

Came to Jerusalem—the royal city of Judah

Expected to find a great king of the Jews.

Desired to pay Him honour, homage, worship.

The king. Herod troubled at hearing of rival king.

Summons priests and scribes learned in law.

Demands where expected Messiah is to be born.

The Scriptures tell in plain words. (Micah v. 2.)

Sends Wise Men on to Bethlehem to see.

Promises himself to follow and worship.

II. CHRIST FOUND. (9—11.) The star shows the place—stands over the house.

The Wise Men rejoice with exceeding joy.

They enter the house and see the Child.

They fall down in worship, and offer Him gifts.

Gold—as to a royal king.

Incense—as to a Divine God.

Myrrh—as to a suffering man.

LESSONS. The Wise Men teach—

1. Earnestness. In their search after Christ.

They faced long journey, unknown dangers.

They persevered till they found Him.

2. Faith. They believed in God's call.

They believed this babe to be the Divine King.

Their faith was shown by their works.

3. Devotion. They adored the infant Christ.

They gave homage to Him as to God.
 They gave offerings of their best.
 All true religion must include two things :—
Contemplation—i.e., faith, reverence, devotion.
Action. (a) Living—according to belief.
 (b) Giving—according to means.
 (c) Working—according to opportunity.
 How is it with us ?

DECEMBER 31ST. REVIEW.

Golden Text—Rev. xxi. 21.

HAVE had twelve lessons from the Epistles having reference to the work of Christ in the hearts of men. Golden text sums up all in the word "grace." Several meanings to the word, partly referring to God's free gifts to man of pardon and love, and partly to the effect of those gifts in man's heart disposing him to good works. Can sum up all the lessons under two heads, viz., God's grace given, and God's grace working.

I. GOD'S GRACE GIVEN. 1. Full of power. (Rom. i. 8—17.)

Seen in turning men's hearts to Him.
 St. Paul changed from persecutor to preacher.
 Romans turned from idols to serve true God.
 Same effects seen in all who believe.

LESSON. By grace ye are saved through faith.

2. Redemption. (Rom. iii. 19—26.)

Law unable to save.

Can only forbid sin and punish sinners.

Christ by his death wrought atonement for sin.

Grace makes man believe in Christ and be saved.

Is God's free gift to all who accept it.

LESSON. Blessed is the man to whom the Lord doth not impute sin.

3. Justification by faith. (Rom. v. 1—11.)

Its results seen in man's heart and life.
 Peace established between man and God.
 Joy notwithstanding all trials of life.
 Patience to bear whatever befalls.
 Hope for time and eternity.

LESSON. Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace.

II. GOD'S GRACE WORKING. 1. In the life. (Rom. xii. 1—15.)

Each gives himself, a living sacrifice.

As member of Christ's body has duties to others.

Love, alms-giving, sympathy, teaching, etc.

2. In self-denial. (1 Cor. viii.) In things lawful.

Give up anything likely to lead others to sin, for even Christ pleased not Himself.

3. In liberality. (2 Cor. viii. 1—12.) How to give.

Willingly, liberally, voluntarily.

But above all, first give selves to God.

Highest example to be seen in Christ.

LESSON. Freely ye have received, freely give.

4. In imitation of Christ. (Ephes. iv. 20—32.)

Christians new creatures in Jesus Christ.

Put away old habits of theft, lying, anger, etc

Have new hearts—desires given by Holy Spirit.

5. In the home. (Col. iii. 12—25.) Christ-like.

Christian virtues must be cultivated.

All members of household must share.

6. In the world. (James i. 16—27.) Hear God's voice.

Be doers of His word—show true religion by words and works of kindness.

RESULT. Heavenly inheritance. (1 Pet. i. 1—12.)

Reserved for all in whom grace has worked.

LESSON. Walk worthy of your Christian calling.

NEW SERIES FROM THE OLD TESTAMENT.

JANUARY 7TH, 1894. THE FIRST ADAM.

To read—Gen. i. 26—ii. 3. Golden Text—Gen. i. 27.

INTRODUCTION. New course of lessons for New Year. Go back to first chapters of Bible—telling of beginnings of things. What are some of these? Beginning of the world—light, air, animals, food, sea, fishes, man; also of sin, punishment, mercy. To-day's lesson tells of man, his creation, nature, etc.

I. MAN'S CREATION. (26, 27.) Notice :—

1. How made. By the word of God.

"Let us make"—showing more than One Person.

"In Our image." Of what does this consist?

His soul immortal—germ of everlasting life.

His nature holy, pure, and innocent.

His mind endowed with reason, will, etc.

His body perfect in all its parts and actions.

2. Man the best. See gradual order of creation.

Chaos gives place to regular formation.

Earth, seas, air take shapes and boundaries.

Vegetable life given to herbs and plants.

Animals, domestic and wild, breathe and move.

But man has life, reason and immortality.

Therefore called the son of God. (St. Luke iii. 38.)

3. Man's powers. He alone develops his nature.

His mind reasons, reflects, increases knowledge.

His soul learns, and receives revelation from God.

For him angels and God Himself have visited earth.

LESSONS. 1. Man's dignity. Made like God.

2. Man's duty. To walk worthy of God.

II. MAN'S WORK. (28—31.) What has he to do?

To people the world—made for man's use.

To cultivate the ground—for his food.

To have power over sea, air, and land.

To subdue all other created things.

Notice that at first men were vegetarians.

Fruits and grains created for man's food.

Herbs and seeds for use of cattle. (Ver. 30.)

Flesh not eaten till Noah's time. (Gen. ix. 3.)

All creation, like Creator, was "very good."

LESSONS OF CREATION. 1. God's almighty power. World made out of nothing.

2. God's eternal wisdom. No mistakes.

3. God's infinite love. All for comfort of man.

III. MAN'S REST. (ii. 1—3.) Creation ended.

God rested. Why? Not because weary, but because His works were now finished and perfected.

Because wished to teach man to rest.

Therefore appointed definite period of time.

Sabbath made for man only—nature has no rest.

Made for rest—recreation of body and mind.

Made for worship—intended to be holy day.

Therefore separated from work-days, for special service of God (St. Mark ii. 27, 28), and typical of heavenly rest (Is. lx. 20).

LESSON. Remember that thou keep holy the Sabbath day.

JANUARY 14TH. ADAM'S SIN AND GOD'S GRACE.

To read—Gen. iii. 1—15. Golden Text—1 Cor. xv. 22.

INTRODUCTION. Man placed in a Paradise (or park) also called Garden of Eden. God gave him his name Adam—he called his wife Eve, and gave animals their names. The life of Adam and Eve at first was holy, in communion with God, happy in each other's love, industrious in tilling the ground. To-day's lesson shows a sad change.

I. TEMPTATION. (1—5.) The tempter.

Satan—once an angel in heaven. (Rev. xii. 9.)

Rebelled against God and was cast out. (St. Jude 6.)

Now tries to effect the ruin of man.

Assumes form of a serpent to deceive.

The tempted. The woman first as being weaker and therefore more likely to yield. (1 Tim. ii. 14.)

The temptation. (a) To doubt God's love.

Is it true that God has given such an unreasonable command?

(b) To doubt God's word. "Ye shall not die."

"Ye shall be as gods," with knowledge, power, etc.

II. FALL. (6—13.) 1. The steps.

Lust of the eyes. (1 John ii. 16.) She gazed at the tree—probably when alone.

Lust of the flesh. She coveted the pleasant fruit.

Pride of life. She desired higher knowledge.

Disobedience. She ate and persuaded Adam also.

2. The consequences.

Shame. They were no longer innocent.

Their bodies were degraded before themselves.

Fear. They were afraid of God's voice.

Tried to hide from God's sight behind the trees.

Dissembling. Adam makes excuses.

Lays blame on Eve for tempting him.

Lays blame on God for giving him such a wife.

Eve lays blame on the Serpent.

III. MERCY. (14, 15.) The tempter cursed.

Shall be conflict between the devil and man and between children of the devil and children of God.

Man will suffer in the conflict, but finally prevail.

Christ—seed of the woman—suffered.

Was tempted, persecuted, crucified, etc.

But overcame sin, Satan, and death.

Man in Christ's power may do same.

LESSONS. 1. The soul that sinneth, it shall die.

2. In Christ all are made alive.

3. God shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly.

AFTERWARDS!

A PARABLE STORY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "COLONEL KIT."

"Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous; nevertheless, afterward—"

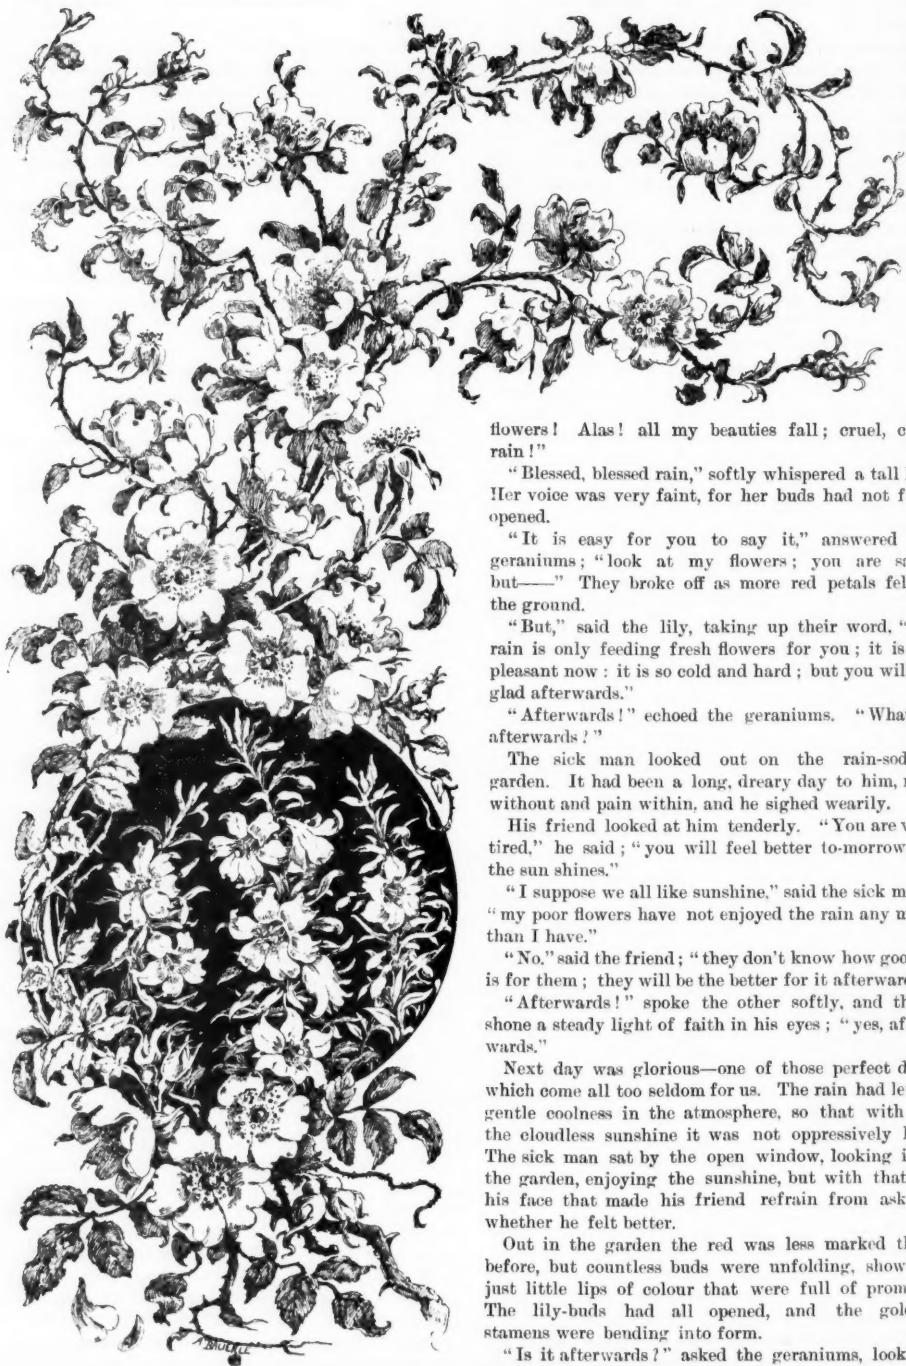

LOUDS had been gathering slowly and steadily all night; at four o'clock there were long lines of golden-red splendour in the east, telling of sun-rising, but the heavy grey clouds soon closed in, and down came the rain with a persevering purpose that was altogether discouraging to the hopes of those who were bent on long walks or excursions.

Soak, soak went the rain on the ground it had softened; wash, wash against the leaves that drooped and quivered. This was no patter of summer shower, that would pass away swiftly, letting the sun soon flash down again on grateful, refreshed plants.

There had been a goodly show of scarlet geraniums in the garden; as early as possible they had been placed there in clumps, rows, and bands, making brilliant patches and lines. Not that there were not other flowers too. Tall lilies lifted their pure crowned heads, roses swung in the breeze, heliotrope flung its scent lavishly on the air, while modest lobelia and gay calceolaria added to the brightness. But the red geraniums were the chief feature of that little square garden. In the house lived one who spent nights of suffering and days of weakness, but who would not spend many more such, his friends thought half sadly; and he who tended the garden placed the bright flowers there that they might cheer that declining life. Perhaps they were not the man's favourites; he loved the gentle forget-me-not, the lowly violet, and meek lily of the valley, but all unconsciously the scarlet geraniums strengthened and cheered him.

"Alas!" sighed the geraniums, as the heavy rain and wind swept off their bright petals, which lay on the brown mould in a red shower, "my bright red flowers! Alas! all my beauties fall; cruel, cruel rain!"

"Blessed, blessed rain," softly whispered a tall lily. Her voice was very faint, for her buds had not fully opened.

"It is easy for you to say it," answered the geraniums; "look at my flowers; you are safe; but——" They broke off as more red petals fell to the ground.

"But," said the lily, taking up their word, "the rain is only feeding fresh flowers for you; it is not pleasant now: it is so cold and hard; but you will be glad afterwards."

"Afterwards!" echoed the geraniums. "What is afterwards?"

The sick man looked out on the rain-sodden garden. It had been a long, dreary day to him, rain without and pain within, and he sighed wearily.

His friend looked at him tenderly. "You are very tired," he said; "you will feel better to-morrow, if the sun shines."

"I suppose we all like sunshine," said the sick man; "my poor flowers have not enjoyed the rain any more than I have."

"No," said the friend; "they don't know how good it is for them; they will be the better for it afterwards."

"Afterwards!" spoke the other softly, and there shone a steady light of faith in his eyes; "yes, afterwards."

Next day was glorious—one of those perfect days which come all too seldom for us. The rain had left a gentle coolness in the atmosphere, so that with all the cloudless sunshine it was not oppressively hot. The sick man sat by the open window, looking into the garden, enjoying the sunshine, but with that in his face that made his friend refrain from asking whether he felt better.

Out in the garden the red was less marked than before, but countless buds were unfolding, showing just little lips of colour that were full of promise. The lily-buds had all opened, and the golden stamens were bending into form.

"Is it afterwards?" asked the geraniums, looking wistfully up to the lily.

"My afterwards has come," sang the lily joyfully;

"yours is coming. Patience for a little longer—only a little longer now."

Then soon the garden was as brilliant as it had ever been, the bright scarlet blooms seemed to smile up to the blue sky in very gladness, glowing and laughing in the warm sunshine.

"I am so glad to see the geraniums out again," said the sick man. "I did not know how much they cheered and helped me; the rain seemed as if it would have spoilt them."

"Only seemed," said the friend, looking, not at the flowers, but at the hands that daily grew thinner and weaker.

"It is their afterwards," said the sick man with a smile of peace.

Before the scarlet geraniums fell again, the sick man had ceased to watch and be cheered by them.

He had grown to need no more of earth's cheering, and lay with a white, peaceful face, from which all lines of pain had been smoothed out, in an upper room. Though the blinds were down, the windows were open, and the summer scents and sounds stole in, and there were long shafts of sunshine that would not be kept out, but moved over the room and touched the sleeper caressingly.

Friends brought wreaths of fair white flowers till the room could hold no more, but the friend who had nursed and tended the sleeper went into the garden and gathered the best and brightest of the geraniums, which, with loving hands, he fashioned into a cross. Then, smiling through his tears, he laid the brilliant cross over the white folded hands, saying in a tone that, for all its sadness, had a note of triumph, "AFTERWARDS."

GARTH GARRICKSON—WORKMAN.

THE STORY OF A LANCASHIRE LAD.

CHAPTER V.

MILDRED did not seem to have gained much by her hasty return home. For some days the weather was wet and stormy; she was a prisoner and solitary, for her father had gone from Glasgow to London, and was still there.

The hills were invisible, the whole world drowned out of sight by clouds, smoky vapour, and sheets of rain; the wind howled over the land, shrieked among the trees, and whistled in the chimneys. All outside communication was cut off, excepting through the postman, who brought little for her; the groom who struggled to town with orders; and the milk-boy from the farm; and Mildred found her solitude a little trying after her gaieties. On the one evening when she did manage to get to the night-school, there were but one or two there, and, to her surprise, no Garth. One day she fancied she saw him breasting his way down the hill, cap pulled down closely, hands in pockets; but she was uncertain, and there was no word even of thanks for the flowers. A vague depressing sense of disappointment fell on Mildred—she almost wished she had remained in London; but at last the wind dropped, the rain ceased, the next morning was bright and sunny, and when she came down-stairs she found her father had returned.

"Returned, Elizabeth! When?"

"Early this morning, about seven—by the night mail, I suppose, ma'am."

However, he had come; there he was, standing on the breakfast-room hearthrug, examining his letters, and looking as fresh as if he had just risen from a comfortable bed; as far from travel-stained as if he and railways were total strangers—a good-looking, portly man, with a strong face and a determination of carriage often seen in those who have taken and kept a successful hold on the world, and with nothing of the harshness Garth has prepared us for. But a grey moustache hides the mouth; and John Caryl at home and John Caryl abroad are two different men, after the manner of the sons of John Bull.

"Ah! Good-morning, my dear"—holding aside his correspondence to allow of Mildred's dutifully raised lips coming between. "How do you do? You should have waited in London, and I could have brought you home, you see. You always are so impulsive, Mildred," blaming her after the fashion of fathers for those qualities derived from himself.

"I was tired of London, papa."

"Or someone there, eh?" and Mildred flushed a little; it was evident he had met someone or other who had given him confidential news—news she had hoped he would never hear. "I wish you had waited. I wired, but missed you by an hour. Yes, I wish I had been there."

"Papa, it would have made no difference—"

"Would it not? I am not sure; and if you will allow me a father's natural interest—Well, well," as the maids appeared with breakfast, "we can talk of this another time; I must get to business."

He got to business at once, seeming to include breakfast in that and that in breakfast, eating with a zest which soon left Mildred far behind, and going on with his letters and newspaper meanwhile. He cast away the newspaper and rose before she had half finished—he never waited—and began to gather up the papers littering his end of the table; then he paused and considered.

"My dear," he said slowly, "I wonder if you could do something for me."

"Certainly—I will try."

"Here is a German letter among these" (selecting it). "I don't understand it. I'm nothing of a German scholar, you know. Could you translate it, and let me have it this evening?" Mildred took the sheet a little gingerly, and looked at the cramped, impossible scrawl, so unlike her German master's neat hand, in some distaste. "I'll try, father—and do my best; but don't be vexed if I fail. My lessons were not in commercial correspondence, you know."

"I wish they had been—it would be helpful. Be careful, Mildred; a mistake might be serious."

Mildred saw her father off, going to the door with a gay antimacassar over her shoulders and watching him down the drive; then leaving her breakfast—her father's businesslike meals always spoilt hers—went to her room at once; she meant to go out this fine morning, and had better do this first.

But Mildred did not do it: the handwriting was so difficult to decipher, the phraseology so strange, that she found the task beyond her. Moreover, there were business terms which she had no idea how to render in English. After an hour or two's vain struggle, she grew bewildered, and threw down her pen in despair, deciding that it was a shame to spend this lovely morning indoors; she would leave it until the afternoon, and go and see old Daddy Pack; and accompanied by a small mob of dogs, off she went.

Someone else was out in the sunny weather also. Mrs. Garrickson was surprised by Garth's coming home in the middle of the morning.

"What is it? Are you not well, my son?"

"Oh yes, mother, there's nothing amiss. There's business at H—Mr. Caryl wants me to do, and I thought I would come in and change my coat and walk across country; there's no train."

"I'm very glad; the walk will do you good; you're too much indoors. I wish you'd get a tricycle, Garth."

"Oh, I can't afford it, and there's as much oxygen to be had on foot," and he ran up-stairs. Presently he came down again in his second-best suit, and very spruce he looked.

"So Mr. Caryl is home, Garth," called his mother from the kitchen, as he paused in the passage to brush his hat.

"Yes; by the early train, just to see if the umbrellas were right way up in the stand, and they weren't, so he took on, and Simister nearly gave warning." Mrs. Garrickson came to the kitchen door, her hands covered with flour, and laughed an amused little laugh.

"Oh, that pleases them, and it needn't displease you."

"Where's the key of the end gate, mother?"

"Miss Mildred has it: she came in for a drink of milk on her way to Mr. Pack, and she had forgotten her own, so she took it. You can go by the shooting range."

"Oh, I can jump the wall," and he was going.

"Shall you be back to dinner, Garth?" she called after him.

"I don't know. No—yes—don't wait." What did he know of the pie his mother was making and the remnant of meat?

He ran down the steps and out at the gate, clashing it behind him, and went off across the field by the straight broad path: on his right the slope of the hill and the plain of Lancashire, scores of smoking chimneys already sully the storm-purified air; on his left a reach of pasture-land, with a farm here and there, his master's land; and from this direction the breeze came sweet and fresh, for between here and Derby was no considerable town; all the Peak district and Dovedale between. On he went, with long, even strides, until the path met the road, a tall iron gate between. Supposing this to be locked, he jumped the wall forthwith, and turned up the rough country road. And now he began to search the land with keen, far-seeing eyes, but no one could he see. Miss Mildred was evidently already on the other side of the hill, and he strode on whistling that little tune of his. But as he neared the top of the hill, where, just past a row of cottages, a lane led off to the left, a clear lilting voice took it up—

"It were profanity
For poor humanity
To treat as vanity
The sway of love."

"In no locality
Or principality
Is our mortality
Its sway above"

—and the next moment the dogs rushed round the corner, barking and leaping upon him joyously—they knew Garth—and Mildred followed; while the women, attracted by the noise, put their heads out of their doors, said "Good-morning," and stood respectfully, within possible earshot—the reason, perhaps, why Mildred was a little embarrassed, Garth more than a little stiff.

"Why, Garth!" in surprise—it was so unusual to see him out in the morning—"Why, Garth! What is it?"

"Your father has come home, Miss Mildred."

"Ill? Hurt, Garth?"—in alarm.

"No, no; nothing is the matter—no indeed, Miss Mildred."

"But I knew he had returned; he came to breakfast."

"Oh, I did not know; I thought he had come from the station and you could not know, or you would be at home, perhaps."

"At home! Why at home? I am not housekeeper."

"Are you not, Miss Mildred?"

"Certainly not, Mrs. Williams would give instant notice if I presumed to interfere. I have been with blind Luc; now I am going to Daddy. I meant to go over the hill and down through the wood, but it was so wet I had to turn back."

Garth still looked away in grave doubt.

"You managed at the gate, I hope?"

"I got over the wall."

Mildred laughed. "Without trying the gate? How characteristic! It was unlocked."

Garth did not laugh. He said—"Well, good-morning, Miss Mildred; I must go on," pulled off his hat, and crossing the road, struck into a field-path, giving her no time for reply.

Mildred turned in a little pique, and pursued her way down the hill. What a simple fellow Garth was, after all; what odd notions he had! Of course all his ideas of household economy pointed to there being twice as much provision for two as for one; and of dauntlessly duty, to her tucking up her sleeves and, if not killing, certainly cooking the fatted hen for her father's consumption. Of course she knew better; but it was uncomfortable to be misunderstood by Garth. He had been very odd since her return; she had no idea why. Perhaps he was vexed by her having remained away so long and left him so much to do at the night-school. It would interfere with his own studies—yes—and that would be the reason of his reading so far into the night, and of his absence the other evening. She must let him know she did not so greatly need him, she decided, as she reached Daddy's cottage. Elijah, or as he was usually called, "Daddy" Pack, was a local celebrity. He had been an ardent lay-preacher of the Methodist persuasion, and for many years the head-gardener of Mildred's grandfather during almost all her mother's lifetime. Now his days of service were over, and he lived in one of these two little white houses alone, confined very much to it and his bit of garden by the infirmities of extreme old age. Mildred often visited him, and was a great favourite of his, as was natural; only second to her being Garth, whom he knew quite as well.

As children they had often met here, when Garth had a half-holiday and Mildred could escape her governess. Many a ramble they had had in these fields; many a scramble in the wood that clothed the hillside; many a merry tea-drinking in the cottage; and though as the years advanced these had somehow ceased, it was not a very rare thing for them to meet there even now, both still coming frequently.

Mildred found the old man feebly at work in the garden, clearing away some branches brought down from the trees above by the wind. "Siding up gen'ally efter th' storm," he told her.

"You don't seem a bit surprised to see me, Daddy. Did you know I had returned?"

"Well, yes, Miss Mildred, mem, I did."

"I wonder at that. So few people know, and in such a storm."

"Well, mem, the storm was the prim'ry cause, if one may so say."

"How is that?"

"Well, the larder was very low, mem, when the storm began. Mrs. Wamsley next door was a-going to town that very day; she'd put it off in somewhat shiftless road—and then down coom the ren; and the larder went lower and th' coals run out likewise, and bein' children next door I didna see me way to takin' o' theirn; seein' there was no sayin' wen the waters would abate from off the face o' the earth; and for children to clem is a very bad thing, mem, a very bad thing," pausing to shake his head and consider the point.

"Well, what did you do, Daddy?"

"I did the only thing there was to do under such-like circumstantial. I tuk it to the Lord in prayer," and again he paused.

"Yes: well!"

"Eh, well, mem," in a glow of half-suppressed triumph, "Mrs. Garrickson up yon, she bethought herself, or rather I should say the Lord Himself bethought her"—reverently—"as 'ow we might very like be in such a case, so when the lad Garth coom whoam from work (and she'd counselled him to stay all night in the toon), she told him, and he come o'er the hill, mem, in his father's old big coat, and his gaiters and his cap tied down on his yed wi' a handkercher"—chuckling immoderately at Garth's expense—"and a basket wi' bread and bacon and potatoes and tea and such; and so," becoming suddenly serious, "I sought the Lord and He heard me, and delivered me from all my fears. This poor man cried, and the Lord heard him, and delivered him out of all his troubles."

Mildred had seated herself on a convenient stone of good size—Daddy's garden chair; her eyes were gleaming.

"That was good; just like Garth too," and there was a pause. . . "Well, what have you been doing while I have been away? No news?"

"Ay yes, now, Miss Mildred, there were a little matter as I would like to tek counsel aboot, if I mout be so bold," and Daddy hesitated and stopped; asking favours was not in his line. Mildred knew this, and her curiosity was roused.

"What is it? Indeed I will do my best to help."

"It's my sister's gell, mem, my sister that married a Scotchman up to Glasgow."

"Oh yes—I know"—and she did: how Daddy's only sister had grieved him by marrying a godless coachman in the family in which she was housemaid in Scotland, and died there of his ill-treatment; but of there being a daughter she was ignorant.

"She's been living these many years, mem, wi' a sister o' her father's, fer her father married agen, and his wife werena kind to Minnie, and when her father died she seemed to belong to her aunt efter so many years' time. Well, now her aunt has died, too, in the course o' natur—a very old woman, and a good woman she were too—and there were nothing for Minnie but to go to her stepmother, who'd married agen, and has a large family. An' she's livin' there now, Bradford way, and she isna comfortable, Miss Mildred, mem, ner doin' well, for her stepmother is a sad woman, a very sad woman," shaking his head thoughtfully. "An' Minnie, she thought o' her old uncle, and she wrote me a letter; it come fore the ren, but I couldna make head nor tail o' it fore Garth coom, and he read it easy—he's a good scholar is Garth; and she's very unhappy, Miss Mildred, it a-pears, and she wants to know can I have her here and find her a place. Well, in course she must coom, Miss Mildred."

"Of course she must come. I'll see about it at once. What is her address? I'll write to-day."

"Well, no, mem, there's no need. Garth, he wrote at oncet. You see, she'd bin some days waitin'; so he writ in his pocket-book that as I told him, and when he got whoam he'd copy it out all fair and tidy and post it next morn, and he's to go on Saturday and fetch her. He's a good lad, is Garth, an' rare handy wi' a plan."

"And what can I do, Daddy?"

"Well, it's the place, mem, we was thinkin' on. Garth, he said he thought you'd know," and the old man stopped; he could not say what Garth had said—that doubtless Mildred would take the girl in herself. But Mildred, of course, guessed it.

"She shall come to the Hall, Daddy, if I can arrange; one of the maids is discontented, I think. I will speak to Mrs. Williams at once." Daddy was evidently relieved.

"Thank you, Miss Mildred; that'll do fine. You see, it's not fittin' that she should live here, with naught to do, even if I could keep her a year or two—which I couldn't well do. She'll have a bit o' money in a year or two what her aunt left her—when she's twenty-one or marries. But it's a poor place for my sister's daughter, and she wants a situation, she says, herself. I'll get th' letter if you'll step in a bit, Miss Mildred, mem." Mildred went into the tiny cottage, neat and clean enough, but evidently lacking a woman's occupation and care—for all the house-work was done by Daddy himself, with the occasional help of his "shiftless" next-door neighbour—and Daddy was getting feeble.

The letter proved to be neatly written and well spelt, but vague and helpless enough. Evidently the girl had capacities, but if left to herself or the people she was with would very easily make shipwreck.

"Yes, she must certainly come. I will see Mrs. Garrickson and Mrs. Williams. We will have some plan by Saturday, and let you know," and Mildred left the old man comforted.

CHAPTER VI.

WHEN Mr. Caryl came home in the evening Mildred met him deprecatingly, the German letter in her hand.

"I am so sorry, father, but I really cannot do it. Look"—showing her copy—"this is the most I can do."

"Well, Mildred, after all the expense of your lessons, it is a pity, and I am sorry you tried; for now a day is wasted and I don't know how to get it done in time for an answer to-morrow."

"It occurred to me, papa, that we might ask Garth."

"Garth?—who?—Oh, young Garrickson. What does he know of German?"

"As much as I, quite—possibly more; he will understand the business terms, at any rate, and with what I have done—"

"How do you know, Mildred?"

"Because I have helped him, and he has helped me."

Her father looked at her. Mildred's face was clear and frank as a child's.

"Smart lad that," he observed, meditatively. "Went to H— on an errand only to-day; extremely well he did it, too—extremely well;" and he paused, thinking of Garth's good looks, his neat grey suit, clear eyes, erect head, and a sharp retort he had overheard. John Caryl had a taste for sharp retorts.

"He really is very clever," Mildred said; "far too clever for the work he is doing. He ought to be in the office."

"But I don't want another in the office. I want a traveller—I am away too much—with an occasional job like this. Where did Garth get this knowledge?"

"Chiefly, I think, from the library."

"The library?"—he had forgotten all about it. Mildred refreshed his memory, and spoke of Garth's work there and elsewhere. "I should not be surprised if he were up-stairs now," she concluded.

"Just go and see; and if he is, bring him down here;" and Mildred went.

But the library was dark and empty and cold. Had she known it, Garth would not be found there for many a day.

"He will be at home," she said, returning, "or Mrs. Garrickson will know where."

"Mothers don't always know their sons' whereabouts in the evening, my dear."

"Mrs. Garrickson will. I expect he will be at home after walking to H—."

"How do you know he walked?"

"Because I met him on the way."

Mr. Caryl considered.

"I'll just go and see, Mildred," with sudden decision. "This must be translated at once, and I should like a word with his mother." He left the room, and soon the front door banged.

Garth was at home "resting after his walk"—the end of him that had been in use, that is—by activity now at the end then idle. He sat on one side of the table, his books around him, knitting his brows over a nice bit of algebra, to all appearance—in reality "wool-gathering;" while his mother sat on the other, knitting for his resting end, wool-using, with simpler and more practical rules of arithmetic.

He did not look up when the door opened, and Mrs. Garrickson had risen and shaken hands before he was roused by a loud, cheery, "Hallo, Garth! In the clouds?"

He started then, and rose dazedly. It was just as well the shade of the lamp threw his flushing face into shadow. His hand was grasped and shaken and dropped, while he stood speechless, his brain in a whirl. What could his master want with him? Could he possibly—? His mother's habitual composure stood Garth in good stead.

"I daresay he is," with a low laugh. "Take a chair, Mr. Caryl, if you please; he'll come down;" and Mr. Caryl dropped into the old easy-chair and stretched out his feet with more real content than he often found in the sumptuous rooms he frequented nowadays.

"You are as comfortable as ever here, I see," he said, and with a fleet glance he had taken in all the room. "It's a cold night, Mrs. Garrickson."

"Yes; it usually is cold up here on the hill, sir."

"Sir!" how naturally! He was no better born than herself, but he was good and a gentleman. She held him in genuine respect.

"Exposed—yes—too exposed, I should think;" and Garth, listening, "brought down a momentary brow." This, then, was his errand; he wanted his house for other use—those who would rent it. Of course, he would declare it undesirable—advise, in all-powerful friendship, a move elsewhere. The idea did not occur to sensible Mrs. Garrickson.

"Well, yes, for delicate lungs it would be; but Garth and I are not delicate. It's bracing."

"Yes; so you are still quite content?"

"Certainly, sir. It's a long way for Garth to go to work, but it's better to be out of the town."

"Much better; better for study. Is that German you have there, Garth?"

Garth's brow did not unbend, he did not want patronage. "No, sir, algebra."

"Ah! you are wondering how I knew about the German," with a glance which unsettled Garth's ideas, and led him to suspect he was mistaking—a

"I'll try. Oh, it's not all wasted time; what she has done will help. If she had just given it me this morning I could have done it now."

"She was out this morning—you met——"

Garth's head went up. Was he to be accused for meeting and speaking to his master's daughter? He knew he had turned his back on that fair vision.

"Mildred found the old man at work in the garden."—p. 127.

suspicion soon confirmed by Mr. Caryl's explanation. When it ended he rose and took the letter and Mildred's unfinished translation, with a deference born of repentance.

"Oh, yes, sir," looking at it, while his master looked at him, secretly admiring the well-knit figure, the pose of the Park head. "I can do this well enough."

"To-night? Can you do it to-night and bring it in the morning? You see, Miss Caryl has lost a day."

"Yes, sir."

"And if she had stayed at home and worked at it like a man she might have succeeded, and I need not have troubled you."

Now Garth was caught—not only in his mistake—his second—but in his position. He had plainly hinted to Miss Mildred that she should be indoors that morning; it turned out she had shirked a set task, and yet he would not have her blamed, even by her father.

"Well, she is not a man," he said, blunderingly, instead of merely disclaiming trouble, and went over to his bookshelf for his German dictionary, brought it to the table, and turned the lamp a little higher.

That attracted Mr. Caryl's attention.

"What a handsome lamp you have, Mrs. Garrickson!"

"Yes, sir; Miss Mildred gave it to me for a birthday present a good while ago. The old one was bad for Garth's reading, and unsafe."

"And you have no gas. I thought you had"—looking for the chandelier.

"Oh, we don't mind that—we don't like gas. Garth is all for the electric light"—with a sly look.

"Have you seen into its workings at all, Garth?"

He had, in Manchester: it was a hobby of his. The German was left, and a discussion ensued, in which he showed considerable knowledge of the subject and a facility of debate which pleased John Caryl. He forgot this was his master—Miss Mildred's father; he forgot the mill—forgot everything in the pleasure of meeting an intellect equal to his own—a tongue as ready.

Mrs. Garrickson slipped away unobserved, on hospitable thoughts intent, leaving them busy: and they were still engaged when she returned, with the neat Janie carrying a white-covered tray.

Mr. Caryl jumped up when he saw it.

"Well, I must go—you want your supper."

"Oh, you will oblige me by joining us now, sir? You surely don't think I would have brought the tray if I hadn't expected."

And John Caryl joined them, wondering if this dainty repast was in the usual order of things.

It was, only Mrs. Garrickson had got out her best china—Mrs. Caryl's wedding present years ago—and made the coffee with her own hands, to Janie's chagrin. He enjoyed it, and said so.

"No one makes coffee like this at the house—no one can."

"Excuse me, sir; have you ever found out that Miss Mildred can do so? Certainly! There's not much in the cooking way your daughter can't do—I've seen to that"—with pardonable pride.

"Can she bake?"

"Undoubtedly. Many a time she's made the bread we've eaten. I hope you don't think I have taken a liberty, sir. There were wet days in the holidays, and since she left school, when she wearied of her books and fancy work, and having no company—"

"My dear Mrs. Garrickson, I am indebted to you for the pains you have taken with my girl. I wish to my heart I had done the like by your boy. I was under the idea that Mildred was rather a useless young lady. I am glad I was mistaken.—Garth, I was just going to ask you if you had ever thought of attending Owens College."

"I have done so—for a session—a few winters ago."

"And why not since?"

Garth was silent.

"He won't afford it, Mr. Caryl," said his mother.

"There's a deal Garth won't afford. He will pay for his keep, you see, and—"

A look on her son's face stopped her. Mr. Caryl saw it also, and had the sense to propose no raising of salary, or make any comment.

He took his leave.

But at the outer door he paused and looked his "out-looker" in the eyes.

"Excuse me, my lad, will you answer a personal question?"

Garth signified assent with a sudden heart-throb.

"How old are you?"

"Twenty-four"—with sudden relief.

"Oh, I thought older—by two or three years. Keep on, my boy; you've time. There's always room at the top"—and he was gone.

"Garth," said his mother, when he returned to the parlour, "you're wrong about Mr. Caryl's hardness."

"If you saw him at the mill, mother—"

Garth was a little bewildered.

"He doesn't keep another heart at the mill. My son, there's an old Book that says, 'Judge not, that ye be not judged.'"

Garth thought of the old motto:—"Fide sed cui vide."

CHAPTER VII.

MILDRED was still in the drawing-room when her father returned.

She came to the door when she heard him and stood on the mat, waiting, while he divested himself of his coat in the hall; and very handsome Mildred looked in her ruby plush tea-gown. She and her father never wore evening dress at home, John Caryl keeping an early prejudice. But Mildred's tea gowns were sumptuous, and this particularly becoming, the rich colouring throwing up the fairness of skin and hair, the darkness of the eyes. She stood there, the doorway framing her, the room behind forming a background—like the portrait of a queen; and the contrast between the home he had left and the home he had come to struck John Caryl forcibly. For the first time he saw how very fair his daughter was.

"Well?"

"Well?—oh, yes! it's all right—he will do it."

"Will you have coffee, father?"

"No, thanks, I have had. To-morrow I will, if you'll make it, Mildred."

Mildred opened her eyes—then laughed.

"Mrs. Garrickson has told a secret."

"Why did you make it a secret, Millie?"

"I never thought you would care about it. You don't mind, do you, papa? The royal princesses learn cooking, you know—it was just amusement."

"A very useful amusement. I wish I had known, too, of that young man's abilities: it would have saved me some trouble and outlay. If I had known as lately as last week—" cogitating. "He's a handsome fellow"—meditatively, by-and-by. "Those eyes are good—very good—as different— There now, Mildred"—waking up—"I had almost forgotten. You have refused Kildare O'Neil!"

"Yes, papa."

"And why did you do that?"—sitting down and leaning forward, prepared for an argument.

"The usual reason."

"Don't jest, Mildred."

"I am not jesting—I am in earnest—and I told Kildare he need never tell you, for it would not help him. If I never married, I would never be his wife!"

"Which, as an Irishman, he should have understood. There is no need to heat yourself, my dear. I have no desires in the thing, but I think I should know how matters stand. Are you under the idea that you definitely refused, then?"

"Certainly, and so is he."

"Pardon me, Mildred; you are mistaken there. He thinks you asked time."

"No, papa. I told him distinctly I would not think of it."

"At present, but in the future——"

"No—I told him for all time. I will not have Kildare O'Neil!"

"Well, well, my dear, I am not pressing you to do so; I have no wish. But I do wish you had written to me, Mildred, for if you could not convince him, I could, you know. And now I have made a grave mistake. How long was this going on?"

"All the last month in London. I kept him at bay three weeks, and then one day he was nearly run over in the park and I was startled, and he made a disgraceful scene"—with flaming cheeks.

"The polite Kildare?"

"Oh, he was polite enough," with scornful emphasis. "And then he insisted that I did care, and everyone knew it, and they seemed to think so, so I came home."

"Very uncomfortable for you."

"Very uncomfortable!"

Mildred was not far from tears.

"And don't you see, Millie, that had you written at first it need never have been! Now, look, too, what I have done: Kildare is to come here as my traveller—living with us!"

"You have refused Kildare O'Neil?"—p. 130.

"Papa!"

"Yes; he saw I was advertising, and came to me and offered, telling me this tale, and begging for opportunity; and for your sake, Mildred, I accepted him, against my own inclination and judgment."

"Father, he cannot come."

"He must, Mildred. He has left his employment—a better salary than I am giving—and made all arrangements. In mere business honour he must come now, 'as per contract.'"

"He need not stay."

"If he gives satisfaction in his work I cannot turn him away, and he will do his best, I know, with a view to partnership. I am very sorry, for personally I do not care for him, and I have since seen the very man."

"Garth, papa?"

"Yes, Garth—just the man. I can't think where my eyes were. I need not have advertised. I disappointed 115 applicants."

Mildred came across to say good-night.

"You are not vexed with me, papa?"

"No, my girl, you are punished enough. But another time tell me."

"I—I thought you would wish it."

"Against your will? That will not be, Millie. Cheer up; he shall behave himself. I'll have a word with Kildare; and he will be much away, trust him to me."

Mildred kissed her father very humbly and went upstairs in just Garth's bewilderment about him.

Next morning they both found him exactly as usual.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE rest of the week Mildred spent chiefly in scheming for Daddy's unknown niece; but her time was much broken by callers, who came in shoals to partake of her bohea and London triumphs; and at last it had to be hastily arranged that she should stay with Mrs. Garrickson until the discontented Emma could be not too summarily despatched, and her place left for Minnie.

And when Minnie came all was disarranged.

It was not until the Sunday evening that Mildred saw her; she arrived late on the Saturday, and Mildred had, of course, been engaged all that day. But after evening service she walked up, to find that Garth had taken the girl to see her uncle, the distance being too great for Mrs. Garrickson. They had been to tea, and would doubtless soon return.

"She is not at all what I expected," Mrs. Garrickson said; "I meant her to share Janie's room and table; but I saw in a minute it wouldn't do, so I made up a bed in the little room, and she has her meals with us. She's a deal above her people. Her aunt seems to have been a most superior person. No doubt it's owing to her living with her so long."

Perhaps so—very probably; but however it might be, this girl would never do for an under—no, not an upper housemaid, if for domestic service at all, Mildred decided at once when Minnie came in with Garth. She was too ladyish.

Of moderate height, slender, and slightly pretty with shy blue eyes, and light brown hair drawn nicely back from a broad, white forehead, about which it crisped in natural girlish curliness, and twisted up at the top of her head. Tastily dressed, too, with tidy gloves and boots. In fact, to good observers, Minnie was the oddest, diminutive, diluted edition of Mildred herself, and looked what she was—the carefully reared only child of an independent, not unrefined, country cottage home—no more fitted for domestic service than for weaving in the mill.

What were they to do with her?

They ought, of course, to have seen her before arranging; but it was too late now. And the girl herself, understanding that a suitable situation was at hand, and that this was her future mistress, sat there all unconscious of these impressions, looking at Mildred and waiting to be told what her duties would be; while Mrs. Garrickson and Garth looked on in unconcealed perplexity.

Mildred's ready wit came to her aid; she put it off till next day.

"We are all tired to-night, and it is Sunday. Come to-morrow morning and we shall see."

But next morning she did not see; the matter was quite embarrassing. Minnie Garner was like most girls brought up at home—fit for nothing but home.

Eminently fitted for that, neat and domestic in her tastes and habits, cheerful and amiable in her temper; but of no stuff for endurance, or continued effort, or bent to menial employment. She was a fair needlewoman, Mildred found; made her own clothing, and trimmed her own hats—in a fashion; played on the piano—hymns and simple airs—and was fond of reading. Her speech was singularly correct, the prettiest Englishised Scotch imaginable. Had her aunt but lived a few years longer, all would have been well; she would have married, doubtless—some small tradesman, perhaps—and been a model of her kind. But left as she had been at eighteen, alone, pretty, and with this little fortune in store, to forsake her was impossible.

But what to do with her?

As a present device Mildred brought in a quantity of calico and set her to work on that; but even such employment would not do permanently, she saw. Minnie was neat but slow with her needle, helpless with her scissors, and the confinement and cramping posture tried her strength. She would have been happier with Mrs. Garrickson than anywhere else; but Mrs. Garrickson did not need her. Had Daddy only possessed a competency and a decent cottage to have kept, it would have been the very thing for her; but he had neither, and to move him or augment his means in any way was not to be thought of.

For the present she sewed on, honestly supposing she was fairly earning wage and "keep" by that means.

She was sitting at the window of Mildred's room with her work one bright morning. Outside, the world was dewy and fresh; inside, dusty and close—partly in comparison, partly because fires were still in continuance and seemed so out of place. The outlook was limited, "commanding an uninterrupted view of over the way"—a high, grassy, tree-crowned bank, which, being accustomed to the open country, Minnie did not find so refreshing to the eye as a townswoman would have done. She was beginning to find what had at first been grandeur just a trifle dull. It was better than Yorkshire, but she missed her aunt and the cheery neighbours of her Scotch home.

In fact, Minnie was fretting, when the carriage pardon," as if it were the most natural mistake in the world, and advancing as if to shake hands. Minnie had none of the insignia of a servant, and looked so very young and pretty. "Whom have I the pleasure of meeting?"

"Oh, I am only Minnie Garner." Her voice betrayed his mistake.

"And do you know where Miss Caryl is?"

"Up-stairs. And will I bring her, please?"

"I will be much obliged, please," making a little drove up to the door and a young gentleman sprang out. Minnie leaned forward, forgetting her trouble in interest, and looked at him, and watched the taking in of the portmanteaux, of which there were several. Thomas appeared on the steps not at all surprised, and respectfully saluted the stranger, who nodded carelessly, and then turned round abruptly to inspect the window at which she sat. Before Minnie could draw back he had seen her and, with a quick smile, pulled off his hat. The next moment there were voices in the hall, the door opened, and he entered the room. He was slight and fair, and rather good-looking, she saw.

"Well, Mildred, here I— Oh, I declare it's not Mildred," as Minnie rose in confusion. "I beg your private amusement by mimicking her so perfectly that she didn't see it, and Minnie got out of the room with all speed.

Mildred was in a bare little room at the top of the house, painting; and, being somewhat bedaubed, thought she had a colourable excuse for remaining there. Kildare must learn, and it was better to begin at once.

"Tell him I am particularly engaged, and cannot come, Minnie. Thomas will find him a biscuit and a glass of wine, and Mr. Caryl is at the works, expecting him."

"I—I—will you mind if I don't go, Miss Caryl? Can somebody else tell him?"

Mildred looked at her in astonishment; then something in the girl's face enlightened her. She said very quickly—

"Go and find Elizabeth and tell her I want her; and you may finish your sewing in Mrs. Williams' room, Minnie," and returned to her easel, considering a possible new complication.

Altogether Mr. Kildare O'Neil found his reception decidedly cool, and was soon aware of the mistake he had made.

His "uncle"—really his mother's half-sister's husband—carried him off to Manchester and kept him there all day. When, in the evening, he met Mildred at tea—high-tea they always had here when alone, and he was accustomed to dinner—she was extremely distant, and gave her attentions to the teapot.

Afterwards Mr. Caryl insisted on his accompanying him to a political meeting which he was to chair, and even Mildred was sorry, as his political opinions did not coincide with her father's. His polite objections were overruled by an outspoken "Come, come, my boy! It won't hurt you to hear the other side. If your convictions are not water, they won't evaporate in heat;" and Mildred's evening was disturbed by thoughts of poor Kildare writhing on the political gridiron.

He came home as sulky as good breeding would allow, and next morning was despatched to Glasgow, where he was to remain a week.

Mildred hoped he would soon be vanquished and withdraw; but unassailable confidence in the ultimate triumph of his charm kept him at his post. It was a pleasant life enough, too: first-class travelling, good hotels; constant change, which agreed with Kildare; and if there were business, there were always also explicit orders for his guidance. John Caryl was not likely to risk much. He was fitted for his work, and did it well, and, after all, so much away, so rarely at home when her father was not, and always so well bred, that Mildred could find no cause for complaint.

And the days lengthened, the trees burst into leaf, the winds softened to zephyrs, and she lived quietly on.

But though her life was outwardly so uneventful, inwardly Mildred lived fast.

There are seasons in our lives when our spiritual senses become abnormally sharpened: our inward eyes opened to the world—our world, that is, and our relations to it, our real self and what that self may be, become, and do; and the conditions of that being, becoming, and doing are very real to our perceptions.

To win that self, to do that deed, it is seen that something is to be sacrificed, something laid down; a position left before another can be taken up; a hold on much loosened before the hands can grasp more; a swinging in space before the lift to a higher plane can be; and what is in the light of eternity an elevation is so often in the light of this world a degradation. Between the two lights, as in twilight, our surroundings are confusingly difficult of recognition.

This just now was Mildred's case; she understood the tendency of her life now. Garth's very precautions against betrayal had betrayed him—how, she scarcely knew; but somehow her clear eyes had read Garth's heart beyond all mistake.

What then? Supposing her hands loosened their hold on all they held and reached out—empty! Would they be grasped by those other hands, warm and strong, and potent to hold and lift, or would they be unheeded—refused—while she dropped—where?

Suppose she held fast what she held? Would it remain firm, or rot in her hand and come away by the roots, like some dead tree in the side of a precipice, dislodged by her own tenacious grasp?

Questionings like these made Mildred's days and nights restless; while Garth, man-like, went on his way unknowing, a way which led him much out of her ken; for the sight of her was suffering to Garth, and yet a joy he dare not allow himself.

He still went to and from the mill by the field and lane, and when not at work was out on the hills, with a book certainly, but not reading; he did not seem to be studying at all—not, at least, as last summer and autumn, when he had been so engrossed in German, so often up-stairs among the Goethes, and in need of help with translation. Now the library was deserted in spite of her hint. At the school he seemed to be doing no more, nor so much, and she never saw him there now, though she knew that in her absence he was present.

For Mildred had blundered.

In very fear of wounding him and giving a wrong impression, she had been vague, which hurt him all the more and left him under a total mistake.

"Don't think I don't want you, Garth," she had said. "I could never have done so far alone; but now for your own sake—and there are others to help if need—"

And Garth had said quietly, "Certainly, Miss Mildred," and gone round collecting the slates—for they were closing the room, the last scholar had departed—with several thoughts born of her tone.

She did not want him; he had done enough. Her cousin had probably offered, and Miss Mildred (who, had he known it, had peremptorily declined) preferred his help.

For Garth had his own opinion of Kildare O'Neil's position. Had his mother been right, he thought, Miss Mildred would have prevented his coming. Had her father not approved he would not have engaged his nephew, even creating a post for him. Of course it could mean but one thing, and he must not see Miss Mildred. When they did meet, he was grave and quiet as always, but his eyes had a depth that haunted Mildred. Even his mother saw a change in Garth.

SOME FAMOUS CHURCHYARDS.

EDENSOR.

To sleep the last sleep within the walls of the Parish Church would seem for many generations to have been the ambition of all who had any claim to that privilege. Yet the custom is not one which commends itself to a sober judgment. Sentiment, indeed, very naturally and properly plays a large part in our treatment of the dead; all the more gladly should we encourage the growth of a public sentiment in favour of modes of burial more consistent with the health of the living.

Our own Royal Family has of late made use of special buildings—the Mausoleum at Frogmore and the Albert Chapel at Windsor—for the bestowal of its dead. One little prince, however—an infant of a day—lies in the churchyard of Sandringham, upon the estate of its royal parents. The grave is at the east end of the church, just without the chancel wall; it is of white marble surrounded by a low iron railing, and bears this inscription:—"Alexander John Charles Albert, third son of Albert Edward Prince of Wales and Alexandra Princess of Wales. Born April 6th, died April 7th, 1871." Upon the foot of the cross-shaped headstone is the text, "Suffer little children to come unto Me." The churchyard contains the graves of many of the Prince's servants, each stone bearing the legend "Albertus Edouardus P., Alexandra P., in memoriam posuerunt." The tombs of two rectors of the parish who have died during the Prince's time bear similar inscriptions.

Her Majesty the Queen has often given proof of her faithful affection for the memory of those who, in life, have been honoured with her confidence. Few scenes could be more touching than that of the 30th April, 1881, when, accompanied by the Princess Beatrice, she personally visited the vault in which the body of Lord Beaconsfield had been placed a few days previously, and with tear-dimmed eyes laid flowers upon his coffin. Perhaps no greater proof of the sincerity of her regard for the departed statesman could be given than the fact that the route which she followed on this occasion was the circuitous road through Clieveden which he had himself taken when he paid his last visit to Her Majesty at Windsor. The Earl was buried beside his Countess—with an utter absence of pomp, save that which was due to the presence of princes, ambassadors, and statesmen of rank and fame—in a vault beneath a marble tomb in Hughenden Churchyard, close against the eastern wall of the chancel. Her Majesty had sent two wreaths, one of primroses, with the inscription, "His favourite flowers, from Osborne; a tribute of affection from Queen Victoria." But the memorial to which all eyes turn is the tablet over his pew within the church, bearing in bas-relief his portrait and arms, and inscribed "To the dear and honoured memory of Benjamin Earl of Beaconsfield this memorial is placed by his grateful Sovereign and friend Victoria R.I. 'Kings love him that speaketh right.' (Proverbs xvi. 13.) February 27th, 1882."

It is worthy of note that the churchyard of the town of Beaconsfield, from which the Earl derived his title, was the scene, in the early days of the Civil War, of the drilling of train-bands on a Sunday afternoon by John Hampden—to the scandal of the authorities, to whom, indeed, he had to make submission.

Among the churchyards which have been selected as the burying-places of great and noble families, perhaps the best known is that of Edensor, near Chatsworth, where lie the bodies of the later members of the Cavendish family, of which the Duke of Devonshire is the head. Edensor itself is an exceedingly pretty and well-kept little village lying at the very gates of Chatsworth Park; and the present church was built by Sir Gilbert Scott for the noble owner of that magnificent domain. Standing upon rising ground, it is approached from the Bakewell Road by a double flight of steps, and the churchyard stretches up the slope of the hill behind. On its furthermost confines a portion has been fenced off with a light wire railing upon three sides, the fourth side being bounded by the deep cutting or moat which both drains and secludes the churchyard. Within this little plot lie the sixth Duke and his Duchess; the seventh Duke and his wife the Countess of Burlington—with whom are buried two of her children, one an infant whose birth cost its mother's life—and several other members of the ducal family. But the grave which is the object of the most sympathetic interest to the many visitors to Edensor, is the simple turfed grave, with low headstone bearing only the initials "F. C. C." and the date "May 6th, 1882," which covers the remains of Lord Frederick Cavendish, whose tragic death created so profound an impression at the time, and is still so sincerely lamented. Flowers of the choicest from the Chatsworth conservatories constantly adorn this grave, portions of the turf having been cut away and replaced with moss, kept always wet, in which the blossoms are arranged.

Nearer to the church, and without the special enclosure, is the tomb of Sir Joseph Paxton, to whom the gardens of Chatsworth owe much that is interesting and singular besides the fine palm-house, which is of the type which furnished Sir Joseph with the original idea of the Crystal Palace at Sydenham.

Chenies, in Buckinghamshire, is celebrated for the magnificent tombs of the Russell family. These are, however, contained in a chapel attached to the church and forming its north aisle. Two or three ladies of the family are buried in the graveyard, and the former Canon of Windsor, Lord Wriothesley Russell, lies in the new burying-ground on the opposite side of the road. Another Church dignitary, the late Bishop Selwyn, once of Lichfield but better known as Bishop of New Zealand, lies beneath a simple marble curb in the grassy lawn surrounding Lichfield Cathedral, and under its very shadow; a spot sacred to holy peace, more impressive, to our thinking, than a tomb within the hallowed building itself.

Famous for quite other reasons is the churchyard of Eyam in Derbyshire—a village romantically situated high up on the hills overlooking Middleton Dale, and not far from Edensor, of which we have already spoken. Here lies, beneath a tomb which is rapidly falling into decay, the noble wife of a noble man, the Rev. William Mompesson, rector of the parish during the awful visitation of the plague, which carried off, as we are informed by another gravestone to which we shall presently refer, no fewer than 259 persons of ripe age and fifty-eight children, out of a population of 350 souls, during the autumn of 1665 and the summer of 1666. Few stories of heroic endurance can compare with that of this little place during that terrible time. When the disease first made its appearance—imported from London through the medium of a bale of clothing sent down to the Eyam tailor—a mother's fears for her two little ones led Mrs. Mompesson to endeavour to persuade her husband to leave the threatened village. He, however, felt it his duty to stay, and Mrs. Mompesson would not quit his side; so, sending their children away, the two set themselves to do all in their power to mitigate the visitation and to prevent the plague from spreading into other parishes. In this they were assisted by the Earl of Devonshire, who was at Chatsworth, and who generously provided necessities. These, with food and other commodities from the surrounding district, were carried to the boundaries of the stricken parish, and there left; money for payment, when that was required, being placed in running water at certain specified places. (For Eyam, pronounced "Eem," is probably Ea-ham, "water-village," and has always abounded in springs.) One such place is still known as "Mompesson's Well." The fortitude with which the villagers, at the urgent entreaty of their pastor, consented to remain within the prescribed limits, while the dreaded sickness carried off family after family, is perhaps the most remarkable feature in the story, and certainly affords a marvellous example of the way in which the virtue of one heroic man will kindle the spirit of self-sacrifice and heroism in others. During the worst time the deaths were so numerous that each family had to bury its own dead in the nearest field—if, indeed, a living member remained to perform that office—so that graves abound on all hands. We have sketched one little cemetery, in the midst of a field upon the hillside east of the village, where a family of seven, of the name of Hancocke, were buried in one week of that fatal August. In the early part of this month Mrs. Mompesson took the infection and died.

Think with what sorrow of heart the good rector must have gone on with his work! The danger of infection was, of course, too great to admit of the gathering of congregations within the church; which was therefore closed, and service was conducted in the open air in a ravine still called "Cucklet Church." This sacred spot and its approaches have been enclosed, and we may hope will remain untouched for many generations. We obtain the key at Eyam Hall, and letting ourselves into the meadow opposite, find ourselves shortly on the verge of a steep grassy slope, descending rapidly to the margin of a little brooklet which issues from a rocky chasm on our right. The slope upon which we stand follows in sinuous curves the course of the brooklet; it is in parts terraced by sheep-paths, in parts overgrown with trees and bushes, and towards the watercourse now and again breaks into rocky cliffllets. High up upon the opposite hill-side, and standing out against the summer sky as we descend into the valley, is a group of grey limestone rocks, worn by the weather into arches, capped with turf and fringed with the graceful forms of elm and ash trees. This is the "Pulpit rock," and here in those anxious days stood the faithful pastor, addressing words of earnest exhortation to his people, scattered in groups at safe distances apart, upon the slope on which we stand. The distance is considerable, and the hills are high: but so secluded is the spot, and such silence reigns—scarcely broken by the quiet murmur of the streamlet and the twittering of the birds—that we are able to realise how, spite of the vast proportions of this heaven-vaulted "church," every word could be distinguished: and we can almost hear again the solemn, "Have mercy upon us," which went up from that hill-side as the good rector offered the well-remembered prayers. One thinks of the signals of recognition exchanged between group and group; of the sad diminution of the numbers week after week—altogether the scene is one which will live for ever in our memories.

Mr. Mompesson's predecessor had taken the living in 1662, under the Act of Uniformity, which had deprived the former rector, the Rev. Thomas Stanley, of his office. The nonconforming ex-rector was still resident in the neighbourhood, and with a true magnanimity, which is in keeping with the rest of the story, he forgot his personal feelings, and heartily seconded Mr.

Mompesson in his ministrations to the sick and dying.

So these two good men, divided by their convictions and even by their personal interests, "went about" together "doing good." To Mr. Stanley's memory a stone has recently been raised close to the tomb of Catherine Mompesson in Eyam churchyard. It bears the very appropriate texts: "And he stood between the living and the dead, and the plague was stayed"; "For the work of Christ he came nigh unto death, hazarding his life"; and the brief statement of the mortality in the parish which we have already quoted.

"Cucklet Church" recalls to our minds the many similar scenes in which John Wesley addressed huge crowds of heart-stricken listeners. Epworth churchyard will always be memorable for the sermons which, standing upon his father's tomb, he here preached to "such congregations as, I believe, Epworth never saw before." The church stands upon the highest point of the rising ground called the Isle of Axholme in Lincolnshire—now no longer an island, but once a fastness of the ancient Britons, and later one of the earliest places to suffer from the incursions of the Danes.

It commands very fine views over the surrounding level country—more wooded, till the wood was destroyed by the Romans because it proved too convenient a shelter for the Britons—and much of it marsh-land until Sir Cornelius Vermuyden took it in hand and drained it in 1626—now bearing luxuriant crops of corn, bright with the poppies which here go by the name of “cup-roses.” We can scarcely picture to ourselves the houses of turf, thatched with reeds, of which mention is made in 1360. Wesley was born at Epworth, of which his father was rector for thirty-nine years, and must often have passed along the stone causeways connecting the town with the surrounding hamlets, which, before the days of Macadam, made the roads passable on horseback even in the worst winters, and which still exist for the advantage of the foot-passenger and the pack-horse. It was when the parsonage at Epworth was burnt down in 1709 that John, then aged six, experienced the almost miraculous escape from death which so strongly impressed him. The house then built for his father still stands, with little alteration. But let us return to the church, taking with us the blind keeper of the keys who lives at the foot of the lime-tree avenue, paved with stone, which leads up from the corner of the market-place. The building has been much altered since Samuel Wesley’s day, and the three-decker pulpit, from which he preached, and the high-backed pews which accommodated and almost hid his congregation, have disappeared. But the nave and aisles remain the same, and the arms of the De Mowbray and Sheffield families, joint benefactors and rebuilders of the church, still adorn the north porch. When Wesley, in 1742, seven years after his father’s death, came to visit his native town, he sought permission of the curate then in charge, and who had been Samuel Wesley’s pupil and amanuensis, to preach in the church. This permission having been refused, Wesley attended the services, and afterwards, using his father’s tomb as a rostrum, addressed an enormous congregation gathered in and about the churchyard. So great was the eagerness of the people to hear him, that his intended visit of three days was prolonged for a whole week, during which he preached every evening upon this spot, and day by day visited the various villages and hamlets in the “island.” He relates a curious incident which occurred during this visit. Their angry neighbours had carried a whole waggon-load of his followers before a magistrate. “But when he asked what they had done, there was a deep silence, for that was a point their conductors had forgotten. At length, one said ‘They pretended to be better than other people, and prayed from morning to night;’ and another said ‘They have converted my wife. Till she went among them she had such a tongue! and now she is as quiet as a lamb!’ ‘Take them back! take them back!’ replied the justice, ‘and let them convert all the scolds in the town.’”

Another churchyard, that of Winchelsea in Sussex, witnessed the last of the great “Methodist” preacher’s memorable open-air services. “Wesley’s Tree,” beneath which the old man—he was then eighty-seven years of age—stood on that autumn day of 1790, is still pointed out to the visitor, and is not without reason jealously guarded against the too acquisitive relic-hunter.

The churchyard of Olney recalls Cowper and his friend, the Rev. John Newton—the rector, who lies in a grave behind the church, at present nameless, but over which it is proposed to build a monument. Standing by the church’s door we can see the houses of both these worthy men; Cowper’s, however, hideous with a new roof, the original tiles having been acquired for exhibition at Chicago. The summer-house still stands in the garden behind the house, now a separate enclosure.

But to speak of the churchyards sacred to the memory of the poets who either lie buried within them or have written about them would occupy many pages, and be quite beside the object of the present paper. We must take leave of a subject which we have but touched, hoping that our readers will have found something to interest them in our notes on a few only of our famous churchyards.

BISHOP SELWYN'S GRAVE, LICHFIELD.

BLOSSOM AND BREAD.

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A.

AM not ashamed to say this: I am a believer in a good breakfast—first, for those who can have it; and secondly, for those who having it, can eat it. For let me tell you, good reader, that the two are by no means the same. You may have a good breakfast and not be able to eat it: in which case you might as well not have it at all; or you might have a capital appetite for it and yet not have it: in which case you might as well, and I should say much better, not have the appetite at all.

I consider that a man who eats a good breakfast starts the day well, so far as the body is concerned. He may, perhaps, in the uncertainties of life, miss the luncheon, in which case he will be carried on better to dinner; but, at any rate, he goes forth into the world better fortified, so far as the body is concerned, against its hail, rain, and snow, and whatever fatigues may come in the daily toil.

If I had my own way with those who do nothing, I should go on the Apostolic precept: that is, "If they did not work, neither should they eat"; and I should make them open the day with a very slight repast indeed—I would not take them very far beyond the tail of a sardine; and when luncheon came, if I let them have the rest of the sardine, it is as much as I would do.

I confess I like to transact business in the forenoon with a man who has had a good breakfast. He has probably slept well, and most likely he is in good health to have enjoyed the food; and the consequence is, he is pleasanter to deal with than a man who has shaken some pepper and mustard over a scrap of ham. I have seen a man do this—and the pepper was cayenne, too. I'm not sure, at this interval of time, whether he didn't put some vinegar on as well. Anyhow, he wasn't a man to go out of his way to do business with on a foggy day.

Don't think me, kind reader, altogether earthy of the earth, because I dwell thus much upon a creature comfort. I am a creature, and I have to do with people who are called my "fellow-creatures"—and I know that creatures move within certain well-defined limits: their bodies certainly do; and I have observed in life that certain conditions of the body are very apt to carry the mind along with them.

And now, good reader, take my advice: never lecture, scold, argue with, or do anything you can help with a hungry man, except feed him. Feed him first, and then, according to circumstances, do whatever you like. A drum is best beaten when empty—a man, the reverse. If you can do no more, get a penny bun into him, or an Abernethy biscuit—anything you like, only let it be something—and then proceed.

Perhaps I might have hesitated to say so much on such an unethereal subject, if I had not been conscious that I was going at least to balance it by saying something in an opposite direction. I have been speaking of what I might call "Bread." I am going to say something about what appears, at least, to be something very different: viz., "Blossom."

And yet these bear a relation the one to the other—the one being food for the body, the other for the mind; and perhaps, more than for the mind, for the spirit itself.

It is sometimes a satisfaction to know how things come about; and perhaps you would like to know how I come to be writing about "Blossom and Bread." Well, it happens thus:—

Some time ago I went to preach in the country, and received hospitality from one of the chief residents in the place. Our breakfast-table in the morning was well spread. There was tea, and coffee, and eggs, and bacon, and sardines, and marmalade, and toast, and butter, and bread; the hospitable board was covered with all good things. And in the centre stood a primula, a modest-looking little plant, the only thing on the table that was not to be eaten or drunk, or that did not minister in some way to the processes aforesaid.

Now, little primula, what business had you there? Nobody could eat you, nobody could drink you; pepper, and mustard, and vinegar, and salt had no affinity with you. Ah! stop; I am going too fast: you could be eaten and drunk, and I verily believe that you and the cruet-stand were first cousins, after all.

Little primula, what I have said would be true if man were all mouth, or all that month ministers to; but man has an eye as well as a heart, and the eye often ministers to the heart, and you, little primula, can be food for both. I believe in your relationship to the cruet-stand in one way: you are, for those who can understand you, an impartor of flavour—aye, indeed, that, more than that, you are actually eye food, and, through the eye, spirit food too.

And here let me digress for a moment to say that the spirit requires to be fed as well as the body, and God has scattered all over the world such food as it requires. He has put spirit food in the winds and in the waves, in the sunbeams and in the stars, in colour and in form, and in sound; and the word is, "He that hath eyes to see, let him see; and he that hath ears to hear, let him hear; and he that hath a spirit to be fed, let him feed."

It is the Great Spirit alone who can feed spirits; and these, and such as these, are used in their times, seasons, and measures as spirit food.

That little primula, so fragile, so apparently unconnected with all around, so apparently out of place to a man of beef-steak mind, occupied, I think, a very powerful and a very important position. No one asked for a bit of it; no one would have known how to cook it, or would have thought of, salad and watercress fashion, eating it raw; and yet there it was, whispering with a modest blush that there was something more than the material! and that that something, though unobtrusive, is beautiful—beautiful in itself, and not for what it can be in the matter of mere material use. The beautiful was amid the useful on that table, as it is in all God's works.

The mere utilitarian could not eat the primula, and yet it was useful, for all that. There are uses and uses: uses for the body and uses for the spirit; and my little primula, if challenged as to its usefulness on the breakfast-table, might have kept its ground, even though challenged by a saucy sardine, a matter-of-fact egg, a pat of butter, or even the big loaf itself.

Talk to me, my little blossom. That's it; if nobody else will listen to you, I will.

"Yes, He who made yon substantial things, the useful, performing their ministry in their way, made me, the beautiful, to perform mine in my way. We have different ways for action, but we are under the one hand, and from the one hand, and under the same law. We are working for the same people and the same end, and obeying one God, knowing that the beautiful and the useful are in the one mind of God, and that His thoughts concerning them are for the same race of man. He wills that man should have both.

"Man doth not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." And is it not by the word that proceedeth out of His mouth that I came into existence? and I, and such as we, are for the nourishment of man's spirit.

"We say, Look for the bounty of God not only in the material, but in the beautiful. He is as rich in the last as in the first, and what He thought well to manifest Himself so largely in, must have its own intrinsic worth.

"We say, Learn to think of God in regions beyond mere needs and their supply: have a knowledge of His passing beyond bread."

Little primula, you don't know men's ways; there are many to whom "give us this day our daily bread" is the only prayer with meaning; they only want to find God in bread. If He give that, that is enough for them—He has been a good God enough for them. Oh, little primula! the world is turned upside down, and man is turned out of the garden.

But Jesus said that there still were lilies in the field, and that God clothed them, and He told them to speak to man, and to tell him that the God of the flowers and the God of man are the same God. The flowers are the witnesses of God; the flowers are the outwellings of the fullness of God.

Little primula, little primula, I know you had a great deal more to say to me, but the eggs were now but shells, the sardines had departed, leaving but the indigestible tails behind (they forgot their heads, every one of them, when they were tinned), and there was a hole in the marmalade; and the fat respectable family loaf had subsided into a few broken pieces and desultory crumbs, and, according to the custom of the family, the breakfast ended, this was the time for family prayer, and I was asked to officiate at it. Where the ordinary reading happened then to lie was in St. Matt. xxvi., and we read about the woman who had an alabaster box of very precious ointment, and who poured the ointment on the head of Christ. There were those who had indignation, and who called it waste, and would have turned the ointment to what they considered practical use, selling it for much, and giving it to the poor. But Jesus said that the woman was not to be troubled, for she had wrought a good work on Him.

Oh, little primula, were you in my thoughts when I said a few words about that woman and her gift? Were you making use of my human mouth, and speaking Divine things through me? We thought over the offering as one of holy emotion, holy impulse, something beyond the routine of daily service and common thought. It came from love; and what was love but an emotion? and let him who would scorn love as a mere emotion bethink him of what love can do—how it can outwell, how it can consecrate, how it can devise, how grand are its impulses, as well as, when need be, how amazing are its endurance! That box was the primula at that feast; and just as my little primula was spending its life with a testimony unread by many, with a voice just for one, so that box was spending itself: the beautiful scent, an emotion, an impulse of love understood not by anyone around, but understood and appreciated too by Christ.

Many pretty conceits might gather themselves around flowers: they seem like the smiles of God upon the earth. I wonder if we shall transgress, if we think of them as God's emotions too? So many tokens has the earth of the practical love, that we may be excused if we may claim some from the emotional also. We know that scientists have discovered uses in flowers and their colours. What is that discovery but to join the practical and the emotional, after all?

All Scripture is full of the holy emotional character of God, and out of it comes many a brightness, many a beauty for us, which hard necessity and the provision for the necessity do not require.

The giving of the woman, the getting of Judas ("What will ye give me, and I will deliver Him unto you?"): the holy emotion, it gave everything; the perverted practical, it grasped everything; and as it was then, so is it now: to the one there was everlasting blessing, with the other, everlasting curse.

As to us, dear readers, let us set up a flower in our hearts and in our homes. Let us refuse to be bound down entirely to the body and its needs and their supply. Let us feel that we have that which cannot be fed by bread alone, and let us recognise the same God in the granite and the gem, in the sparkle of the dewdrop that nourishes the grass-blade as in the grey ocean that beats against the shore—in all things beautiful as in all things needful. All are the outcomings of a Father's feelings for His children, the thoughtfulness and the emotions of His love. All through the world, if only our eyes were opened that we might see, we should find what I found on that country breakfast-table, that day—BLOSSOM AND BREAD.

"FATHER'S OWN."

BY THE AUTHOR OF "BEAUTY AND THE BEAST," "THE DOCTOR'S PARTNER," ETC.

A LONG stretch of lawn in an old-fashioned country garden, which, in spite of the sharp autumnal air, somehow contrived to keep about it a suggestion of summer; and in its midst six wooden kitchen chairs, arranged with much precision in a semi-circle.

Into this scene of still life came presently a small girl, bearing something wrapped with much care in her pinafore, which, when uncovered, proved to be a big dinner-bell, which she placed upon one of the end chairs before seating herself next to it. Evidently the time for ringing it had not yet arrived.

She was a pretty little thing in a red serge frock, with big brown eyes and curly hair; and if there had been anyone at The Court with time to expend on such sentiment, it might possibly have occurred to him that that same suggestion of summer which still clung about the lawns and terraces was mainly owing to the sunshine of this child's presence. For when she moved, she danced from pure happiness instead of walking, and when she laughed it would indeed have been a grim nature which did not find her laughter infectious.

She was five minutes too early, for that bell was to be rung exactly at twelve by the clock in the bell-tower at the top and in the very middle of the big house; but Violet would have sat there patiently waiting for an hour, rather than have sounded it a minute too early or too late, and so have brought down upon her devoted head the scornful inquiry of her brothers: "What can you expect of her? She is only a girl."

They were watching her now, she knew, the five of them, although there was not a trace of them to be seen; for punctuality is one of the most important rules in a soldier's life, and consequently, it was one of the most important in the lives of the young Carmichaels. For Father was soldiering out in India, and the great idea and ambition of these motherless children of his, whom he had left in the old Kentish home, was to behave now as nearly as possible in their nursery and schoolroom days as they would have to behave in time to come, in those glorious grown-up years when Norman, Harry, and Rupert, when Ned and Eustace, would all be in the army too, fighting for Queen and country.

I am afraid their ideas of this wonderful future were a little vague, for they all intended to be in the Scarlet Lancers, "like Father," and to be majors, the whole five of them, "like Father" again; but in the meantime, it did them no harm, but, on the contrary, much good, to work hard at their lessons and be punctual and "smart," and obey their tutor as the officer in charge of "Father's Own," and try not to grumble overmuch when the morning baths were uncomfortably cold, or Perrin, their nurse, even crosser than usual. Much of this, of course, was hard to put up with at times, but they were all so devoted to the father whom the coming Christmas was bringing back to them, and so enamoured of the idea of following in his footsteps, that it was quite sufficient for their tutor, Mr. Stuart, to say contemptuously: "Well, you'll never make a soldier, my boy," to bring the most unruly of them to order at once.

But all this naturally applied only to the boys, and not to the one little daughter who was now anxiously watching the clock, for she was "only a girl," poor mite, and she felt the disgrace keenly.

Ding! Dong!

The first of the twelve strokes had sounded, and was immediately followed by the sharp clanging of the dinner-bell as Violet rang it hastily, and by war-whoops issuing simultaneously from five different pairs of lungs, as the boys came rushing out of their various ambushes, and made straight for the chairs.

"I've 'martist," shrieked Eustace at the top of his shrill baby treble, as he hurled himself on to the nearest chair; for his five-year-old wisdom had shown him a hiding-place behind an overturned wheel-barrow, which gave him but a short distance to run to his sister.

To be "smart," which was a soldier's word their father had taught them, meant many things, but principally quickness, neatness, and obedience, and as Eustace clambered on to his seat he felt that he had covered himself with glory.

Harry came next: he was Violet's twin. And then, neck and neck, arrived Rupert, and Norman, the biggest of them all. Last came stolid, good-tempered Ned, saying lazily: "Oh, someone must be last! What does it matter?"

"REPORTS!" screamed Norman, and all the others jumped, and thought what a fine thing it was to be ten and a half, and have such a big voice.

They knew that the one in command always did behave as if everyone else were deaf, but they none of them could make quite such a noise as Norman did, so they envied him accordingly.

"Sergeant Cuff's report," Norman continued. "Norman—good. Harry—good. Violet—good. Oh, we are all good, of course. What is the use of reading it?"

"Use of reading it?" echoed Eustace. He had not very many ideas of his own yet, poor little man, but he always repeated the fag-end of everybody else's, and so it seemed as if he had a great number.

The sergeant was an old soldier who lived at The Court, and who drilled the children, and it was very seldom that he had other than an excellent report to give of them. But then they were all good with him, "of course," as Norman said, for they loved the drill, and they loved the man who could tell them such

"She whipped me when I sat on the edge of the bath to see what would happen," Rupert said, so mournfully that Harry tried to console him.

"Well, it did happen, anyhow, for I met a pond walking down the stairs," he said. "And at all events, it sounds growner-up than to have one's breakfast for a week standing, because I fidget so when I'm on a chair."

So it was, they all agreed, but it had to be written down, all the same, and by the time the rest of them had spoken, and Perrin's reports were completed, they looked very bad indeed.

"It is a horrid bother!" began Norman discontentedly; when Ned called out—"There's Mr.

"The boys went through their drill."—p. 144.

wonderful tales about their father, so it was not surprising.

"Perrin's report," Norman said next.

He had a little note-book in his hand, and a stumpy badly cut pencil, which he sucked whenever he wasn't speaking. There was a silence. Most of them disliked the nurse as much as they loved the old sergeant, and it was discouraging to hand in to Mr. Stuart, for whose benefit this conclave was being held, such black accounts of their conduct.

Violet was the bold one who broke the silence.

"I've been shaken twice, an' once I was tied to the bed-post—"

"Say you were put under arrest. It sounds better," put in Harry in a hasty aside.

"—'cause I leaned too hard against a window."

"Did you smash it?" inquired Norman, and when she answered "Yes," he gravely wrote down—"Placed under arrest for distruktion of property;" and though the spelling looked a little odd, still it sounded well.

Stuart! Oh! and a gentleman;" and rolling off his seat, stood before it as stiff as a little ramrod.

The rest did the same, and Mr. Stuart acknowledged the salute as gravely as if he were in the service himself, instead of being "just a civilian, poor thing!" as Harry used to call him before it had been practically explained to him that civil law was the law of the land.

"This is a friend of mine, boys," said Mr. Stuart pleasantly. "He and I were old college chums, and now I find he is the new vicar here in the village."

"And we are all going to be tremendous friends, are we no'?" the stranger said at once.

He was a big rosy-faced man, and he had a big jolly voice which attracted all the children, but still they stared up at him tongue-tied, and only Violet retained a sufficient recollection of Perrin's daily lectures on "manners," to slide a small friendly hand into his large one, and to say shyly—"Yes, please."

But somehow, those two soft words seemed to satisfy Mr. Clewer (that was the new vicar's name), and while the boys went through their drill in obedience to Mr. Stuart's suggestion that they should show their visitor how well even Baby Eustace knew it, he continued to hold Violet's hand, and to squeeze it occasionally, just to show that he remembered she was there.

"Can't you do all this, too?" he whispered to her; and when her brown eyes brightened in a way that meant of course she could, "Why don't you, then?" he said.

Violet only answered by a silent shake of the head.

She could not explain to a stranger that Norman would never let her "show off," or mix in any way with the rest of them, when anyone was there. It was too sore a point to speak about, and, as her brothers said, it was fair enough. She had had as much chance of being born a boy as any of the others, and she had not taken it: that was all.

But Mr. Clewer was one of those lovely people who understand things without having them explained to them, and he answered that silent shake of the little maid's head that very afternoon, just as perfectly as if he and she had talked together for an hour. And the way he did it was by asking two questions: one of the child herself, and one of his friend Mr. Stuart.

"Isn't she rather out of it—one girl amongst so many boys?" he said to the latter, when they were alone.

Mr. Stuart looked puzzled for a moment, and then laughed.

"Oh, I don't know," he said. "She is as sharp as a needle at lessons, and the best Latin scholar of the lot. But I don't see much of her at other times, for I find her much harder to get on with than the boys. And I am told she is constantly in hot water in the nursery, so perhaps it is not all my fault."

This was the other question Mr. Clewer asked, and he addressed it to Violet—

"Will you come and have tea with me to-morrow afternoon?" he said.

The next afternoon (I have not written down Violet's answer, because there could be no manner of doubt as to what that would be) was a thoroughly unpleasant one, so misty that one could only see over half a field, and so clammy that a winter fur-edged coat was not a bit too warm. But country children are not in the habit of staying at home on account of the weather, and precisely at four o'clock, which was the time Mr. Clewer had fixed, Violet was saying good-bye to the sergeant, who had walked with her as far as the vicarage gate.

"Hold your head up, missy, and answer spry and pretty-like," quoth the old soldier, and then he turned back into the lane, and Violet walked sedately up the trim garden path.

"If you please, is Mr. Clewer at home?" she began, the moment the door was open; and though it was Mr. Clewer himself who opened it, she went on to ask—"If you please, can I see him, then?"

The vicar asked her afterwards why she did it, and she explained that this was her endeavour to behave "pretty-like;" for having arranged the two sentences in readiness for the maid, she could not find fresh ones on the spur of the moment for the master. But this was much later in the afternoon, after Mr. Clewer's old housekeeper had shown her the three tabby cats in the kitchen, and he himself had shown her the pictures in the study, and after they had had tea together.

And what a tea it was! Violet lost all her shyness, and enjoyed herself mightily, though beforehand she had felt rather nervous about the meal when she remembered how much she had annoyed the doctor's wife at her tea-times. For when the little girl went there first, she began with cake instead of bread-and-butter, and Mrs. Withers talked out loud to her tea-cosy about what a pity it was that children should be so greedy, and that in her young days they were taught to begin with wholesome bread-and-butter. So when Violet went there the next time, she started on a thick piece of crust, and then Mrs. Withers looked injured, and told her tea-cosy how disappointing it was to provide holiday fare for children who did not appreciate it.

But at the vicarage, nothing like this happened. The big rosy-faced vicar sat one side of the huge tea-tray (it was a black wooden one, and there was a bunch of blue and scarlet poppies painted in the middle, which was beautiful to behold), and Violet sat on the other, and poured out. And whenever she poured the milk on to the tray as well as into the cups, which happened very often, the vicar said it was the fault of the milk-jug, and he hid the little white pools under the china sugar-basin. Then he told her about the cow whose name was Strawberry, and who had given them that milk, and how she thought her own paddock and her own cow-house were the most important parts of all England. He said that if that cow saw a map of the world, she would expect that field and house to take up quite half the space; and that this idea was not so very unlike the ideas of a good many people who thought themselves of just such an absurd amount of importance as did Strawberry.

And in return, his little visitor told him all about "Father's Own," and how the boys were all going to be soldiers when they grew up, and how she couldn't, since she was only a girl. But she had her initials, all the same; and were they not beautiful ones?

"What are they?" asked her new friend, and Violet answered proudly—"V. C."

"That is how Father often ends his letters," she added presently. "'My love to my dear little V.C.' Or else, 'Tell V. C. that I quite count on her living up to her pet name, and that she must be as brave and soldierly as any of the boys.'"

The vicar sat and looked at her for a moment, and then he said slowly—"Then, what is it you are miserable about?" for though Violet had not told him she was miserable, he seemed to know it quite well.

"Because it is all pretence," she answered at once.

"Violet sat on the other side, and poured out."—p. 144.

"Just play an' pretence, an' 'cause Father loves me, you know. For I can't really be as 'soldierly as any of the boys.' I can't be anything much."

This was after tea, and Mr. Clewer was sitting in a comfortable old arm-chair, while Violet perched on one of the padded arms; but now he drew her down on to his knee, and kissed her.

"Who does the army belong to, little one?"

"The Queen," said Violet promptly.

"And it exists, it fights, to protect—what?"

"Queen and country, and the right." The old sergeant had taught the children all these things, and Violet's words came fast.

"And who is greater than the Queen, and owns not only our country, but all countries? Who is the Head of all that is right?"

"God," said Violet; and this time she spoke very softly.

"Yes, dear, God. Well, then, don't you see what we are getting at, and what I am quite sure your father means you to understand? From the day you were born you were intended to be 'a soldier of Christ,' and that you must be, and must go on being, whether you are a boy, to grow up and enter the service, and wear a red coat, or whether you are a girl" (here he kissed her again), "and so have a much harder duty to perform than ever the boys can have."

Violet sat bolt upright, and thought.

"Harder?" she said at last, and her eyes flashed.

She was so accustomed, poor mite, to be willing to do far more than she was ever allowed to do, and so used to being told all her longings to be and do things were of no avail, that the idea that she too had hard work to perform, and "harder duty," than the boys, Mr. Clewer had said, made her small face flush, and her whole body quiver with delight.

"Tell me how?" she said at last; and Mr. Clewer told her.

He began talking at first of what seemed quite a different thing, for he talked of the coming Christmas-tide, and of the dear Christ-Child whose birthday it then was. He made her understand how pretty He must have looked resting on His mother's breast as she lay upon the golden straw, and how, though He was such a tiny infant that He could not teach anything yet in words, still there was one great beautiful lesson which He gave us from the first, and that was "Peace on Earth." He smiled up into His mother's face, and that was peace, for the smile of the Christ-Child glorified, and still does glorify, even the commonest acts of daily life into blessedness. He stretched His dimpled hands towards the beings who brought Him gold, and frankincense, and myrrh, and that was Peace, since to have our offerings accepted by the King of heaven brings an untold contentment. And lastly, without doing anything, He just lay and looked, in His gracious, innocent baby way, on all who cared to approach Him, and that indeed was peace on earth, since no joy here or hereafter can equal that of being looked on and loved by the Christ-Child.

And then Mr. Clewer told Violet what it meant being "a soldier of Christ," a soldier of this helpless baby who had been cradled in a manger. It meant that besides having to be and do all the good things which "Father's Own" were striving after, she would also have to get higher than that. She would have to be punctual, of course, for the Queen's soldier had to be that; but she would also have to be careful that in her endeavour to be punctual she did not drive everybody out of their minds with worry, and so bring bad temper, instead of peace, on earth. She would have to be obedient, too; but instead of just being it outwardly, she would have to get rid of all the rebellious thoughts as well, and be loyal in her heart as well as in her body.

And above all, at the present time—and this is what the vicar had meant when he said she had harder work before her than had the boys—it was her business not to feel hurt and sore when the boys called her “only a girl,” because she was a soldier already, and one who might at any time be called upon to do very great deeds, and because there could not be an “only” about that.

When their talk was over, Mr. Clewer asked Violet whether she would be so kind as to sew a button on to his glove; and Violet was so proud at being asked, that she sewed it on so very firmly that there was quite as much thread as button by the time it was finished, and its owner could never fasten that glove, after all. But he never told Violet, knowing well that it was extra love which had put in all those extra stitches; and when the time came for her to go home, and the sergeant stood waiting for her at the garden gate, her new friend told her how much he had enjoyed having her.

The little girl looked puzzled. She had been so happy that she had forgotten all about answering “spry and pretty-like,” but now she suddenly recollected.

“I thought it was the one who came who said the ‘thank-yous,’ not the one who had you,” she said to the vicar. “But if you say it, there’s nothing left for me to say.”

“Well, we might thank each other,” said Mr. Clewer gravely.

So they shook hands and thanked each other, which made Violet feel easier in her mind; and she had crossed the porch on her way out, and had acknowledged the sergeant’s salute from the bottom of the trim little path, when she thought of something else, and came back to ask—

“When Perrin says, ‘Well, have you been good?’ what shall I say? Perrin said she expected me to be as ‘good as gold.’ Have I been all that, Mr. Clewer?”

“You have been heaps better,” said the vicar unexpectedly. “To be as good as gold is not worth much. Why, it has to be changed into something else before it has any use or power whatever. No, no; tell Perrin you have been as good as a little V. C. ought to be. And tell Mr. Stuart I shall look him up again very soon.”

Violet and the sergeant ran races all the way home. She could run faster, but then he could keep it up the longer, so they generally reached the hedge, or whatever the winning-post was, very much at the same time. This made it exciting; and when, moreover, the sergeant promised her that if she could manage somehow to win a prize that Christmas-time, and so become the proud possessor of a new drum, he would teach her how to beat a tattoo upon it, Violet felt that the crowning touch had been put to a most successful day.

Norman patronised her, and Rupert was too passionate for much friendship to be possible, but when she could get them quite to herself, so that they were not afraid of what their brothers might say, both Harry and Ned were devoted to Violet, and to them she confided the Christmassy part of the vicar’s talk. But, of course, she did not tell them the bits which only concerned herself, for they wouldn’t have understood.

“I wish we could do something for Christmas, too,” she ended wistfully. “I asked Cuff what he was going to do to bring peace upon the earth, an’ he said he had an old brother who was married and not doing extra-well, and that he always gave them a helping hand once a year.”

“Well, we can’t do that for Norman,” remarked Ned, with striking common sense, “‘cause he isn’t married yet. But there’re some children in the red cottage close to Eustace’s most favourite oak, an’ they none of them ever had Christmas presents in all their lives. We might give an extra hand to them.”

“How do you know?” asked Harry; and he spoke in quite an awe-struck voice, for it seemed to him a dreadful thing not to have any Christmas presents. “Perrin never lets us talk to the poor children, for fear of measles, or something.”

“It rained the other day, an’ we ran in there,” explained Ned. “She talked to the woman, an’ I talked to the children, an’ I said, ‘S’ppose Santa Claus asked you, what would you choose?’”

“Drums and guns, and helmets and swords,” Violet said at once—for these were what she and her brothers were always wanting; but it appeared that the little Browns wished for none of these things.

The cripple boy longed for a fresh crutch, since he had outgrown the small one the village carpenter had once made him. The little girl wanted a fresh pinafore for Sunday-school, and a pair of mittens for chilblained little hands; while the grubby babies had only one desire, and expressed it in one word—dollies.

Ned seemed to have made the most of his time in the red cottage, for before the rain cleared and Perrin called to him, he had learned that the reason why the Browns were quite sure that Santa Claus would not come near them was because father had hurt himself and was in the infirmary, and mother had said that Father Christmas would not come to such a poor home as theirs would be this year.

“We must get them for them with some of Father’s money,” Violet decided at once; and the others agreeing, they talked it over eagerly.

Major Carmichael sent them five shillings each as a Christmas-box every year, and though they were strictly charged to buy themselves a gift from him with it, still, as Violet pointed out, he had never told them to spend it all upon themselves, and they might easily get "a littler thing," and let the rest go to the crutch or the dollies.

But nothing of such importance could be done at The Court without the sanction of brother Norman, and when Norman was asked, he said he thought it was nonsense, for soldiers never went muddling about in poor cottages: they minded their own business, and they expected other people to mind theirs, and, for his part, he intended to give part of the money towards decorating the school-room as usual, and to spend the rest in buying a jolly big cannon.

"What is the use of listening to Violet? she is only a girl; I must know best," he said to the others; and Harry, who had been boasting rather about what he would do, and how he would buy the crutch all by himself, turned round the other way at once.

"It is just one of your stupid ideas, Violet," he growled. "I shall buy a cannon, too."

"You are afraid of Norman laughing at you," Ned said in his sober way; and since this was doubly aggravating for being true, Harry flew at him with a face as red as a turkey-cock's.

Ned put up his elbow to ward off the blow, and as Violet rushed to the rescue she came into violent collision between the two boys, and received a knock from each of them.

Rupert broke in with a jeering: "Hit a girl? Ugh! you cowards!" which didn't tend to improve matters when neither of them had meant to touch her, and a long wrangle followed, which ended in Mr. Stuart entering the room, and sending the four of them supperless to bed.

"At any rate, the chaplain was right when he said it was 'hard,'" thought Violet, as she sobbed herself to sleep.

It grew harder still in the next few days, for Norman and Harry took it into their heads that Violet had become "uppish" since Mr. Clewer had taken so much notice of her; and without in the least realising how unkind they were, they resolved to make her thoroughly understand that she could in no way expect to be put on an equality with their own lordly little selves.

Why, they were boys, lords of creation, which naturally included any little curly-headed sister who might chance to belong to them; and, furthermore, they were going to be soldiers one of these days, and everyone knew that soldiers were the grandest and bravest men alive.

But, in spite of much teasing and snubbing, Violet stuck bravely to her point, and tried very hard to bring peace upon the earth, both in doing her best to keep good-tempered with the others and in procuring the gifts coveted by the little Browns. This latter was the easiest endeavour, for it is wonderful how you can get Christmas presents for other people if you only set your mind to it. The sergeant volunteered to make the crutch for her in the wool-house if only she would give him threepence to get some stuff to cover the arm-rest; a pinafore she had outgrown would do beautifully for Sally; and though it nearly broke her heart to part with her two dearest dolls—for they were the only two she had which the boys had not broken—still, she made the sacrifice for the sake of the grubby-faced twins. So all that was left to buy were the mittens, and they could be had for ninepence at the village shop.

"I'll give you half of it, V. C.," said the faithful Ned, who had a great idea of justice, and who, since he had discovered the Browns, looked upon himself as especially bound to help them. "I'd give you more, but the five shillings hasn't come yet, an' I've got to pay two of it to Perrin for smashing the water-jug. Jugs are stupid things to play cricket with, aren't they, Violet?"

No, the five shillings had not come yet, but just one week before Christmas a letter arrived from India enclosing the money for all of them, and also a most marvellous piece of good news, and that was that Father—dear, dear Father—was coming home! He had kept his intention a secret, for fear that he might not be able, after all, to get to them by the twenty-fifth, but now it was quite certain that he would do so, for he reached London on Christmas Eve, and, of course, would travel down to The Court. He longed to see his darlings, he wrote.

And as for the children—well, I really do wonder that they did not go out of their minds with excitement. They had not seen Major Carmichael for two years, and neither Eustace nor Ned could remember him at all clearly; but instead of absence dimming their love for him, I really think it had increased it, for each of the five boys had invented a different hero for himself whom he called "Father," and for whom he prayed regularly every night and every morning; while as for Violet, she would gladly have let herself be cut into little pieces if by so doing she could have spared Father even half an hour's head-ache.

So she was terribly disappointed, poor child, when Norman decided that, though she might help in decorating the schoolroom with holly, and in sticking up a very wobbly, but a very triumphal, arch of evergreens in the hall, with "WELCOME HOME" in cotton-wool letters in the centre; and though they allowed her to spend all the rest of her money in buying some squibs to let off in Father's honour, she still could not possibly form one of "Father's Own," when the regiment of boys stood waiting to receive him at the lodge gates. They would see the dog-cart at the bend in the road, and then they would fire off the two new cannon by way of a salute, and then be drawn up as a guard of honour to receive him. Violet might be somewhere near them, if she liked; she might even, if Perrin would let her, drive to the station to meet him; but under no consideration might she be enrolled in the regiment on such an important occasion.

Rupert made this all the more difficult to bear by explaining the real reason of this decision.

"You see," he said to her, "it is not so much that you would look horrid, though, of course, a frock spoils it all; but it is because you're not brave enough to play at soldiers. You would scream when the salute is fired."

"I shouldn't," retorted Violet indignantly; and then remembering that this was scarcely a peace-maker's answer, she swallowed her anger, and said very gently: "Please, Ru, do get the others to say I may. I know I screamed at the rat, but I never will at anything else: an' even Cuff said he was 'a nasty-looking brute.' And it squealed horribly, didn't it, now?"

"So it was," truth compelled Rupert to agree, for he had not much liked that rat himself. "But the cannons make more row than a rat does any day; and anyhow, we don't want a girl, 'cause girls aren't brave."

This was all the explanation she could get from any of them; and when, on Thursday night (Christmas Day being on the Saturday), she went off to bed as usual at seven o'clock, she looked so miserable that even Perrin, who did not often notice such things, kissed her quite fondly as she tucked her up, and said: "Get off to sleep as soon as you can, Missy, and wake up a bit brighter in the morning, for I declare it gives me the doldrums to see you looking so wretched."

Violet obediently went off to sleep as soon as she could, but her "could" that particular night was a long time in coming; and when it did come, she kept waking up again with a start. Perhaps she was too tired to sleep properly, and certainly her great disappointment was not calculated to soothe her.

But at last she went off into a comfortable lullaby slumber, and in it she dreamed a dream which was of that beautiful kind in which things hard to understand are made quite plain and easy, and during which, if our eyes were opened, and we could pierce through the darkness, we should see that an angel was watching over us.

This was the dream:

She dreamed that she was living in a lovely land which was called The Land of Content. It was beautiful with flowers, which, instead of fading, as our earth-flowers do, grew more and more exquisite as time passed on; and with happy smiling people who always were busy, and yet who always had time to help each other. And everywhere there was a lovely golden haze.

Here, too, it was Christmas Day, and gifts were being offered to Someone who was hidden from her, because at the particular place where He stood the golden haze grew brighter and more golden, until Violet veiled her eyes before its splendour. But she saw the gifts which were being borne towards Him by beings in white garments, and suddenly Violet understood that these were the angels of Paradise, and that what they held in uplifted hands were the presents which people in the Land of Shadows—that is, the earth—had given at that season of the year for the Christ-Child.

Some was raiment for naked children whom they had been commanded to clothe: many offerings were of food given to the hungry: the hands of several of the angels were filled with golden coins: and many more held toys for motherless babies who had none.

But the strangest part of it all was that very few of these gifts actually reached to the Christ for whose dear sake they were all of them supposed to be offered. For unless the intention was absolutely pure—which means that unless the thoughts which went with the gift were wholly of the Christ-Child and His poor, and nothing at all of self—they shrivelled away in the heat of the splendour surrounding Him, and never reached to Him at all.

Lots of clothes had been made because it was expected of the maker; "and one must live up to one's position, my dear." Large cheques had been drawn, to put to shame other people's. Food had been given indiscriminately, and without involving the slightest personal trouble. One and all they faded away and disappeared when brought to the test of the heavenly light; and though this was the part of her dream which was not so clear to the little maid as was the rest, as she grew older it came to be the part which helped her most. But now, as she seemed to be standing and watching the white-robed procession, she grew suddenly bewildered, for there came an angel with a common wooden crutch, such as Sergeant Cuff and Violet had planned between them for Mrs. Brown's lame boy.

"Oh, please don't. The light will burn it up, an' I want it for Bobby," Violet tried to call out; but the words refused to come, and while she sought for them, behold! the angel bearing the wooden crutch passed straight through the surrounding glory, and a voice came out of the cloud which said, "She hath done what she could."

And the cloud grew brighter and more intense, and became hotter and hotter, until Violet gasped for breath, and gasping, opened her eyes, and—found the nursery was on fire!

The little girl rolled out of bed like a ball, and ran into the next room to call to Perrin, who slept there with Eustace and Ned. She met the nurse on the threshold, carrying Ned in her arms, and at the same moment Violet found herself caught up in Mr. Stuart's arms, and carried hastily down the stairs.

"The others are all out," he shouted back over his shoulder to Perrin, who was following him; "they are in the gardener's cottage. We can't save the house, but I'll try to get out of it all I can as soon as you are all safe."

He ran down the stairs like lightning, and across the narrow strip of garden which divided the back part of the hall from the cottage, and when they got there, Violet found the servants and her brothers there before them, and they were all only half-dressed and dreadfully frightened.

There was such a hubbub and commotion, and such an appalling noise that night! Violet had read about a fire in one of her story-books, and there it was all quite easy to understand, how first one part of the house had caught fire, and then another part, and how the fire-engines came up just when they were wanted, and the people made themselves useful passing buckets full of water from one to another.

But here, at The Court, it wasn't a bit like that. The sergeant and the rest of the men-servants, and Mr. Stuart and Mr. Clewer, were all running this way and that, and everybody screamed at the top of their voices; and all the furniture was being carried out and stacked up in the middle of the fives court, and the darkness of the night seemed to lie about in huge mountainous shadows wherever the glare of the flames did not reach, and Perrin and the cook and the boys were all talking at once, when a voice cried sharply—

"Where's Eustace?"

It was Violet who called that out, but no one heard her, and the cottage was so dark, illumined only by the glare of the burning house, that no one saw her either as she ran out of the room, and across the stretch of kitchen garden, with her heart beating so violently that it almost seemed as if it would leap out of the quivering little body. For she knew at once how it came about that the baby-boy of the household had been overlooked in the general scramble for life. Perrin had put him as a punishment to sleep in the elder boys' dormitory, instead of keeping him with her, as usual, in the night-nursery; and, of course, Mr. Stuart had not known of this when he had rushed in to arouse its ordinary occupants. So Eustace must be there now.

Avoiding the front stairs, which she knew were on fire, Violet raced up the back ones as rapidly as ever her feet could carry her, for the steps were of stone, and as yet were untouched.

But when she reached the landing where the boys' room was, "there was a lot of smoke and chokiness," as she said to her father afterwards, "and then; oh! then I forget."

And the major would never let her try to recollect, for fear she should cry, now that it was all over, and crying didn't matter; so really there is very little to tell about her adventures that night. But Mr. Clewer can, at all events, relate the end of the story, and describe how he looked up suddenly, and saw the child standing by the window with Eustace, drowsy with sleep, in her arms. He tells, too, of the awfulness of that moment when he saw the flames beginning to lick round the window-sill, and of the difficulty of rescuing the children, which was so great that the girl's arm was scorched before she was back again in Perrin's keeping. And then he, too, breaks down, as if he would like to cry as well, as he tells how Violet held out her burden to his eager arms, and said simply—

"Take Eustace first, an' if I don't ever see Father, tell him I tried to be brave."

"And so she was, bless her!" Major Carmichael always adds at this point; "and I think, too, she has taught some of us what real courage means. All my boys belong to 'Father's Own,' but there is only one little V.C., after all," and not even Norman ventures to contradict him.

NEW LIGHT ON OLD TEXTS.

BY THE REV. TRYON EDWARDS, D.D.

"But I would ye should understand, brethren, that the things which happened unto me have fallen out rather unto the furtherance of the Gospel. So that my bonds in Christ are manifest in all the palace, and in all other places."—PHILIPPIANS 1, 12, 13.

AS whatever throws light on any declaration or passage of the Bible is always both interesting and instructive, the verses indicated above are worthy of a brief notice.

St. Paul, writing from his prison in Rome, tells the Philippians that he would have them understand that his imprisonment has not hindered, but rather has helped, the spread of the Gospel—that his bondage for Christ's sake has enabled him to make the great principles of the Gospel known, as our version reads, "in all the palace, and in all other places"; or, as the new version more properly says, "throughout the whole Prætorian guard, and to all the rest"—i.e., through the guards, as we might say, "to everybody else," so that thus the truth had a wider spread and greater influence than it otherwise would have had.

If it is asked how this could be—how the Apostle, shut up in the Roman dungeon, could do more for the extension of the Gospel than if he were free to go everywhere preaching Christ and Him crucified as the foundation and model of all true character and the only hope of the soul—the answer may be found in the circumstances of his imprisonment. For, according to the Roman custom, the captive in prison was chained to a soldier—one of the Prætorian Guard—his right hand to the soldier's left; and the soldier was relieved, and his place taken by another, every four hours, until every member of the company had taken turn in the service, when the duty was passed on to another company, every member of which, in like manner, spent hours with the Apostle. In this way Paul had the opportunity of free and full conversation with every member of the Prætorian Guard, and so was able to make the Gospel known to them all, and thus to introduce the leaven of Christianity not only into the leading corps of the Roman army, but, through its members, to great numbers of their friends and associates, and even also, as in this same Epistle he tells us (chapter iv. 22), to those who had become converts—"saints in Cæsar's (the Emperor's) household." It was during this imprisonment, also, that the Apostle wrote not only this Epistle to the Philippians, but the Epistles to the Colossians, the Ephesians, and to Philemon, which in the past have been, and in the future will be, preaching to the ends of the earth while time shall last; so that his usefulness was not only not prevented, but was greatly increased by his imprisonment and chains.

What a lesson does this give us of how one of the right spirit may everywhere do good: of how the wrath of man may be overruled to the glory of God and the good of men: and how even the dungeon may become a pulpit, and the chains of persecution a means of extending the Gospel where otherwise it might not find its way.

WITH A DOCTOR OF CHARITY.

BY RAYMOND BLATHWAYT.

PLAY TIME.

LITTLE boy in uniform was rushing along the crowded Mile End Road, down which I myself was wandering on my way to Dr. Barnardo's Homes. Recognising by his familiar uniform that he himself was an inmate of these Homes, I bade him to take me with him and to tell me something of his young life.

"Have you any parents?" I asked him.

"No, sir," he replied. "My father died in prison and my mother killed 'erself, and ever since I've been at the 'omes."

"And you like them?"

"Oh yes, sir, we all like 'em," he replied, as though it were a matter of course that they should like them. And, indeed, as I was to find out a few minutes later, it would be very strange if boys who are so cared for, who are so tenderly looked after, whose every hour in life is thoughtfully considered and planned out, it would be strange indeed if they were not happy and contented.

Dr. Barnardo himself received me and showed me over one of his beautiful houses. It was pleasant to note the warm affection, the complete understanding, that exist between him and his enormous family, which consists of upwards of 5,000 children and not less than 800 employes. He appeared to be known to and loved and welcomed by everyone.

"But," said he to me, when I commented upon this fact, "the truth of the matter is that it is absolutely necessary that a man in my position should be in constant touch with everyone around him. I supervise everything personally, and that is one of the secrets of my success. This," he continued, as we entered a large, airy dormitory, every window of which was flung wide open, "this room contains ninety-six beds, and, as you can see, they are all in constant use."

I was much struck with the perfect cleanliness and utter comfort of this dormitory for homeless, and in many cases nameless, East-End lads. No dormitory in the best public school in England—and I have been in them all—can surpass it, and many do not equal it in these two essential particulars.

"Each bedroom," said my host, "leads on to the shops, for it is a part of my plan here that every single child shall be master of a trade before he leaves the building. Each department is presided over by a thoroughly skilled workman."

As the Doctor spoke we entered the tinsmiths' shop, and I was much struck with the eager intentness and the wonderfully apt manner displayed by each boy in the manufacture of kettles and saucepans. The same thing was evident in the tailors' fire-escape outside, which is on the New York Hotel plan. But we have here in the building itself a well-trained Fire Brigade, so that we are well provided against panic or accident. And the discipline is perfect; each boy would know what to do in a minute in case of alarm."

"And what led you to this work?" I asked, as the philanthropist led the way into a large and airy playground immediately beneath the Tilbury and Southend Railway.

"Many years ago," said he, "as far back, indeed, as 1866, a little ragged boy who attended a ragged Sunday-school which I used to conduct when I was starting in life as a doctor, lingered behind the other children whilst I shut up the room. I told him to go; he hesitated, and at last told me he had no home to go to. I was horror-struck. The boy's story opened up to me a state of things which I did not believe existed on earth. He was sheltered at once, and at once I began my work. That young street-arab rescued on that night has been succeeded by at least 23,000 other homeless and destitute children, and that single room in Stepney in which he slept that night has now grown to upwards of fifty distinct institutions. And it has all been done by faith. On an average we take in nine children a day. Now, if you will follow me we will go into some of their workshop, in which most of the boys were cripples, "for," said my host, "there is no physical disqualification for my Homes. And indeed it is a curious thing how the cripples are in some instances the happiest boys here. The other boys are wonderfully tender and loving towards them, the cripples associate with them exactly as do all the rest, and that gay young fellow without arms whom you see crossing the yard at this minute, is actually the best athlete we have in the Homes. Did you notice that little fellow," said the good man, as we entered the carpenters' shop in which they were busy making boxes, washing-stands, etc., "what a bright, happy little fellow he looked? I have a very touching memory of him. I was standing at my front door one bitter day in winter when a little ragged chap came up to me and asked me for an order of admission. To test him I pretended to be rather rough with him. 'How do I know,' I said, 'if what you tell me is true? Have you any friends to speak for you?' 'Friends!' he shouted. 'No; I ain't got no friends; but if these 'ere rags,' and he waved his arm about as he spoke, 'won't speak for me, nothing else will.'

"There, that was the most beautiful compliment ever paid to my work, and it was that dear little fellow over there, all over smiles, who paid it. And it was perfectly genuine, too!"

We stood a moment, Dr. Barnardo and I, in the printing office of the establishment.

"Here," said he, "are printed the histories of each child that comes into the building, and sadder stories have never been written on this earth."

In the hospital I sat talking to a little girl over whose cot was inscribed the legend, "In memory of Mary B. Miller"; a bright little maiden this, fast getting well, wrapped up in her dollies, and with a charming smile for everyone who spoke to her, and especially for the good Doctor, with whom she appeared to be on the easiest and pleasantest of terms. The "Gordon" Memorial Room was nearly empty.

"We have such good health here," explained my guide, "that I am glad to say these rooms are often quite empty. But you must come up to the convalescent room and to the roof, which is so constructed that they can go and sit out with perfect safety in the open air."

To the roof accordingly we mounted, to be greeted with shouts of merriment from a number of little boys who were fast recovering their health, and with a smile of broad and placid contentment from a big, handsome negro lad, who told me he hailed from New York. A beautiful and a striking view was that which met my eye from the top of this lofty house in East London. Sunshine everywhere, the masts of tall ships standing in the docks, far away a silvery gleam of water told us of the Thames flowing this summer day towards the great green Mother.

DR. T. J. BARNARDO.

And from below came the hushed roar and turmoil of those weary, awful streets, from which the young ones standing round me had been so recently snatched away. Never before had I so thoroughly realised the beauty of the work in which this devoted follower of his great Master is so earnestly and vigorously engaged.

"We have a little fellow named Sydney Lawrence under our charge," said Dr. Barnardo, "in whom you ought to be specially interested; he is one of the waifs supported by THE QUIVER Waifs Fund. He is on one of our training farms, and I daresay he will go out to Canada one of these days."

"Do you consider that the present condition of street children is improved from what it used to be when you first started this work, Dr. Barnardo?" said I.

"Yes," he slowly replied; "there is a great change in London, though not in many of the great provincial cities. Liverpool, for instance, is in a terrible condition, but in London it is greatly altered. The popular feeling is against rags and destitution. At the same time I think the street-boy of to-day possesses exactly the same kind of characteristics that he always possessed. It is very remarkable to anyone who has studied the subject as I have to note the manner in which juvenile crime has decreased of late years; this, I fancy, is owing in a great measure to the advance of education. It is rare nowadays to find a child who can't read. Thirty years ago, of course, it was the exception to find one who could."

"You send a great many to Canada, do you not?"

"Oh, yes. Last year alone I sent out upwards of 730 trained children to the Colonies, the largest number ever sent out in a single year. It brought up the total of our young emigrants to 5,737. When it is remembered that in Canada three Institutions are kept up, in which is resident a staff of experienced workers, who maintain constant supervision over our children, visiting them, writing to them, advising them, acting in sickness and in health as their friends and guides, the detailed perfection to which the organisation of that particular branch alone has been brought will be understood."

"And do the Colonies approve of your thus sending to them so many poor and destitute children?"

"Well," replied my host, "under my system they can hardly object. Emigration can only be carried on under the most stringent conditions. The history of emigration, as a rule, is strewn with failures arising from some radical defect in method or principle. We work on certain definite and well-thought-out lines of action. We send out only the flower of our flock: those who physically, spiritually, and mentally are in good health; only those boys who have been trained in our own workshops, or girls who have had most careful instruction in domestic service. Then the children, as I told you, are most carefully supervised, and should any prove to be total failures they are returned to England at our expense. As things are at present, we give the Colonies what they most want—honest, industrious, piously trained youths, who, by God's blessing, will grow into successful citizens in the near future."

"And admission to the Homes is absolutely free and unrestricted?"

"Absolutely," replied the Doctor, with a smile. "The golden key opens no doors here, I can assure you. On the contrary, it acts as a bar. Not even physical disability prevents a child from being taken in. We have at least 500 incurables within our walls. But, of course, with such facilities for admission, the greatest care has to be exercised that no improper advantage is taken of the Institutions. Inquiry is as stringent and thorough as we can make it. If an application is received from within the metropolitan area, it is personally investigated at first hand by a skilled staff of 'Children's Beadles.' If a country application comes within the radius of the new Provincial Branches, of which we have seven, which we call 'Ever-Open Doors,' it is investigated by our local agent on the same lines as here in London."

"And as regards the religious training of these waifs and strays, Dr. Barnardo? for I cannot help seeing that there are a good many evidences of religious feeling throughout the building."

"Well," replied the Doctor, "the Homes took their rise in a Sunday ragged-school. They are, as they always have been, Christian Institutions, their work being the practical outcome of the Gospel Spirit. But they stand absolutely outside the camps of mere sects or denominations. They are, of course, Protestant, and so Evangelical Christians of any party may and do join hands in our work. Whilst with us the children are not brought up exclusively in one denomination. One-half of all those in residence are under systematic instruction by Evangelical clergymen of the Church of England, attending the services of the church regularly and belonging to its Sunday-schools; about an equal number are brought up under earnest-minded Nonconformist ministers, and finally, when the children leave the Homes, they go out to employers who are professedly Christians, but irrespective of the Church or denomination to which such employers belong."

"You have special Homes for girls at Ilford, have you not?"

"Yes; indeed, a regular village. That village home of mine is an attempt to substitute the natural conditions of a cottage Home for the cold mercies, and often fatal advantages, of the workhouse, and to imitate the rescue of waif and destitute girls on broader lines of human and Christian charity. It arose out of a deep conviction that the 'Barrack system,' as it is called, of rearing young girls was altogether wrong. I became personally convinced that if young girls are to be brought up in a manner which will insure the highest results in life I must follow the Divine, which is, after all, the natural order, and let them live in small family groups. Why should not these poor little waif girls know the beauty of family life? And so we have built a large number of cottages, each of which contains a mother's sitting-room, a sitting- and play-room for the girls, a large dining-room for the family meals, and a kitchen, scullery, pantry, and store-room. Upstairs there are several bedrooms, each containing from four to six single beds. The daily life of the village is as homelike as I know how to make it. Each group of girls is ruled over by a 'mother,' and the relations sought to be maintained between her and her charges are mainly those of loving obedience. Then there are my babies. Out of the Ilford Home grew the Babies' Castle at Hawkhurst, in Kent. A baby had been placed in every one of the Cottage Homes, but the babies at last came too thick and fast. What was I to do? At last came light! Mr. Theodore Moilliet, who owned property at Hawkhurst, offered me the Villa of Hillside and the accompanying land, and here in a very short time twenty-six babies took possession of their new and comfortable quarters. But soon enough the space at Hawkhurst became too limited. I was forced to build upon the land so generously given to me, and in August, 1886, the Duchess of Teck opened 'Babies' Castle,' where we comfortably house upwards of two hundred babies at once, and we are never empty, I can assure you. Poor little things! some of them have sad histories. The mother of one of them, a murderess and would-be suicide, walked into the sea at Sandgate with her two children. She and little Billy, now a big fat boy, were rescued, the other poor child was drowned. She is now in prison for life, and Billy is safe at the Home."

The boys were playing cricket as I passed through the playground, the armless cripple was delighting a group of eager spectators with some wonderful athletic performances; a group of sad-faced, weary, tattered little fellows sat on a bench within the great hall.

"There," said my host, "before night those little fellows will be inmates of the Home, and safe, I hope, for evermore."

SHORT ARROWS.

NOTES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND WORK IN ALL FIELDS.

AN UNCHRISTIAN SPEECH.

NOTHING is so essentially snobbish and unchristian as to treat people slightly because they are poor. This, however, is what too many self-seekers do. They are like a young man who remarked lately in my hearing that he could not afford to know a poor person. And yet it was for the sake of even such persons as these that Jesus Christ became poor.

WORK AND BE WELL.

Amongst the North American Indians the medicine-man orders a sick person to be beaten into health! Similar enforced activity might not be a bad remedy for our hypochondriacs. But be this as it may, there is no doubt that what most of them want is more work. If they are unfortunate enough not to be obliged to labour, let them volunteer to do so for the sake of others, and then they will not have time to meditate upon their supposed ailments. "Laugh and be well" is a good maxim, but so is also—Work and be well.

"HE SHALL NEVER HEAR THE END OF IT."

Would that there were in us all the spirit which animated a sailor when he was first brought to God.

"To save such a sinner as I am!" he said, "He shall never hear the end of it." Those words, so bad when used revengefully, as they often are by man to his fellow-man, are excellent when they are used by us to Christ. But, alas! how little do we live in their spirit. At first, after conversion, we think we can never be grateful enough—that we shall never tire of praising—that we can never have enough of close communion with Christ; but how soon our hearts grow cold, or, at any rate, how soon their fire dwindles down into mere warmth! In heaven, indeed, Jesus shall never hear the end of it; but let us in this respect begin heaven on earth in the church and in our hearts.

FOR PRIZES OR PRESENTS.

Boys and girls who are not pleased with the books issued for their reading this year must indeed be hard to satisfy; in quality the works are as high, in quantity they are as abundant, as in former years, while their scope is much wider. That veteran friend of boys, Mr. R. M. Ballantyne, is again to books for prizes and presents, and when one thinks of books for girls what two names are more likely to be suggested than Agnes Giberne and Emma Marshall? To Miss Giberne we owe "The Andersons," and to Mrs. Marshall "The Close of St. Christopher's," both published by Messrs. Nisbet, and both equally well calculated to serve their purpose. The Christmas volume of Little Folks (Cassell) would make an admirable gift or reward for younger readers, for its varied contents would secure attention in any home circle.

GOOD FROM EVIL.

The life of the true Christian who sees the hand of God in all things is one long thanksgiving. Bernard Gilpin, when summoned to London to answer a charge of heresy, broke his leg. The person in whose custody he was retorted on Bernard his favourite saying, that nothing could happen to him but what was for his good; and the event showed its truth, for Queen Mary died, and through the delay occasioned by the broken leg his life was saved.

the fore, and in "The Walrus Hunters: a Romance of the Realms of Ice" (Nisbet), shows that his hand has lost none of its cunning with years, and that he can still give the boys of to-day a story as fully instinct with healthy incident and sustained interest as were its predecessors.—Dr. Gordon Stables is an old sailor, and quite at home in the telling of a sea-story for boys that he calls "Just Like Jack," which is published by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton; the tale is good in tone, and strong in incident.—Two other good stories for boys from the same firm are "Graeme and Cyril," by Mr. Barry Pain, and "In the '15: a Tale of the First Jacobite Insurrection," by the Rev. H. C. Adams; the former is one of the best school-stories we have seen for a long time, and the latter a thoroughly good historical tale.—But the girls must have their turn in our survey of suitable new

"THE QUIVER" GOOD CONDUCT PRIZES.

We give this month the portraits of the three winners of THE QUIVER Good Conduct Prizes for this year. Bertram Roberts and Jessie Gregory are both scholars at the Asylum for Fatherless Children, Reedham, and to them the prizes were presented on the occasion of the summer festival at the end of June. Corporal Alfred Carpenter is an inmate of the Gordon Boys' Home, and he received the prize at the annual inspection of the school. The prizes are awarded for "all-round" good conduct throughout the year, and our readers will be glad to hear that the prizes are much sought after and highly valued. We trust these children will have many imitators. Some day we hope to be able to present our readers with a list of past and present prize holders.

WINTER.

In summer we shrink from the thought that its beautiful long evenings, its flowers, fruit, and birds, its sunshine, its excursions and holidays, will soon be over, and that we shall be in the stern grasp of cold winter's iron hand once more. Still, the last rose of summer does not constitute the whole of life. If summer were perpetual we would soon degenerate. Nor is winter without compensations. The family circle round the fire is a school for the affections. We have then, too, more opportunity of forgetting ourselves in plans for the relief of the poor. And perhaps there is no better sport than rushing over the glittering ice on ringing skates while the blue sky and almost genial sunshine show that the heavens above have by no means forgotten the earth beneath. Yes, at all seasons God is near us, and sends to us such weather and other things as are most expedient for us.

SOME HELPFUL WORKS.

There are few preachers and teachers who can afford to disregard the help which is offered them in the careful volumes of "The Biblical Illustrator" (Nisbet), edited by the Rev. J. S. Exell. Three new ones are before us as we write. The second volume on the Epistle to the Hebrews completes a most difficult piece of work in a very satisfactory manner. Accompanying it are two of (apparently) three volumes on the Acts of the Apostles, a book which offers a wide field for illustrative anecdote and reference, of which Mr. Exell has availed himself to the fullest extent.—From Messrs. Isbister we have received two excellent volumes of sermons by the Archdeacons of London and Westminster. The former gives to his volume the title "Christ and Our Times," and a more direct and timely series of discourses we do not remember. Manly, outspoken utterances like these are what our times need. Archdeacon Farrar speaks very modestly in his preface of his "Sermons on the Lord's Prayer" as being

"of the plainest and simplest." They are not quite that, but they are near enough to it to form acceptable reading and helpful guidance for all.—"The Way into the Holiest" (Morgan and Scott) is the appropriate title which the Rev. F. B. Meyer gives to his expositions of the Epistle to the Hebrews. Our readers know and appreciate the helpful character of Mr. Meyer's work, and will, we are sure, welcome this suggestive volume.—Messrs. Nisbet send us a little collection of admirable sermons to children with the title "The Children's Pew," by the Rev. J. Reid Howatt, profitable as reading and helpful as models.—"The Concise Bible Dictionary," issued by Messrs. Isbister, fully justifies its title, but the work is full enough to meet all the requirements of ordinary readers.—Mrs. Boyd Carpenter, wife of our contributor, the Bishop of Ripon, is to be congratulated on the pretty allegories which go to form the tasteful volume which comes to us from Messrs. Isbister under the title, "Fragments in Baskets." They are at once light and deeply suggestive, and ought to do much good.

"THE HEAD" AND "THE HEART."

Some of the truest of God's people—some who know and serve Him best—have but little of the intellectual power of which the world makes so much. It is well for many of us that God looks at the heart and not the head—it is well for some, but it is ill for others; for there are many who know much theology in the head, but know little of love in the heart. We cannot understand God, but we can love Him. We cannot perhaps argue for God, but we can live for Him; or, if need be, die for Him. Oh, that we loved our Saviour so that we might be like the martyred girl who said, "I can't argue for Jesus, but I can die for Him." A crowd had assembled near the prison in Rome—all were busy in preparing for the work—some gathering fagots, others making firm the stake. The prison door opens, a young girl is brought to the stake, the fagots are placed round her—but she is to be given a chance for her life. A priest steps forward and asks, "Wilt thou recant?" The answer of the girl rang out distinct and clear in the morning air, "No!"

 "But why," said the priest, "wilt thou persist in so great an absurdity? Thou canst not give a reason for thy belief." The face of the Christian lighted up with almost heavenly radiance as she said, "I can't argue for

WINTER.

Jesus, but I can die for Him." Let us not concern ourselves so much about our understanding with the head, as loving with the heart. The testimonies of love are those which will be most valued in the Great Day.

THE SECRET OF PEACE.

"Are you not afraid, mother?" asked the kindred of an old body who during the progress of an earthquake remained calm, peaceful, and in good spirits. "No," was her answer, "I rejoice to know that I have a God who can shake the world." This reminds me of the story of an old Highland shepherd, who listened one evening to the discussions of some of his friends upon threatening political matters; and when he had heard all they had to say, strode off to the mountain after his sheep, saying out aloud, "The Lord is King, be the people never so impatient." That was enough for him. To be able to say, "This God is our God for ever and ever," is the secret of power and peace.

A UNIVERSAL NEED.

When the present Empress of Austria chose a tutor for her daughter she sent for a certain bishop, and told him that she had decided to entrust the Archduchess's education to him. "Teach her," she said, "to be a true Christian. We are all in sore need of religious support to go through this life."

CHRISTMAS BOOKS.

The phrase is used to cover a variety of works issued to meet the manifold demands of the winter season, but is, after all, employed most frequently with regard to books for young people. In "The Outdoor World" (Longmans, Mr. W. Furneaux, F.R.G.S., has certainly provided us with one of the most suggestive and instructive books for young people that we have seen this season; in its coloured plates, its hundreds of black-and-white illustrations, and its homely, easily understood notes on the natural history and botany of our own country, it presents in one handsome volume a perfect mine of information in a pleasant and interesting manner.—A prime favourite among writers of stories for young people is Mr. G. A. Henty, whose wide range of subjects surprises one more and more as each fresh season reveals a further development.—Messrs. Blackie and Son send us three new stories of his, the titles of which indicate sufficiently the widely different sources to which their author has gone; first is "Saint Bartholomew's Eve," an excellent story of the Huguenot wars, with twelve illustrations, and a map of France that serves to impress upon the young readers of the tale the fact that its setting is historically true. Then we take up "Through the Sikh War" and "A Jacobite Exile" in turn, and find in each case that our author is equally au fait with the material which these far-separated periods present.—To Dr. Gordon Stables Messrs. Blackie owe another stirring book for boys, under the title of "Westward with Columbus," in which the pathetic story of the old mariner is wonderfully well told.—J. M. Callwell takes us back to the days of Prince Hal and the Lollards for the setting of his story, "A Champion of the Faith," which ought to prove equally interesting to readers of either sex; and from this work, which seems to us to appeal to both boys and girls of healthy taste, let us pass to two others of Messrs. Blackie's stories that appeal more particularly to girl readers. "A Fair Claimant," the first of the two, by Frances Armstrong, is a story at once strong and sympathetic, a quality rightly esteemed at a high value by girl readers; and the other, "The Clever Miss Follett," by J. K. H. Denny, is of such sustained interest that it would suit the tastes of lady-readers who would ordinarily not look at a story equally suitable to girls of no great experience. One word more about all Messrs. Blackie's stories: they are all strongly and tastefully bound, a quality which all buyers at this season will appreciate.

GRATITUDE.

One evening at a fashionable seaside place (says a friend), I was listening to some open-air preaching. After the service was over a man came up to me, and, thinking that I was one of those who had conducted it, shook me warmly by the hand, and with tears in his eyes thanked me for the benefit he had obtained. How I wished that I had been one of those who had benefited him and had deserved his gratitude! The incident impressed upon me the fact that people are not as a rule as ungrateful as they are supposed to be to those who try to improve their moral and spiritual condition. They feel that charity to the soul is the soul of charity.

A CAT THAT WON'T PURR.

There are people who do not mean to be and who perhaps are not ungrateful for kindness, but who never respond to it. You may do everything in your power to benefit them, and try to surprise them with kindness, but their dull cold natures make no sign. A boy of this description known to me was said by his schoolmaster to be like a cat that would not purr. Still, we must not cease trying to help people because they are undemonstrative and seem to have no feelings. Every creature is after its kind. You pity a man whose bodily eyes and ears are blind and deaf; why not extend the same pity to those who are blind and deaf of soul?

RIDICULOUS PURSUITS.

Nearly all the thoughts, words and deeds of some people are more or less connected with fox-hunting, which has been defined as "riding after a lot of dogs running after a smell." Philanthropy when taken up as a mere pastime or as a pursuit that has become fashionable is sometimes responsible for acts that are foolish enough, but the most foolish kind is more sensible and even more pleasurable than are some of our so-called amusements.

ENTERTAINING A STRANGER.

The writer once, when taking a walking tour through Gloucestershire, found himself near two or three neat cottages. Being tired and hungry after a tramp of twelve miles, he asked a good-natured-looking woman at the door of one of them if she could give him some milk. She invited him in, gave two glasses of delicious milk and a slice of cake, and when asked about payment said, "Oh, nothing; it is such a pleasure to be of use to a stranger." The character of the woman came out not in this act alone, but in every detail of her household arrangements. Never surely did brasses and culinary utensils shine brighter than did hers. The tourist found out afterwards that this was a good Christian woman, but he had guessed as much before he was two minutes in her house.

EVIL COMMUNICATIONS CORRUPT.

The early martyrs were often condemned to this hideous death: tied firmly to a dead body, they were left till corruption destroyed life. May not something even more horrible take place when we unite ourselves in marriage or some other kind of very close intimacy with one who is spiritually dead?

BOOKS NEW AND OLD.

In many respects the most popular set of illustrations to the Bible is that by Gustave Doré. Much has been heard of late of the success which has attended the circulation of various versions of the Scriptures on the Continent, and we in Protestant England are not to be behind in that respect. So Messrs. Cassell have sent forth a cheap but well-printed edition of the Bible with the whole of Doré's plates, and now all who will may possess it. The teaching value of illustrations can never be overestimated.—From the Clarendon Press we have received a copy of "The Thumb Prayer Book;" tiny as are its pages, the type is very readable, and the paper is so fine that the book weighs less than three-quarters of an ounce.—Messrs. Isbister are responsible for a pleasant little work on "Our English Minsters," in which seven of our best known cathedrals are described by recognised authorities, and splendidly illustrated. When we say that the paper on Westminster is contributed by Archdeacon Farrar, and that Mr. Herbert Railton is responsible for many of the illustrations, we have said enough to indicate the high character of the volume. — Mr. Fisher Unwin sends us a useful volume from the pen of Mr. Leopold Wagner, entitled "More About Names," the names explained being those of various articles, bodies, places, and institutions, with the result that a very useful reference book is provided for us.—Many of our readers must be familiar with Backhouse and Tylor's "Early Church History," and all who are will thank us for drawing their attention to Mr. Charles Tylor's "The Camisards" (Simpkin, Marshall and Co.), a valuable contribution to the religious history of France.—What a wealth of encouragement and suggestive thought there is in Dr. A. J. Gordon's "The Holy Spirit in Missions," published by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton. Every worker in or for the mission-field, at home and abroad, should not only see but carefully study this most admirable work, as high in tone as it is lofty in purpose.—From the same publishers we have received an excellent Scotch story, "Michael Lamont," and have also to acknowledge the receipt of "A. Mackay Ruthquist," cousin of the pioneer missionary to Uganda (Hodder and Stoughton).—"Betting and Gambling," by Major Seton Churchill (Nisbet and Co.).—"God's Will, and Other Stories," (T. Fisher Unwin).—"Links of a Chain," by J. M. Cowan, and the first volume of "Reminiscences of Seventy Years' Life, Travel and Adventure," both published by Mr. Elliot Stock.

TO THOSE ABOUT TO MARRY.

At the express desire of Princess May, Duchess of York, the following motto was engraved upon the inner surface of her wedding-ring :—

"In God alone
We two are one."

God is not only the best Maker of marriages, but it is He who alone can make a marriage in the true sense. He "maketh men to be of one mind in a house," says the Psalmist, and in cases of domestic strife, that "sorest ill of human life," are very common, it is because so many people begin their marriage without thinking of Him.

THE ROSE.

THE SHADY SIDE OF A DOCTOR'S LIFE.

BY THE REV. FRED. HASTINGS.

"What have you killed?"—p. 164.

O see a smartly and chastely dressed doctor riding calmly in his vehicle, would lead one to imagine he had no trouble. The dapper coachman in livery keeps the spanking horses on the go, and draws the attention and admiration of the people on the footpath. The doctor himself may be anything but as happy as he looks. He may have heavy expenses and a small practice. He may have paid exorbitantly to enter partnership with another, and have found the number of patients much smaller than represented. He may be envying the man of business who can push business instead of having the dismal work of waiting when people happen to be "unconscionably healthy."

A doctor has heavy expenses to bear while going through the hospitals and securing his diploma. He has expenses for instruments and his turn-out. He must live in a good house and in good style. To secure a practice men will sometimes attach themselves to a church. One in America, to my knowledge, took a lesson from Dicker, and was frequently called out of church during the sermon. He had only to go and "bleed a milestone." A tip to the doorkeeper enabled the doctor to do a little advertising. Another doctor, however, told me that he long hesitated to attach himself to a certain church lest it should be said that he was seeking for patients. He wished to build up a practice by merit and not by any artificial method. He succeeded. He would not allow his conscience to be warped that his pocket might be lined.

Fierce competition rages through the increasing number entering the medical profession. The older men often find themselves shelved and younger preferred. People fancy the younger practitioner is up to the newest methods of healing. Yet the older generally keep themselves abreast of the day by study. A doctor starting afresh in a neighbourhood generally finds himself well patronised by those who like plenty of attention, but who have little concern about paying. He is likely to find at the end of a year that his "returns" do not equal his expectations or even his expenditure.

A doctor may be called from his bed to attend those who might have sent earlier. Patients will be going from bad to worse three or four days, and then very late in the day, or even at midnight, will send for a doctor. People also will sometimes try to "corner" a doctor by getting him to make a statement as to when they will recover; and if the patient should happen to pass the time mentioned, the doctor will be blamed. Friends of the patient will then say, "He does not understand the case; call in somebody else." The changeableness of patients certainly worries. If a man's practice be large he will have great perplexities; if it be small, he will have equal trouble as to how he will meet expenses. Each case must cost a conscientious medical man much thought and possibly great anxiety.

Recently a very skilful man, who had done his best for a patient, had to endure the annoyance of an action at law to recover three thousand pounds damages for alleged maltreatment. The jury fortunately found the allegation untrue, but the medical man had to bear the annoyance of having a great slur cast on his professional skill. He was also mulcted in considerable money-loss over and above what was covered by "costs." Such an experience is surely a rare one; but it shows a shady side to a noble profession. Possibly those who have to do with cases where a new life is ushered into the world have as much worry as any. Some altogether decline such cases.

Many who can well afford to pay are enrolled in lodges, and when ill are most exacting. One wealthy man known to me was in a lodge, but he, when suffering from a very dangerous complaint, said to a doctor, "If you pull me through this illness I shall give you a hundred pounds." He forgot his promise, and when the doctor was taking his leave of the man, convalescent, the latter said, "Doctor, you will remember I am a lodge patient." He meant, "Don't send me any bill."

A new system has come up in some colonies—that of touting for patients. Two or three men, ignorant of medicine, will form a so-called medical club. They will go round canvassing for patients, and get people to pay a small amount to cover a year's risk of illness. Then these touts will get one or two doctors to guarantee to attend any of these patients for a certain amount. Doctors having little practice are ready to fall into the scheme. The men of professional skill get, however, but a small part of the money collected. Three-fourths at least of the amount will go into the pockets of the touts who form the so-called society or club.

Doctors have also to bear annoyance when they find that some unsafe medicine has been ignorantly resorted to. But it is greater trouble when they find some patient suddenly collapse and slip through their fingers.

Medical men have to give more professional service gratuitously than those in any other profession. Oliver Wendell Holmes, in his "Professor at the Breakfast Table," rightly gives them a high character for geniality, general knowledge, breadth of sympathy, and unselfish service. They go through the most trying experiences in order to effect a cure. It must require nerve, skill, and self-denial to put one's mouth to the mouth of a diphtheric patient and draw away the offensive and deadly poison from the throat. It needs nerve to be shut up with the insane or with small-pox patients.

A doctor can get few holidays. A day or two in the year has to satisfy many. One went out for a day's shooting. On his return his wife asked—

"What have you killed?"

"Nothing, alas!"

"Ah! that comes of not sticking to your profession."

Cruel; but she did not see or intend such sarcasm.

Doctors do anything to save life. Many of them would give to-day the answer which an army surgeon gave to Napoleon the First when he wanted to be saved the trouble of transporting several hundred invalided men from Jaffa to Egypt: "Sire, my duty is to save life, not destroy it." His words may form the motto of the medical men of our day.

If doctors have many other things that might be mentioned as belonging to the shady side of their lives, they have also many that give brightness. Often as they go about they see those who have been brought, by their skill and God's mercy, from the edge of the grave. Moreover, they often meet with those who, even if too poor to pay, send some little thing that shows that there are such beings in the world as "grateful patients."

Possibly, the most trying part of a doctor's life is that where he has, in softest tones and gentlest manner, to break to an anxious family—to a wife or husband, or betrothed—the terrible fact that for the life of the intensely loved there is little or no hope. Often a doctor must step from a doorway with a very saddened heart. Sight of suffering does not make this shady side of his own life less trying. He will only be able to bear it by a knowledge that he has conscientiously discharged his duty.

CHAPTER IX.

THE week lengthened into a fortnight before Rex would consent to part with his beloved.

He had added to her happiness by showing her a letter from his father, expressing pleasure and satisfaction at his son's choice.

"He writes as if he knew me," said Drusy, smiling.

"My letters have been full of you," he replied; "and we spoke of you before he left me." "Did you? Had you made up your mind so long ago?"

"You know I had, sweet one!"

It was well for Margery that she was not entirely dependent on Drusy for companionship at that time, for Rex wasted day after day in a most reprehensible manner, and was scarcely ever absent from Drusy's side. The music they drew from piano and violin was most exquisite. Margery declared that when words failed them to express their feelings, they flew to music as a safety-valve.

But all things must have an end, and at length their last day at Norwood arrived. They had an early lunch at Wollaston before going to the station.

Rex was there, of course, holding Drusy's hand under the table; and perhaps Margery was envying her sister just a little; at any rate, Drusy would have her lover's letters to look forward to, while she—what had she? In her heart of hearts she wished Stuart Fergusson had been a little more selfish; she knew he loved her, and she understood well enough why he hesitated to tell her so. And she knew he was right: always he was sure to be right, whatever he did.

He had promised to look in while they were at lunch and say good-bye; he was too busy that day to spare more than a few moments. But the minutes passed, and he did not come, and at last they had to leave for the station, for the cab arrived with their luggage from Admaston.

"There is heaps of time," said Rex. "Drusy and I are going to walk."

"Very well—only don't miss the train.—Come, Margery, we might as well go with the luggage:" and Phil got into the cab, while Margery gave one searching glance up and down the road to see if Dr. Fergusson's brougham and bays might not be in sight.

But there was no sign of them, and, with a stifled sigh, she took the seat by Phil's side.

"How I shall miss you, Margery—you more than Drusy, because Rex has monopolised her so much of late that the rest of us have derived but scant benefit from her society."

"You won't miss either of us long, Phil; you have Theo, you know."

"Dear old man! I feel happier every day, Margery. We have been married two months to-morrow. I love him heaps better now than I did on our wedding-day."

"I am so glad, dear. I hope Drusy will be as happy."

"I hope so too, bless her heart! And you, Margery, what of you? But you can afford to wait a bit: only you will find it dull all alone at Long Reach. When Drusy is married, come and stay with us until—There's Dr. Fergusson! I knew he would turn up somewhere. That man worships you, Margery!"

There was no need for Margery to reply. The cab pulled up at the station, and he opened the door and helped them out.

"I shall just look out for the others," said Phil, desirous of giving Stuart an opportunity of speaking privately to Margery if he chose.

And he did choose. The light in her eyes on finding him waiting for her when she had given up all hope of seeing him helped him to that decision.

He gave instructions about labelling the luggage, took the tickets—Margery slipping her purse into his hand for the purpose—and then he walked the length of the platform with her, where they were quite alone.

"Margery"—his voice trembled a little—"I think you must have read my heart by this time; you know its great desire. I had not meant to say a word—you are so young, my dear: too young to be bound. And I am not going to bind you now, even if you are willing. Why should I say 'if,' when I know I have won the priceless treasure of, at least, your affection? But, lest it should only be affection, and not the love—without which I would not take you—lest that be so, do not hurry to decide. Think of it for three months—three calendar months. If at the end of that time you feel willing to be my wife, write and tell me so: but, for Heaven's sake, do not marry me out of pity! Promise me, Margery, that you will not do that."

"I promise," she whispered, as he paused for her reply.

"Remember, child, you are as free as air. Should you find, on thinking the matter over calmly, that you have nothing more than a friendly feeling of regard for me, do not hesitate to tell me so. Stay; that might be difficult for you. Suppose we exchange letters once a week from now—would you object?"

"Oh no!"

Her face brightened a little, for this serious wooing had made her very grave.

"Then we will correspond for the three months. I shall say nothing to remind you of what I am telling you now, because I want you to feel quite free. If when the three months are up your decision is adverse, simply stop writing; I shall understand. But if the contrary—if you feel you can bless my whole life with your dear love—would it be difficult for you to write it, Margery? Perhaps it would. See here, dear: if you can give me my heart's desire, let me hear from you this day three months, on the 20th of February. Write about what you like, only begin with 'My Dear Stuart'—that will not be very difficult, will it? And on that day, if I get that letter, I—will—come—to—you, please God!"

"But"—Margery spoke hurriedly, for she heard the train coming—"but suppose you change?"

"I! If I change, sweetheart, I will tell you: I swear it!"

They turned and joined the others. Rex was whispering farewells into Drusy's ears, and she was looking almost tearful. But Margery's eyes were shining joyously, even though she was going away.

Phil wished them both good-bye; then, as they stepped into the train, the two men pressed forward.

"I shall come down for Christmas, if you don't come up," were Rex Eden's last words to Drusy.

"Good-bye. Write me a line to-night, darling!" whispered Dr. Fergusson to Margery.

Her eyes looked into his for one brief instant, then the train bore her away, and he stood on the platform saying to himself—

"At least I shall hear from her. She loves me—God bless her! Heigho! how empty the place will look without her!"

Rex Eden was saying to Phil—

"I should like to catch myself waiting a whole month to see her! Ha, ha!"

His laugh grated on Fergusson's ears; he shook hands with them both, and left them, pleading extra patients to see as an excuse for an abrupt departure.

"I must get to work," he said to himself, "or I, too, shall be feeling I must see my darling again immediately. If only I were free to take a few weeks' holiday! But no! It is best as it is. I am determined she shall have those three months clear to think it over. It is only right she should; but oh! I should like to have held her in my arms one moment before parting with her!"

His brougham stopped at the house where lived the patient next on his list; and he had to put Margery's image in the background. He entered the house well under control, every whit the clever physician and man of science.

Just then Drusy was saying—

"You haven't told Miss Fraser, or anyone, in your letters, have you, Margery?"

Margery, recalled from a pleasant dreamland of her own, replied vaguely. "Told—what, dear?"

"Why, about Rex and me, of course!"

"You know I haven't, Drusy. I should not be likely to do so without first consulting you. And I have not written to anyone at Winchmore but Miss Fraser and nurse."

"Oh, I don't mind nurse knowing; but I don't want anyone else told—not even Miss Fraser; for, nice as she is, she is one of those three; and they are the greatest gossips in the place. It seems hateful to think that what is so sweet and so sacred to me should be a subject of mere chit-chat to a lot of people I don't care a farthing about; and people are always so insanely interested in an engagement."

"So they are. I think you are quite right to wish to keep it to yourself. And we are sure to go up for Christmas; so Rex will not be hanging about Long Reach, and affording food for talk."

That matter settled, they said little more until they reached Paddington. It seemed rather surprising that Rex had not accompanied them so far; but he had said nothing about wishing to do so; and Drusy was too proud to ask him to go, were he twenty times her avowed lover. If Margery wondered a little, thinking to herself that had Stuart Fergusson been at liberty—well—she kept her thoughts to herself.

It was she who looked after the luggage at Paddington; and she who took their tickets for Winchmore: Drusy meanwhile sauntering the length of the train and back again in search of the compartment most to her liking.

At length they were both seated, with plenty of time to spare; Margery settling herself in one corner with a book, as an excuse for not talking; and Drusy looking out of window at the people hurrying hither and thither on the platform.

A stout old gentleman and his wife entered their compartment presently; followed, soon after, by two young men; and when the porter, bearing their rugs and things, retired and closed the door, Drusy gave a little sigh of satisfaction at the impossibility of further disturbance now the seats were all occupied.

But, just before the train started something happened which appeared to disturb her considerably—mentally. She blushed rosily, and frowned at herself for doing so as she returned the bow of a gentleman who was hurrying past in the wake of a porter. The gentleman was Reginald Warre; and, as he entered the train, it was natural to suppose that he was going down to Winchmore.

"Margery, did you see? That was Captain Warre."

"Was it, dear? Well, it doesn't matter much; does it?"

"No—only I do wish that as he isn't Rex he wasn't quite so very much like him. It makes me want my dear boy all the more."

The first station at which they stopped Captain Warre came to the window of their compartment.

"Going home at last, Miss Weston? You should receive quite an ovation at Winchmore. The place hasn't seemed itself without you. My father returned yesterday: my aunt being now quite herself again. We wanted you back before, both of you; though, perhaps, now it is not too late. They are getting up a concert in aid of the Lighthouse fund: the Lighthouse is begun, you know, only there is not enough money forthcoming to finish it. I have promised to give a tune or two on my fiddle: but they want your piano, Miss Weston; and a song from you, Miss Margery."

"When is the concert to come off?"

"To-morrow night. Do you think on such short notice you could——"

"Take your seats, please!"

Reginald had to depart at the guard's bidding.

"You are sufficiently in practice to play before royalty itself, Drusy," said Margery.

"But they won't want me. The programmes will be printed by this time, and everything arranged. I wonder who else is going to perform?"

"We will ask Captain Warre: he is sure to come again the next time we stop."

Which he did, and as the stout old gentleman and his wife had reached the end of their journey, Reginald moved his belongings to their compartment and was thus free to gaze at and talk to Drusy Weston until they got to Winchmore.

They learnt that Miss Paule was to sing at the concert, and that Mrs. Pearson had offered her services as accompanist to all the vocalists.

"Then I shall certainly not sing!" declared Margery, with her determined little chin held high.

"But I would accompany you, Miss Margery."

"Thank you, Captain Warre; but as Drusy and I were saying just now, probably all arrangements are completed, and it would be a pity to upset them. Will this be your first appearance in public? I know it is the first at Winchmore."

"I have never been there when there has been anything of this sort going on. I have frequently taken part in regimental entertainments."

"Are you sorry to leave the army?" asked Drusy, taking pleasure in the very sight of him and in the sound of his voice, for his likeness to Rex Eden.

"Yes, for some things. Though I agree with my father that it is quite time I settled down at St. Ouans. Poor old Rickard has had a bit of a stroke: did you know?"

"No. When did it happen?"

"One day last week. My father set his mind at rest about his family by telling him that I was prepared to undertake most of the steward's duty, so that no stranger would be put on. Rickard seemed very grateful. He will keep his house, and do what he can when he gets round a bit. What! Winchmore already? Surely we are in before time."

"On the contrary, we are ten minutes late, Captain Warre;" Margery was thinking of the letter Stuart Fergusson had asked her to write that night: would it be posted in time?

There's a great deal of truth in the old saying "Where there's a will there's a way:" five minutes before the letter-box nearest to Long Reach was cleared, Margery, with a shawl around her shoulders, ran down the garden-path and along the road towards it, carrying two letters—hers to Dr. Fergusson, and one from Drusy to Rex.

"Phil and Mrs. Thornton must wait until tomorrow," she said to herself, as she returned to the house. "Rex will let them know we got home safely."

As they were having supper, Nurse came bustling into the room with an envelope in her hand.

"I was forgetting to tell you, Miss Drusy, that a man came the other day to know if you'd have tickets for the concert. I knew you'd be home in time, and wanting to go, so I took the liberty of buying two of the best places he'd got."

"That's a dear old Nurse! I was wondering if we should be able to get any seats worth having.—You would like to go, wouldn't you, Drusy? I want to hear Captain Warre first and foremost; of course, his playing won't come up to—have you told Nurse?"

"Aye, she've told old Nurse, bless her bonny heart! I'd liefer it had been the Captain; but, after all, 'tis Providence orders everything, and it ain't no use for us to want to go contrary. I make sure this gentleman's good, or Miss Drusy wouldn't be marrying him. And so he do play the fiddle?"

"Beautifully, Nurse! He'd draw the very ribbons out of your cap with his playing," said Margery.

"Would he, now? Then I hope he'll keep his distance till I've sewed 'em all a bit tighter;" and Nurse went off chuckling in the fat, comfortable way she had of making merry.

Twenty-four hours later they were in the public hall, where every sort of entertainment was held, listening to Reginald Warre's violin.

Drusy had to look round the room to satisfy herself that she was in Winchmore, and that the man on the platform was Captain Warre; for when, for an instant, she closed her eyes, she fancied herself back in the drawing-room at Wollaston; and that wailing, sobbing air the violin was giving forth: how many times had Rex played it to her of late? Then it changed to a merry, tripping tune, to the accompaniment of joyous laughter. She closed her eyes once more, and opened them to meet Rex Eden's eyes fixed on her face; surely, surely it was he! That smile, too, was his! Reginald Warre would never look at her and smile at her like that! Then—heigh presto!—the music had ceased, Rex Eden had vanished, eyes and smile, and only Captain Warre stood there, bowing in stiff military fashion in response to the applause absolutely thundered at him by an audience who knew good music when they heard it.

Margery glanced anxiously at her sister; she, too, had noticed the change that had stolen into the face of the violinist under the influence of the music wherewith he had so charmed that crowded roomful of people that they clamoured for an encore.

No wonder, thought Margery, that Drusy sat bolt upright, with white cheeks and staring eyes, mutely questioning the man who shouldered his violin once more and gave, by way of encore, that delightful bit of Sarasate's which Rex had taught her to play.

But Reginald's gaze met hers no more. When a song in Lilian Paule's clear soprano had brought the first part of the concert to a close, Captain Warre came into the hall, and chatted with various acquaintances dotted here and there. He paused by the Weston girls long enough to say softly to Drusy—

"You understand my music, if you will not understand myself; and—it reached your soul. Why will you not let me do likewise?"

"What did he say, Drusy?" The expression of his face as he murmured those words struck Margery so curiously that she could not refrain from asking that question.

"I hardly know, Margery. That is not true: I do know. He spoke as Rex would speak, and he looked as Rex would look. Is it possible for two men—strangers to each other—to be so alike? And—for both to like me?"

Margery had no answer ready, and presently the various performers claimed her attention again; only the next time Reginald Warre appeared he played something Drusy had never heard before; and when he glanced once in her direction, it was in the most casual manner possible.

CHAPTER X.

AFTER the night of the concert, Captain Warre became once more so palpably a suitor for Drusy's hand that she debated with Margery whether it would not be wise and right to tell him of her engagement to Rex Eden.

"I make quite a parade of showing my ring when he calls, but it does not seem to have the least effect on him; and I try to be as cold as an icicle, so as to let him see that I wish he would leave me alone."

"Unfortunately, Drusy, most men—Captain Warre amongst the number—are what Nurse calls 'so contradictory,' that they rather like that sort of treatment; it seems to encourage them to hope. Why not be gracious to him, for a change, and see what that would do?"

"It wouldn't do at all!" decided Drusy hastily. "One afternoon when I met him he looked so astonishingly like Rex that I felt quite happy—just speaking to him for a moment. He walked a little way with me, and talked like Rex, too; he had come through the woods, and he quoted somebody's verses about the breeze murmuring to the trees, and the tender messages whispered by the seas. You know he never used to talk like that: he was only a matter-of-fact, every-day sort of man—wasn't he?—without a scrap of poetry or music in his composition."

"He never showed symptoms of hidden poetry, certainly," agreed Margery; "but he used to talk about his violin, you know. Well, and when he looked and talked like Rex, what did you do?"

"I said to myself: 'He is Reginald Warre, of St. Ouans, and not my darling Rex Eden, of Nowhere,' and I froze back my smiles, and made myself speak stiffly; and he changed so quickly from Rex to himself again. I don't know if you have noticed it, but his voice is much harder—not half so musical as my boy's."

Margery had to admit that she had not noticed that fact; but then, she had not listened so long to Rex Eden's dulcet tones as Drusy had.

They had been home three weeks, and were talking of their approaching return to Norwood for Christmas and the New Year; this time to stay with Phil.

Stuart Fergusson, in his last letter, had written a few words of quietly expressed pleasure at the prospect of seeing them both again; he did not particularise Margery, though that young person chose to read between the lines, and say to herself that his dear big heart would throb for joy when their hands touched once more, just as her own heart would do.

The morning that letter came Margery went to see Miss Fraser, who was confined to the house with a bad cold. Drusy was in the breakfast-room, touching up a sketch she had been busy about for the last day or two. She heard the hall door bell, but considered it was too early for visitors, so did not trouble herself to think who it might be.

But, in a moment, a maid of diminutive stature appeared to inform her that a gentleman had called and wished to see her. The little maid was only a temporary supply—the housemaid having been called away to nurse her mother rather unexpectedly—and as this small girl was not a native of Winchmore, Drusy thought necessary to put her through a short catechism respecting the undesired morning caller, who, she felt sure, would turn out to be Reginald Warre.

"What is the gentleman's name, Ruth?"

"Oh, I forgot to ask, miss; but he seemed an old friend like, for he just said 'Miss Weston at home?' and came right in."

"You are sure he said 'Miss Weston'—not 'Miss Margery'?"

"Quite sure, miss. And I said you was at home, but Miss Margery was not."

"That was quite unnecessary, Ruth."

"Yes, miss; only he seemed pleased-like to hear it. He smiled as I opened the drawing-room door, and said, so pleasant, 'It's Miss Weston I've called to see, not Miss Margery.' He's a tall gentleman, and short-sighted, I should think, for he wears glasses, and——"

But Drusy had passed out of the room with swift lithe movements, and was half-way up the stairs before Ruth realised that she had gone. Two seconds' pause outside the drawing-room; for what if, after all, it was only Captain Warre? Then trembling fingers turned the handle, the door opened, and Drusy stood face to face with Rex Eden.

Face to face? Aye, and heart to heart, before one could have counted six; and with one glad cry of "Rex, oh, Rex!" she rushed into his open arms.

"My darling! my darling!"

That was all he said as he pressed his lips to her forehead, hair, cheeks, and rosy quivering mouth.

Then he drew himself erect, removed her hands from his neck, and said, in what Drusy had described as Reginald Warre's "harder, less musical" tones—

"The temptation was too strong for me to resist: you have made me desperate with your coldness."

A quick movement of both hands, the nose-glasses and curly brown wig were cast on the table, and Reginald Warre stood before her, with shining eyes and glowing cheeks.

"Captain Warre!" exclaimed Drusy, indignantly.

"Margery glanced anxiously at her sister."—p. 168.

"Nay—I cannot have you cry!"—p. 171.

"At your service," he replied, bowing low.

"You are a coward, sir, and a traitor!"

"Traitor to what?" was the quick retort.

"To your honour, and to me!" said Drusy hotly.

"My honour may safely be left to take care of itself. As to you, I don't see that you have much cause for complaint; I have loved you for years—you know it. As long as I had no rival to fear I did not despair of some day winning you, in spite of your pride: for it was pride chiefly that kept us apart. That I should have won your love had I not been a Warre of St. Ouns I never doubted; and when you at length gave your heart into the keeping of a man so much like myself that even you are bewildered at times by the similarity between us, I knew I had been right in thinking so. Don't you think it would have been more womanly and merciful of you to have told me of your engagement, instead of leaving me to find it out for myself?"

"I have been wanting to tell you. I have said nothing yet down here to anybody—"

"Why? Is there anything about my rival for you to feel ashamed of?"

"Ashamed?—when I glory in his love, and am prouder of belonging to him than I should be to be Queen of England! Ashamed, indeed! I have done wrong, no doubt, in not telling you; but my secret was so sweet I wanted to keep it a secret as long as I could. And I hoped you would see by my manner that—that—"

"Your manner has fluctuated much these last three weeks. Is it any wonder I laid the flattering unction to my soul that it was still only pride that stood between us? But I wanted to be satisfied. I never met my rival in town; but I knew he was much with you. You have not mentioned him once, frequently as we have met since your return. I was determined to find out for myself the extent of his claim on you, if any existed. I prepared myself with that disguise"—pointing to the wig and the glasses—"remembering you yourself had said they formed the only points of difference between us. Just now I met your sister on her way to South Terrace, and I knew I should find you alone. I availed myself of the opportunity to personate my fortunate rival. Do not blame me too much that I yielded to the temptation of continuing to personate him for a moment when you came towards me with the love-light in your eyes—the light that meant death to Reginald Warre's lifelong hope. How was I to know how far things had gone? How could I know that the mere sight of my rival would suffice to change you from a statue to a living woman? Forgive me, Drusy—one love of my life! And do not grudge me the only caresses I shall ever give or receive from you. With all my heart I implore your pardon, and with all my soul I pray for your happiness."

He was going without another word; but Drusy raised her head: it had drooped lower and lower as he justified himself in her eyes for what he had done.

"Captain Warre—stay one moment, please. It is I who should ask your forgiveness more than you mine. I ought to have told you—and—and—oh! I am so sorry!"

Every scrap of pride was vanquished. She turned aside, and burst into tears.

"Nay—I cannot have you cry!"

Whose voice was it said that—Rex Eden's or Captain Warre's? But Drusy ceased to puzzle over the mystery of their great similarity. She sat down on the sofa and buried her face in one of the cushions, sobbing as if her heart would break.

"Drusy, my darling, do not cry like that—what a selfish brute I am! Only I loved you so; and you did not—would not—say what he was to you: this Eden who has stolen you from me. I will go now, dear. I shall leave Winchmore to-day, and not come back until— Good-bye, dear; God bless and keep you always!"

He longed with all his heart to take her in his arms and kiss away her tears, but restrained himself, merely raising to his lips the hand she held out while keeping her face still hidden.

"You—you forgive me?" asked a small tearful voice.

"If you forgive me!—You do? Then it is mutual. And when we meet again we will try and be the best of friends."

He went; but she did not move for some minutes—then, slowly raising a tear-stained face, she looked about the room with unhappy questioning eyes, whispering to herself—

"What shall I do! How shall I ever face Rex again? Is it possible to love two men? It must be—for I love them both! They seem only one; it is Rex I really love: only when Captain Warre seems so much like him— But it is dreadful—truly dreadful! Was there ever anyone who felt like it before? I daren't tell Margery. I will just say Captain Warre has been here, and I have told him of my engagement to Rex, and he has gone away. How glad I am we are going to Norwood on Friday! Ought I to tell Rex? I think not; I couldn't tell him without seeming to boast that Captain Warre likes me; and I have done him enough harm without triumphing over him, and letting other people triumph too. If I don't see him again I shall be able to forget how like Rex he is—perhaps—yes, I should think I'll forget, and think only of Rex."

She waited feverishly for Friday to come; the more so that Miss Fagan called at Long Reach on Thursday and said one or two things hard to bear.

In discussing Captain Warre's unexpected disappearance, for instance—

"Not but what it must be a relief to some people, of course—forgive my alluding to the subject, Miss Weston—but a discarded suitor is undesirable company at the best of times, and when he is engaged to someone else it is worse than ever. He called to wish you good-bye, I know. Did he mention his engagement?"

"No." Drusy was very cold and haughty in her manner that afternoon.

After a quick glance at her, Miss Fagan turned to Margery.

"I daresay he would not speak of it to Miss Drusy; but to you he might—"

"Not a word," said Margery cheerfully. "To whom is he engaged, Miss Fagan?"

"Why, I thought you knew! Betty Fraser said she told you in one of her letters. To Lilian Paule, of course: not that you can get her to own it. Only all I can say is that if they are not engaged, they ought to be. Such constant walking through the woods together; and such long good-byes! I see it all from my dining-room window, you know. Maybe they haven't noticed that one of my windows looks straight up to their favourite exit from the woods. It has been going on for some time; and I am not the only person who has seen it. And now he has gone away again; and Lilian Paule has asked for three days at Christmas. I shouldn't wonder if they get married then. Talking of getting married: has Amelia Foster told either of you if she means to trap that poor silly Mr. Harrison? He is always there: but he can't have seen her in one of her tantrums yet, or he'd never think of asking her to be Mrs. Harrison. That Miss Paule is wonderfully clever; she manages Amelia as easily as if she had known her all her life. I don't know what she will do when Lilian Paule is transplanted to St. Ouans. Wonder what the squire thinks of it all! Has he been here lately?"

"Not since we have been back. He has not been out much the last week or two, I think. Captain Warre told us he had a touch of gout. I don't think I have seen him since the night of the concert. How is Scott, Miss Fagan?" Margery was anxious not to let the conversation return to Reginald Warre.

"Scott justifies my opinion of his sex: he is fickle and ungrateful to the backbone. You had better ask Betty Fraser how he is; she is much more likely to know than I am." Miss Fagan rose as she spoke, and uttered her farewells through thin lips drawn thinner than ever in evident disapproval of Cat Scott and his goings-on.

Drusy had imagined all the week that she knew what it was like to feel not very happy; but her state of mind then was almost blissful compared with its condition ten minutes after the last evening post arrived on that memorable Thursday.

She was at the piano when the familiar rat-tat was heard, and two letters were brought in by the diminutive Ruth. One was for Margery from Stuart Fergusson—just half a dozen lines, to say how he was looking forward to the morrow. The other letter bore the Winchmore postmark, and was addressed to Drusy in what looked like a feigned hand. It lay on the piano, and she glanced at it as she finished what she was playing.

"A circular, I suppose," she said, with a yawn, when Margery questioned her about her correspondent. "Are you curious to know whether it advertises somebody's boots and shoes, or somebody else's sewing-machines? There! Now I'll open it: that bit was too pretty to be cut short for anybody's circular."

She opened the envelope, and glanced at the signature—

"'Scott and Twist!' Oh! It is a joke of Miss Fraser's, of course! How amusing she is! Shall I read it out?"

"Do!" said Margery. "Where do they date from?"

"Winchmore Woods. I'll read it all."

"WINCHMORE WOODS.

"Thursday.

"MUCH RESPECTED AND ADMIRER MISS WESTON,

"Those two adjectives express what we both feel for you, with a considerable amount of affection thrown in. Therefore we have set ourselves to tell you what human beings in their mistaken kindness may endeavour to conceal from your knowledge. You know, animals see and hear a lot of things not intended for them—or, at least, not intended for other ears: and it is one of those things we are going to tell you. You know Miss Paule? Well, she has been setting her cap at Captain Warre ever since she came."

"Drusy dear, don't read that low rubbish! Let me have the letter, and I'll see if there is anything likely to interest you in it. Miss Fraser never wrote that, I know!"

Drusy moved Margery aside, and read on to herself:—

"Not only has she done this; but she has led him on in his selfish desire to humiliate you. Whether there is any truth in what he said we know not; but we can both affirm that they stood talking in the woods last Monday afternoon, and Miss Paule said: 'Then you confess my advice was good?' 'Yes,' he replied: 'it was good, so far as it went. As Reginald Warre, I should probably never have won her: as Rex Eden, I have her promise to be my wife. But I rather tremble as to the result—I mean as to how she will accept my explanation.' 'Why explain at all?' said Miss Paule. 'Make sure of her first. Let the explanation take place in the vestry when you sign your name as her husband.' That was all we heard; but we are both prepared to swear it is true, and we think you ought to know how you have been deceived."

"Ever, dear Miss Weston, your respectful and attached friends.

"SCOTT AND TWIST."

Drusy handed the letter to Margery without a word, then she opened her desk and began to write rapidly; her face very white, and her eyes full of pain.

CHAPTER XI.

As Margery read she knew that her suspicion was verified; for some days she had had an idea that Reginald Warre had concealed his identity, and had won her sister as Rex Eden: ever since the night of the concert this suspicion had been growing in her mind, and she had wondered more than once whether Drusy herself guessed the truth. As she came to the end of the letter she looked at Drusy half-fearfully, doubting how she would take the matter thus forced into notice by someone evidently bent on making mischief.

Drusy's face rather startled her: her eyes were glowing like live coals; but her cheeks were pale, and her lips firmly compressed.

She raised her head suddenly, as though conscious of her sister's gaze.

"Well, Margery, what do you think of that letter? I am going to send it to Rex by to-night's post—there is just time. If he can contradict it, well and good: but if he has so betrayed me—and I feel in my heart he has; for I have seemed to know ever since we came back that they were one and the same: I can see now that I have known it since the concert at the hall when—but I must not lose the post. No, don't come! I shall go quicker alone: I must take it to the General Post Office, you know."

But Margery did not intend her to go alone: hats used for gardening hung on the pegs in the hall, and there were cloaks there too. The girls did not stop to study appearance: taking the first things that came to hand, they wrapped themselves up hurriedly, and were soon speeding down the road towards the town.

Only once did Drusy speak; and then it was to say imploringly, as she clung to Margery's arm:

"Margery, tell me one thing! You did not know this? You were not in league with the others against me?"

"No, dearie, no! I had no idea of it until quite, quite lately, and then I told myself I must be mistaken."

Drusy gave her arm a loving squeeze, but said no more until the letter was posted.

"Thank Heaven we were in time!" she exclaimed then, as they turned their faces homewards. "Will you mind much if we don't go to-morrow, Margery? I cannot go if this is true. How could I stay in Phil's house, hating her and Theo all the time? They must have known; and how they must have laughed to themselves at seeing the success of their plan and how thoroughly I was being taken in. Oh, Margery! how would you feel in my place?"

"I think I should—almost—want to hit somebody, Drusy."

"And wouldn't you hate Rex? Pooh! he isn't Rex any longer; he is Captain Reginald Warre, and further removed from me than he ever was in the days when only pride kept us apart. For I liked him then; I may confess it now it is all over; only when I met Rex he seemed so entirely lovable—so very much more like my other self than Reginald Warre had ever been. Of course, I had tried to keep him always at arm's length; he had had no chance of drawing close to me. I can see now plainly enough that the two were only one; my heart tells me that it is so. I know that I have been duped. Margery, do you know I have been tormenting myself all this week because I felt I loved both—Reginald Warre and Rex Eden. Oh! to think that I have been so deceived! I will never forgive him—never!"

"But Drusy, you may be mistaken after all. See, dear, he has written you twice a week since we came home."

"And what more easy than for him to send letters addressed to me for Phil to post? Or Dr. Fergusson? He must have been in the secret too. I detest them all! Oh, do put yourself in my place, and try and realise what you would feel. I declare I could kill the person who thought of such a plan."

"But, Drusy, here's another thing, dear. If you remember, we left him on the platform at Norwood, and yet he—that is, Captain Warre—travelled down here with us from Paddington."

before he threw off his disguise; I declare I can hardly now believe they are only one man. There was a bit of a scene; I reproached him for taking advantage of me in such a way, and he reproached me for not having told him of my engagement; and I was silly enough to fancy I was in the wrong, and I actually cried. Oh, only think of it!"

"I am ready to listen to any explanation you choose to give," she said coldly.—p. 174.

"And if you remember, Margery, we allowed him to choose our trains for us. Probably he knew of a quicker way to reach Paddington; I only know we were a long time getting there. And—I didn't tell you at the time, because I was too ashamed of myself—but the other morning when you went to see Miss Fraser, and he called, he was disguised in a wig and glasses (which I afterwards noticed he was careful to take away with him), and I thought he was Rex. Ruth let him in, and she did not know him. I said enough to let him see Rex and I were engaged before I found out my mistake—I mean

She stood a moment in order to stamp her foot: never before had Margery seen her in such a rage, and her heart sank, even while it sympathised. She could not honestly advise Drusy to overlook such conduct in her lover, however sorry she might feel for her sister's suffering; for suffer she would long after anger had been lived down; in fact, not until the anger died would the suffering really begin.

"When he disappeared for a day or two from Norwood, of course he came down here," continued

Drusy. "He had to help arrange about that concert, and he had to take frequent walks with Miss Foster's companion. I have it! Margery, Margery, don't you see? It is her doing: this Lilian Paule's doing. She wanted him herself, and so she has invented this means of getting rid of me. Oh, she is welcome to him—quite welcome! He may marry her to-morrow if he likes. Only—she will not have his love: not yet, any way. That, at least, is mine; I think I am sure he loves me now, whatever he may do in the future."

"Of course he loves you, dear; if he had not been madly in love he would never have tried such a way of winning you."

"Then through that love he shall suffer as he has made me suffer. I have a pain in my heart as if I had been stabbed, Margery. I wish I might die this night."

The excitement of intense wrath was giving place to a consciousness of loss and agony; her footsteps flagged, and she leant heavily on Margery's arm.

"Courage, dearie, courage!" whispered that would-be comforter. "You will live this down—we will together, you and I. Pride helped you to keep him at a distance before, and it will help you now to forget him, and to show such a brave face to the world that the writer of that mean, cowardly letter shall never have the satisfaction of knowing how she has wounded you."

"It was Lilian Paule who wrote it," affirmed Drusy. "No, she shall not see that I suffer. To-morrow I will go out and see people, and—and all that. But to-night—oh, Margery! If I could only die to-night!"

They had reached home, and Margery led her tenderly up the path and into the hall, where Nurse stood, wondering what had become of her "charges," as she still liked to consider them.

"I will tell you all to-morrow, Nurse," whispered Margery. "Leave us for to-night, like a dear. I want to get her to bed at once."

They slept together that night, though there was little sleep at first for either. Drusy moaned and tossed from side to side in a very fever of mental pain; and all Margery could do was to whisper words of comfort and hope—hope that Reginald Warre might be able to explain his course of action, so that all would be right.

It was not until Drusy had, at last, dropped asleep—exhausted in mind and body—that Margery remembered her own little disappointment—that she would not now see Stuart Fergusson on the morrow: but it seemed such a tiny, trivial thing, compared to Drusy's great sorrow, that she called herself selfish for so much as thinking of it.

The morning's light showed a very sorrowful Drusy waking to a knowledge of what had occurred; but by the time both of the girls appeared at breakfast she had called pride to her aid; and though she ate little, and looked a trifle pale, it would have needed a keen observer to discover that she was suffering intensely.

At their mid-day dinner she said—

"I asked him to telegraph if—if it was all right, Margery; and then we could have gone up by a later train; but no telegram has come, you see."

"Perhaps he has not had your letter, dear. When a man is personating two people he cannot always be where one might suppose him to be. There is just the chance that when he pretended to be leaving Winchmore last week he only went into hiding at St. Ouans; so as to be near you, even if he couldn't see you."

"I daresay," assented Drusy coldly. "He seems capable of any amount of deceit."

Just before tea-time, Margery, looking out of the window at the sound of an approaching footstep, saw Reginald Warre coming quickly up the garden.

"Here he is, Drus!" she said quietly.

"Which 'he'?"

There was a slight bitterness wholly foreign to Drusy in the question.

"Captain Warre."

"I'm glad of that! I'm glad he hasn't come as Rex—my Rex! I can steel my heart against Reginald Warre!"

So she thought. But when she faced him a moment later she was trembling in every limb; and at the sound of his voice—Rex's voice it was—pleading for forgiveness, she longed to hold out her hands to him, and let him take her to his heart and hold her there for ever.

"Forgive me, Drusy! I never thought you would learn the truth in that way—or in any other way but from my lips. I would rather cut off my right hand than cause you one moment's pain; and I know how deeply wounded you must feel at what looks like deceit on my part; though Heaven knows I never meant to deceive you as I have done."

"I am ready to listen to any explanation you choose to give," she said coldly.

He would rather she had stormed angrily at him—coldness is much more difficult to combat than anger.

She seated herself with her back to the light, and motioned him to a chair not too close to her.

"I will tell you all, from the very beginning," he continued. "I have loved you for years, as you know—moreover, my father was anxious for me to marry you, believing, as I do, that you and your sisters have more right to St. Ouans than we have, legal though our claim may be. I tried and tried to make you like me: and at times I fancied I was succeeding, only to have my hopes dashed to the ground again and again. At last I felt certain you cared for me—it was the night of the fire at Davis's: you have not forgotten! No, I see you have not. That night you were more sweet and gentle than you had ever been before, and I could not help hoping that I was conquering, by my love, the pride that had made you keep me at such a distance. But for some reason—I could but think it caprice on your part—you changed once more into the veriest icicle, and I despaired of ever winning you. Just then I met an old friend in the person of Miss Foster's companion. I believe there has been a lot of nonsense talked about us lately—she says there has; and she has given me permission to tell you her history, and so explain why I have been seen so frequently with her. Ten years ago she married a man I knew well enough, and disliked most heartily. At one time I had been foolish enough to lend him money—when we were both in the same regiment; for he, like myself, was an army man. But I learnt to be thankful for my folly when I found it gave me a hold of him—as it did. He soon began to ill-treat his wife, and she ran away from him. I met her hiding from him, and she told me of his cruelty. I promised to help her, and I contrived to make him cease from persecuting her. In return for being let off his debt, he promised to leave her free to live where she liked. I got her a post as companion to an old lady I knew, to whom I confided most of her history; and there she remained until Mrs. Commans—the lady in question—died. That was three months ago; then she came here. She soon discovered my love for you, and set herself to help me. But before I say more about that I had better finish her history. One day, when in town, I ran up against an old college friend—Stuart Ferguson. He asked me to call and see him; and at his house I became acquainted with Kershaw. That was several months ago. While chatting about various things, I discovered accidentally that the man Lillian Paule—Paule was her maiden name—married had met with an accident, and though he might live for weeks, perhaps months, yet death was not far off. Later on I saw him from time to time, and carried messages of repentance and forgiveness between him and his wife. Well, he is gone now, and she is about to marry Mr. Harrison."

"Mr. Harrison! Why, I thought Miss Foster——"

He smiled, in spite of his anxiety.

"That is a little plot between them to baffle their neighbours' curiosity. But enough of that matter. When Miss Paule found how hopeless I was of ever winning you, she suggested that I should adopt a different name and personality, and see if you would then own that you cared for me. Directly I found your love was mine, and I had your promise to marry me—as Rex Eden—she advised that I should confess the truth. But I turned coward, and dared not risk my happiness. Again and again she urged me to speak out, but my father agreed with me that I should not do so—that our marriage should take place before you knew I was Reginald Warre. And I determined that it should be so until the other day, when I yielded to the temptation to hold you in my arms once more. That interview made me see that I was acting wrongly. I had been trying—as Reginald Warre—to win you from your allegiance to Rex Eden—or, rather, to ensure your loving the man whose wife you were to be. I found that morning I had succeeded so well that you were doubtful which you really cared for, and such a state of mind was bound to trouble you. Therefore I decided to tell you the truth as soon as you got to Norwood. It has been a stupid thing to do; but you will forgive me, Drusy, for the sake of the love you bear me?"

"The love I bear you? You forget, Captain Warre, all my love is given to Rex Eden."

"Then I will be Rex Eden to the end of the chapter!" he exclaimed, seizing her hands, and drawing her to him. "Listen, dear: Margery shall have St. Ouans—or Phil: she is the eldest, so it should be hers by right. I will continue to work for my living; as I have done of late, and thoroughly enjoyed doing. I have always dabbled a little in literature, you know; but you did not know, for you would never take sufficient interest in me to encourage me to talk of myself. As Rex Eden, I have started a good connection with various journals, and I can make enough to keep you as comfortably as you have been accustomed to live. Only say you forgive me, darling! Look at me with one of your sweet, loving glances, Drusy, and say, 'Rex, I love you, so that I must forgive you!'"

She stood before him like a statue, leaving her hands in his, simply because he held them too tightly for her to withdraw them. She had listened to him with downcast eyes and still, proud mouth. But now she looked him in the face, and said—

"I love Rex Eden, and shall always love him. It was not Rex Eden who deceived me, but Reginald Warre, and for him I have no love and no forgiveness."

"Be logical, Drusy! I will do what penance you like, dear; but you will not make us both miserable for life because——"

"Speak for yourself, please, Captain Warre! I have no intention of being miserable. Will you kindly release my hands?"

"Not if I know it!" he exclaimed, hotly. "This is sheer nonsense, you know! You own you love me——"

"I beg your pardon; I do not love you! Do you want more than that? Then I will tell you I hate and despise you—I despise you! Do you hear, Captain Warre?"

There was certainly no love in the eyes gazing straight into his. Drusy at that moment both hated and loved the same man—her heart ached and longed for Rex Eden, while she was furious with Reginald Warre.

His face growing very white, he slowly dropped her hands, and said—

"I will trouble you no more. I have wronged you—I own it in grief and shame; but, Heaven knows, the punishment you mete out is more than I deserve. Some day you may be sorry you allowed your pride to conquer your love."

2. Be Thou my joy and gladness,
O Thou, my life and light,
And raise me from this sadness,
This long tempestuous night,
Into the perfect gladsome day,
Where, bathed in joy divine,
Among Thy saints, and bright as they,
I too shall ever shine.

3. There shall I dwell for ever,
Not as a guest alone,
With those who cease there never
To worship at Thy throne;
There in my heritage I rest,
From baser things set free,
And join the chorus of the blest
For ever, Lord, to Thee!

AFTER DEATH.

A DREAM.

ONE cold winter's evening three friends sat round a large fire in a spacious room in one of the oldest colleges of a well-known University. Outside in the great quadrangle the December wind was blowing and whistling with startling fierceness, whilst a thick covering of frost-hardened snow lay on the ancient pile of buildings, and paks of black and wind-driven clouds threatened a further downfall. The topic write, alluring though the subject is. What we wish to do is to preserve from oblivion an experience, related by the eldest man of the three, which will probably be of more than usual interest at a season when men's thoughts especially turn to those who have left the fireside circle for the blessed Home which lies beyond the shadows and the mystery of death.

"Some years ago"—so ran the story in the "So ran the story."

upon which those three friends were conversing was one to which, by some strange impulse, mortals seem drawn on such nights—it was the immortality of the soul and the nature of the life after death. One of the three was a young graduate who had recently won great academical distinction; another, a man considerably older than either of his companions, and one who had, unlike them, been through the furnace of affliction, and had come out with a stronger faith than theirs; the third member of the little company was the writer.

Of the many facts and theories which were carefully discussed that evening we do not intend to narrator's words—"you will both remember that I lived with my mother, then a widow advanced in years, in a pleasant house in the centre of this town. Whilst there, what with excessive study and a family bereavement, I fell seriously ill—so ill, in fact, that my chances of life seemed almost hopeless. For three weeks I lay scarcely able to move, though quite conscious; and then one morning the doctor, in no very cheering tones, said that at midnight my case would undergo an important change—for life or for death.

"The disease which afflicted me was of such a character that, whilst it weakened and attenuated the physical man, it seemed to add power to the mental faculties; and consequently the thoughts and feelings which possessed me during the hours of that momentous day can be better conceived than described. Only a man who has drawn thus near to the dissolution of his mortal nature can adequately realise the different aspect which life and its pursuits wear when viewed from the threshold of the grave; and only such a one knows fully how weak and vain a support philosophy or conjecture of any kind is to rely on then, and how blessed and peaceful must be the closing hours of him who can look up with firm assurance to the Christ and say, 'Thy rod and Thy staff they comfort me.'

"To the widowed mother who tended me with all a mother's care and self-forgetfulness the day was one of constant prayer and hourly deepening anxiety. Not a syllable, however, escaped her which told of her anguish of heart. 'I leave you in God's hands, my darling,' she whispered tremulously, as she adjusted my pillows for the last time that evening; 'He knows what is best, and will do the right.'

"That night I had a dream so realistic and remarkable that I remember to-day its minutest details.

"The hour was midnight; the scene, my bed-chamber. A dim funeral light was burning in the room, and, except the measured ticking of the clock, no sound broke the stillness there. The only conscious presence in the room was my own, and I was there in spirit only, for death had taken from me the robes of mortality. Methought, however, that though invisible to the eyes of the living, I still possessed the faculty of watching and taking an interest in their doings. To myself I appeared as a formless, vaporous being—resembling one of those small pale clouds which sometimes sail in loneliness across the deep blue of the summer sky. On the bed which filled one corner of the room lay the shrunken and shrouded form of a man—

"'A worn-out fetter that the soul
Had broken and thrown away.'

It was the mortal tenement in which I had passed life's hurrying years.

"As I looked with a curious interest upon the shrouded form, the door of the chamber opened, and I saw my mother enter. There were tears in her eyes, and sorrow depicted in every line of her dear face. She approached the body, and, bending down, kissed passionately the cold, responseless lips. Then she knelt beside the bed and told the Eternal Father of her great loneliness, now that husband and son were taken from her; and she prayed that the time of separation from those she loved might not be long. As I listened there came over me a yearning—more intense because I knew instinctively the hopelessness of it—to let her know that her lad was near her still, and thus lift the load of sorrow from her desolated heart.

"Long the dear figure remained kneeling, and when she arose and softly left the room, the scene of my dream suddenly changed, and I felt then that I had entered fully on the life beyond death. The spirit had taken a garb very like that which it wore in life, except that the imperfections and mutability of the latter were gone.

"The scene of my second experience was a town somewhat similar to that in which we are met to-night. A broad clear river threaded its way among noble and ancient buildings which were evidently homes of knowledge and of thought, whilst grave sculptured figures looked down on the world from their niches high up on the old walls. The streets were thronged with passers-by whose features told of an inward peace unknown on the mortal side of the grave; and as I moved among the throng, with a clear blue heaven above me, and a sun shining which warmed and cheered, but never scorched or wearied, I recognised many whom I had seen committed to the dust of earth during my sojourn there.

"One reunion, however, I remember more than all the others. It was with one who had been my bosom friend and constant companion during mortal life—the sharer in every sorrow that had darkened my home, and the unselfish participator in all my joys and successes. 'What is it,' I asked of him, 'which makes you all appear so happy here? Why are there no sad, tear-stained faces?' Very deliberately came the answer, and with a distinctness which almost made me fancy when I awoke from my dream that a human voice had really spoken the words to me: 'There is no sin here.' Never shall I forget the earnestness and power with which these words were spoken, and the echo of the voice often haunts me in the thoughtful hours of life.

"Very sweet, as you will imagine, was this resumption of an old fellowship which the grave had sundered, and long we conversed of the past and present. Then he led me, I thought, to a greater joy than any that had gone before—to hear the Voice and see the Face of Him whom, with much waywardness and many wanderings, I had ever looked to as my eternal hope among the shadows of mortality. Just at the moment when this blessed sight was to have been mine, when the desire of years was to be realised, the spell was broken, and I awoke—to live.

"Scarcely a year after the night of this strange experience the mother who had watched so tenderly by my bedside, herself passed through the veil which hides us from the Unseen. As is only natural, I often think of her, and of her love and perfect sympathy; and I sometimes find comfort in the thought that she may be near me still—even as in my dream I was with her—though it needs the kind hand of death to give my feeble sight the power to see her as she is."

Thus ended the narrative told that winter's night in the old college. Never since have the three men met, and changes have come which prevent the possibility of an earthly reunion. Often does the recollection of those thoughtful faces and that evening's conversation come to the writer amid far other scenes; and often also will there come the thought that perhaps even in our day, as of old, a glimpse of the eternal future is sometimes granted to earnest, prayerful men through the gateway of a dream.

WILLIAM H. SWIFT,

HOW BESSIE WAS TRANSPLANTED.

BY MAUD R. HALL, AUTHOR OF "A NEW DIANA," "THE FILLING-UP OF CWM ELAN," ETC.

IT was early spring-time when I first saw the child, and one of those dull, grey, heavy days we so often have in London at that season of the year. The flower-women were selling violets and snow-drops, and even daffodils, at the street-corners, but nevertheless the chill winds swept past with a sharp reminder that winter was not yet over.

"Nell, my dear, you are not going out again?" said my mother, as I came into the drawing-room, dressed for walking. "I think that both you and Lillias have been out long enough for to-day."

"I should think so!" echoed my sister from the depths of a comfortable arm-chair. "But Nell never will idle like other people."

"That poor Mrs. Tibbits—" I began.

"Dear me, yes," said my mother. "I had quite forgotten; and someone ought to go and see her, poor thing; but really, Nell, I think to-morrow would do just as well. It is such a nasty afternoon—"

She stopped, and I hesitated. It was a nasty afternoon, and the fire was enticing, yet I must go some day. Elizabeth Tibbits had once been a house-maid of ours, and she had written to my mother in the greatest distress. Her husband was out of work, the children were ailing. My mother would help her, she said, and so I had volunteered to go and see what could be done. I knew it was useless waiting for Lillias to go with me, so, after a moment's consideration, I turned to the door.

"To-morrow might be worse than to-day, mother; there is that to be thought of, so I had better go. Good-bye," and I was out in the street.

It was rather worse than I anticipated. As I drew nearer the river, the chill leaden sky seemed to drop down above me until its greyness was all round. Scarcely more than three o'clock, the afternoon light was nearly gone, people hurried past as if anxious to be within doors, and the pavements were dark with the clammy, sticky mud of a great city.

I stopped half-way across Westminster Bridge, and pulling my cloak closer, looked up and down the lead-coloured, hurrying waters, now turned to a whitish tint as one of the penny steamboats shot out from beneath my feet and churned the current into foam. So grey above, so grey beneath! and midway between the two, a few white seagulls, hovering almost motionless in the air!

My way led me through the most crowded and dirtiest part of Lambeth, and for some time I followed the directions I had received. Then my bump of locality failed me, and I was forced to ask for guidance at a small sweet-shop. There were long red and white sticks of candy and other bright-coloured wares in the window, and two dirty children were gazing at them with longing eyes. The woman in the shop was civil enough, but she was a stranger, she said, and could tell me nothing. Perhaps "the lady at the coal-shop opposite" might know. I crossed the little street to a sort of shed wherein a large woman, begrimed with coal-dust, and with arms akimbo, stood beside a weighing machine. Round her were sacks of coal, in front of her was a tin label with "1s. 2d. per cwt." painted upon it in white letters. She helped me in so far that she knew the street I was in search of, and, following her directions, I found myself in a narrow alley guiltless of sidepath. I could not help thinking of my mother's horror could she have seen her daughter groping her way up such a place!

To my great relief, a turn soon brought me into a street of small houses, quite tidy and exactly alike. The window-blinds were dingy, but the place looked very respectable, and in one or two instances a pot of evergreens was placed in the lower window. No. 10 was one of these, and I hopefully ran up the steps that led to the door. There were three bell-handles, and after some consideration, I decided to take the lowest one, thinking that it would probably lead to the kitchen regions. After two good pulls, the door was opened by a woman, who regarded me with a kind of insolent stare. Her tawdry dress was profusely trimmed with blue plush, and when I asked for Mrs. Tibbits, she informed me that there might be some such person in the house, but, as she was the possessor of the first-floor, she consequently had no knowledge of the lodgers higher up. I asked if I should ring the topmost bell. She replied ungraciously that I might if I chose, and shut the door.

This time my efforts were more successful, but in the woman who now faced me I could trace no resemblance to our former trim, fresh-looking house-maid. Coarse-featured, unkempt, she had one dirty child in her arms, and another clinging to her torn skirts, and before we had reached the top of the stair up which she led me, she had shaken and cuffed the elder one more than once.

"He's that worryin', that he's enough to wear a saint!" she exclaimed in answer to my expostulation. "Yes, Miss Ellen, but it's only them as 'as children to do for that knows what they are. I'm sure I've 'ad my share, let alone Tibbits' mother, that can't do a hand's turn for herself."

She had two rooms, she told me, but for warmth, and to save trouble, they all lived in one. My heart sank when I entered it. The house was so respectable on the outside, so miserably dirty and worn inside: but Mrs. Tibbits' room was worse than all.

"Mrs. Tibbits' room was worse than all."—p. 179.

Every part of it, ceiling and all, looked dingy and black. The floor was bare, with no attempt at cleanliness; the few chairs were littered with what looked like dirty rags, the deal table in the middle had the remains of a meal still upon it. There was a small fire in the rusty grate, and an old woman crouched beside it, nor did she even look up at our entrance. A hollow cough instantly attracted my attention, and looking further, I could see a little figure sitting up in bed at the other side of the room. Bed, I have called it—it was more like a heap of miscellaneous articles, with a blanket on the top.

"That's Bessie," said Mrs. Tibbits, following me, and stooping to straighten the old coverings. "She's never been well since the winter began," she continued, as the little girl tried to speak, and was interrupted by a fit of coughing. "I was forced to let her go to school yesterday, for the inspector came and said he'd fine us if we kept her at home, but to-day she ain't fit to leave her bed, and I keep her there, for it's warmer."

Looking at the child, I wondered how she had ever lived in such surroundings. Her delicate little face was framed in soft golden-brown hair, and her eyes, bright with fever, were positively startling in their depth and beauty. The effort of coughing had brought a bright flush into the thin cheek but my heart ached to see how white they instantly became as she sank back exhausted on her pillow. And such a pillow!

Mrs. Tibbits was but too ready to tell the story of all she had undergone since she had left my mother's service, and when I at last got out into the street again, her complaints of her husband were still ringing in my ears. Perhaps, if I had seen more of London, its immense size and population, the visit I had just paid would not have made such an impression; but I was new to it all, and that room haunted me—its dirty, squalid appearance, the unappetising remains of food, the whining children, Mrs. Tibbits' harsh voice going on and on in a perpetual stream, and, amongst it all, the delicate little girl, coughing her life away unheeded.

My mother brought me comfort, as she generally did, and in a few days Bessie was sent to a children's hospital, while we consulted as to what was best to be done for her. The doctor said that, with good food and country air, she might live to grow up,

London was killing her, and were she to go back to her home, she would, he averred, not last out the year. What was to be done! On one point I was decided—that she should go into the country somehow; and during the visits I paid to the hospital I grew very fond of the little maid. Her nurses, too, were full of praise of her patience and loving gratitude for any kindness shown her. Mrs. Tibbits was quite willing to give her up, and it was like inspiration when one morning at breakfast my mother said, "I do wish we could induce Martha to have someone to live with her! It is not right for her to be there alone, now that she is getting so blind."

"Bessie!" I cried. "The very thing!"

Martha was our old nurse, who lived in a little cottage far away in the country. She had bought the land, and there she lived, quite alone, absorbed in her garden and her bees. Bricks-and-mortar were her delight, and, bit by bit, she had added a whole new cottage, as a kind of wing to the old one. It was her pride and delight to have Lilies or me to spend a night or two in this new building. She kept herself apart from her neighbours, though she was very kind when anyone was ill or in trouble, and, when we said anything about her loneliness, she would only reply that she was best so, and that she kept a large dinner-bell on purpose to ring out of the window in case of fire or burglars! So it required some tact to approach the subject of her having Bessie to live with her. The more we discussed it, the more I liked the plan. The simple country life would be everything to the child, who in her turn would be an interest and help to the old woman. I believe in her letter my mother dwelt principally upon the good Bessie would gain, for Martha quite "took to" the idea, and in the warm summer days the little girl travelled southwards, and we only heard of her from time to time in Martha's letters.

It was spring again when I next saw her. The twilight was falling as I drove across the common and up the country road to the cottage, but the air was sweet and fresh, and country-bred though I was, the faint twitter of the birds going to rest, the distant low of the cattle, filled me with a new sense of delight.

Martha's cottage stood end on to the road, so that I could not see the welcome light of her fire as I drove up, but she herself was waiting at the gate, and she greeted me in her usual fashion, with a curtsey out of doors and a warm kiss in the house. How cosy it all looked with the firelight shining out upon the red-brick floor of the verandah! Supper was nearly ready, Martha told me, and she had cooked something she knew I should like, so I hurried up-stairs to wash my hands.

All this time there had been no sign of Bessie, but I was not surprised, for Martha never approved of children being brought forward and "made of," as she expressed it. However, I had hardly been in my room five minutes before a timid knock at the door made me call out "Come in!" and there stood the little girl, holding a jug of hot water, and smiling and blushing all over. The sweet childish face was unaltered, as she asked in her shy, old-fashioned way if I was well; but though there were still signs of delicacy, the cheeks were rounder, and the eyes had lost the wistful, pained look that had so haunted me that afternoon in London.

The next day was Sunday. The warm sun-rays came slanting in over my bed as if to wake me, and I jumped up to see what the outside world was like. The bees were humming busily among the borders of spring flowers, and the jessamine upon the verandah seemed coloured by the sun itself. Some apple-trees shut out the view of the road, and these were full of blossom, as if a pink-and-white snowstorm had come softly down in the night and covered the rough gnarled boughs. Martha was feeding her hens. I could hear her voice calling to them, and soon I discovered her standing on the grass-plot, beyond the flower-beds, and beside her Bessie in a fresh blue cotton frock and white apron.

We went to church in great state. Martha's Sunday dress of stiff black silk lent dignity to my simpler costume and Bessie's little white hat. After dinner we wandered among the flower-beds, and I listened to endless stories of each bulb and plant; for Martha knew them all by heart, in spite of the fact that her eyesight was too bad for her to distinguish them unless she stooped low over each. I was pleased to note how in this, as in everything else, she included Bessie with herself; and when she told me how the country air had seemed to do the child good almost at once, she talked of her as a grandmother might have done. Clearly Bessie had found her way to the old woman's heart!

"And I'm learning her to cook and truss a fowl, and be useful," she concluded, while Bessie's eyes responded to everything that she said. "Now, my dear, put on the kettle, and we'll have a cup of tea by-and-by."

It was hard to be obliged to leave this peaceful spot and rush back to busy London, but it had to be, and early on Monday afternoon the shoemaker's little pony-cart, hired for the occasion, came to take me to the station. My bag and Martha's presents of eggs and flowers were soon packed in. The good-byes were said and I drove off, but I could not help looking back to wave my hand again. The afternoon sun was peeping through the creepers and throwing patches of light upon the verandah floor. The bees hummed lazily past on the soft spring air and buried their heads in the rich bronze of the wall-flowers. The sky was blue, flecked over with small, soft, white clouds, and beneath the jessamine-covered arch stood the old woman and brow-haired child. Martha's hand rested upon the gate, her eyes were strained after me as I drove away, but Bessie's face was lifted up like one of the flowers growing round her, and as the spring sunshine fell upon her head, it seemed a bright harbinger of a summer in store for her.

THE BOOK OF RUTH.—I.

BY THE RIGHT REV. W. BOYD CARPENTER, D.D., LORD BISHOP OF RIPON.

"And a certain man of Beth-'ehem-judah went to sojourn in the country of Moab, he, and his wife, and his two sons."—RUTH i. 1.

THE Book of Ruth is the romance of the Bible. The charm of the story has robbed criticism of its sting. The tale has movement, and tragic incident, and happy consummation. Its pastoral simplicity delights us. We are tired of heated discussions and high politics, of jarring controversy and commercial panics. We pine for the country air, for the fragrant meadows and the yellow corn, and the simple discourse of simple men. We can forget the haste and hurry of the world, and even ourselves, in the hopes and fears and fortunes of country life. The lessons we learn are easy and pointed; they are practical rather than deep, and yet they are of living force; and as we read, the sense of greater things is with us, for we know that the story plays a part—subordinate, no doubt, but real—in the great drama of the world. Ruth, for all that her own life's story is complete, is one who takes a place in the great moving procession of characters which preceded the Christ.

The book supplies a link between what has gone and what is to come. The feeling that this was the case probably accounts for the position which it occupies among the books of the Bible. Before it is the wild anarchy which the judges strove to reduce to local order; following it, we read the story of the movements which led to more settled order, under the guidance of Samuel and Saul, and culminated in national stability under the sceptre of David. Placed thus between books which record the tumultuous story of the formation and growth of national life, the Book of Ruth is a pleasant interlude. It is like a country holiday, after the painful pressure of anxious work.

But even in this simple and pastoral tale the affairs of the kingdom are not forgotten. We are introduced to this quiet home-life of the family at Beth-lehem-judah, but it is the family which is destined to give to Israel and Judah its most illustrious race of kings. We are reading the story of the immediate ancestors of David and Solomon.

Sometimes the question has been asked why the book finds a place in the Sacred Canon. The answer might well be that it traces the origin of the family of David the king, out of which He sprang Who was David's Son and David's Lord. But the homely record reminds us that simple things are dear to God. He who watches the sparrow in its fall and the flowers as they grow, cares for the fortunes of simple homes, and marks the fears and hopes of the family life. The story is not told us only because great issues of national and world history are bound up with the narrative. The experiences of these simple folk have an interest of their own. Elimelech and Naomi are not interesting only because they have points of contact with David and his descendants. Their own story, apart from the great future with which it is associated, was lived out under God's fatherly providence, and bears its message and its meaning to the world. It is the story of simple fidelity, out of which future greatness springs. Ruth prepared the way for Israel's king and the world's Messiah; but besides these greater things, the book tells how the devotion and faithfulness of a true hearted woman restored the greatness of a fallen house. Whatever else we learn, the lesson of simple duty we see shining throughout the story. It reveals no wild ambitions; it tells us how greatness may be found in doing with our might the duty which lies nearest. It has its message for an age of unrest and dissatisfaction. It shows us the better way of life, the way of piety and goodness. In the corn-fields of Beth-lehem, by the side of Ruth as she gleaned, we may learn contentment, and that primitive faith which believed without signs, and trusted in God without the applause of men.

The story follows the simple lines of unconscious art. We are first introduced to the family in the days of its prosperity. We are then told how dark times of adversity overtook them, and we are shown the scenes and incidents which led to the restoration of the prosperity of the house.

The members of the family at the outset of the story are four—Elimelech and his wife Naomi, with their two sons, Mahlon and Chilion. Of these, only one—Naomi—survives at the close. But in the beginning the sun seems shining over the household. Elimelech bears a name which signifies that God is King; Naomi, in the hour of her sorrow and solitude, plays bitterly with her name; more fitly might she have been called Mara—bitter. But in the earlier days her name was appropriate enough, for rightly was the mother called Pleasant when the two boys were called Joy and Ornament. Over the family there was the brightness of happy days. The names given to children in those early times frequently carried some hint of the home history. If the shadows fell round the home, the child born in the days of disaster and despair bore in its name the memory of family or national distress. During the very period of which we write, a sorrowful woman had named her child Itehabod, because the glory of life seemed to have passed away. But in the home of Elimelech fortune was smiling, and the two lads bore in their names the reminder of those happy days, adorned with prosperity and domestic love.

The place where they lived was pleasant and fertile. It was Beth-lehem-judah—so called to distinguish it from Beth-lehem in Zebulun, as we distinguish Newport in Monmouthshire from Newport in the Isle of Wight. Beth-lehem in Judah was situated in a fruitful soil. The harvests were abundant, and the water supply sufficient. In this "House of Bread," as its name signified, Elimelech lived as one whose family was known and respected in the locality. They were not new-comers; they belonged to the number of the old and recognised residents of the place. They were Ephrathites of Beth-lehem-judah, Ephrathah being the old name of the district. The picture given us, therefore, is of a prosperous, happy, well-established home.

The next scene introduces us to the same family under the shadow of adversity. The trouble begins with famine; and the famine so filled the mind of Elimelech with apprehension that emigration to a foreign land appeared to him to be the only resource. Moab offered many attractions, and, accordingly, in the direction of Moab the family moved.

Here wealth and fertility seemed to greet them. The hardships of their own home were forgotten, and in the field of Moab, the rich table-land where plenty was supplied, they re-established their home. Here, too, the family joys expanded. The two sons married, Orpah being the bride of Mahlon, and Ruth of Chilion. But the restored prosperity in a strange land was short-lived. The dark shadow which waits on all homes fell upon them. Elimelech died soon after their arrival in Moab, and when ten years had passed Mahlon and Chilion died also, so that of the once happy family Naomi and her daughters-in-law alone were left.

So far the story gives us two scenes—the scene of brightness and hope, the scene of darkness and despair. The morning which promised so fair was turned in the evening into the shadow of death. It is a simple story of a simple family, and here for the present we must leave it, noting only its plain and obvious lessons.

Is it too much to say that we can trace a certain measure of weakness in the character of Elimelech? Was not his the temperament which clung so fondly to his family and loved his dear ones so well that he could not endure the thought of their distress or privation? Many men are heroic enough for themselves, but they lack that moral robustness which enables them to be heroic for others. The dread of loss, not to himself, but to those who are bound to him by ties of affection, may lead a man aside from the higher path; it is not always personal selfishness, but excessive, almost weak, solicitude for others, which evinces cowardice. Elimelech, if our conjecture is right, could not bear to contemplate the misery which might befall his family. Scarcity of bread was threatened. The pain of prolonged suspense, followed by perhaps prolonged privation, rose before his mind, and filled his imagination with many fears. The fancied terrors were probably greater than the actual evils of the situation. Cowards, it has been said, die many times. Over-fondness may produce a sort of cowardly anxiety. In this lies the reason why our Lord denounces over-much anxiety as a species of mammon worship. "Ye cannot serve," He says, "God and Mammon; therefore I say unto you, take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat or what ye shall drink, nor yet for your body what ye shall put on." There is, of course, a fitting and a wide prudence which is in nowise at variance with Christ's command of faith, but there is a habit of running to meet trouble half-way which is the very opposite of faith; and in the story of Elimelech I think there is a suggestion that Elimelech's emigration was more hasty than wise. The ardent attachment of all true Israelites to the Land of Promise had in it a religious aspect. It was the land into which God had led their fathers; it was the land on which the blessings of their fathers' God seemed to abide; it was the land where all the magnificent hopes of the future were concentrated. To remain there, and to work out the purpose of God in a patriotic persistence of duty, was the ideal of the Israelitish life; but the first view of danger and the first pressure of want were enough to drive Elimelech to seek, in the plains of Moab, sustenance and safety.

His eagerness and weakness blinded him to higher considerations. The social atmosphere of Moab was bad; the morals of the people and the religious ideal were alike low; the worship of Chemosh and of Molech was characterised by cruelty and sensuality. In such an environment the higher moral interests of home could hardly be safeguarded.

In forgetting these moral risks, Elimelech seems to have forgotten also the tenderness of God's providential love.

Cowardice, when it flies, often meets the very dangers which it seeks to avoid. Elimelech sought to avoid poverty and death: but in Moab death quickly overtook himself, while both evils overtook the family. Elimelech died soon after their arrival, and Naomi, after ten years of exile, is bereft of husband and sons, and reduced to poverty.

But all the while the care of God is over the household: His educating watchfulness never ceases. To this Elimelech was blind; the one absorbing anxiety of his soul was the thought of present need; and yet in his very name he carried the reminder of the trust which should have been his—"God is King"—that in that lay the assurance of the strength and the protection which never fail. The past had borne abundant witness to this; the story of the wilderness had been the story of God's care; man did not live by bread alone, but by every word of God. The lesson taught to the fathers in the wilderness was the lesson which was calculated to foster heroic endurance and simple trust.

But this lesson was missed by Elimelech, and he fades out of our sight—he has no share in the great future which is to be the portion of the family. The ancestor of David is to be sought in Boaz, not in Elimelech; and Elimelech's emigration to Moab has in it a kind of abdication of destiny—the crown which might have been his passed to another.

To Naomi's mind the mistake is made clear at last. She seems, when she returns in sorrow and loneliness to the land of Israel, to realise that there had been some weakness or wrong in the course of their action. "The Lord," she said, "hath testified against me, and the Almighty hath afflicted me." She had gone out full, and she had been brought home again empty; she had found that trial is inescapable; she illustrates the truth that it is nobler to face adversity than to fly from it: that patient trust has higher qualities and better chances of success than prudent timidity.

It is possible to barter away moral and spiritual advantages for the sake of material comfort or worldly ease. The lower and the higher are perpetually meeting in conflict, and the first lesson taught us is the duty of maintaining in high and strong hopefulness the determined preference for moral good over earthly advantage.

If this interpretation of Elimelech's character and action be true, he is one who succumbed to a very natural and a very frequent temptation. Life constantly presents to us alternatives of choice. Our prerogative is that we can choose; but choice involves responsibility, and in the exercise of this responsibility moral judgment is of priceless value. Too often, however, the power of moral judgment is weakened by our methods of education. We teach our children the duty of success: the examples which we hold up to them as worthy of admiration are the examples of the energy which has achieved fame, or the perseverance which has accumulated wealth.

It is quite true that perseverance and energy are excellent and admirable qualities; but the way in which these examples are sometimes put before the minds of the young is calculated to teach them not so much that energy and patience are good as that fame and wealth are desirable. We need at all times, and especially in periods when there seems to be a feverish desire to accumulate, to be on our guard not to confound means with ends. It is possible to put forward the virtues of determination, self-denial, and perseverance, only as desirable or useful means towards the possession of wealth or of influence. As a fact, however, if life means anything, the experiences of life, whether in the want of or in the possession of wealth, are means towards the development of spiritual qualities. The much and the little of this world's goods are used by God as instruments to educate us in self-denial and patience, in courage and responsibility. In other words, the life is more than meat, the character is more than possession; and one of the sources of modern weakness and modern discontent is the reversal of this thought.

The practical lesson, which may be found in all this, may be expressed in a single word. Moral qualities are more than material possessions. If this were taught in homes, the heated race for wealth might be less anxiously pursued, contentment with smaller returns might be the means of developing moral qualities, at once higher and more robust. The period of plain living and high thinking, which many admire and few desire, might be brought within the range of practical experience. The ostentation and the vulgarity—for ostentation is always vulgar—which disturb and distress society might be seen to be unworthy of beings whose real glory is found in their likeness to the Father who made them.

Happy would it be for our land if the ideal set before all classes were the ideal that the true betterment is the betterment of the moral nature and of the character: that a good post is not merely the post where there is good pay, but where there is the opportunity of useful work and higher moral discipline. With the recognition of this there might prevail in business transactions a worthier and a nobler principle; the haste to be rich, and the doubtful expedients which accompany it, might be banished. The relations of society between class and class would be happier; the bitterness and estrangement which we deplore might rapidly diminish; and the rivalry of men would no longer be base competition, but a nobler emulation of being and of doing good.

But there is another lesson—and perhaps a happier one—which the story suggests. The Book of Ruth is universally loved. Can we explain this widespread affection for so short and simple a story? We might attribute it to the characters which are presented to us there: the sadness and solitude of Naomi, the noble courtesy of Boaz, and the fidelity of Ruth—so picturesque and charming. But there are picturesque and fascinating figures in other parts of the Bible, and yet the attraction which the Book of Ruth has for us does not extend in the same way to other books. The charm, I think, lies not so much in the characters—though these are attractive—as in the fact that in this book we touch quiet home-life, to the story of which the book is completely dedicated. We love the tale of the fortunes of this simple family, and we are glad that it should have found a place in the Sacred Canon; for we feel that the lesser human interests, which the world may hardly note, are dear to God.

To know that the home-life is watched over and guided by the providence of God is to realise that the trifling trials, the strange vicissitudes, and the insignificant joys of the ordinary households of men have a place in the heart of God Himself.

The Book of Ruth thus becomes the book for the family. We all know the pressure of hard times, the presence of sorrow, and the bewildering influences of anxiety. We doubt at times whether our small home-concerns can ever find a place in the thought of God; but He who watches over the birds of the air and the grass of the field has a thought for the sorrows of men. The little is not always the insignificant: whatever touches the heart of man, whatever affects his highest welfare, whatever causes the thrill of joy or the throb of pain, cannot be otherwise than remembered by God. His care is as real in the little things as in the great. The fashion of a flower that to-day is and to-morrow is cast into the oven is as minutely cared for as the life of the planet that lasts for millions of years. We, who attempt to judge things by the material place which they occupy, or the number of years that they last, are sometimes deceived, and imagine that God's thoughts must be as our thoughts. We need to learn that all are alike to Him: that the smallest as well as the greatest are His: that He watches the fortunes of a family as well as the destiny of an empire.

But it is needful to understand the meaning of His care. When we speak of it, we sometimes think of it only under the aspect of the comfortable things which His love may bring us; but God's care is the care of the spirit of man, and His care is as much seen in bitter providences as in happy times. It is not His sunshine alone which evinces His love; the heavy rains also, which darken the sky, are the signs of His care over the evil and the good. The cheerless times are His as well as the cheerful times. He makes winter as well as summer, for both are good in season; and His ways with the sons of men are as His ways with the world of Nature. The vicissitudes of life are His angels; and He is caring for Naomi in her loneliness and in her poverty as much as in her days of plenty.

Spiritual growth of one sort can only be nurtured in trial. Tenderness and sympathy, kindly tact and unassuming patience, can only be learned in the dark and in the painful experiences of life: it is but a poor and narrow view of Divine care which limits it only to things which are pleasant. We have said in our impatience that it is a cruel world, but the cruelty of which we complain may be veiled kindness. Looking back upon the storm-laden periods of life, we are led to confess that we would not have been without its darker experience. It is good for us to have seen affliction, for we had not known the fulness or the nearness of God's love unless we had met Him in the dark and in the solitary places. It is in the wilderness that God speaks; and it is better to hear His voice in the desert than to be deaf to it amidst the noises of the world's prosperity. It may be that the spirit drives us as it drove our Master into the wilderness, but if so, the angels and the ministry of God will meet us there, and the meaning of His care and the joy of His presence will be revealed to our hearts. Thus the story shows to us the weakness and wilfulness of man, and the wisdom and the care of God.

A JEWISH CONFIRMATION.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM BURNET, M.A.

IS very interesting to compare Jewish and Christian rites together. Widely though modern Judaism and Christianity differ in their principles and doctrines, they resemble each other in not a few of their outward observances. In some cases ours were no doubt derived originally from the synagogue, whilst in others the Jews have imitated the religious customs of the Christians amongst whom they live.

We have a striking example of this resemblance in the rites with which the young people are admitted as members of the congregation. In Paris these are even spoken of as the "Première Communion," and in other places as their "Confirmation." Strictly speaking, these names are most inappropriate, being connected so closely with Christian ideas and hopes altogether foreign to Judaism. Still, they have come to be applied in both cases to the public profession of religious faith.

Before describing this interesting ceremony, as witnessed in the chief synagogue at Paris, it may be well to offer some account of the stages of religious education preparatory to it.

Circumcision is, of course, still, as in patriarchal times, the ordinance by which at eight days old Jews seek admission for their children into covenant with God. For this occasion two witnesses, called the sandakin, or godparents, generally husband and wife, are selected from the relatives or intimate friends of the family. This is considered an honourable and meritorious office, and there are societies of persons qualified and disposed to undertake it even for the poorest parents. A Hebrew name is then given to the infant (as was done at the circumcision of John the Baptist), which is added to his secular one, and under which, when he is grown up, he is known in the synagogues and is called to discharge any duty connected with its services.

As soon as the child can speak, he is taught his daily prayers, and he begins to wear under his clothes a square piece of cloth, termed the "Arbang Kenaphoth," or "four corners," to which are attached the "Tsitsith," or memorial fringes, probably similar to those that our blessed Lord wore, conforming in this respect, as in every point, to the Ceremonial Law. Each of these fringes is composed of eight threads about a quarter of a yard long, fastened to the cloth with knots, made in a special manner and supposed to have a hidden mystic meaning. These fringes are always made of white lamb's wool, spun and prepared by a Jew. The wearing of this cloth with its appendages, even by the youngest child, is accounted of vital importance, being a literal compliance with the injunction in Numbers xv. 38, 39, and Deuteronomy xxii. 12. By so doing, according to the ancient Rabbins, a Jew is considered to have kept the whole Law, for this singular reason, that the numerical value of the word "Tsitsith" is 600, while the eight threads and five knots added to this make 613, the exact number of precepts said to be contained in the Law. However this may be, long before the child can understand this profound explanation he must wear this symbolic garment. At the same time, as he grows up, if he have pious and intelligent parents, he is instructed in the principles of his religion. By one of their Doctors it is laid down that at five years of age he should begin to study the Scriptures, at ten the Mishna, and at thirteen the rest of the Talmud. It goes without saying that this standard is seldom, if ever, attained in these days, when the requirements of secular education are so increasingly high for Jewish as well as other boys. Still, in every case a certain modicum of knowledge is required before they can be presented to the Rabbi, at the age of thirteen, to be made "Bar Mitzvah" or "sons of the Law." For that purpose they must have learned sufficient Hebrew to read and translate some passage of the Pentateuch, and to be able to repeat their prayers, the Ten Commandments, and the Thirteen Articles of the Jewish religion. When the son has passed an examination in these subjects, the father introduces him into the synagogue on the first Sabbath after his thirteenth birthday. The boy is then called up to read the Law before the congregation. When he has duly performed this formidable task, he is received as a full member, and is expected henceforward to fulfil all the obligations of his religion, both public and private. Previously to this, he is completely under the power of his parents, who are popularly said to be accountable for his sins; but from that day he becomes responsible for his own actions. Before that time he was called "Katon," or little one; now he is "Gadol," or grown up, being treated as a man. Accordingly, when the solemn service is over, the father lays his hand upon his head and pronounces these words: "May you follow the steps of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Amen. On this day you have arrived at manhood; from this day henceforth I am free from all your sins which you may commit hereafter; you have to answer for your own deeds. From this day and henceforth you are reckoned amongst the congregation; be strict and keep the Law and the precepts, and the God of Abraham will be your Shield and Guide through life." The family then meet around the festive board, and many and hearty are the congratulations offered to the youthful neophyte. How this view of parental obligations can be reconciled with the responsibility of each individual soul, even of the youngest child, to God, as taught by the Old Testament as well as by conscience, it is indeed hard to understand. This is a point, however, we will not here attempt to discuss.

We rather hasten to describe the impressive rites by which in France Jewish children of both sexes are solemnly dedicated to the service of God. As regards the boys, this is a more public ratification of their religious membership; whilst for the girls, who have reached the age of eleven and have been sufficiently instructed, it is the only way in which they are recognised as in any sense members of the congregation. That the daughters of Israel should be so received at all is a remarkable sign of the progress of modern thought and Christian ideas even amongst those who still reject Jesus as the Messiah and refuse to accept the Gospel. The elevation of woman to her rightful place on an equality with man is one of those indirect blessings which Christianity has brought in its train. The Jews have been slow in admitting this truth, and there is still a strange prayer used in the synagogue in which men are instructed to say, "Blessed art Thou, O Lord God, King of the Universe, who hast not made me a woman"; whilst the Jewess is taught to meekly say, "Blessed art Thou, O Lord God, King of the Universe, who hast made me according to Thy will."

With a happy inconsistency, however, modern Jews do admit their girls as well as their boys to a place in their community. On the occasion referred to both maidens and youths took part—the girls attired in simple white dresses and veils, as at a Christian Confirmation; the boys in plain black clothes.

The predominance of dark, piercing eyes and strong Jewish features was very striking. The general demeanour of the candidates was quiet and devout.

The proceedings began with the recitation, first in Hebrew by the boys, and then in French by the girls, of the Ten Commandments, the Thirteen Articles of their faith, and of certain prayers. These were repeated simultaneously by each company in turn. Suitable and eloquent addresses were then delivered by the Chief Rabbins of France and Paris, who at the close laid their hands on the heads of the young people, pronouncing a benediction, very much as is done by the Bishop in the Church of England. Sacred songs celebrating great events of Jewish history are also sometimes responsively sung by the boys and girls. The effect is very pleasing, and the rich melody of their well-trained voices reminds one forcibly of the children of their ancestors, in the days of our Blessed Lord, crying in the Temple, "Hosanna to the Son of David." The contrast is at the same time, indeed, painful, when one reflects that even at the close of this nineteenth century they are brought up in ignorance of Him of Whom Moses in the Law and the Prophets did write. Still, apart from these painful reflections, a very pleasing impression is certainly left by these simple, solemn rites. As we witness them, the prayer rises from the heart that the day may be hastened when the outward sign shall be fulfilled in all its deep spiritual meaning, and when Zechariah's prophecy, in all its rich fulness, shall be accomplished: "I will pour upon the House of David and the inhabitants of Jerusalem the spirit of grace and of supplications; and they shall look on Me, whom they have pierced, and they shall mourn for Him."

CHAPTER I.

On the 27th ult., at Calcutta, Captain J. Seaton, of the Royal Blues, to Rosamund, daughter of the late Sir Edward Finch, of Wotton Hall. By telegraph."

Madge Paton's eyes of wide horror hardly took in the sense of the words until she had read and re-read the terrible paragraph half a dozen times over.

Jem Seaton, the man, she was going out to marry, already wedded to another woman!

It was impossible—absolutely impossible; and she gave a faint laugh as she looked up from the front sheet of the Times, away across the blue Mediterranean and the wide white deck of the steamer to the gaunt white rock of Gibraltar they were so fast leaving behind them.

The latest London papers had come on board at Gibraltar, and Madge had taken up the Times idly enough, and settled herself in her deck-chair to study the only portion of it absolutely fascinating to a woman—the first sheet.

Above her head the white awning flapped listlessly in the faint breeze, and she looked vacantly across where two or three Lascars, with their noiseless brown feet and melancholy dark faces, were busy with the ropes.

A little sea-swallow darted on board and hung for an instant to rest against the canvas, then flashed away again into the infinite blue of the May sky.

There were very few passengers on board, for May is hardly the season for people to be outward bound for India, unless necessity drives them; and of these a few were playing deck quoits and cricket, while others were sitting reading or flirting in their deck-chairs.

It could not be true! Madge Paton crumpled the sheet in her white nervous fingers with a sudden agony of terror.

How could there be another Captain J. Seaton in the Royal Blues? and, above all, Jem in his homeward letters had of late mentioned Rosamund Finch as such a charming girl—a probable friend for his little wife.

Yes, it must be true; and this was the end of it—the end of the faithful love-story of two years of separation, the sorrow of her widowed mother's death, lightened by the thought of the lover she was so soon to see, and of—alas!—the whole of her little fund of money expended in her simple trousseau and her passage to Calcutta.

For Mrs. Paton's income, being an annuity, had died with her, and had it not been for the home and the husband waiting for her on the other side of the world, Madge would have been desolate indeed.

But he might have told her that his love for her had changed, instead of writing to fix the wedding-day and to beg her to come out to him at once!

He must have become infatuated with this beautiful Rosamund to have forgotten his faith and honour in so complete a fashion.

She was stunned by the blow, and the hopeless misery of the whole thing, as she sat with her eyes fixed on the flying clouds, and on the sea-swallow clinging to the shrouds—a waif in the world, like herself.

A sudden revulsion rose up within her against the clattering quoits and the shrill voices of the one or two girls and the handful of young officers who were playing.

"I say, now, now, Miss Baily, no cheating, you know—I saw you!"

"We'll have a regular high old time upon deck to-night with your guitar and a Spanish dance or two, eh, Miss Smith?"

"Mr. Feversham! I've twice asked you for my glove. Do you mean to keep it for ever?"

And so on.

Madge, with a gesture of disgust, rose from her in her pleasant full voice; "and I have taken an interest in you since the day you came on board. I could see that you were not over-burdened with wealth or friends, and as I was once in the very same position, for the sake of a dead past I want to help you if I can."

Madge sat up, a rigid look of despair coming over her white drawn face.

She was wonderfully pretty, the older woman

"It could not be true!"—p. 188.

chair and walked swiftly towards the companion on her way down to her cabin.

As she did so, a stout elderly lady, who had been observing her closely from her seat under the window of the music-room, came after her, and touched her gently on the arm.

"Forgive me, Miss Paton," she said; "I fear you have had some bad news."

The girl looked up, half-bewildered, into the kind face above her, and, throwing out her hands, burst into an agony of tears.

The lady slipped her arm round the slender waist and supported her below, out of sight of the inquisitive eyes on deck. And when she had half carried her into the little cabin which she occupied fortunately alone, she put Madge into her berth and sat by her, holding her cold fingers, until the paroxysm had spent itself, and the girl was calm once more.

"My name is Forsytus—Lady Forsytus," she said, thought, with a pang of pity, as she took in the details of the girl's face, with its corn-gold hair and delicate sensitive lips. Her eyes—a strange contrast to the fair masses of her hair—were rich deep brown, with lashes just curled enough at the very tips to suggest the possibility of a strong will and personality.

"Quite unfitted to battle with an unsympathetic world," was Lady Forsytus's conclusion as she watched Madge's pretty fingers twisting and untwisting over her panting bosom.

"I am in the most terrible position!" she said at last, passionately, thrusting the page of the Times into Lady Forsytus's sympathetic hand. "There is no one in the world to whom I can turn, for I am an orphan, and I was going out to be married, and this paper tells me that the man I was to have married has wedded another girl!"

She broke down, and her voice trailed off into silence, and nothing was heard in the close little cabin save the throbbing of the screw and the soft lapping of the fresh waves against the ship's side.

"You are certain that this is your fiancé?" said the older woman gravely, as she laid down the paper deliberately, and took off her glasses.

"Oh, certain—certain! There could be but one Jem Seaton in the Royal Blues; and besides, he has often spoken of this lovely Miss Finch; and we, he and I, have not met for two years. He has forgotten me, but he shall never know that he has broken my heart!"

"What shall you do?" said Lady Forsytus compassionately.

"I shall stop at Malta and forfeit the rest of my passage-money. Surely there will be someone there who will give me employment? I will slave my fingers to the bone if only they will let me be nurse or housemaid, so that I might never have to go back to England to be laughed at as a deserted woman."

Madge rocked herself to and fro in her narrow berth.

At present she could only think of the shame and misery of the whole affair. When she was calmer she would forget everything save her broken heart and the love that had gone from her. But her pride came to her rescue now.

"Had you not better go out to Calcutta, and find out the truth for yourself?" put in Lady Forsytus hesitatingly.

"I had rather die before I would put myself within touch of his hand, within sight of the face I have loved so well!" moaned the poor girl.

"In that case," said her new friend briskly, putting her glasses into their case with a decided snap, and then smoothing down the bodice of her dress with a complacent air, "I have a plan which I think will answer admirably. But, to begin with, look me in the face, and tell me if you can trust me."

Madge turned her tear-dimmed eyes upon the energetic stout little woman with the genial rosy face, and the hard line of the sailor-hat which looked so quaint on her middle-aged head.

Then she put out her hand with a faint smile, and laid it on the sunburnt well-formed fingers of her new friend.

"I could trust you with my life," she said tremulously.

Lady Forsytus winked violently, till her eyelids seemed to snap together. Then she said huskily—

"All right, then: that's a bargain; you give me your brains and your fingers, and I'll look after your future. You will stay with me in Malta, where I am going to be for a week, picking up a little niece of mine. Then we will all go back to London, you looking after little Dorothy on the voyage, in return for your passage. Then, I am just starting a Home for friendless and poor ladies in town, in St. Helena's Square, and I want a young sympathetic woman as under-superintendent, and if you will undertake the thing, why, the post is yours, and so is £150 a year. Don't thank me; it only worries me. What is the use of having more money than you can count if you can't make some use of it? If you like the plan, say so."

Madge, with a sudden passionate movement of gratitude, lifted Lady Forsytus' hand to her lips, and kissed it.

"God has indeed raised me up a friend," she whispered brokenly.

"Tut! tut!" said Lady Forsytus, springing to her feet with a jerk. "That's all right, then: that's settled. And don't go and show the rest of the passengers that you've had a disappointment. No one need ever know a thing about it if you don't tell them. Dear, dear; I think the salt water must have got into my eyes, they are actually quite weak. There—good-bye."

And she plunged out of the cabin, leaving Madge with a bewildered sensation of gratitude and amusement, and a head which ached and throbbed with the misery of her shattered hopes, which as yet she could scarcely realise.

She still wore Jem's ring on her finger: a little pearl hoop, with an inscription and the date inside. And with a sudden wave of feeling she took it off, and laid it away in her jewel-case.

Then turning her face to the wall, she lay motionless, battling with her tears.

She had loved him so well, and alas! alas! for her, she loved him still.

CHAPTER II.

"BASIL! BASIL! For goodness' sake, wake up! What are you dreaming about? A new Greek tense or a Hebrew accent? I've got a letter from Lady Forsytus, and there is some news in it."

And Maimie Short waved an open letter energetically before her brother's short-sighted eyes, as she executed a brisk pas seul in front of his chair.

Basil Short, the vicar of Puddleton Magna, smiled gently as he took Lady Forsytus' letter.

"My dear Maimie, my dreams were far more to the point," he said, in his slow pleasant voice. "I was wondering when Lady Forsytus' desolate ladies were coming to the Red Manor. The house has been empty for some time now."

"Bless your heart, my dear boy, this letter is all about that very subject!" cried Maimie. "She says that the home in St. Helena's Square is quite full, and that she is sending two or three ladies down here to the Red Manor, in charge of a Miss Paton, a very charming and suitable young woman."

"How nice and dull she will be!" said the Vicar, with a laugh. "I know what Lady Forsytus' suitable young women are. Do you remember the school-mistress she sent us last year, who was lame in one leg, and almost blind with one eye? She was so steady, Lady Forsytus said, that one would put up with a good many infirmities. If Miss Paton is so steady, she is sure to be afflicted."

"Don't be sarcastic; it doesn't suit you," said Maimie, as she danced out into the garden through the French window.

The Vicar of Puddleton Magna had been a Fellow of an Oxford college till two years before, when he had accepted the offer of a country living to make a home for his sister, who was considerably younger than himself.

He was the last man you would have expected to find in an out-of-the-way place like Puddleton.

His whole life had been absorbed in study since he gained his Fellowship. He was like Browning's Grammarian, his whole aim and ambition wrapped up in perfecting a tense, a method.

But he was gradually becoming accustomed to his new existence and to the souls in his charge, and, by striving to take an interest in his parish, had grown to be half in love with it and with his people.

He was not what you might call a good-looking man, but the honest light of goodness and true worth shone from his blue eyes behind their spectacles, and his brown hair, just sprinkled with a touch of grey, shaded a face noble and strong in expression, though pale with much study.

Maimie, his piquante sister of four-and-twenty, with her laughing pink and white cheeks, and her rosy dimpling mouth, was such an utter contrast to him, that it was no wonder they were such firm friends.

Lady Forsytus, who owned a good deal of property in and about Puddleton, had begged the brother and sister to take an active interest in the Home which she was founding in their village, and to which she had devoted one of her prettiest country houses.

Puddleton was like many another village in the fair county of Somerset, surrounded by trees and hills, well-wooded and well-watered. So beautiful in every way was it, that the Vicar reflected on the delight that it would afford to the women who had found life a hard battle when they came to end their days in the Red Manor, under the green slope of the hills.

But he was not allowed to reflect long over Lady Forsytus' letter.

Maimie came in to rouse him with the news that she expected him to accompany her down to the house, to see that everything was in order for her new-comers on the morrow. And with a sigh of regret for his beloved study, he departed.

It was a late October day when Madge Paton and her three elderly companions arrived at Puddleton Magna.

The air was crisp with autumnal freshness, and the leaves in the wood above the house were turning bronze and yellow with the touch of the dying year. The bracken, more beautiful in its golden and green dress than it had been in its summer colouring, studded the hedges round the old-fashioned garden, and the quaint straight-fronted Queen Anne Manor was a blaze of beauty with the Virginia creeper that clothed the front, and peeped into the narrow windows.

The three women who had come to take refuge in the Home were out in the garden, enjoying with keen appreciation the country air from which they had been absent so long. And Madge watched them half curiously from the drawing-room window as they wandered feebly about the terraces.

They were old and bent. One of them had been a governess all her life, and was fast losing her sight. Another had sunk from governess to mother's help, and had lost her health in slaving for poverty-stricken niggardly families, who had starved and ill-treated her because she was friendless.

And the third had lost health and money in striving to keep lodgings which nobody wanted to take.

"Life is a hard thing, after all," said Madge to herself, as she sat thinking over her own life for the past eighteen months.

Her week in bright noisy Valetta had seemed a dream to her, while she waited with Lady Forsytus for the completion of her business, and the arrival of the homeward-bound "P. & O."

She had an indistinct recollection of jangling bells, and of brilliant sea and white houses, and of dark-eyed Maltese women in their faldettas, who looked curiously at her. Then of her return voyage, and of tiresome little Dorothy Morgan, who had effectually succeeded in distracting her attention from her own sorrows by constant demands on her time and sympathy.

She seemed now to have spent nearly all her life at the Home, for she had grown so accustomed to the routine of her office that she often found herself wondering whether she had ever been anything but manager of the "Forsytus Home for Penniless Gentlewomen."

As she sat there in the gathering dusk, she became aware of quick steps on the gravel outside, and of the click of the gate that led up from the shrubbery; and in a few moments, Hughes, the head maid, ushered into the room a lady and gentleman, and set down a lamp upon the side table.

She rose to her feet hurriedly, half confused by the sudden light, and found herself being greeted by a girl with a shrill sweet voice and an ecstatic little manner.

"How do you do, Miss Paton? We could not help coming down at once to see if you were quite comfortable. I am Maimie Short, and this is my brother, the Vicar."

Maimie stopped abruptly, for the graceful figure in the black gown that had risen up at her words was so different to the personality of the "suitable person" she had established in her mind, that she could not restrain a little gasp.

"You are so different from what I thought you would be," she continued impulsively, still holding Madge's white hand in her own.

Over her shoulder, the Vicar was looking too, with a world of interest in his eyes, at the beautiful face of the girl before him, and the glorious eyes that sorrow had deepened into something that was almost too perfect for words.

In all his life there had never flashed across his path a woman who came so close to his ideal of womanhood as this fair girl, and he drew his breath sharply as he listened to her soft voice, and saw the smile that woke the dimples in her cheeks as Maimie spoke.

"I am so sorry to have disappointed you," she said, and then looked up at the Vicar, with the light of the shaded lamp softening the misty depths of her eyes. "Please don't say that you think me too young to be here," she said pathetically. "These poor ladies seem to like to have someone young about them; and I am very sympathetic when they tell me their troubles, for—I have known a great deal of sorrow myself."

"Too young! Why, you are just charming," said Maimie demurely; "and I wish I was a poor lady, so that I might live here with you. No; but my brother quite thought you would be like many other of dear Lady Forsytus' 'suitable persons': well, quite middle-aged, and perhaps afflicted with blindness."

"Maimie!" cried the Vicar, a sort of horror coming over him as he remembered the terms he had applied to the lady who was coming to take up her abode in the Red Manor. It seemed desecration to have even thought of them in connection with this lovely girl before him.

But Madge laughed blithely, and Short listened with wonder to the silvery sound, which he found himself comparing afterwards, in the solitude of his study, to a chime that a fairy might have rung on the gold clappers of a bluebell, and then took himself to task for his frivolity.

"I hope that if you like me you will come often down to this house to see me," Madge said warmly. "Our poor ladies will be delighted to have a bright young visitor, and perhaps you will help me in giving them ideas in the way of work and painting; for we want to make a little money by the handiwork of our inmates, which will go to outside pensioners."

Maimie was delighted at the idea, and she and her brother took their leave with many promises of future meetings.

"She is a darling, Basil—don't you think so?" cried Maimie, as she clasped her hands round the Vicar's arm, and looked up into his face.

"I—I think she seems very nice," said he hurriedly, with a blundering desire to hide the real truth of his feelings from Maimie.

For, alas! poor Vicar, he had fallen head over ears in love at first sight with lovely Madge Paton.

Maimie laughed mischievously.

"Don't you think she is a darling? Nice is such a cold word," she said, pinching his arm softly.

"I—I really do not feel myself competent to judge quite so soon," said Short, with an elaborate affectation of indifference.

"Oh yes, you do, Basil; oh yes, you do," whispered the sprite at his side.

"It is really growing quite cold, my dear Maimie," he continued, ignoring her last remark, and looking about him with an eager desire to find something or someone to distract her unwelcome attention.

But Maimie—naughty, discerning, heartless Maimie,—laughed merrily the whole way home, and woke up in the night to laugh again.

CHAPTER III.

ALL through the dull months of autumn and winter life was very bright to the Vicar of Puddleton Magna. He became so different to his usual self that Maimie laughingly declared that he had left ten of his forty years behind him.

The study was deserted, the Greek and Hebrew books laid aside and collecting dust on their brown covers, while Basil Short was at the Red Manor or in the country lanes with Madge, reviving his skating, his botanising, and his sketching powers.

Madge had little to do in the Red Manor, so far, save to regulate the housekeeping, and to interest the three ladies under her charge in their various employments.

They were a very happy party, and as the Shorts spent a great deal of their time with Madge, the girl soon regained her usual spirits in Maimie's cheerful society.

She did not forget the man who had loved and deserted her.

Her best affections, her very life and love, had been bound up in him, and it is no light matter to forget when such is the case.

Night and morning she thought wearily of Seaton, till the wound in her heart ached and throbbed anew, and she longed and craved for peace and oblivion.

She was not ignorant of the Vicar's feelings; for what girl can be of the palpable admiration of a man who is never happy save in her society, and whose very eyes are instinct with rapturous love?

It was very pleasant to her, after all, to be the centre of the world to someone again, and to feel that there was someone to whom her lightest word was law, her most careless smile a treasure.

She was one of those women who, while they draw breath, must be loved, who would rather die than spend a life of lonely self-concentration.

It was her highest earthly ambition to be first with someone, to be essential to the happiness of some fellow-creature, and she could not help a faint feeling of pleasure when she woke the love-light in Basil Short's eyes.

It was wicked to love a man who was married to another woman, but there was no sin in envying a life of love and peace, and such was the life that the Vicar of Puddleton Magna could offer her.

Maimie Short was delighted with her brother's downfall.

The deeper he plunged in the stream of love, the more she encouraged him, and brought about crafty little plans of meeting, and conversations deeply planned, between him and his sweetheart.

Madge Paton was sitting one bright January morning in the little room that was devoted to her private use, reading a letter from Lady Forsytus.

"MY DEAR MADGE," it ran, "I am sending you another inmate for the Red Manor. She is quite young, poor thing, and seems to have had an awful life for the last year. She is a widow; and it is a blessing, poor soul, for her husband drank himself to death six months after their wedding, having previously spent her little fortune in paying his gambling debts.

"Her name is Seton. Be very sympathetic with her, there's a good soul. She will be with you to-morrow.

"Your letters about the Home are charming.—In great haste, yours ever, "SARAH FORSYTUS," "Madge looked away across the snow-bound hills."—p. 194.

"Madge! Madge!" said a voice at the door as she finished the last word of the letter, and laid it down before her on the table. "Let me in directly, you tiresome creature!"

Maimie shook the handle imperiously, and when her friend unlocked it with a smile, she bounded into the room, a round rosy vision in a fur cap and a sealskin coat.

"Gracious goodness, Madge Paton! do you mean to say that you are spending this heavenly day indoors? Lay down your pen at once. Basil is waiting outside, and we are all going to Durdon Lake to skate. I've got luncheon for you in this basket. Now, don't say no, for this is the last day we shall have alone probably for some time, as Basil has got a nasty tiresome Indian friend coming to stay with him very soon, which will break up our party."

"What will Mr. Henderson say to that?" said

Madge, with a smile, as she bundled her letters into a drawer.

Mr. Henderson was Maimie's enthusiastic admirer, and the young couple were on the very verge of an engagement.

"Mr. Henderson! Oh, well, it doesn't matter what he says," returned Maimie, with studied indifference in voice and manner, as she bent over a photograph to hide her vivid blush.

The little party paired off very comfortably as soon as they left the Red Manor behind them. And while Maimie and Mat Henderson shot ahead with a rapidity which did them credit, Madge and the Vicar lagged unaccountably behind.

Perhaps their skates were heavy, or the scarlet rose berries were tempting to the eyes of an enthusiastic botanist against the pure white background of the snow-wreathed hedge.

The crackling snow was crisp under their feet, and the very air seemed to be laden with tiny floating frost crystals, which flashed in the struggling sunshine.

The Vicar was silent at first. He was nervous and unlike himself, and Madge unconsciously caught the infection of his manner, and trembled without knowing the why and wherefore of her feelings.

At last he said, suddenly and awkwardly—

"Madge—at least, Miss Paton—I think that you know what I want to say to you, and what I, a blundering, stupid sort of a fellow, cannot find words to say. I love you, dear; will you be my wife? I will try and make you very happy."

Madge looked away across the snow-bound hills.

What a different wooing from her last passionate one, when handsome Jem Seaton had carried her away with the force of his pleading and his love.

She remembered him now with a keen pang of bitterness, but her voice was very steady as she answered the Vicar's words.

"I will be quite honest with you, Mr. Short," she said, and he, looking at her face, saw by the stern tension of her mouth that she was deeply moved. "I do not love you, though I esteem you very highly. I was once engaged to a man who—who married another girl, and my love died with him, and is buried in a deep grave from which it can never be disinterred. But if you will take me, knowing this fully, I will try and be a good wife to you, and in time I may perhaps love you."

It was a great risk, but the Vicar took it, and reaching out his big strong hand, he took hers tenderly.

"Darling," he said gently, "I never expected that you could love an old fogey like me. But it will be heaven on earth to be allowed to try and comfort you, to teach you to forget."

He felt an impotent fury rise up within him as he thought of the other man, and saw her blanched cheeks and the unshed tears in her eyes.

Would the spectre of that other love rise for ever between them? or would his honest affection win the day in the end, and teach those lovely eyes to soften with love for him?

Madge was worth the risk, and he cast his doubts to the four winds.

She turned her face to him, and smiled.

His words were so inexpressibly sweet to her sad heart, and the idea of a life of quiet peace and happiness so tempting that she gave way.

"I will try and care for you very much, for you are so good—the best man I ever knew."

His humility was inexpressibly touching, and she forgot that he was no longer very young and that he was very far from good-looking, and in another instant he was startled by a sudden kiss upon his hand!

It was quite a shock to him, for he had never imagined, in his wildest dreams, that he might kiss his divinity. Such an idea had never entered his mind, and his brain whirled with the thought.

Then, awkwardly enough, the arm that had never before circled a woman's waist slipped reverently round his sweetheart's, and, stooping down, he laid a light kiss upon her forehead.

He dared not touch her lips—even to kiss her cheek would have been a desecration in his eyes. And when she shrank back a little at his touch, he humbly begged her pardon and took his arm away.

Still, he was strangely, wonderfully happy, and it was only when he received the congratulations of his sister and young Henderson that he could at all realise the truth of the matter: and even then he was not sure that it was not all a brief delirium.

They parted at the gate of the Red Manor, and he went home to the pretty vicarage, to thank God on his knees for the great joy that had entered into his life; while Madge—strange, inconsistent woman—went up to her room to cry and cry over the photograph of the man who had deserted her.

That evening the new inmate of the Home arrived, and Madge went to meet her at the door, serene and sweet in a grey gown, with knots of heliotrope ribbon about it, and a velvet bow of the same colour in her hair.

Mrs. Seton was sobbing when she arrived, and sobbing still when she walked into the hall with a helpless persistence, which, in spite of Madge's strenuous efforts to the contrary, irritated her exceedingly.

She was a tiny woman, scarcely more than a girl, with pale straw-coloured hair, and big blue eyes, which were red round the rims with much weeping. But Madge felt sure that under happier conditions, well-dressed and well-appointed, she would be out of the common, pretty and fascinating. She was dressed in a shabby black gown, which looked as though it had not been brushed for weeks, and she limped a little as she walked.

"Oh, dear! oh, dear!" she sobbed plaintively, when Madge had taken possession of her, and had carried her off to her own private sitting-room to have some tea. "Isn't it awful? I am only twenty-seven, and here I am without a penny, and without any possibility of earning anything; and lame—yes, lame, from a blow which my husband gave me when he was drunk!"

She did not seem to require much sympathy to draw from her the recital of her troubles, but Madge, thinking it might relieve her to talk of them, let her ramble on.

She was sitting very comfortably at Madge's writing table in an easy-chair, sipping her tea and nibbling at her bread and butter, and her sobs had ceased, save for an occasional tremulous one that shook her little frame disconsolately.

"He took to drink before I married him," she went on, not waiting for Madge's sympathy; "he took to it in India, but I thought I could save him, like many another foolish girl. He only lived six months after we were married, but in that short time he managed to spend every penny of my tiny fortune, and to nearly ruin my health. The Royal Blues paid my passage back to London—it was very kind of them, considering what a disgrace Captain Seton had been to the regiment—but since then I have been nearly starving."

Madge's brain whirled, and she could hardly steady her voice to ask, in a tone of horror—

"What regiment was your husband in?"

"The Royal Blues," said the little woman complacently. "It's a good regiment, you know, and it seems awfully hard, when I've seen all the amusement and fun of the smartest half of Indian society, that I should come to this."

What were her complaints to Madge in this sudden agony that had come upon her!

There before her very eyes was her rival—the girl who had won the heart of the man she loved away from her! And she was bound to sympathise with her sorrows, to console her, when it made her shudder to be in the same house with her!

She clenched her hands together in a bitter conflict: the most bitter she had known in her whole life.

And while she was fighting with herself, her eyes misty with pain, the little woman in front of her was prattling on petulantly about her trials and her cruel husband.

Then Madge's better feelings conquered, and she stretched out her hand with a shiver, for she felt strangely cold.

"Poor child!—poor little thing! I am so sorry for you!" she said tenderly.

And Rosamund Seton, looking up, thought that the tears in the beautiful eyes were for her own misfortunes, and she smiled languidly.

"Thank you so much, Miss Paton. I know you will sympathise with me. Of course, I was very silly to marry Tom, but then——"

Madge caught her breath quickly, a new light breaking in upon her.

She rose swiftly and went to her desk, and took out Jem Seaton's photograph.

"Was this your husband?" she said in a strange hollow voice, as she held the picture before Rosamund's eyes.

"That! no, oh dear no!" said Mrs. Seton, with some curiosity. "How did you know him? He was the other captain in the Royal Blues, and he never cared for my husband, because he did not like our keeping our engagement a secret. Tom exchanged into the Royal Blues, you know, for some reason, so they were not together long. But it was always rather awkward their being of the same name, only that it was differently spelled."

"Awkward!" what an inadequate word to use for the coincidence that had ruined two lives! Madge sighed impatiently.

"And, poor thing," went on Mrs. Seton's even tones: "a girl threw him over in a very cruel way. She was coming out to Calcutta to be married to him, and when he went down to meet the boat, she had got out at Malta, of course to marry someone else, and he was never the same after that."

Madge stood with her hand on her heart, the photograph fluttering to her feet.

"Don't you see? Oh, can't you see?" she moaned. "I am that girl. I was engaged to Jem Seaton, and I saw in the paper the announcement of what I thought was his marriage to you, and so, sooner than face him in Calcutta, I got off at Malta, and came here with Lady Forsytus as manager of this Home. What shall I do? oh! what shall I do?"

She had broken down now, and was sobbing passionately, and even Rosamund's selfish little heart was stirred within her.

"What a dreadful thing!" she said curiously. "I don't know what you can do now. Write to Calcutta, and explain your mistake."

"No, no!" moaned Madge's white lips: "I could not do that, for I must have killed his love by my doubts of him. I see it now—oh! I see it now. I ought to have trusted him, and gone on to Calcutta. He will never forgive me!"

Rosamund Seton stared at her with passionless round eyes of wonder.

What a foolish girl she had been to make such a mistake in her life! Surely she could not expect much pity when her troubles had been all her own fault! And Mrs. Seton carefully selected a macaroon and deliberately ate it, while Madge, her face buried in her hands, was sobbing tearlessly and hopelessly as she thought over her ruined life.

At last she rose to her feet, and pushed back her hair with a quiet gesture of self-repression.

"I can do nothing now. It is too late; and he will think that want of trust in a woman is worse than want of love. Thank you, Mrs. Seton, for telling me so much that must have been painful to you. Would you like to come and see your room?"

Rosamund, as she followed her guide, stared with amazement at the statuesque figure, with the face from which all traces of emotion were just vanishing.

She felt that Madge could not have much heart, after all, to bear the news so calmly.

She could have sympathised with hysterics, but not with coldness, and she therefore kept Madge waiting upon her fretful little self till far into the night, demanding help and pity, which the girl patiently and dully gave her.

Then when she was at liberty, and shut herself into her own room to be alone, only her own heart knew the misery that those four walls witnessed till dawn of day.

And when the cold grey light began to steal in through the blind, she flung herself on her bed, to dream in a short troubled slumber of the man she had injured so cruelly.

CHAPTER IV.

MADGE had not only herself to think of in this great crisis of her life. She had to consider three people: the Vicar, Jem Seaton, and herself.

Of the first she scarcely dared to think, for his pain was quite undeserved: of the second, when she trusted her mind to dwell on him, she knew that till death should still her heart for ever it would beat for him alone, and therefore she had no right to wrong one man by marrying him when she loved another, who might cross her path again. For herself, she only prayed that she might be led to do right, and to follow, not her own inclination, but the path of goodness.

She kept indoors for two days, sending down a message to Maimie and the Vicar when they came that she had a bad headache, and could see no one.

But in the afternoon of the second day she braced up her nerves for action, and set out for the vicarage,

"God bless you both."—p. 197.

with an indefinite idea in her mind of putting an end to her uncertainty by some speedy means.

She passed swiftly up the frost-bound lane, between the tall hedges, and by the trout stream, where the icicles hung under the bank like crystal candles.

She made a pretty picture in her violet gown, with some soft black fur at her throat and round the brim of her little hat; though her face was pale with the conflict she had undergone during the past two days, she had altered wonderfully little since we first saw her on board the outward-bound steamer.

At the end of the lane, where the vicarage garden began, was a little walk, bordered by thick yew-trees on either side, which led up to the gate, and when she entered it there was a solitary figure pacing up and down in front of her.

At first she thought, in the shadow of the gloomy trees, that it was Basil Short, and her heart beat faster as she reflected on the painful interview that must inevitably take place between them.

But surely the figure was more youthful and erect than the Vicar of Puddleton's, and even as the truth struck her, Jem Seaton had wheeled impetuously round, and had seen and recognised her.

A cry so great went out from him that Madge paused, petrified with wonder and cold terror.

What if he should drive her from him with cruel, well-deserved words that would crush her very life out of her? and she turned away, half-prepared to fly from him.

But with one bound he had caught her in his arms, and was straining her fiercely to his heart.

"Madge, Madge!" he cried, and she could feel the mighty throbbing of his heart against her shoulder. Then he pushed her away from him as she lay motionless.

"Madge!" he said hurriedly, "what are you doing here? Where is your husband? Why have you come back to torture me again? Could you not have thrown me over in a less cruel fashion? Or are you, like so many other women, happy only as you can reckon so many male scalps at your waist?"

He laughed hardly, and Madge clung convulsively to him.

"No—no, Jem," she sobbed, "I am not married. I—oh, God, help me!—I thought—I saw in the paper that you—that Captain J. Seaton had married Rosamund Finch, and as you had never mentioned another man of the same name in your regiment, I thought it was you; so I got off at Malta, and came back with Lady Forsytus to be superintendent for her Home for Penniless Gentlewomen here."

He stared at her incredulously.

"You thought that I had married another woman, when I was daily expecting my little wife, and her home was ready waiting for her?" he said, with a faint touch of contempt that cut her like a knife.

"I was mad! oh, Jem, I was mad!" she wailed; "and poor Rosamund Seton has just come to the Home, and I learned everything from her. Oh! can you forgive me? I have been so miserable!"

He looked into her eyes.

On her face lay the traces of many tears, and here and there a line scored deeply in the delicate skin told him she had suffered.

"Forgive you?" he said passionately. "Yes,

Madge, I forgive you, but I shall never trust you out of my sight again."

It was then that she remembered the Vicar, and her promise to him.

"Jem," she said, in sudden dismay, "what shall I do? Only two days ago I promised Mr. Short to marry him, though I told him that I did not love him, and that all my love was buried with you."

"Mr. Short!" laughed Seaton, with a happy triumph in his voice, as he shut Madge's lips with a kiss. "My dear child, that old fogey, good and dear as he is, will not break his heart over your desertion. I should think he proposed to you out of sheer pity for your loneliness; all the heart he ever had is shut up in his Greek aorists. Just tell him that you have made a mistake, and it will be all right. I shouldn't wonder that he has forgotten your very existence already. He was in a regular brown study at breakfast this morning—over a Hebrew verb, I suppose. Bless your dear little heart! don't cry over him. He is right enough; and I ought to know, for I am one of his oldest friends."

From behind a clump of yew-trees, thick and dark, came the sound of a throbbing sigh, unheard by the lovers in their arcadia of happiness, but caught up perhaps by a listening angel, and wafted, a true self-sacrifice, to the very throne of God.

It was the Vicar who stood there, faint and dizzy, leaning against the thick branches.

He had unawares come upon the couple, and had heard every word they had spoken before he could collect himself sufficiently to be able to hide out of earshot.

And here in the crisp snow he fought the hardest battle of his quiet life, and came out victorious.

Half an hour later, when the lovers were still in the yew walk, the black figure of the Vicar came towards them from the further end among the trees.

There was a quiet smile on his face as he got up to them, and if his face was ashen white, no one noticed it, for it is only the eyes of love that are quick.

"Jem, my dear boy—Madge," he said, taking a hand of each, still smiling, "God bless you both; what a strange and beautiful reunion! We will forget any little mistake we may have made, dear; for when I think it over, I see there was a mistake—on—both sides."

He laid their hands together, and passed on; and if, when he was out of sight, the smile faded in a rush of tears, no one was any the wiser.

Even his sister thought, when she found him buried in his beloved books once more, that he did not much care after all.

The thought consoled her for the loss of Madge as a sister, and she became quite enthralled in the romance of the reunited lovers.

And if Madge, with a woman's true instinct, guessed something of the storm that had passed over the pale student's head, she forgot to be more than a moment pitiful for him in the golden glory of her own happiness.

If there is much joy in this world, there must of necessity be sorrow for each child of man. And in the end, sorrow enriches the heart, and wings the soul to heaven.

THE DISCIPLINE OF PAIN.

BY THE REV. J. H. BERNARD, D.D., FELLOW OF TRINITY COLLEGE, DUBLIN.

"Though He were a Son, yet learned He obedience by the things which He suffered."—HEB. v. 8.

IN these words the Apostolic writer appeals to the life of our blessed Lord as illustrating in a remarkable degree the principle that pain is a means of discipline. A principle, this, hard to learn, but none the less true. Though we do not know why there should be pain at all, we do know that it serves many good purposes in the progress of the world; and among these the fact that it acts as an agent in the formation of character is not the least conspicuous.

The subject of pain is, no doubt, a subject from which we all turn with something of dislike. When we are not in trouble ourselves, we are unwilling to be drawn into the consideration of a subject so mournful, so full of gloomy possibilities and sad memories; we prefer to dwell on the lights rather than on the shadows of human life. "Why not look on the bright side of things?" people say; "we should not anticipate pain by thinking of it beforehand." But yet, sorrow is so prominent a feature in ordinary experience—we are exposed to pain at so many points—that we are not acting as serious persons should if we do not, at least, occasionally set ourselves to consider it, and inquire what lesson it has for us, to what good effect it may be directed in our own lives. And further, we should remember that if we are to form any calm judgment upon this disciplinary influence of pain we must do so at a time when we are not overwhelmed by its presence. When we are in pain ourselves, we are not capable of reflecting dispassionately on its meaning or its message. A human soul carried away by the shock of overmastering sorrow cannot justly estimate either the greatness or the purpose of the pain with which life is surrounded. At such moments the uppermost reflection is that it is too great to be borne: that in our case, at least, it is unjust and intolerable. Hence, it may be a prudent thing to direct our attention, now and then for a quiet quarter of an hour, to the educational value of pain. Our Lord, we read, was made "perfect through suffering." Is there any similar progress in the lives of ordinary men and women? Is it true to say that, in general, suffering refines and sanctifies the Christian character?

1. Reflect first upon the lesser pains of life, such as the pains of toil or the pains of poverty. These are pains which we can readily understand may often be full of blessing. "It is good for a man to bear the yoke in his youth" is true in more senses than one. And, on the other hand, the enervating influence of an unceasing round of thoughtless pleasure is manifest. It is not an uncommon thing to see a man endowed with great gifts—gifts of mind, body, and estate—deteriorating steadily in character from day to day, just because he has never encountered any obstacle to check him in his selfish, complacent round of delights. There seems no outlet for his energies but in pleasure, and so he seeks it there, with the result that he grows weaker and less manly, in spite of his better self. Here is a case in which pain, the loss of money, of position—aye, of reputation—may be an unmixed blessing. It puts him on his mettle; it is a means of strengthening his character. The strong men of this world are those who have had obstacles to overcome, whose path has not been always strewn with flowers.

It may be said, perhaps, that there are few people whose lives are so surrounded with pleasure that the pleasure becomes a source of weakness to the extent that has been suggested. But the truth is that we are all too much afraid of pain. The character of Tito, described with such terrible faithfulness by George Eliot in one of her great books, is a typical character. Many a life is wrecked, many a splendid possibility is thrown away, simply because the command "Take up the Cross" seemed too hard to obey. We may be sure of this: that it is not until one realises in some measure what is meant by "enduring hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ" that the full strength of the Christian character can be reached. Pain, then, even in its lesser forms, is a strengthening influence. We chafe under the restraints which it imposes upon our freedom; and in the struggle to overcome them we bring out whatever is strongest in our nature. No one who has not suffered is strong.

2. But, again, there are other pains, very common and very distressing while they last—the pains of disappointment. Failure in a long-planned undertaking, the despair which overtakes us when our motives are misunderstood, the severance of old friendships—these are some of the commonest pains of life. None of us is always successful; few of us escape misrepresentation; many of us know what it is to lose a friend. It is often hard at the time to see what possible good effect upon our lives such trials as these can bring about; and yet, if we can recall any such sad experiences, we may remember at least one benefit that resulted from them. It is at such times that our true character becomes patent, if not to the world, yet to ourselves. The power of self-deceit is so strong that as long as things go well with us we may never question our own infallibility of judgment, candour of disposition, amiability of temper. But when we are driven in on ourselves by the rude questioning of sorrow, we begin to understand that, after all, things might have been different if we had been different. We may not—very likely we do not—admit it to ourselves openly; but there is always after failure or disappointment—if we are not entirely filled with an inordinate self-conceit—a suspicion aroused that it might have been our own fault. The disgust, for example, with which we view the failure of a scheme professedly for the glory of God or the service of men may, perhaps, suggest to us that it was our own self-importance we were thinking about, and not the glory of God at all. The shock attendant upon the loss of a friend may reveal to us as a possibility that perhaps we are not altogether desirable as friends, that there may be something hard, or selfish, or uncandid in our conduct. And so in every case: there is no agent more potent than pain in revealing to us our secret character as it is in the sight of God. If it puts upon us more honesty, more charity, more single-mindedness, it is a true blessing in disguise.

3. These, however, are not the most intense forms of human suffering: there is the pain of bereavement. When this is present with us, there seems to be no comfort, no mercy, in earth or heaven. And yet it is a discipline—a hard, a terrible discipline—by which God calls us to Him when lesser trials have elicited no response. It often seems a mockery to speak of blessing being contained in bereavement; often, indeed, "our safest eloquence is our silence"; but yet, many a time it has been in moments of sorrow and anguish that the full meaning and seriousness of life have been brought home to the heart. When oppressed by the nearness of the Valley of the Shadow of Death the soul is led to seek for some practical solution of the mysteries of life and suffering. "I found trouble and heaviness, and called on the name of the Lord," is not the experience of the Psalmist of Israel alone. The Via Dolorosa—the way of sorrow—is the way to the Cross.

And we must not overlook the sympathetic power of this pain of bereavement. The presence of a pain to which all men feel themselves exposed is a bond of union and the root of sympathy. Much of the kindness and compa-<sup>n</sup>ion of human beings in respect of their fellows in distress is called forth by the memory of their own sufferings of a like nature. Pain, even more than joy, makes the whole world kin.

In these different ways, then, as in many others, pain is a means of education, a factor in the development of individual, as well as of national, character. We can see in the case of others—though not so clearly in our own—that pain may bring blessing in its wake. And, indeed, under the conditions of life in this world, pain will be a discipline to us, whether we wish it or not. It remains with us to determine whether it shall be a discipline for good or for evil. It may influence us for evil; make us hard, unsympathetic, cynical. But it may also teach us, if we will, lessons of kindness and patience; by its penetrating criticism it will exhibit us to ourselves as we are; it will strengthen us for achievement of our appointed tasks; and even by the shadow which it casts upon life, it will prompt us to look with more longing towards that country where is neither sorrow nor pain. For, indeed, suffering quickens our powers of spiritual perception in a strange way: the Delectable Mountains, whence the pilgrims in Bunyan's allegory saw the vision of the Heavenly City, were not far from the Castle of Despair.

Thus the good or bad effect of pain on our Christian progress depends very much on our mental attitude in regard to it. There must be a deliberate acceptance of it, as containing lessons for our learning, if we are to extract from it that lesson which God wishes to teach us. So our Lord speaks of taking up the Cross. The burden is not merely to be endured; it must be taken up with something of a voluntary acceptance.

"All very easy to write," says some poor soul; "very easy to acquiesce in, but very hard to practise." And this is true enough. When we notice the sorrows and disappointments of our neighbours, we find it natural enough to say, "How that man's character has been purified and ennobled by hardship! How that woman's life has been sanctified by suffering!" But when the thing touches ourselves, general reflections of this sort are of little use. We know very well that it is not happiness, but goodness, that we are put into this world to pursue. That goodness will bring happiness in the long run is indeed a principle of religion, but it is not obviously true as regards the present world. And so it is only by bringing home to ourselves the truth that pain is not merely a penalty exacted by nature for wrong-doing, not merely a factor in the forces of the evolution of the human race, but also a discipline controlled in every detail by a Father in heaven, that comfort can be gained by the stricken soul. "Whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth" is an Apostolic maxim; and that is, perhaps, as far as we can safely go in respect of the philosophy of pain.

And yet we must try to see a step further. In the presence of the mystery of the Passion pain seems to take upon itself a new aspect. The true consecration of suffering is at the foot of the Cross. "Though He were a Son, yet learned He obedience by the things which He suffered." Pain is a discipline of the Christian character, for it formed part of the discipline of the character of Christ. Sorrow brings us closer to the Man of Sorrows. Thus St. Paul speaks of our being "baptised into the death of Christ," of "being crucified with Him." These phrases are full of profounder meaning than we can grasp, but, at least, they teach that union with Christ involves union in suffering here, if in joy hereafter. "The disciple is not above his Master"; and we may learn by failure and sorrow something which joy could never teach us of that love of God in redemption which was consummated in the sacrifice of the Cross. "He Himself"—the words are familiar—"went not up to joy, but first He suffered pain; He entered not into His glory before He was crucified." So, truly, our way to eternal joy is to suffer here with Christ, and our door to enter into eternal life is gladly to die with Christ, that we may rise again from death, and dwell with Him in everlasting life."

THE CHAPELS OF THE FIRST NONCONFORMISTS.

IN most instances, it is well known, the devout people who were the first to separate themselves from the services performed in their respective parish churches in the seventeenth century made use of such existing buildings for their meetings as they found convenient for their purpose. Sometimes these were private houses; often, especially, they were the dwelling-houses of the ministers; sometimes they were disused buildings that had formerly been parts of monastic establishments; and sometimes they were the halls of the merchants' guilds. At Berwick-on-Tweed use was made of the Free School for some time. We have plentiful evidence of the exact nature of these various arrangements in old diaries, in public records, and in local memoranda. The narrative of Edward Terrill, a schoolmaster in Bristol, gives us particulars of the gradual growth of the Puritan party in that city, and mentions that the first little group of nonconforming worshippers met together for prayer at the houses of a carpenter, a glover, and a grocer alternately, and that when the latter died his widow continued to give her adherence to the nonconforming movement, and was mobbed and had her windows broken in consequence. Tong, in his "Life of Matthew Henry," relates that this distinguished man was invited to preach at the house of Mr. Henthorne, sugar-baker, in Chester, and that so many good people flocked to it that it was found necessary to provide a larger place; and Mr. Hen-thorne again came to the front, and gave them the use of a pretty large outbuilding which belonged to him which had been part of a Friary, and that it was made ready with so much forwardness as to be opened on the next Lord's Day. Other journals also give similar testimony. On the passing of the Toleration Act buildings specially intended for dissenters' places of worship were built in large numbers.

Most of the buildings in which the first Nonconformists met have been enlarged or otherwise altered; and many of them have been quite rebuilt. Some are said to have been rebuilt, when a little scrutiny reveals that they have been only partially taken down, and extra space included by the extension of one or two of the walls, and therefore still retain fragments of the original buildings; and, on the other hand, some of them are called ancient, as though they had been handed down intact, when they have been, in reality, much modernised. Here and there, however, we may still look upon the structures that were so much to our forefathers two centuries ago. There is a beauty as of homeliness about some of these old places, for the lines upon which they were built were as simple as possible; so there is the grace of their association with honoured names still clinging to some of them. The Baptists seem to have been early in the field as builders, on account of their greater difference of opinion, which left it certain that their views would not be adopted by the Church party. The other two leading divisions of dissenters, Presbyterians and Independents, appear to have been under the impression that concessions would be made which would enable them to return to their old places in their respective parish churches, and they do not seem to have commenced building with so much zest. We read of the alternations of their fortunes, as affected by political influences, in Pepys' "Diary": "Mr. Hill of Cambridge tells me that yesterday put a change to the state of England as to the Church; for the king now would be forced to favour Presbytery or that the city would leave him"; and again, he wrote down, whilst waiting in the channel for orders to bring King Charles over to "his own," that he paced the deck of the Nasby with Mr. Moore, who had brought despatches from London, "who did give me an account of all things at London. Among others, how the Presbyterians would be angry if they durst, but they will not be able to do anything." A little later than this time, too, he wrote down: "My letters tell me that Mr. Calamy had preached before the king in a surplice," and adds, "This I heard afterwards to be false"; and then he mentions, "The old clergy talk as being sure of their lands again, and laugh at the Presbytery." And in the same year, after recording a report of "a head of Fanatics," he praises the Lord Mayor for carrying himself honourably, and causing one of their meeting-houses in London to be pulled down. And he also mentions "Great talk of the difference between the Episcopal and Presbyterian clergy; but I believe it will come to nothing."

The chapel built for Matthew Henry in Chester is still standing. The front has been renewed, and some of the windows altered, but the back and south walls remain, as well as the external staircase leading to the gallery; and the interior has not been seriously disturbed. There are the two rows of massive oak pillars that divide it into three parts; there is the original pulpit in which Matthew Henry preached in the year 1700, and there is the old dark oaken gallery, the space under which was partitioned off in the last century to afford accommodation for a portion of the congregation that, in its turn, differed from the rest of it, and seceded from it.

Lydgate Chapel, which is about five miles out of Huddersfield, is also of much interest, though it has also been altered. This building, like the last-mentioned, was erected at the close of the seventeenth century, and is said to have been rebuilt in 1768: which, however, probably means only partially so; and furnished with a gallery in 1786, and with a bell-turret in 1848. Both reading-desk and the canopied pulpit are within the communion-rails, and there is an old oaken chair on the side of the table not occupied by the pulpit stairs. In a recess under the table are three volumes of Tillotson's Sermons, chained to it by iron chains sufficiently long to admit of the books being placed on it in the olden style.

Another very interesting old chapel, and one which the restorers have not spoilt, is that of Dean's Row, about six miles from Stockport, which partakes of the characteristics of those of Knutsford and Macclesfield, in so far as the diamond-paned windows are not large and round-headed like those of a somewhat later day, but small and rectangular, with a stone mullion down the centre of each of them, and the gallery is reached by external stone steps. It retains its old oaken pews. It was built during the ministrations of the Rev. Eliezer Borch, which extended from 1687 to 1707. Matthew Henry assisted at the ordination of this minister's successor, and made the following entry in his "Diary" concerning the ceremony:—"Sept. 2nd, 1707. A solemn fast in the congregation of Dean Row, for the ordination of Mr. Hugh Worthington, whom they have chosen to be their pastor in the room of Mr. Borch. I preached from 2 Cor. v. 18. Mr. Angier prayed over him. Mr. Jollie of Sheffield gave the exhortation. We had many things very affecting. The Honourable Mr. Cecil Booth was with us in the evening. This was one of the Stamford friends."

Knutsford Chapel, however, where Matthew Henry also preached, has a still greater charm for us, on account of its recent association with Mrs. Gaskell, and because she has described it so daintily in her story entitled "Ruth." There are four small rectangular mullioned windows along the front of the ground storey, two above them, and then six above these again to light the gallery. The roof at both ends is brought down to cover the two external gallery entrances which project wing-fashion at the top of two external flights of stone steps. The ground-floor of the building is approached by a doorway that opens into a porch-like way behind these steps. The front and much of the roof are grown over with foliage. In the burying-ground that adjoins it is a monument marking the last resting-place of Mrs. Gaskell. Puritan steadfastness and simplicity could not be put before us in a more delightful aspect than that presented by these chapels.

At Norwich, the first Presbyterian meeting-house of 1689 has completely disappeared, and on its site stands an octagonal chapel, which in its day was pronounced one of the most elegant in the kingdom. This was not erected till the middle of the last century, when Wesley thus described it:—"December 1757. I was shown Dr. Tayler's new meeting-house, perhaps the most elegant one in all Europe. It is eight-square, built of the finest brick, with sixteen sash windows below, as many above, and eight skylights in the dome, which indeed are purely ornamental. The inside is finished in the highest taste, and is as clean as any nobleman's saloon. The communion-table is fine mahogany; the very latches of the pew doors are polished brass." Within are eight pillars to support the roof, which also came in for a great deal of admiration at first, because they were so well painted in imitation of marble as to deceive those who looked upon them. By way of entrance to this octagonal building is a classic portico, with columns and pediment. Several chapels erected about this time, or soon afterwards, followed this lead, among which may be mentioned Whitefield's Tabernacle in Tottenham Court Road. There were a great many parish churches in Norwich, besides the beautiful cathedral and two churches for the Flemings, when this chapel was built; nevertheless, there was not wanting a devout congregation for it among the workers in crape and bombazines and stuffs for which the city was then especially celebrated. There is a Queen Anne Chapel in the neighbouring county, at Bury-St.-Edmunds, which has not been altered since it was built, in which a winding stair leads from the reading-desk to the pulpit, over which there is a sounding-board in the form of a canopy. Over the vestry door remains a tablet recording the date of its erection: 1711. It is built of red brick, and is lighted by round-headed windows of the usual type. It stands on the site of an older one, which the congregation had outgrown. Edmund Calamy, it may be remembered, ministered at Bury-St.-Edmunds for several years prior to his appointment to Aldermanbury (about 1640).

Some early Nonconformists in Dover built themselves a chapel, or meeting-place, when the town lay wedged in the cleft between the white cliffs on either side of it, brown and grey, close and compact, when there were no rows and rows of uniform houses, with their fronts veiled with verandahs, along the beach, and the grand old castle looked down only on narrow streets, with narrower lanes turning out of them, with here and there a delightful old building in them like the Maison Dieu. We are told that the congregation was driven from this meeting-house in 1661, probably when the return of King Charles the Second, and the accompanying rejoicings, salute-firings, and health-drinkings, had intensified public feeling in the little town on such matters for the time being. Pepys tells us, in his "Diary," that when the king landed at Dover he was received by General Monk and great crowds of horsemen, citizens, and noblemen. The mayor presented his white staff to his Majesty, who, standing under a canopy provided for the occasion, returned it to him; then the mayor gave him a very rich Bible as a present from the town, which the king accepted, and declared it was the thing that he loved above all things in the world. "The shouting and joy expressed by all is past imagination," Pepys wrote. No wonder that the mayor took it upon himself about this time to put a lock upon the meeting-house door, and still less that it was promptly taken off again, and thrown into that worthy's garden. Within twenty years of this time the number of the congregation had much increased, notwithstanding many annoyances and frequent interruptions of the services, and it was resolved to divide it into three branches: Sandwich and Deal being joined together as one, and Folkestone and Hythe as another, with the understanding there should be an annual gathering at the Dover branch on the first Sunday in May. The little edifice that was thus speedily outgrown has not been handed down to us. It would have been interesting to have seen the building frequented in those days by the Dover, Deal, and Sandwich men and women, to say nothing of those of Folkestone and Hythe. We know the fearless character of the Cinque Port people in old times: how they occupied themselves in deep waters, and went down to the sea in ships: how for centuries they were ready with their money and their men at the king's need; and, like the famous gun in Dover Castle, always ready, too, to carry a ball to Calais Green, so to say; and their little meeting-place doubtless partook of this fearless simplicity in its structural treatment. Be this as it may, the curious craving that has so frequently and persistently set aside all the old homely and historical associations with which the first meeting-houses should be now embowered asserted itself here, as in so many other places; and in 1819 the foundation stone was laid of "a new and elegant" house of worship. We may see that the reputation of the Norwich chapel was in the builders' minds, for, though not so large, it is of polygonal form, with a round-headed window, full of small squares of glass in each plane of it.

Mention has been made of Berwick-upon-Tweed. In this strongly fortified, walled-in border-town and seaport, John Knox officiated as minister for two years; consequently, we may assume it was rendered a very receptive field for "the new religion." The vicar, at the date of the Act of Uniformity, Luke Ogle, was duly ejected: nevertheless, the first meeting-house was not built till 1720. Before that date a house in "Easter Laine" was used for worship, and, as has been said, the use of the Free School was allowed, on condition that neither the master nor the pupils were inconvenienced by it. As time went on and dissent became more defined and acknowledged, a meeting-house was built on the north-east side of Hide Hill, capable of seating 700 persons; and this being found insufficient, four years afterwards another was erected higher up the hill, capable of seating 1,500 persons, which was called the High Meeting-house. This is no longer in use, except as a warehouse; but the congregation, now reduced in number, still meet in the Low Meeting-house. A third chapel was built about 1755 that was known as the Middle Meeting, to distinguish it from the Low and High Meetings. It was in Berwick that Knox first substituted ordinary bread for wafer, and the sitting position for kneeling in the ceremony of Communion; and slight as these matters seem, compared with the duties involved in the grave enjoinment to love our neighbours as ourselves, considerable commotion must have been the result. "The practices of the Lorde's Supper yewzed in Barwicke-upon-Twyed by Iohne Knoxe, preacher to that congregation, in the Church there," is the title of a tract written by him in Berwick, which is a token of it.

Now that we are in the north—"the dark, and true, and tender north"—mention may be made of a William-and-Mary chapel at Dob Lane, Failsworth, near Manchester, that is of considerable interest; and a Presbyterian chapel at Chowbent, in which similar features are presented on an extended scale, particularly in the matter of the number of round-headed windows with prominent key-stones and springing-stones. At York, too, there is another William-and-Mary example that must not be passed over. This is the chapel at St. Saviour's Gate, erected for their Majesties' dissenting subjects, and opened for worship in April, 1693. It is built, unlike those already mentioned—which are either parallelogrammic or octagonal—on a cruciform plan, and a low pyramidically roofed tower rises from the point of intersection. At first a high massive wall screened it off from its surroundings, but this has now been exchanged for iron railings, that let in the light and air. Sir John and Lady Hewley were the chief personages in the little community that first assembled in it, and occupied a large pew facing the pulpit; and in their memory, an arm-chair used by them, and portraits of both of them, are still preserved in the vestry. Of the chapel built in Halifax in 1689, only two of the original walls remain.

In the same county, at Briarfield, near Burnley, there is an eighteenth-century chapel that may be mentioned as characteristic. It is uncompromisingly square, with two storeys of rectangular windows and a rectangular door with a small tablet over it, mentioning its purpose and the date of its erection. It is built of stone, like the mills in the neighbourhood, and, like them, with the exception of the tablet mentioned, does not possess a single touch that could have been withheld.

The Presbyterians, in the reign of James the Second, assembled in Derby in a small chapel on St. Mary's Bridge, and there, after a short tenancy of a building near the market-place, they built themselves a chapel in 1698, in Briargate. Coventry, Leicester, and Hinckley also built meeting-houses at an early date. In Nottingham, too, the Independents had a chapel as early as 1682, which has been enlarged several times from its original size; and the Presbyterians had another that they built in 1690; and the Baptists had likewise a chapel here at an early date. Fox, the founder of the Society of Friends, records in his "Journal" in 1649, that he went to the steeple-house at Nottingham (which was the stately spacious parish church that Leland described as being "unyforme in worke," and having "so many fair windows in it, no artificer could set more"), and, during the time of Divine service, addressed the people and was thereupon committed to prison; after which episode Quakerism took still deeper root. Pepys, in 1661, writing of Baldwick, set down in his "Diary": "I find both here and everywhere else that I come the Quakers do still continue, and rather grow than lessen."

Looking southwards now, we may see at Tavistock, Devon, an instance in which part of an old monastic establishment was used, and is still used, as a dissenters' chapel. The Vicar of Tavistock was another of "the glorious two thousand" who were evicted from their livings, in consequence of which treatment the Earl of Bedford made over to him in perpetuity a building that once formed part of the great monastery there, and which is supposed to have been the chapel of the abbots. It belongs, therefore, to an earlier part of the history of our native land than the William-and-Mary chapels, yet partakes of their pathetic interest. The windows have two cusp-headed lights divided by mullions, and over the low-arched doorway is a bold label moulding. It is bowered in foliage.

On the north side of Newington Green there is a chapel that was built in the reign of Queen Anne by a small community of Presbyterians, and which was not modernised till 1860. It was plain and square, built of bricks, and covered with a tiled roof; and in front of it grew a row of fluttering elms. To this little edifice came Daniel Defoe when it was spick-and-span new and the elms were but saplings; and a nephew of Matthew Henry was one of the first trustees. Mary Wollstonecraft, who kept a school on the Green, was also among the early worshippers, and Samuel Rogers, the poet, not only attended the services all the days of his youth, but continued to be a trustee to the end of his days. Before the modernisation took place, a small brass plate in one of the square pews indicated where Mrs. Barbauld used to sit; and we are told that her sister and Dr. Aiken, author of the never-to-be-forgotten "Evenings at Home," sat on the opposite side of the chapel. Surely there are places that can be better spared than this relic of Queen Anne's reign, with its continuity of associations!

GARTH GARRICKSON—WORKMAN.

THE STORY OF A LANCASHIRE LAD.

CHAPTER IX.

THE evening Mildred was returning from a round of visits. She had begun with conventional afternoon calls, and then dismissing the carriage had gone to several cottages. It was her way to take her richer and poorer neighbours together, with no change of attire or manner, excepting that to the latter she went on foot, and with a little accession of friendliness.

The day had been very hot: even now the air was scarcely cool. She was warm and wearied, and walked slowly. There was no need for haste: her father was away, Kildare at home.

She was passing through the country beyond Daddy's cottage, a broad, grassy valley, bounded by bare hills, only the one before her—their own hough—wooded. That was wooded thickly almost to the summit; and half-way up it, among the trees, the little white-washed house perched, in fashion problematical to strangers.

Mildred meant to mount to it and rest there, then take her way home straight up through the beech wood and over the brow of the hill—a steep climb and lonely, but a much shorter route than round by the lane, cooler, and commanding a noble view.

She had come across from the high road, and was descending from the general land-level into a dell through which a brook went bickering, a wooden bridge, much higher and longer than necessary, spanning it from side to side; behind, the view was shut in by the bank she had descended; before, the wood rose steep and high. This was the prettiest nook in the country to Mildred—very fair just now in the tender evening light.

She looked with loving eyes, then paused. On the bridge below was Garth.

He did not see her—his back was towards her. He seemed busied with something—she could not see what. His dog was ferreting about in the brook.

It did not occur to Mildred to retreat. How could she retrace her steps so far? and why—for Garth? She advanced.

As she stepped on to the plank and her own dog joyously greeted his friend beneath, Garth turned round, and she saw what he was doing: only carving with his knife on the handrail; but he started guiltily, and cut a sudden obliterating gash through his handiwork.

An embarrassed flush rose in his face.

"How are you, Garth? and how is Mrs. Garrickson?"

"Pretty well, thank you, Miss Caryl." She was always "Miss Caryl" now.

"I thought you were always at the Mechanics' on Wednesday?"

"It is closed—the classes are—for the summer. It is very hot in town."

"Oh, yes, I remember. Yes, very hot everywhere—you must feel it in the mill."

"Yes."

There was no complaint in word or tone, but both said much to Mildred.

"I wish you needn't do it, Garth!"

"Oh, the heat is everywhere! One can bear what all do."

But Mildred knew what the mill was, even in winter; and his love of grass and trees and air, his hatred of confinement, of brick walls; and thought how she had borne the heat, in a lounge by a shaded open window, gazing drowsily across the lawn and beeches to the hills—too hot even to read; and then driving, and drinking refreshing drinks in cool drawing-rooms, chatting in shady gardens.

Her gaze wandered away in compunction, and rested on the dogs below: one had fallen into the brook and was scrambling out, dripping; while the other on the bank barked his entertainment.

They looked at each other and laughed.

"Garth—do you remember?"

Of course Garth remembered: how she had run away from her governess one afternoon, and they had come trespassing in these lower woods, which belonged to a neighbour—an M.P., usually in London—and were jealously preserved. How, being pursued by a keeper, Mildred had floundered into the brook as clumsily as the dog just now; how Garth had hauled her out on the safe side (while the man protested and his dog barked on the other), and carried her off in dripping triumph, to leave her in Daddy's bed and bring dry clothes—and the indignantly scolding Fräulein.

"Mildred's eyes fell and rested on his carving."—p. 206.

How they laughed!

"I wonder how ever you got me up 'The Ladder.'"

"Oh, I was a strong enough lad; but you were very wet."

"And frightened! You were very good to me, Garth—far too good to such a naughty child—always!"

"I did not often know you were naughty."

"No, I hid it from you as often as I could; I was afraid of your morality. You did not know I had run away then."

"I knew we were trespassing."

"But that was not against your morality: your inward sense of the injustice of the owner excluding the public in his absence. I remember your fervid oration——"

"I remember you wanted to go. You begged till I gave way."

"Against your sense of right, Garth?" regarding him.

"I'm afraid so, missie."

The old name in the old tone, with the old smile she had not seen for so long. Mildred's eyes fell and rested on his carving, not quite effaced.

"Mi . . . Gar . . . ." she read.

A sudden uncontrollable blush overspread her face, the long lashes drooped, the mouth trembled, the head bent slightly; then it was raised and turned, but not quickly enough to hide the quick-succeeding paleness, the clear light in the eyes, the sweet curve of the lips, the look of gentle pride.

Garth looked and read it all. A wondering light sprang into his face—a surprise joy dawned in the dark eyes. There was a breathless pause——

Footsteps on the bridge—scarcely wide enough for two to pass. They turned. It was one of the Hall servants—the discontented Emma, who had stayed on—and an admirer. Seeing who was in their path, they stood at the end of the bridge, waiting.

Garth said abruptly, "Good-evening!" pulled off his hat, and strode away in the other direction, leaving Mildred to meet them, acknowledge their recognition, and go on her way alone.

The girl and her companion passed on. Emma laughed.

"What a pity! I wouldn't 'ave come if I'd known."

"Why not?" The lad was an employé at the mill, respectable and discreet, and Emma's mockery displeased him. "Why shouldn't Miss Caryl speak to Garrickson?—they're very friendly."

"Very—this looks like it," stopping to examine the handrail. "Look—what's this? 'Mi'—that's the bottom of L, and this is D. 'Gar——'"

"Nonsense, nonsense, lass! Much more like 'Minnie Garner.'"

"It's no such thing! That prig, indeed!"

"Come, Emma, she's no prig."

They wandered away to Minnie's virtues and delinquencies, but neither forgot that cutting.

Meanwhile, Mildred went on slowly along the path under the hill until she came to the narrow lane leading up to the road above—a steep lane, indeed, and none the easier to climb for the dilapidated steps placed at irregular intervals—a truly break-neck place, locally known as "Jacob's Ladder."

For once it was too much for Mildred. She felt suddenly faint and chilled—quite disinclined for Daddy.

She sat down on one of the low milestones at the foot of the steps—actually the border stones of her father's land on this side—and tried to rally herself.

Why had Garth changed so? Who was ever to put things right? She was a mere, mere woman, helpless!

Oh, Garth!—if he would but be true to himself! That pride would ruin him unless broken—"Pride of race, pride of place." Oh, Garth!

It grew late, shadows gathered—she began to shiver. Then the thought that Garth might return and find her like this roused her. He must not see her again that night. She began to clamber up the ladder, and soon reached Daddy's cottage.

She had intended passing now, and going straight home, but the old man was sitting on the stone bench outside the door, and beside him sat Minnie, busied with some mending for him. She had had leave to go to Mrs. Garrickson's. Garth had been coming this way, and had brought her to see her uncle. He was to call again and take her home.

"But it's gettin' let," the old man said; "you'd best go with Miss Mildred, my girl." He was very fond of Minnie.

She seemed reluctant.

"I've not done your mending."

"Toots, toots, lass! 'T will do another day. Or ye might tek it whoam, if so be Miss Millie would allow."

"Yes—oh yes, bring it, by all means."

Clearly Minnie wished to linger.

"I've almost done; it isn't worth while."

"Then I will wait. I think, Minnie, Garth may have forgotten you. I have seen him; he went the other way."

In truth, an inward revulsion had seized Mildred. How could this girl go about the country with Garth? She was but a servant—it was not befitting. The feeling was intensified by Minnie's quietly confident, "Oh! I don't think he will forget."

She sat down on the bench from which Daddy had risen, so evidently intending to wait that Minnie wisely rolled up her work, and saying prettily that if Miss Caryl would trouble, she must not detain her, went in search of her hat.

The old man sat down in her place, and leaning on his hoe looked out to the glimmering landscape, while Mildred looked at him and wondered at the peace in his face.

His life had been long and troubled, she knew: many a battle with the world he had had, and no triumphant victory over it; yet he had "won through," and the eventide of life was light and fair as this summer evening to him. She spoke abruptly, almost passionately. "Daddy! I wish I had your faith."

"Maybe, Miss Millie, you havena my cause; you havens lived a long life and foun' the Lord at every turn as good as His word."

"But I have the word."

"Aye, missie, and it's a great and a gran' thing; but it's unreal until it's borne out in the life of a man. If so be as ye've not 'read,' but 'tasted,' as the Lord is gracious. 'Experience': that's the thing."

"But, Daddy, mustn't we have faith to have the experience?"

"Aye, Miss Mildred, mem, of a soart; but there's soarts and soarts o' faith. There's ineeeshal faith, but it's poor stuff, poor stuff, mem. It's the experience ye'll want, to have the real faith—an assurance of faith, d'ye see?"

"But against circumstances?"

"Circumstances! Humph! we werena talkin' of circumstances as I knows on. Howsomedever, Miss Mildred, mem, it's no likely I'd 'ave faith in a god as served me as Baal did them poor fellows as give him all their beef and mutton, and got no fire to cook it wi'. The God as answereth, He is the God."

"But circumstances, Daddy. If you know a thing should be in such a way, and it's against circumstances?"

"What soart o' circumstances, Miss Mildred, mem?"

"One's station and surroundings, one's way of life."

"Well, now, mem, we're to consider there's a many circumstances in the world as is ruled by the Prince of this world—they're not the Lord's will—not they. But there's a many as is the Lord's will; there's circumstances as is the hedge on each side the path i' which His children should goo, and them as feels 'em barriers, and cries and beats agen 'em, is just turned roun' in the path and tryin' to git out, instead o' marching on."

"And how are we to know the difference?"

"Pray the Lord to show us. He gives the light in His own time. Give over strivin'; the servant o' the Lord must not strive. He works things round. Matters isna ripe, maybe. Perhaps there's others in this question as 'ave summut to learn; we've none of us got the whole world to oursel's, tho' some foalks ae' like it. It's no wasted time learning patience. Time—aye, it's time as is wanted, maybe the changes and chances o' this mortal life." And there was a pause.

"All things are passing. God never changeth," quoted Mildred softly, by-and-bye.

Old Daddy raised himself and stood leaning on his hoe, and looked out to the hills stretching away in clear-cut, majestic outlines.

"Aye—the very hills—the everlastin' hills is passin' away, and the men as is born on 'em, and grows up and passes back'ards and for'ards on 'em and dies, and is buried in 'em, thems all o' this world as is everlastin'. But there's one beyond. Aye—

" 'Before the hills in order stood,
Or earth received her frame,
From everlastin' Thon art God,
To endless years the same.' "

Daddy had talked himself into a fervour—the deep eyes glowed, the white brows contracted. One withered old hand grasped the hoe, while the other beat time to the lines as he gave them out in the remains of the round, rolling, sonorous tones he had been wont to employ in the pulpit, and as they ended the feeble old voice quavered out into a familiar Methodist tune. Mildred's clear sweet one joined it, and they sang together, these two—in the light of this world so far, so near in the light of eternity—while the trees rustled a gentle accompaniment, and the quiet hills and fields seemed to listen. This feeble, ignorant old man had given Mildred just the strength and knowledge she needed.

She set off with Minnie, with a heart at peace; but Minnie's bosom was not peaceable or happy. The walk was uncomfortable; more than ever Mildred wondered what she was to do with her protégé.

Truly, Garth had forgotten the girl; he was striding over the land, scarcely knowing how or where, his soul in a tumult, his brain on fire. When he came to himself he was far from home—on a solitary road, the hills standing round in dim, solemn grandeur, and the country in the distance was dark—a light twinkling here and there.

Garth stood still and, leaning his arms on the wall, watched, or seemed to watch, while a mighty purpose took shape in him. He bared his head and looked up where the stars were coming out, and when he covered it and turned homewards there was a deep, manly, almost solemn resolution in his face.

He did not remember Minnie till he reached the cottage; it was fastened up and dark, and he went on his way—the way the girls had gone—through the beechwood and over the hill, blaming himself.

CHAPTER X.

AND then—how was it?—they met but once again in all the summer, these two.

For some days Garth had gone about his business to all appearance as usual, but with an inward restlessness which had grown now almost uncontrollable. In the evenings he was no longer far afield, but at home, or about the grounds—at furthest with Daddy, for Mildred often came there, he knew; but Mildred he had not seen. He was as anxious now to meet as he had been to evade her.

And what possessed Mildred? Did something tell her he was waiting out there? Was it mere girlish shyness that kept her so much indoors? Or was it pique? Was she angry or was she afraid? He waited restlessly, watching eagerly, always, everywhere, but of Mildred he caught no glimpse—until one evening at tea he heard of a scalded child in the cottage next to Daddy's, and Miss Mildred's having gone, and rising from table without a word, he reached down his hat and went out. Straight across the fields and over the hill he went. He must watch that cottage and meet her whichever way she came. And he did watch—sitting on the low old wall at the top of the beechwood—watch and wait with patience, until he began to fear that she must have left already; and then at last his heart leapt up, as she came out and paused a moment at Daddy's door.

Garth sat and watched from behind the screening trees with burning eyes which yet took in every detail: the dainty summer costume, the free, graceful carriage, the frank manner, which was yet so dignified—a woman so nobly planned, and the heart of her was his!

But there was scant time for observation, for with to rest half-way, and sat below singing; and what was this?—

"It were profanity
For poor humanity
To treat as vanity
The sway of love.

"In no locality
Or principality
Is our mortality
Its sway above."

"You would not like to live here always?"—p. 210.

a mere word to Daddy, Mildred went on along the road, crossed it, mounted the stile, and came straight up towards him through the wood. This did not suit Garth; he must not be found waiting; she must see him suddenly; he must take her by surprise. He dropped from the wall, and moved away a little; directly when she reached the top, he would return swiftly.

And again he had to wait, for Mildred stopped

Garth, foolish fellow! How can you surprise her? Better go down. But he did not; he waited on.

It was not fair to listen. She was telling out her secret to her trusty old hills, and the free air and the birds, who would never tell tales. When she chose to tell him, well and good; there was all the future. So when Mildred reached the top he was standing at such a distance as made hearing problematical, and instead of meeting her with keen, comprehending, all-subduing eyes, his back was towards her, and had full benefit of the first glance.

Now what was this—what possessed Mildred? All these days she had been shunning Garth—dreading, yet dreaming of the next meeting there must be. Well, here he was before her, and she must have known—she did know—how it was. One sign of shrinking—of hesitation—one touch of girlish shyness, and all would be over; the very set of Garth's shoulders said as much. But she did not shrink, she did not hesitate, there was no least tingeing of the cheek, no slightest drooping of the eyelids—she just came straight towards him in that free, dignified way, with clear, unabashed eyes, calm, unembarrassed speech.

"Guten abend, Garth. You have heard of this accident?"

"Yes, Miss Caryl."

It was all he could say. A wave of utter disappointment, that was agony, swept over him, and left him still, pale, grave.

This Missie—his little Missie whom he had carried about as a child, romped with as a lad, lost and thought he had found again? This the sweet, shy girl who had looked so, spoken so, acted so the other evening, down there on the bridge, under this same over-arching heaven? This was the Miss Caryl society knew—this self-possessed young lady who talked so evenly while he stood and endured as heroes do, and made no sign.

Did Mildred know what she was doing as she stood and chatted, and presently said good-evening and turned away, Garth dumbly helping her over the wall, with those kind hands which were always so steady and ready at need, and then plunging down the hill-side? Suppose she had turned back and seen that prostrate figure in the darkening wood?

Mildred, Mildred—what did it mean? Why had she hidden herself all these days and now met him thus? Had she reconsidered? Had she felt herself in fault? Had her head refused her heart? Did she regret having shown him that? Was she ashamed now?

It must be so, and he could not appeal to her. He would not. No! Unless she surrendered of her own free will, he would do nothing. He would ask no woman to stoop to him. He would let her alone.

Gradually, as he lay there and the stars came out, Garth became quieter. If this were the woman God had given him, as he had thought the other night, all would be well.

He had done nothing to win her love—and she loved him already—such a love would never deny itself. Sooner or later those clear eyes would see truth through the world's thin screen—surely, if slowly, she would capitulate. He would wait, if need, with "years of dutious service, till he win."

At last he rose and went home, calm and not despairing.

CHAPTER XI.

AND the calm lasted until the following evening.

All day he had gone about his work, quiet and pale, and with a preoccupied air which had not escaped his companions' notice and remark. Already, had he known it, rumour was on the air and comments were rife; for no people are so quick in catching, or open in speaking of such things, as sharp-eyed, warm-hearted, ready-tongued Lancashire workpeople. But significant looks and undertone remarks had all escaped Garth, even when sudden excitement was caused by the news, passed rapidly from mouth to mouth, that Miss Mildred had gone away from home.

Preoccupied as he was, it all escaped Garth, until returning home in the evening, long after the rest, he overtook Minnie on the drive.

Garth liked Minnie; she was a pretty girl, well spoken, well mannered, and the days she had spent at his mother's house had led, naturally, to more intimacy than he cared to have with girls of his own class; he knew the names, even, of very few at the mill. Her shyness and strangerhood appealed to him; and then, too, she was always with Miss Mildred, and could talk about her. She was Mildred's protégée—he had treated her always with a brotherly kindness not at all disagreeable to Minnie. Garth was just the man to attract such a girl, strong and manly and grave. She could not help seeing that she had more privilege than others, and she had thought of it—as such brotherless girls will—more than she need.

So when Garth, instead of passing with a nod and word, as he might, stopped and shook hands and slackened his pace to hers, Minnie received him kindly, and amused him with shy chatter all the way up the road. And as they neared the top and Garth was preparing to say good-night, and betake himself off up the branching lane, it slipped out.

"Did he not know Miss Mildred had gone into Derbyshire that morning? She had friends in the country, at a vicarage, and the lady was an invalid."

Yes, he knew: "Cousin Margaret," Kildare O'Neil's sister.

"Miss Mildred had said it was a pretty place—she would like to stay altogether."

Gone!—and she had not told him! She had made her preparations in those quiet days, intending to escape. She had said good-bye to Old Pack—and meeting him had behaved—so—and gone, to Kildare's sister! She would stay long enough, no doubt—and Kildare travelling about—

A sudden unreasoning wrath seized Garth. That was her treatment of a man who loved her, because he was a workman, and could not greatly add to her own abundant plenty—a man whom she knew as she knew him, a friend from babyhood, a foster-brother, a fellow-man, her equal in God's sight!

Garth stood at the side of the road and looked across the roofs below—and he could have dashed himself down the cliff in his anger—across to the steadfast hills; and vowed—a deep strong vow—to wash his heart of Mildred Caryl—to give her no thought more.

Minnie stood by his side and saw nothing—she was chary of looking at Garth, and he was very still. All she saw was the view, the old houses beneath in the mellow light, the mills, quiet and lonely after the noise and turmoil of the day, the tall chimneys with no stream of smoke to sully the clear air—it was very clear just now—pointing heavenward as surely as steeples, perhaps more characteristically of the folks of this ilk—and, surrounding all, the sun-tinged hills.

This was all she saw, all she knew—that Garth was regarding it.

"It is pretty!" she said.

Garth turned and looked at her. Pretty!—what was pretty!—Oh, the view! To her it might be—to him it would be hateful henceforth—and he paused.

Whatever else was pretty or not, the girl was. The breeze had roughened her hair and tinged her cheek—perhaps shyness helped that—the lips were red and smiling, the lashes lowered slightly over gentle gleaming eyes; her dress, a pretty Quaker-like grey, and shady hat pleased Garth's taste.

A throb came into his throat, a flush to his face, as he looked.

"I like the place very well," she was saying.

Garth stopped, crossed his arms on the wall, and looked down into the town; perhaps that was what made him so oddly dizzy. He was tired—tired.

"But you would not like to live here always!"—and his tone was slightly husky.

"Yes, I would like it very well."

"Down there, in the town?"—with a curious choked feeling—a dim sense of struggling against a vague, intangible something, and finding his strength unequal.

"I don't think I would mind: it is busy. I like to live where work is going on all day."

"It is dirty—you would not like that"—wondering what the impelling sensation was, and dimly guessing.

"My house would not be dirty. All the streets are not, and the people are many of them clean, sober people."

"Your company would make a difference, then?"

"A great deal of difference!"—his company, yes.

"A clean, sober husband, for instance"—seeing clearly now what he was going to do, and hurrying on.

She was thinking so; she blushed and said nothing.

"Well, Minnie"—with a catch in his voice she might well misunderstand—"you can have that without living in the town. Suppose you came to live with my mother, and I were your husband—how would that be?"

Minnie was a little stunned. Of course, she had fancied—she had hoped—some day, perhaps, but it had been a long way off, and this was sudden; and Garth had never let her know, or think about it properly. It was not this way she had fancied it at all—not the way one or two had spoken to her—not the way someone had spoken and looked that very day. But Garth was so unlike other men: he would never be "soft" like some young lads.

"Well, how would it be?" he repeated.

"I—I don't know!" she faltered, and then she stole a look at him.

Garth was leaning still on his arms, crossed on the wall, his cheek flushed, his eye bright and stern—to Minnie he looked very determined.

"I should like it"—very timidly—"only—only—"

What her "only" meant she did not know. To Garth it sounded comprehensible, and the weight upon him lightened a little, the mist a little lifted. She was going to refuse—there was someone else in the case—some young boy in Scotland, no doubt.

He looked round, his eye softened, his brow smoothed.

"Only" what, Minnie?"—very gently.

This was what Minnie wanted. She hung her head, trembled, and said nothing.

"Is there someone else you like better, my good little girl?"—and his tone was natural, now; he was beginning to smile.

"No, Garth dear!"—very softly.

The smile died—he paled.

"Well, what then?"—trying to speak gently still.

"I—I don't just know; I—think I am frightened—and—and— Oh, I wish aunt were here!"—in sudden distress.

Why was he so odd and quiet? This was not the way Robin had spoken, and she had not wanted Robin at all. Even now he did not touch her, or offer to kiss or comfort her at all—only stood up and leaned against the wall, and waited until she was quiet, and then said, kindly enough, but quite coolly—

"Never mind, Minnie; there is my mother; she will be kind to you and take your aunt's place. You are always happy with mother, are you not?"

"Yes—oh, yes! And—and—you," shyly.

Evidently she was very fond of him.

"Yes; and you have no other home or friends—and we shall be very happy—oh, yes, very happy!—and you will forget all the trouble—and I—and—and mother will take care of you, and you will be a good daughter to her." He was really arguing with himself.

"And a good—good to you. I will try, Garth!"—and she crept nearer to him and lifted a flushed, rather tearful, face to his.

Garth started. What did she want—to be kissed?

He to kiss this girl, who had thought of such another? Yes, and he must kiss her now and always; and these were sweet lips, too. It was a pretty face, shy and full of love—all of such a love as Minnie had to give.

And he did it—he kissed her, and then led her away up the narrow lane; with his arm about her shoulders, too, and talking, kindly as he could, poor Garth; for, after all, it was his own doing, and he was touched.

He even began to feel a little savage triumph—it would do Miss Caryl good! She would think she had been mistaken. He had been so cool lately, and so kind to Minnie always. She would think he really loved the girl; and she should think so. He was glad he had never spoken a word to her. Suppose he had declared himself, and she had yielded, and given him up next day to please her father! There might have been trouble. No one would dispute with him for this girl.

It was safer for Minnie, too—she might have fallen into the hands of any scamp with that little fortune in store; he could take care of it, and her. Oh! it was better as it was, he said to himself, drawing Minnie closer, who nestled to him. Yes, she loved him, and was a nice, good girl—she would do very well, and it was suitable.

And then all was cloud and storm again. Minnie wondered what Miss Mildred would say.

"Suppose you write and tell her," he suggested.

"Oh, no! I couldn't—I couldn't. I don't like writing letters, and there's no need until she comes home."

"But if she is to be away a long time, Minnie?"—thinking that Miss Mildred had better hear while away from home.

"But she will not be away any time—it was so sudden—and she only took a bag with her."

"A bag?—she went suddenly?"

"Yes, in a few minutes' time. She came running up-stairs from breakfast—I was tidying her room—and said there was a letter; she must go at once. Her papa, the master, was going too, but he was going to London, and would bring her back on Friday or Saturday. The lady was very ill where she was going."

The lady ill!—her Cousin Margaret, whom he had often seen, and knew to be so delicate—so dear to Mildred, her one woman friend beside his mother; her father going through the village by rail, offering to take Mildred with him, drop her at the little wayside station, and pick her up on his return. The hurried departure—"only a bag"—how unlike his first hasty conclusion!

Poor Garth! Involuntarily he loosed Minnie and caught his hat from his heated brow.

"Why did you not say so?" he asked gravely, even sternly.

"I don't know—I didn't think.—Does it matter, Garth?" with a little anxious look.

He glanced at her sharply. Was she deceiving him? Had she done it purposely? No, evidently; it was only his own mistake—his own miserable mistake!

"Well, no—only—there is the school, you see, and another matter"—remembering that Minnie must never guess that Miss Mildred had any special interest for him.

"Minnie"—after some steps in silence—"don't you think it would be better if I told mother of this first, and you came to see her to-morrow? It is getting late, and I—well, to tell the truth, I've had no tea, and mother will be too busy getting it to attend to you properly. If I tell her, to-night, and you come to-morrow afternoon and have a nice quiet talk while I'm at work—women always want a talk, don't they?"—thinking of Mildred's long chats—"don't you think that would do?"

Minnie did not; she would rather have gone with him now. But if he had not had tea—though she would like to have poured out for him, too—if he wished it, of course it must be so.

And he did wish. He was thinking his mother must be prepared; he must not take Minnie to her suddenly. She must take it in and settle her thoughts, and he would rather not be there.

But it seemed Minnie wanted him—she did not want to be alone with Mrs. Garrickson. If it could do in the evening and he could come for her, she would rather, she said timidly.

Very well, he would come for her. Yes, of course, that would be a good way of letting people know. Everyone must know—it must be old news when Miss Mildred came home.

But now he said "Good-night!" where he was, and in such a fashion as sent Minnie home satisfied enough.

How he told his mother Garth never could afterwards remember. He made what pretence of having tea he could, in silence, with a book before him as usual, but not reading, Mrs. Garrickson's sharp eyes could see. Garth's face never retained one expression when reading, and such a grave, resolute expression always meant something wrong. But, wisely, she held her peace, and at last he closed his book, gulped down his last cup of tea, pushed back his chair noisily, and standing by the table, made his announcement, not altogether as men usually do, perhaps, but with a tolerable show of cheerfulness.

And after the first startled glance—the transient grieved face-cloud—Mrs. Garrickson showed no more disturbance than mothers often do, and said less than most—that Minnie was a good girl and lovable, and would make a good wife; that it was suitable; confessed she had thought of it—only—and kissed her son, her eyes unsaying all her words.

And he spoke a forcefully laughing word of "losing her son when he got him a wife," and left the room—and that was all.

Only once in the evening did they speak again, when Garth, instead of going out or taking a book up-stairs as usual, had returned and sat at the harmonium, wringing her heart with it as she sat in the window, to all appearance tranquilly knitting.

"You know Miss Caryl is away mother?"

"Yes—she sent word."

A pause—then indifferently—

"Did she? She was written for, I suppose!"

"Wired—it was a telegram, Garth, delayed over-night. Mrs. Donaldson had a son, and wanted her."

"A son? I thought there were no children."

"This is the first, after all these years: it's only just possible the mother may live. Miss Mildred sent because they wanted me to go; but I felt I could not help, and I couldn't leave. She said, if all were well, she'd be home on Friday—at school, as usual, and asked if you would please be there."

Garth said nothing, but presently rose and closed the harmonium.

"Well, good-night, mother: I'll go to bed."

"Yes, you look tired. We'll have prayer now."

"Oh, I'll not wait—Janie will be busy. You can put up a little something extra for Minnie and me in confidence, if I am not here, you know!" with a little laugh as he kissed her.

And then Mrs. Garrickson understood the extent of the danger.

CHAPTER XII.

MILDRED loitered slowly along a lovely Derbyshire road—a road level, white; bordered with greener, softer grass than grew in the fields at home, shaded by trees—not a thin line, but a wood, through which this pretty road wound like a private drive. Farther on the trees opened out on barer, more exposed country; but Mildred did not intend to go so far—she could not leave Margaret long—and it was sheltered and soothingly pleasant here. She needed soothing just now.

She had come on Wednesday: this was Saturday. She had fully intended returning with her father yesterday, but he had been, and gone on without her. Margaret was not to be left.

That alone was discomfort enough. To have come away leaving all in such doubtful order—her own affairs, the school, and so many sick; that scalded child, for instance, with no one even to change bandages and make decent food but a rough, slovenly mother—to say nothing of the visits and dainties she had promised!—all left at a moment's notice; not a word to anyone but just that hasty message to Mrs. Garrickson. It was disturbing.

Most disturbing of all was the thought of Garth. Suppose that message had been forgotten! She had met him so coldly the other evening—and then left so. Would he not misunderstand! She had had vague fears from the first; yesterday a word had been dropped which roused them to fever-pitch, and not even yet were they calmed.

At luncheon she had been trying to frame some message for her father to take which should say enough and not too much, when he had said, carelessly—

"By the way, Mildred, as you thought Garrickson could do the office work, I have decided to try him. Simister is retiring, and the young men are to do it between them."

"Oh! But, father, why both? Could not Garth—"

"Not all at once, my dear; presently, perhaps."

"Perhaps I was only thinking they might not get on. Kildare tries Garth."

"No doubt. Kildare has soft paws—duly furnished," said his brother-in-law, the clergyman.

"Garth can take care of himself," drily. "I was writing in my room the other day, and Kildare in the other—I could hear that scratch of his—when the outer door opened and shut, and the scratching stopped. 'Er—er,' drawls Kildare. 'A-s-suredly, assuredly. Garrickson, how d'ye spell "assuredly." 'Er—er,' says Garth, in exact imitation, 'a-s-s-u-r-e-d-l-y.' Then he adds politely, 'I thought 't would be so impertinent to say "a, double s, you are." ' Kildare went on scratching."

And in the midst of the laughter at this, came Mildred's heart-blow.

"He's found him a wife, Mildred."

"Who? Kildare?" and the clergyman looked at her.

"No, of course—Garrickson. That pretty little protégée of yours—what's her name—Jenny—oh, Minnie. I hope he won't marry yet; it will just spoil his fortune," and Mr. Caryl launched out on a panegyric, while Mildred—struck dumb—listened half-unconsciously.

Garth engaged!—her friend Garth!—and to Minnie! Impossible! Garth, whom even her father, who so seldom praised his workmen, and had so high an ideal, thought of thus, to marry Minnie!

Of course it was impossible, she had told herself ever since—and yet—and yet— And the longing was terrible to rush home and see for herself. But what excuse? And here were Margaret and the wee son.

She had scarcely slept the previous night; in the morning had been pale and faint, and after luncheon had come out for a little air; presently must return to the sick-room while the nurse rested. She loitered on, trying to persuade herself that she was tolerably cheerful, and failing entirely. She turned a bend in the road and came within sight of the end of the wood; in the opening was a little silhouette of a figure—a post-boy, she saw, and took no further notice; there was but one daily post here—in the morning.

But he advanced rapidly, and, as he reached her, stopped.

"Where's the vicarage, please, mem?"

"Straight on—a mile or so—on the right behind the church."

"Mister Donaldson's, I suppose, mem?"

"Yes. What is it, a letter? I am staying there; shall I take it?"

"I'm thinkin' it must be yourn, mem. It come to Chapel-le-Frith, and there's no post till Monday, so I'm sent. What name, mem?"

"Caryl. Oh yes, it is, thank you; that is a long walk for you."

She sent him off happy with a shilling, turned and looked at her letter. It was directed indistinctly and erroneously: "Mr. Donaldson, — Rectory, Nr. Chapel-le-Frith." She recognised the writing, but not the writer. She opened it—oh yes, of course, Minnie—and then Mildred stood still in the road.

After all, it was as nice a little letter as Minnie could write. Mildred had sent her a list of things to get together and forward to her with Mrs. Williams' help, and Minnie wrote to say she had done her best, and hoped Miss Caryl would get them before Sunday; one or two she could not find. And then at the end she added that she would not intrude, but as Garth had wished her, and she was writing, and as Miss Mildred was taking so much trouble to find her a place, she must tell her there was no need to do that now, or take any more trouble, because she had promised to marry Garth, and they would live with Mrs. Garrickson, who was very kind to her—and, indeed, everyone was very kind, and she was very happy—for, indeed, she and Garth were very fond of one another; and she hoped the lady would soon be well, and Miss Mildred soon come home.

That was all. How long and anxious a task it had been to Minnie she did not think—only of what a baby-letter it was for Garth's future wife to write. She sat down on the low wall and turned her face to the wood, trying to realise it; Garth was gone—her world empty. She understood how it had been.

"At the foot of the bed he paused."—p. 214.

Garth was wrong; not for a moment was she deceived, her eyes were too keen, her brain too clear, she knew him too well; not for a moment did she suppose he really loved Minnie; and yet all was over now—for them both.

She raised her face and looked up into the cold sky; one short week ago so warm and deep, yet scarcely deep enough or broad to hold the pulsing joy of life—empty space now, as life would be henceforth. Was there no One yonder, that this thing should have befallen? Was His rule restrained, the rule of Garth's God? Garth! Garth! to have turned away from the Guidance he so trusted!

Had he never realised a higher order in the eternal mating of souls than merely this world's rule? Were there no exceptions? Had he never felt the All-Father's impelling hand that he should turn away from the path so clearly before him, because to enter he must bow his head—his English workman's proud head?

"Heaven's gates are not so highly arched
As princes' palaces; they that enter there Must go upon their knees."

But his earthly heaven, workman as he was, he must enter like a prince.

Workman! Never was he so princely as when about his work, because never so utterly lord of himself. And the man himself—Garth Garrickson, workman—had all her life been her better self. Now her life would be barren as that bleak hillside.

And for him—what? Minnie was no mate for him, this sweet slight girl—whose sweetness was all weakness. She had no plummet for the depths of Garth's nature. He so needed the companionship of a clear, strong mind, a tender heart. No "sway of love" for him in life henceforth.

How would it be? Would both lives be wasted—the order of creation gone astray for both with his straying footsteps? A passionate cry broke from her to the Father of souls, in whose hand their breath was, and Whose were all their ways, that rather He would recall that breath than that all their lives they should wander from Him.

The afternoon wore on, the shadows sloped and lengthened; sometimes a vehicle passed—a heavy, creaking waggon, a whirling trap, a tourist on a bicycle; the birds twittered and flitted overhead, a rabbit scampered across the sward—

At last a voice roused her.

"Mildred—why, Mildred! are you asleep?"

It was the clergyman returning from pastoral visits. And as he saw her face—

"Ill? What is it? Margaret!"—in sudden alarm. He had left home before her. Had she followed with ill news?

"Margaret!" struggling to recall herself. "Oh, she was all right."

Margaret! His selfish anxiety for Margaret had brought all this trouble upon her. Then, seeing his distress—

"I did not see her again after you left; I think I have been asleep and dreaming," with a shiver. If only it were a dream, a mere dream; but there lay Minnie's letter on the grass at her feet. She picked it up and crushed it into her pocket. She must burn it; no one must be able to date the difference in her; no one must ever guess.

She went home with Roger Donaldson quietly enough. He, anxious for his wife, forgot to think of her, and ran up-stairs at once. A few minutes later they met again on the landing.

"She is sleeping," he said. "Will you go?—the nurse is anxious for tea and a rest."

Mildred went at once. The nurse put the babe into her arms.

"The mistress won't waken yet," she whispered, and left her.

Mildred sat down with the wee bundle of humanity on her knee, leaned back and closed her eyes in very weariness. Oh, to leave it all and fly home even now!

But the transfer from the nurse's arms to her own had disturbed the child; she had to rouse herself and make all efforts to still him, for the sleeping mother's sake; and as she hushed him, some subtle influence from the tiny thing—that influence most potent to every woman's heart—touched Mildred. She hid her face in his draperies, and saving tears came. Presently someone touched her; it was Roger, a cup of tea in hand.

"Drink this; it will do you good. Courage, Mildred; all will be well," thinking, of course, she wept for his woes.

He stooped and kissed his little son, and waited, caressing him while she drank her tea; then, taking her cup, turned to leave the room. At the foot of the bed he paused for a long tender look at his wife. Then the cup crashed to the floor, and there was a cry—

"Margaret—Margaret!"

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

JANUARY 21ST. CAIN AND ABEL.

To read—Gen. iv 3—13. Golden Text—Heb. xi. 4.

INTRODUCTION. Last lesson ended with judgment and mercy. Adam and Eve punished for their sin of disobedience—turned out of Paradise, made to endure hard toil—but promise given of future Saviour Who should conquer Satan and restore man. Now two sons are born to Adam and Eve; Cain, who becomes a tiller of the ground, or farmer; and Abel, who becomes a shepherd.

I. THE SACRIFICES. (3—7.) What were they?

Cain brought some of the fruits of the earth. Offering of thanksgiving instead of sacrifice for sin.

But without shedding of blood is no forgiveness. Abel offered up a firstling of his flock.

The lamb—innocent and bleeding, type of Christ, Who died as a lamb for man's sin. (Is. liii. 6.)

Also, Abel offered his in faith. (Golden Text.)

He believed God's word, and obeyed Him.

Therefore his sacrifice was better, and his motive.

Abel's sacrifice accepted. Probably fire came down.

As when Aaron offered a sacrifice. (Lev. ix. 24.)

And Elijah on Mount Carmel. (1 Kings xviii. 38.)

Abel would depart in peace and happiness.

Cain's sacrifice rejected. He is angry and sullen. God remonstrates with him and rebukes him.

If he does right, i.e., offers a right sacrifice, he too will be blessed.

If not, punishment for sin must follow.

LESSON. How to come before God.

(a) With sorrow for sin—a broken and contrite heart. (Ps. li. 17.)

(b) Pleading for mercy because of Christ's sacrifice.

Example. Publican in parable. (St. Luke xviii. 14.)

Then shall be pardoned, accepted, blessed.

II. THE MURDER. (8—13.) Notice—

The cause—envy of Abel's sacrifice being accepted.

This led to hatred, malice, murder.

The place—in the field or desert away from home.

The manner—treacherous: "While they talked together."

The question—bringing Cain's guilt home to him.

The answer—a lie, and a poor excuse.

The judgment—Abel's blood appeals to God.

God avenges the death of His righteous servant.

Cain is cursed. His work will be fruitless.

His life will be a misery to himself and others.

His own conscience will be his tormentor.

The appeal. The punishment too great to be borne.

But Cain shows no sorrow for the awful sin.

LESSONS. 1. Where envy is, there is confusion and every evil work.

2. God is angry with the wicked every day.

3. The soul that sinneth it shall die.

JANUARY 28TH. GOD'S COVENANT WITH NOAH.

To read—Gen. ix. 8—17. Golden Text—verse 13.

INTRODUCTION. The world became rapidly peopled. Men lived to great age—several hundreds of years—and founded large families. But many fell away from God. The earth became full of wickedness. Noah's family, alone faithful, were saved in the ark—all the rest being destroyed in a great flood. After a year Noah and his family left the ark. God blessed them and made a covenant with them.

I. THE COVENANT. (8—11.) Notice—

The occasion. Noah and family just left ark.

Would feel lonely and desolate after the Flood.

A few cattle their only possessions left.

But they spare some for a burnt sacrifice. (viii. 20.)

God renews promise of abundant increase. (ix. 2.)

Then makes a solemn covenant or promise.

The persons. Noah and his family and the whole future race of man.

The animals also included in it.

The terms. By water man should not again perish. Nor the earth and its produce be destroyed.

But the seasons should recur regularly. (viii. 22.)

Seed-time, harvest, summer and winter, etc.

This was God's part of the covenant.

What was Noah's part? To take what God gave.

To accept promised blessing with thanksgiving.

II. The token. (12—17.) What was it? Rainbow.

Caused by sun shining during a shower of rain.

Rainbow must often have been seen before.

Now to have to man a new meaning.

Rainbow not always seen from the earth.

But always visible from above clouds.

So God Who reigns above would always see it.

He promises always to remember His promise.

Men and animals may henceforth live in security.

LESSONS. The rainbow teaches about God.

1. His protection. Directs all the affairs of men.

Makes, preserves, and governs this world.

2. His mercy. Spares when we deserve punishment.

3. His watchfulness. His eye always on His people.

Rainbow also teaches man—

1. To trust and not be afraid.

Dark clouds often have bright linings.

May sing of mercy and judgment.

2. To praise. God has kept His promise.

The world has never been flooded again.

Harvest and seasons have come regularly.

3. To fear. These events written for our warning.

Must beware lest by sin provoke God's anger.

"Hear His voice—harden not your hearts."

FEBRUARY 11TH. BEGINNING OF THE HEBREW NATION.

To read—Gen. xii. 1—9. Golden Text—verse 2.

INTRODUCTION. Pass over 350 years after the Flood, and come to-day to the call of Abraham, the founder of the Jewish nation. His a most interesting and important history. God's promises were through him to the whole world.

I. ABRAHAM'S CALL. (1—3.) Where made.

In Ur of Chaldees, where his father Terah lived.

North-east of Canaan in district of Mesopotamia.

There his fathers worshipped idols. (Josh. xxiv. 2.)

How made. It was a direct call from God.

Perhaps in a dream, as afterwards. (Gen. xv. 13.)

Perhaps by a strong moving of his heart.

Or by a direct voice, as to Samuel. (1 Sam. iii. 8.)

Why made. Because he feared God.

Therefore was chosen personally by Him.

What was the call? To leave his old home.

To undertake a long and dangerous journey.

To emigrate to a strange far-off land.

To give up country, relations, fatherland.

The call was coupled with promises. God would—

Guide him—therefore the way would be clear.

Protect him—therefore he need not fear.

Bless him with large family and posterity.

Give him honour—his name should be great.

Make him a blessing to all the world.

II. ABRAHAM'S JOURNEY. (4—9.) His party—

Himself, his wife Sarah, and his nephew Lot.

His servants in charge of the numerous herds.

His journey. First from Ur to Haran.

There stayed some time till his father's death.

Then with servants and cattle crossed the great River Euphrates, hence gaining the name 'Heber,' "The man who crossed over."

Thence journeyed to the south into Canaan.

His altars. One built on his first entrance. (Ver. 7.)

God's voice told him this was the promised land.

Therefore dedicated it to God Who gave it him.

Then moved on near Bethel and built another.

At each place in his journey called on God.

III. ABRAHAM'S OBEDIENCE. It was—

Immediate—did at once what God told.

Result of faith. (Heb. xi. 8.) Faith seen by works.

Constant. Day by day resting on God's guidance.

Thus became the "Father of the faithful."

As such is example to all. We must—

Believe what God tells. Go where God calls.

Do what God commands. Honour God always.

LESSON. Without faith it is impossible to please God.

FEBRUARY 11TH. GOD'S COVENANT WITH ABRAHAM.

To read—Gen. xvii. 1—10. Golden Text—Gen. xv. 6.

INTRODUCTION. Thirteen years since God's promise was made to Abraham. His wife has had no son, and has persuaded Abraham to take Hagar as a second wife. Her son Ishmael now grown to boyhood, but was not to be the heir. Now God renews His promise to Abraham.

I. A NEW PROMISE. (1—4.) Notice—

God appeared in some way to Abraham.

Perhaps by an angel, as often. (Gen. xviii. 1, 2.)

God declares Himself to be the Almighty One.

Nothing is impossible with Him.

He can give strength and vigour to the aged.

Only Abram must live according to His will.

He must be blameless and upright, like Noah.

(vi. 19.)

God renews His previous covenant.

(1) Abram shall have a son by Sarai his wife.

Fulfilled in the birth of Isaac.

(2) He shall be the father of many nations.

Fulfilled literally in the large tribes of Israelites, Ishmaelites, and Edomites descended from him.

Fulfilled spiritually in all believers. (Rom. xiv. 12, etc.)

(3) His seed shall possess Canaan. (Ver. 8.)

Fulfilled 430 years afterwards under Joshua.

(4) The blessing to extend to future generations.

Fulfilled in coming of Christ to bless all nations.

II. A NEW NAME. (5—10.) Abram, "Mighty father," changed to Abraham, "Father of nations."

Name to remind always of God's new covenant.

What were the conditions of the covenant?

On God's side—Prosperity, protection, blessing.

On man's side—Obedience, gratitude, love.

This covenant had also a new outward sign.

All Abraham's family were to be circumcised.

Every male child at eight days old.

Whether sons, servants, or slaves. (Ver. 13.)

What would this new outward rite teach?

(a) Separation from the world as God's people.

(b) Consecration to God as their only Master.

(c) Family religion. All in the house to serve God.

LESSONS. We, like Abraham's family, have—

A Christian name, to show we belong to Christ.

A dedication to God.

Blessings promised if we are faithful.

A better country, that is, an heavenly.

See that we walk worthy of God, Who has called us.

BETTER THAN BROAD RIVERS AND STREAMS.

AN HISTORICAL CHAPTER IN ISAIAH, AND ITS GREAT LESSON.

BY THE REV. J. R. MACDUFF, D.D.

(ISAIAH XXXIII.)

THIS chapter affords a remarkable specimen of Isaiah's graphic and pictorial method of description: I shall endeavour to give a somewhat detailed rehearsal of its figurative references, with their historical and local colouring. In a succession of bold images he brings before us the state of the Jewish nation at a momentous period of their annals.

Hezekiah had for thirteen years swayed the sceptre of Judah. There were conspicuously few blemishes in his character and reign. But one of these doubtless was his pusillanimous endeavour to purchase peace of the King of Assyria by despoiling the Temple of its treasures. The expedient was so far successful; but it was a brief lull and no more. The haughty Sennacherib, faithless to his word, was soon again on the march with an overwhelming force to crush the Hebrew Kingdom—once more to pillage its sacred places, and carry its king a captive to his own dominions.

The whole of the thirty-third chapter is occupied with a description of the terror inspired by this fresh descent on Jerusalem. The Prophet begins (ver. 1) with an appeal to the unscrupulous violator of treaties for his aggression on an unoffending people. "Woe to thee that spoilest (or woe to the devastator) and thou wast not spoiled: and dealest treacherously and they dealt not treacherously with thee." He warns him of impending disaster. "When thou shalt cease to spoil thou shalt be spoiled; and when thou shalt make an end to deal treacherously, they shall deal treacherously with thee" (ver. 2). The speaker pauses. He interrupts this his first prediction of woe, and interjects a prayer for himself and his terrified countrymen. In their name he pleads (ver. 2): "O Lord, be gracious unto us; we have waited for Thee!" He knows he does not appeal in vain to Him who is the Salvation of His people in the time of trouble—"their arm (their shelter and defence) every morning."

Jehovah Himself now interposes. In answer to the pleadings of the terror-stricken, He stills "the noise of the seas, the noise of their waves, [even] the tumults of the people."

(Ver. 3.) Isaiah describes the terror that had seized the nation in common with all the surrounding kingdoms which had already succumbed to the Assyrian potentate. "At the noise of the tumult the people fled; at the lifting up of Thyself the nations were scattered." And then (in ver. 4) he speaks of the utter discomfiture awaiting the plunderer's "grasshoppers." The timid Jews—so lately crouching with dismay within their walls—are represented as going fearless outside, to the place strewn with the enemies' dead to gather the spoil:—"Your spoil shall be gathered like the gathering of the caterpillar: as the running to and fro of locusts shall he run upon them."

Again the Prophet's voice is heard. He lifts it up in grateful, adoring praise. Or, if we prefer, we may imagine a chorus of his countrymen singing the psalm of victory:—(ver. 5) "The Lord is exalted!" As if they had said—"That proud invader, that mighty cedar of strength, imagining himself to have reached the stars of God, is laid low. His whirlwind career is arrested. Lucifer, son of the morning, has ignominiously fallen. But 'the Lord Jehovah is exalted:' and not only so, but, 'He hath filled Zion with judgment and righteousness.'" Zion was emptied. Her sacred treasures were ransacked by "the treacherous Spoiler." Her "holy and beautiful House was burned up with fire, and all her pleasant things laid waste." But now she is replenished. She has had stored to her her gold and silver: and, better than all, she has got what these cannot pay or purchase—"God is in the midst of her." Her very afflictions have been blessed. King and people have had threatened and impending trials sanctified. They have been driven from the creature to the Creator. They have sung in glad procession (as Hezekiah did sing) that noblest of battle-songs—the song of Trust in the God of armies—"God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble," etc. etc. (Psalm xlvii.).

(Ver. 6.) Turning to the representative Head of the holy nation, addressing himself to Hezekiah—the Prophet, in the name of his God, gives the encouraging assurance:—"Wisdom and knowledge shall be the stability of thy times, and strength of salvation. The fear of the Lord is his treasure."

The succeeding verses, in a way common in Hebrew poetry (returning to the story of the invasion), graphically and in elegiac tones describe the thrill of consternation caused by Sennacherib's devastating campaigns. The Hebrew ambassadors, sent with their propitiatory bribes from Hezekiah, return from Lachish in tears. Their mission has been scorned. (Ver. 7.) "Behold, their valiant ones* shall cry without: the ambassadors of peace shall weep bitterly." The track of the destroying army is vividly pictured: the highways lying waste, the earth lifting up its feeble, languishing protest against the invader. The heights of Lebanon are bared by his sappers. The wealthy corn-districts of Sharon are devoured by his locust-host: Bashan and Carmel are pining over their dismantled groves and trampled vineyards.† Shall the appeal of these holy places, these desecrated altars of nature, be in vain?

No. In ver. 10, not the Prophet, but Jehovah Himself is represented as again sublimely interposing to answer the appeal of the dumb earth, the prayers of the righteous king, and the devoted remnant of his people. The hour of Judah's redemption is come:—"Now will I rise, saith the Lord; now will I be exalted; now will I lift up myself." He predicts the utter ruin of the assailants. He foretells their destruction to be like "burnings of lime and thorns in the fire," and that the nations around, beholding the overthrow, will bow them down in reverence, owning the sovereignty and righteous retribution of Israel's God.

Having again recurred to the havoc that is to overtake the pagan warrior, Isaiah proceeds to

* Their "heroes"—"the Lions of God," as some render it. (See Lowth and Delitzsch.)

† As the invasion was in autumn, the reference is supposed to be to the faded foliage and falling leaves of mountain and plain, as if typical of the national grief and shame. (See Delitzsch.)

depict the terror of the faithless, inside the city walls.

The "godless in Zion" (ver. 14) :—the atheist crowd in the nominal "Holy City" are afraid : "fearfulness hath surprised the hypocrites." They crouch in dismay at the thought of the alternatives of slaughter and captivity, or the still more terrible prospect of "devouring fire" and "everlasting burnings." But with the pious and loyal, the true Hebrews of the Hebrews, all would be otherwise. Conscious of better munitions than earthly places of defence, they would "dwell on high," safe in the keeping and protection of Him who is Himself the "munition of rocks" (ver. 16).

He still farther rehearses, in a new strophe, and under fresh poetic colouring, the opening picture of the chapter—the melting away of the invading army. The gleam of its swords and shields was seen outside the walls of Jerusalem. They could mark its engineers surveying the fortifications—taking observations for the impending assault. They could see "the receiver" (or, margin, "weigher") ready with his balances to seize the treasures of gold and silver, and put them in the waggons of the conqueror. But he asks now in triumphant exultation (ver. 18), "Where is the scribe? where is the receiver? where is he that counted the towers?" The people of a strange "stammering tongue" (ver. 19), where are they? Jehovah has blown upon them! They have withered; the whirlwind has taken them away as stubble!

And then in ver. 20, turning to his loved Jerusalem, which had the besom of destruction ready to sweep its foundations, he calls on all his faithful brethren—pious Jews—to "look upon her," in contrast with that force which has thus in the twinkling of an eye vanished. There was (as he wished to bring out in this contrast) nothing gigantic about her—nothing to compare with the colossal grandeur of Nineveh, with its winged symbols of might. Yet, what, after all, was that godless pagan power! The tents of her legions were dissolved in a night, at the touch of an angel's hand; their stakes were torn up and removed by the terror-stricken remnant; their proud camping-ground made an army's grave—an awful necropolis! "Look," says he, "upon Zion; the city of our solemnities: thine eyes shall see Jerusalem, a quiet habitation, a tabernacle [or tent] that shall not be taken down; not one of the stakes [the tent-pegs] thereof shall ever be removed, neither shall any of the cords thereof be broken."

The more special words of the present meditation follow, presenting to us yet another point of contrast: "There the glorious Lord (the glorious name JEHOVAH [Lowth]) will be unto us a place of broad rivers and streams, wherein shall go no galley with oars, neither shall gallant ship pass thereby" (ver. 21).

The comparison made here is to a ship. In a subsequent verse (the 23rd), speaking again of Senacherib and his army, he likens them to the same: a vessel plunging and reeling in the storm—"Thy tacklings are loosed; they could not well strengthen their mast, they could not spread the sail." They had to leave the unwieldy "leviathan" to buffet the tempest as best it could. It went ashore dismantled amid the rocks and breakers. It becomes the prey and plunder of those that were weak and despised. He adds, "Then is the prey of a great spoil divided—the lame take the prey" (ver. 23). The lame, helpless, crippled Jews, the apparently defeated nation, go forth to that wrecked colossus, and "take the prey." The treacherous spoiler is himself robbed and spoiled in his turn. Indeed, the gold and silver which, not long after, Hezekiah displayed to the Babylonish ambassadors, has been surmised to have been no other than what was now gathered from the discomfited hosts, the rich prey taken by "the lame."

The figure of a vessel seems to suggest to the Prophet's mind a still further point of contrast with Jerusalem. Beautiful as the Holy City was for situation—the joy of the whole earth—girdled with her valleys and mountains, she stood almost alone among the capitals of the world, an exception in one respect (it is the conspicuous want to the eye of every traveller to this day), that she had no river. Nineveh had her Tigris, Babylon her Euphrates, Memphis and Thebes had their mighty Nile, Rome had her Tiber. But Jerusalem was without a stream: a navigable river was not among the glorious things spoken of this "city of God." She was far from the Mediterranean coast at Joppa—the nearest point where "galleys" and "gallant ships" could be seen. The one only river of Palestine, historical, though by no means "great"—the Jordan—had no outlet to the ocean, and was more than twenty miles from Jerusalem; while in the valley which flanked the city on the east, her Kedron was only a winter torrent, dry often all summer long. As a consequence, the old Hebrew capital was a stranger to busy trading, and crowded port. Tyre, the mart of the old world's merchandise, would look with haughty disdain on this isolated city—devoid of the one great source of her prosperity and greatness—Tyre with a forest of vessels in her harbour—the white-winged messengers of commerce to the ends of the earth. "The harvest of the river" (says the Prophet in another place) "is her revenue, and she is a mart of nations." No; Jerusalem had neither river bank nor maritime shore. Her priests looked down in vain from the lofty Temple Courts; her pilgrims looked in vain from the heights of her green Mount of Olives, for the galley with oars, the triveme with gilded prow, or the laden merchantmen of Carthage, Corinth, or Alexandria. Farther, in the time of straitened siege, she had no moat with its deep pools washing her walls, which would have added to her defences, or it may be rendered her impregnable.

But now comes the grand antithesis. She had BETTER. She had what came in the place of rivers, and what made her independent of them.

It was a magnificent spiritual compensation: "The glorious Lord will be unto us a place of broad rivers and streams," "There is a river, the streams whereof make glad the city of God, the holy place of the tabernacles of the Most High. God is in the midst of her; she shall not be moved: the Lord shall help her, and that right early." Jerusalem had a richer dower than all these queenly cities—"God is known in all her palaces for a refuge."

The Psalmist in another Psalm (lxxxvii.) draws a similar contrast between earthly capitals. He does not withhold the tribute of greatness and renown from many others. Indeed, they had distinguishing glories which were denied to Jerusalem. "I will make mention," says he (ver. 4), "of Rahab and Babylon to them that know me: behold Philistia, and Tyre, with Ethiopia: this man was born there." This and that distinguished man—this warrior, this statesman, this orator, this poet—was born within their walls. "But of Zion it shall be said," with reference to a nobler birthright and heritage—a nobler roll of illustrious heroes—"this and that man was born in her, and the Highest Himself shall establish her." "The Highest Himself shall establish her!" Yes, that was her glory. He had promised to be a wall of fire around Zion, and the glory in the midst thereof. Let her be without river or moat, let no illustrious stream flow past her ramparts, she has a mightier equivalent in the "Highest Himself." She is encircled with a wall of fire, and that wall is her God.

And now, coming to the great personal lesson. How often do we still see a similar compensation in the experience of Jehovah's own people, reconciling them to the want of much they would otherwise wish to have, by what the old divines call the "upmaking portion" they have in Himself.

One is poor. He sees vessels laden with merchandise bringing in costly cargoes to their owners. But he has no "gallant ship," no golden-prowed galley, no broad river on which to launch his earthly hopes. He has, however, a nobler heritage. Poor in this world, God has made him "rich in faith." Perhaps some devastating stroke of adverse fortune has loosed all his tacklings, shivered his masts, rent his sails, read to him the lesson, "Trust not in uncertain riches." But it has taught the counterpart, to "trust in the living God."

Another has been prostrated by long years of sickness. His neighbours are in possession of vigour.

Their sails are set to healthful breezes. They have never had a shattered mast or a loosed tackling. That choice stream of unimpaired strength has ever been theirs. With this secluded one all is different. There is to him or her nothing but the dry, worn channel: no wave of joyous life ever gladdens their solitude. But they have, too, a peerless substitute. "The glorious Lord" is better than all of which they are deprived. One river of blessing is curtailed, only that the chief blessing may come in its place. God has stretched them or theirs on a bed of languishing, only that by heart and flesh fainting and failing, He may be the strength of their heart and their portion for ever.

Another has to mourn a sadder loss, the drying up of the choicest of earthly rivers—some stream that was wont to gladden the best-loved valleys of existence. It is gone! The joyous music of these galley-oars is no longer heard: hushed for the forever of time. But such have a blessed compensation. "The glorious Lord" will also be unto you "a place of broad rivers and streams."

How often does He dry up these channels, that He may fill the mighty heart-void with His own self. The mutable is gone, but the Immutable remains. The perishable has gone, but the Imperishable remains. You are made (in the stead of the uncertain earthly stream) "to drink of the rivers of His pleasures." Better poverty, trial, bereavement, suffering, with God, than all earthly riches and honours without Him. Better Lazarus with his crumbs and the reversion of a heavenly heritage, than Dives with nothing besides his purple and fine linen and sumptuous fare. Better Paul's chains and captivity and bonds, with God, than Nero's palace and imperial crown without Him. "Happy art thou, O Israel," said Moses. When did he say so? Was it when those he addressed were surrounded with the ensigns of national glory, the evidences of national prosperity: a people who had returned in triumph to their capital with the spoils of vanquished nations? No. It was uttered to a crowd of exiled pilgrims; their home the desert—wanderers in a strange land—with enemies on every side. But, devoid of all else, they had the God of the pillar-cloud as their guide by day, their defence by night; "the glorious Lord" was to them, in that waterless desert, "a place of broad rivers and streams." They had in Him better than river, or capital, or fenced city and protecting walls and bulwarks. "The Lord was their judge, the Lord was their lawgiver, the Lord was their king, their Saviour" (ver. 22). With the consciousness of so sublime a shelter, their earthly leader could exclaim—"Happy art thou, O Israel; who is like unto thee, O people saved by the Lord: the shield of thy help, and who is the sword of thy excellency!"

I close these remarks with one other thought. It is suggested by Jerusalem not having any broad river or stream, no galley with oars, no gallant ship that could pass thereby. The thought is this—that she was in many respects better and safer without these. What would have been to her in other ways an element of beauty—a noble river sweeping by her walls, and bearing on its bosom galleys (vessels of pleasure) and gallant ships (vessels of commerce)—this very attribute of beauty, and strength, and power, might have proved an element of danger. It was by means of their rivers that many a proud earthly capital of old was laid low. Ofttimes did the warlike ship and galley approach by means of the river to the assault. It was, as is familiar to all, by the diversion of the Euphrates that Babylon was destroyed. In the case of Nineveh, as recorded by the Prophet Nahum, the Tigris was employed as the instrument of Jehovah's vengeance on that guilty city: "With an overrunning flood He will make an utter end of the place thereof." "Howl," says the Prophet in another chapter, "howl, ye ships of Tarshish, for your strength is laid waste." "The day of the Lord of hosts shall be on all the ships of Tarshish!" If Jerusalem too, like these giant capitals, had possessed its Euphrates or its Tigris, how much more easily might it have fallen a prey to successive invaders. What, therefore, was in one sense a loss, might have proved, had it been there, a source of danger. Had the Kedron been a waterway,

floating a navy on its bosom, while it would have added to the

splendour and attractiveness of the Hebrew metropolis, it might have been like the arm of a giant grasping her for destruction, and the very feature which seemed to impart alike beauty and power, might have proved the secret of her weakness and ruin.

How often is this the case in the daily life-history of each one of us; and how ought the peril connected with the possession of doubtful blessings to reconcile us to the want of them. We may be devoid of many such accessories which may appear desirable. But, if we had them, they might prove sources of danger and temptation to us. They might be as a lion or adder in the pilgrim path: we are better without them. We may see others around us in the possession of riches, worldly honours, intellect, genius, coveted positions in life. We may be safer far as we are, with the lowly lot, the humble mental gifts and surroundings. Wealth might be a snare to us. Intellect might only foster vanity. Great positions might only bring with them new cares and racking anxieties, perhaps infinite peril to the soul's best interests. We are safer, like Jerusalem, without any broad river or stream. Fancy may picture to itself many delights in the possession of what we have not: the swift-oared galley—the gallant ship, with sails all set, bearing in its hold golden and silver treasures. But that ship might be freighted with deadly hidden stores. There might be explosive elements within that would scatter death on every side. It might bring enemies to the gates of the soul. O, if we have, in the absence of these, THE GLORIOUS LORD as a place of broad rivers and streams, I repeat, we have better than all material, social, or intellectual acquisitions.

Reader—let all other earthly blessings and portions go; but keep hold of the Best blessing, the only inalienable one. All other galleys which are freighted alone with worldly portions will, sooner or later, be wrecked. Their tacklings will be loosed—there will be no strengthening of the mast. They will be driven at the mercy of the storm. "Thou breakest the ships of Tarshish in an east wind." All earth's best rivers and broadest streams will, sooner or later, dry in their channels. Aye, and often drying soonest when most needed. But if, through the merits of our blessed Redeemer, we are able to exult in the Lord as the portion of our inheritance, we have a vessel freighted with imperishable treasure; borne along "the River of God which is full of water." We have riches surpassing the wealth of ten thousand worlds.

CHRIS.

BY MARY BRADFORD-WHITING.

CHAPTER I.

AIN was falling: it had been falling all day, and now that darkness was drawing on, the wind had risen, and was dashing the drops against the window-panes with ceaseless fury.

It was a dreary outlook, and inside the room where Mrs. Winton and her little boy were sitting it did not seem much brighter. The fire was getting low, but it gave a feeble gleam now and then, which showed up the worn patches on the hearthrug and the bare look of the whole place. Mrs. Winton had fallen asleep in the one arm-chair the room boasted. It was not a very comfortable seat, for the springs had long ago been broken, and the cushions were old and thin, but she was tired-out with her day's work, and slept as peacefully as though it were the most luxuriously padded resting-place.

The room was very still, but Chris was not asleep. He was lying on the rug, gazing thoughtfully at the glowing embers, his chin propped up in his hands. He was rather an imaginative child, but at this moment his thoughts were very practical. "It's getting very cold," he muttered to himself, "and mother was coughing before she went to sleep."

He waited for a minute or two, and then got up cautiously. Mrs. Winton stirred uneasily, but she did not wake, and Chris stooped over the coal-scuttle to see what he could find. There were only a few small pieces of coal at the bottom, and he scraped them up carefully with his hands and put them on the fire, which gave out a grateful little blaze.

The clock of the neighbouring church struck five as he finished his task, and a new idea darted into his mind. "I'll get the tea," he thought; "and then mother can have it as soon as she wakes up."

He looked at his hands in the firelight, and, seeing that they were covered with coal-dust, he rubbed them carefully on his little black stockings, and then stole on tip-toe to the sideboard where the tea-things were kept. He soon found the cloth, and shaking out its folds, succeeded in spreading it on the table, after which he went softly backwards and forwards, carrying each cup and plate separately, for fear of making a noise.

When all was done, he went to the door, and tried to turn the handle quietly that he might go and fetch the kettle from the kitchen, but it slipped back with a click, and Mrs. Winton opened her eyes. "Is that you, Chris?" she asked.

At the first sound of her voice Chris darted towards her, and, jumping on her knee, covered her face with kisses. "I didn't mean to wake you," he said, "but it's struck five, and I've been getting tea."

"You good little boy!" said his mother, stroking his head with her hand. "Now I will light the candle, and then we will make the kettle boil."

She got up as she spoke and struck a match, and as she did so she saw that her hands were quite black. "Why, Chris!" she said, looking at him, "this must have come off your hands. What have you been doing?"

Chris held up his little fists penitently. "I only put some coals on with them, 'cos I thought I should wake you," he said; "but I really thought I had rubbed them quite clean on my stockings, mother—really and indeed!"

Mrs. Winton could not help laughing. "And who do you think is going to wash your stockings for you?" she asked.

"Me," said Chris stoutly.

"I don't think you can quite wash stockings," said his mother, "though I must say that you can do a great many things very nicely. But now I am going to fill the kettle, and you shall carry it in for me."

Chris's father had been dead about three years, but though the little boy could not remember much about him, there was one thing that he had never forgotten. He had been brought up and put upon the bed on the day that his father died, and the sick man had looked with loving eyes on the sturdy little frame and clustering brown curls.

"Chris," he said faintly, "I am going away; but I shall see you again some day, and till then you must take care of mother for me." And Chris had kissed the pale face with his warm rosy lips, and though he could not understand it all, he remembered one thing—that he must always take care of mother.

Mrs. Winton had had many troubles to bear since that day. Poverty and ill-health had worn her down, and she had had to leave her pleasant house for a little four-roomed cottage, but through it all she had had one great consolation: and that was the love of her boy. The little town in which she had settled was a very quiet one, and living in the humble way that she did, she expected to make no acquaintances; but through the kindness of Mr. Milman, the vicar of the parish, she was brought into contact with several people who became real friends.

Chris was eight years old now, and liked to consider himself as the man of the house. He always locked up the house himself after it got dark, and strongly resented being sent to bed while his mother was still sitting up. Just as he was going up on the evening in question, however, a loud ring came at the bell, and he darted back to the parlour.

"There, mother!" he cried, "I'll have to wait now to answer the door;" and before she could reply he had run out into the passage again.

"Who was it?" she asked, when he came back.

"I think it was Mr. Grant," said Chris; "but he gave me this letter, and went away in such a hurry I could hardly see."

Mrs. Winton sat some time with the unopened letter in her hand after the little boy had finally disappeared. She was not in much doubt as to its contents, and she wanted to think a little before she opened it. Mr. Grant was the vicar's brother-in-law, a rich man, who owned a place called Courthope, a few miles off. He had remained a bachelor so long that people were tired of prophesying his marriage, but as soon as he saw Mrs. Winton he knew that his time was come. He was some years older than she was, but his natural buoyancy of manner made him seem almost younger, and she often wondered what it was that attracted him to her. Much as she liked him, she was not at all sure what her answer would be. She had a strong dislike to the gossip and chatter that would be inevitable in the place; and more than this, she did not feel at all certain what Mrs. Milman would think; and she had received so much kindness from her, that she shrank from the thought of causing her any vexation. But there was another reason that influenced her more strongly still. She felt convinced that Chris would set himself against the marriage with all the force of his childish nature, and she did not know how to inflict such a wound upon him. Yet, after all, might it not be the best thing for him? She understood Richard Grant well enough to know that he would care for the boy as though he were his own, and he could give him advantages that would always be beyond her power to bestow.

She sighed as she opened the envelope at last, but the sigh was succeeded by a smile. It was not possible to read that tender outpouring of love without being touched by it, and as she read, her doubts and fears vanished away. The words seemed to bear the impress of the honest heart from which they came; he loved her, she knew, as a man only loves once in his life.

"I should have come to you," he wrote, "to have your answer from your own lips, but I am unexpectedly called away. Write to me at once to the enclosed address, and if I may come to you, I will be with you as soon as possible."

Mrs. Winton looked at the clock; it was already nearly post time. Three words would suffice, and she did not hesitate long; fetching paper and ink, she wrote her brief note, and hastened out to post it. The pillar-box was close to her house, and she was only absent a minute. At present she hardly realised what she had done, but when she came back, and had taken off her shawl, she stole up to Chris's room. He was lying quietly, his cheeks flushed with sleep, and his curly hair tumbled on the pillow. She knelt down by the bed, and put her arm gently over him.

"Oh my boy, my little boy!" she murmured, half-aloud, "it is the best thing for you, indeed it is!"

The child stirred, lifted his heavy lids, and put up his face to kiss her; she waited till he was quiet again, and then crept out of the room, and Chris slept that night with his mother's warm tears lying on his cheek.

CHAPTER II.

THE next day passed like a dream to Mrs. Winton, but on the following morning a letter came for her from Mr. Grant, to say that he should be at the vicarage in the evening, and that he would fetch her to tea by his sister's request. It was evident, then, that the vicar and his wife knew all that was going on; and soon after breakfast Mrs. Milman herself arrived, and an hour's talk with her convinced Mrs. Winton that she need have no fears about her reception.

But there was still something before her that she dreaded. Chris was to go with her to the vicarage, and she was determined that he should not meet his future father-in-law until he knew all about it. But though she had made up her mind to tell him, it was not an easy thing to do, and she felt strangely nervous when he came running in at dinner-time from his play. Chris himself made an opportunity for her, however.

"I've been looking in the coal-shed, mother," he said, when they had nearly finished dinner, "and there isn't hardly any coal left in it."

"Isn't there, dear?" said Mrs. Winton, rather abstractedly. "Well, we must order some more, then."

"But you said yesterday that we couldn't afford to have any more coal till next quarter," said Chris; "and it won't be next quarter for five, six, no, seven weeks!"

Mrs. Winton hesitated a moment, but the opportunity was too good to be lost. "I have something to tell you, Chris," she said: "something that will be a great surprise to you. I think the time will soon come when we shall not have to be so very careful as we are now."

"But, mother, that's just what I told you yesterday!" exclaimed the boy. "I told you I should soon be big enough to take care of you, and earn lots of money, and you only laughed at me!"

The last words were uttered rather unsteadily, and Mrs. Winton held out her arms to him. "You must forgive me if I made you unhappy," she said, folding him close to her heart; "but you know, Chris, you are only a very little boy yet, and it will be a long time before you can earn money for me. And so, dear, you must try and listen to what I want to tell you. Mr. Grant has asked if he may take care of you and me, and I have told him yes."

Her voice had been getting lower and lower, and now she stopped altogether. "I don't quite understand," said Chris, in a doubtful voice.

Mrs. Winton did not find her task of explanation a very easy one; however, she began again. "I mean, dear, that I am going to marry Mr. Grant, and we shall live with him, and he will always take care of us; and you must try to love him, Chris, because I do."

Chris stood upright, a sturdy little figure, with his small hands clasped behind him and his eyes glowing with excitement. "But, mother," he cried, in his clear childish voice, "what would father say?"

Mrs. Winton started, then leaning forward, she tried to draw the child back to his old resting place. "Father has gone to be in heaven," she said; "but I know that if he could speak to me now, he would say that I was doing right, because when he left us his greatest trouble was to think that there would be no one to take care of me any more."

Chris did not respond to the gentle pressure of her arm. He stood stiffly before her, the gleam in his

"Yes, I do," said Chris: "I understand it every bit; but, but——" His voice faltered, and big tears stood in his eyes.

"Don't cry, dear, please don't," said his mother,

"What would father say?"—p. 222.

eyes fading into a look of displeasure. "Father told me to take care of you," he said. "I've remembered it lots and lots of times, and you always said I was your little comforter."

"So you are, darling," said Mrs. Winton, "and so you always will be. But you must trust me that I am doing what is right now, though perhaps you cannot quite understand it."

kissing the cheek that felt cold now to her touch. "I shall love you just the same, you know."

Chris gave her a grave little kiss in return. "I know you will," he said. "It is you who don't understand, mother."

Perhaps Mrs. Winton did not understand him altogether, but she knew him well enough to guess at a great deal that was passing in his mind. Chris was unchildlike, because for a considerable time out of his short life he had had a definite purpose in view. His mother had been his whole world, and he had learnt to look upon himself as her protector, so that now to learn that a new-comer was to fill his treasured place seemed like an earthquake in his life. He was right in saying that he could quite understand what was going to happen, but he could not understand how his mother could do it. It was the first time that he had ever had a doubt about anything that she said or did, and it filled him with a keen sense of pain.

He was almost glad when Mrs. Winton got up from her chair at last, and said that they must clear away the dinner-things. "Would you like to go and play with Harry Wilson?" she said, when they had finished.

"No, thank you," said Chris soberly. "I am going to put the wood away in the coal-shed: the man brought it this morning."

"Very well," said his mother; "only be sure that you come in at four o'clock, because we are to go to the vicarage to tea, and I want you to put on your best suit."

She was glad that he had something to occupy him, especially as she knew that this was a task of which he was very fond. He enjoyed running backwards and forwards with the wood, and piling it up in the shed; but to-day he worked very quietly, and if his mother had seen him she would have known that he was unhappy.

He did not take long in finishing, but instead of going indoors again, he sat down in the shed, and gave himself up to his thoughts. He could not see the front gate, and he had no idea that anyone had come in while he was sitting there; but when four o'clock struck and he went back to the house, he heard voices through the closed door of the sitting-room, and guessed at once who was there.

His heart seemed to get up into his throat and choke him. Somehow, he had not expected this, and it seemed more than he could bear; he could not believe that his mother did not always want him, yet some strange feeling prevented him from going to her now. But Mrs. Winton had caught the sound of his step outside, and, engrossed as she was in her conversation, she rose at once to open the door. "Come in, dear," she said. "Come and speak to Mr. Grant."

Chris straightened himself with an effort, and though his breath came rather more quickly than usual, he made no other sign of his agitation. His mother tried to take his hand in hers, but the little fingers slipped from her grasp, and he walked into the room, holding himself very erect.

"Well, Chris, how are you?" said Mr. Grant pleasantly; he was not particularly anxious for the boy's presence at that moment, but he was a thoroughly good-natured man, and he felt very kindly towards his future little stepson.

"I am very well, thank you," was the grave answer. "But my name is Christopher."

"Well, my name is Richard, but a good many people call me Dick," said Mr. Grant, with a smile.

Chris did not smile in response. Mr. Grant was leaning in an easy attitude against the mantel-piece, and the boy stood in front of him, with an expression of solemn earnestness upon his face. Mr. Grant was tall and well-built, and there was a brightness in his eyes that made his face very attractive. Just now he was looking his best, for he was feeling happier than he had ever done in his life before; whereas Christopher's childish brow was clouded with a heavy weight of thought and care.

Mrs. Winton stood by, looking at the two whom she loved with rather an anxious feeling. "I think you had better go and get ready now, Chris," she said. "Mr. Grant has come to take us to the vicarage, and it will soon be time to start."

She was rather afraid that he would make some inconvenient reply, but he said nothing, and went quietly out of the room.

All through the evening he kept up the same polite gravity, though it was evident that many thoughts were at work in his brain. Richard Grant was full of joyous fun; he talked and laughed, and seemed fairly bubbling over with happiness, and, to the boy's surprise, his mother, who was usually so quiet and sad, entered fully into it all. He thought it a great pity that she should be amused by such nonsense, and he was very glad when it was time to go home.

After he was safe in his own little room he fetched a chair, and kneeling upon it, looked steadfastly at the portrait that stood upon the table. It showed the face of a dark-bearded man, grave and sad-looking, with hollow eyes and thin cheeks, but with an expression of thought triumphing over the evident ill-health.

Chris gazed at it for a long while, and that a comparison was going on in his mind was clear from the remark that he made as he got down at last from his chair. "Mr. Grant isn't a man at all!" he said; "he's only a great big boy!"

He laid his cheek fondly against the picture for a minute, and then, with a resolute air, turned away, and made haste to get into bed before his mother should come to say good-night.

CHAPTER III.

It was a brilliant summer afternoon when Mr. Milman, with Chris by her side, drove up the long avenue that led to Mr. Grant's house.

The wedding was over, and while Mr. and Mrs. Grant were away the little boy had been staying at the vicarage. He had been looking forward to the day when he should see his mother again, but now that it had actually come there was a painful feeling in his mind that he could not express. This strange big place, with its gardens and stables and its many servants, could not seem like home to him. Home was the dear little four-roomed cottage, with its familiar shabby furniture, where there had been no one to come between his mother and himself.

He had never been to Courthope before, and the old butler looked curiously at him as they drove up to the door. The servants were mostly staid and elderly people, who had been with Mr. Grant's father before him, and they dreaded the arrival of a small boy in their midst: "which is all the same, tiresome little scaramouches!" as the butler remarked to the housekeeper when she asked for his opinion.

But Chris did not look like a "tiresome little scaramouch" at all as he alighted quietly from the pony-carriage, and stood waiting till Mrs. Milman was ready to go indoors. His face was sober, and he stood quite still, without any of the restless little movements that Benson and Mrs. Hartley so much disliked to see in children.

"Quite the gentleman!" said the butler to himself, as he saw Chris rub his boots upon the door-mat and take off his hat as he entered the hall.

Chris, for his part, looked at the butler in wonder; he had never seen anyone like him before, and he could not think who this elderly gentleman was who seemed to be so much at home in the house. He did not ask any questions, however, but listened in silence while Mrs. Milman heard all about the preparations, and in a few minutes a sound was heard that put all other thoughts out of his head. Wheels were coming up the drive, and a general bustle in the house showed that the long-looked-for arrival was at hand.

"Come, Chris," said Mrs. Milman, "we must go out on the steps to welcome them."

She hurried out, and Chris followed more slowly behind; he would not have minded meeting them if he had been alone, but when he saw the group of people that stood in the hall his heart failed him altogether. He followed her slowly towards the door, till suddenly he stopped aghast. Was that his mother? Ever since he could remember she had been dressed in black, except on the wedding-day, when he had been too confused to notice what she wore. Could it really be his mother in that light-coloured dress, with her hair no longer strained back under a cap, but waving about her forehead? She seemed changed altogether, and with a feeling that the world could never be the same again, Chris slipped away through the surrounding servants, and fled—he knew not where. When he stopped at last, he found himself in a little room that opened out of a long passage. It was prettily furnished, and the windows looked on a garden, gay with summer flowers. He paused for breath, and then, with a sudden cry, threw himself down on the sofa, and broke into a passion of sobs. It was as much excitement as grief that had so unnerved him, and by degrees he became quieter, his sobs grew less, and the tears ceased to trickle down his cheeks.

It was not long, however, before a sound of approaching footsteps made him start to his feet, and look round hurriedly for some hiding-place. But as he stood uncertainly in the middle of the room, the door opened, and his mother came in.

"Mother!" he cried, and then stopped, for the tears were flowing fast again.

"My little Chris!" said Mrs. Grant, taking him in her arms; and not another word was spoken for some time, for she would not ask any questions.

"How do you like my little room?" she said at last.

Chris loosened his arms from about her, and sat up on the sofa. "Is this your sitting-room?" he asked.

"Yes, it has all been newly furnished for me; your father wanted me to have a larger one, but this little room opens into his library, and I like best to be near him."

She spoke with a fond accent in her voice that showed what a love and confidence had already sprung up between them. Chris looked at her with his great eyes, and read the thoughts that she left unspoken, but he made no remark.

"Would you like to come and see your room now?" said his mother, after a little silence.

"Yes, please," said Chris, in a low tone.

They had hardly left the room when a hasty step made them turn, and they saw Mr. Grant coming from the library. "There you are, my boy!" he cried. "We could not think what had become of you. Where were you hiding, eh?"

Chris made no answer, and his mother hastily interposed.

"We are just going up to see his room, Richard," she said. "Will you come too?"

Chris gave her hand a little pull; he had no wish to go and see his new domain if his step-father was coming with him; but his mother took no notice, and went on talking cheerfully as they mounted the staircase.

"This is your room," said Mr. Grant, opening a door as he spoke.

"Chris was not accustomed to have his word doubted."—p. 226.

It was a pretty little room, simply furnished, but with everything in it that a child could possibly want. Chris said very little, however, and Mr. Grant felt somewhat disappointed. "What a silent little fellow he is!" he said to his wife when they were alone.

"Do you think so?" said Mrs. Grant, rather anxiously. "He generally finds plenty to say."

"Oh! I daresay he is rather shy with me at present," said Mr. Grant good-naturedly; "it will wear off all in good time."

But Chris was not a child who found it easy to accommodate himself to new surroundings, and there were difficulties ahead that his mother had not foreseen. The life to which he had been accustomed was so different from that in which he now found himself, that he had hard work to learn the new ways.

He was awake as soon as it was light the next morning, and lay wondering what he should do with himself till breakfast-time. If he had been "at home," as he still called the cottage, he would have gone down-stairs to help his mother, but he had been told that he must not get up till he was called, and the time seemed very long.

The breakfast-room looked bright and pleasant when the bell sounded at last, and his mother was there to greet him, but the meal seemed very formal after their cosy little breakfasts together. Mr. Grant read his letters, and turned continually to his wife with questions and bits of news. Chris had a thousand things to say, but he could not utter them before a third person, so he sat silent.

As soon as the meal was over, Mr. Grant asked his wife to come into the library. "I will not keep you long," he said; "but there are several things that I must speak to you about."

"I will come back soon, dear," said Mrs. Grant, laying her hand on her little boy's head as she passed.

Chris looked after them as they went away together with a feeling that life was very hard. He tried not to give way to it, however, and looked to see what he could find to occupy himself. He had always been used to clear the breakfast-things, and he thought that he might as well do so now. The plates seemed to be heavier and more slippery than those he had been used to, but he managed to make them into a pile, and collected all the knives and forks. He was so busy that he did not hear the door open, nor see the footman's start of surprise as he caught sight of the little figure.

The man stood still for a minute, uncertain what to do, but Benson, who was passing, rushed in with dismay written on every feature.

"Goodness' sake! Master Christopher, what are you doing with them plates?" he cried.

Chris turned round in alarm, and as he did so his foot caught in the table-cloth, and he went down on the floor, drawing plates, cups, and dishes after him in one general crash!

There was a shriek from the onlookers, who for a moment were too paralysed with fright to do anything, but in another instant they were down on their knees by the side of the heap of broken crockery.

Chris lay perfectly still under the ruins, and the footman declared that he must be dead, but when they had at last set him free, the child sat up, apparently none the worse. Benson heaved a sigh of relief, but as his anxiety lessened his displeasure increased, and he looked at the little culprit with an air of dignified rebuke.

"What were you touching the table for?" he asked. "Don't you know it's bad manners to go taking things after the company have gone?"

"I wasn't taking things!" exclaimed Chris.

"What were you doing, then?" asked Benson.

"I was only clearing away. I always did it at home."

"That's not a very likely story!" said Benson gravely.

Chris was not accustomed to have his word doubted, and it wounded him to the quick. He was too proud to cry, but his heart swelled within him, and he would have given an indignant answer had not Mr. Grant appeared at that moment.

"Hallo! what's all this?" he asked.

"I don't exactly know," said Benson, "but it's some mischief of Master Christopher's."

Mr. Grant felt more vexed that there should have been a disturbance between the child and the servant than at the loss of his china. "Well, well," he said, "accidents will happen; but another time don't play so near the breakfast-table, little man."

"I wasn't playing!" burst out Chris; but Mr. Grant had gone, and his exclamation was unheard.

It seemed very hard to him to be so misjudged, but Benson did not see it in the same light. "You shouldn't speak so to the master," he said. "Many gentlemen wouldn't have been so kind, I can tell you!"

Chris saw the justice of this remark. "I'm very sorry," he said penitently. "How long do you think it will take me to save up my pocket-money to buy him some new china?"

The butler smiled rather contemptuously. "Longer than you can count!" he said. "Besides, it's not the worth of the china; we don't think much about that."

Chris stared at him, hardly believing that he heard aright. The only explanation of such a remark must be that Benson had no experience of life at all, and it would therefore be an act of kindness to enlighten him. "Perhaps you don't know how much things cost," he said; "but when you are married and have got a house of your own, you'll know how hard it is to pay bills."

Benson looked at him in utter amazement. "I think you had better go away, sir, while we arrange the room," he said at last.

"He's a rum one!" said the footman as soon as the door was shut; but Benson could only shake his head in mournful silence.

CHAPTER IV.

ALTHOUGH Mrs. Grant did all in her power to prevent Chris from feeling the change in his life, it was not possible for her to be with him as much as she had been in the past. Mr. Grant was always willing that the little boy should be with them, but still he had a good deal of loneliness to endure.

Chris did not so much mind being alone sometimes, for he had endless ways of passing his time, but what he did feel was that his mother no longer seemed to want his help. He liked to show his love by doing things for her, and now there seemed to be nothing that he could do. Mr. Grant was always taking care of her, and if he ever left anything undone there was a servant at hand to do it. Chris chafed sorely against this new order of things, but he was powerless to alter it.

Several weeks had already passed since Mr. and Mrs. Grant's return home, when some visitors arrived rather unexpectedly. Mr. Lyddon was an uncle of Mr. Grant's—rather a pompous old man, whom Chris took a dislike to at first sight; but his wife was still more trying, for she wanted to know everything, and asked incessant questions.

Their coming seemed to erect another barrier between Chris and his mother, for she was necessarily much taken up with entertaining them. Mr. Grant took the opportunity of inviting a good many people to the house, and there was much coming and going.

There was to be a large garden-party one afternoon, and Chris would have enjoyed helping in the preparations if he had been allowed to do so; but he knew that he should only receive a severe reprimand from Benson if he dared to interfere. He was rather unhappy all day, and when the afternoon came he wandered about in his new white suit, feeling very miserable. He was a shy child, and it was agony to him to be talked to by strangers. He stood half-hidden by the shrubs, watching his mother as she received her visitors on the lawn; she looked so utterly different from the mother of old days, that he could hardly bear to look at her. It was all fancy on his part; Mrs. Grant had changed in nothing but the outward circumstances of her life; in heart she was just the same; and if he could only have known it, she was wishing for her little boy at that very moment.

But Chris did not know this, and at last he felt that he could not stay there any longer, so creeping round the shrubs, he slipped into the house, and ran up-stairs.

He thought that he would go and lock himself into his own room, but as he passed his mother's room he saw that the door stood open, and he paused and looked in. The room was full of pretty things, but Chris did not look at any of them; just inside the door stood a pair of her boots, and flinging himself down on the floor, Chris laid his head upon them, and burst into tears.

"I do love her, I do!" he said again and again, with a defiant ring in his voice.

After a time he sat up, with the boots jealously clasped in his arms, and looked about him with a new idea in his mind. In days past he had often cleaned his mother's boots for her; he would do it now while there was no one to hinder him.

He looked cautiously up and down the passage before he ventured out with his prize; there was no one to be seen, however, and he was soon safe in the outhouse where he had often seen the man doing the boots and shoes. There was a delightful variety of blacking-bottles and brushes, and he soon forgot all about his trouble in the interest of his task. He poured on a plentiful supply of blacking, and then applied himself diligently to the brush. He was some time before he was satisfied with his work, but when he stopped at last he was seized with a sudden dismay. His white suit was covered with blacking, and when he tried to rub it off, his dirty little hands made matters worse at every moment.

What was to be done? If any of the servants should see him, he knew that he should get into dreadful trouble; so tucking the boots under his arm, he slipped round to a path that led to a side door, hoping to get in unobserved.

Just as he reached it, however, the door opened, and Mrs. Lyddon appeared on the steps, bringing some fresh visitors into the garden. Chris turned to flee, but he was too late; she laid a detaining hand upon his shoulder, and addressed him in her most cutting tones. "Go into the house at once, you disgraceful child!" she said, "and don't dare to appear again."

"Poor little fellow!" said one of the ladies kindly; "he has fallen down and soiled his clean suit.—Have you hurt yourself, dear?" she added, turning to the child.

Chris looked up at her eagerly, but before he could speak Mrs. Lyddon broke in again.

"Please don't encourage him, Lady Fotheringham," she said. "My nephew has trouble enough with him, as it is. In fact, he said the other day that he could not bear it much longer, and I really think—"

The last words were lost as the ladies moved on, and Chris was left standing in the middle of the path, his face crimson with passion.

"I wish you would send Christopher to school," said Mrs. Lyddon to her nephew, when all the guests were gone.

"I don't want to send the child away," said Mr. Grant rather shortly, for he was not fond of his aunt's interference.

"Indeed!" said Mrs. Lyddon. "I thought you told me the other day that you could not get on with him at all?"

Mr. Grant had already repented having said anything about the boy. He liked children, and Christopher's presence in the house would have been an additional pleasure to him if only he had been more responsive. He did not realise how much Chris felt the sudden change in his life, and he thought that the big house and garden, with all their many interests, must be a continual source of delight to him. Even Mrs. Grant perhaps hardly understood it; she had had so much to occupy her since her marriage, that, though her love for her boy was not in any way diminished, she had not been able to give him so much of her attention. She wanted him to love his kind stepfather, and he had several times grieved her by his strange silent ways with him. They had always been so perfectly agreed that she could not understand that Chris looked at him from a different point of view from her own.

The little boy had seen so much of the stern realities of life, that Mr. Grant's light-heartedness was a constant enigma to him. Still, he had had a secret liking for him, but Mrs. Lyddon's unkind words had scattered it to the winds. His stepfather had said he could not bear him much longer. Very well, he would take him at his word.

As soon as it was light next morning, Chris stole out of bed and put on his oldest suit; he took the biscuits out of a tin that stood on his table, and put them into his little knapsack. When he had finished his preparations he opened the door cautiously and crept out, and slipping down-stairs, he unbolted the side door and ran out into the garden. He had quite settled on his plan of action. The river ran through the grounds, and there was a boat-house on the banks. Chris thought that he would get into a boat, and go down the river till he came to some town, and there he would find work to do, and earn his living, and never let anyone know where he was, and when he was a man he would come back and see his mother again.

It was a true child's plan, full of dangers and impossibilities that he could not foresee, but he was determined to carry it out at all costs, and he soon reached the river, and managed to scramble into one of the boats. It was some time before he could unfasten the rope, but at last he succeeded, and was carried into the middle of the stream. He was a little frightened when he felt how quickly the boat slipped down through the water, but he was too triumphant to feel much fear. He had not been on the water more than a few minutes, however, when he saw something that made his heart beat violently. It was the figure of a man standing on the bank with a fishing-rod in his hand, and to his dismay Chris recognised his stepfather. Hardly knowing what he did, he sprang to his feet; his sudden movement overbalanced the boat, and in another moment he was struggling in the water.

What happened next he never exactly knew, but when he recovered himself again he was lying on the bank, and Mr. Grant was nowhere to be seen. He shrieked aloud in terror, but almost before the cry had left his lips footsteps were heard, and two of the gardeners who had seen the whole thing as they went to their work rushed down to the water's edge. Chris was past speaking by this time, but there was no need of explanations, for a white face suddenly appeared in the water, and Mr. Grant rose close to the bank. The men clutched him by the coat, and dragged him up on the grass, then pulling up one of the hurdles, they laid him upon it, and carried him towards the house; while Chris followed them, a dismal figure, with the water trickling from his hair and clothes.

The whole house was soon alarmed; Mr. Grant was carried up to his room, and a man sent tearing off on horseback for the doctor. No one took any notice of Chris, who was cowering in a corner near the bedroom door, but presently Mrs. Lyddon came out and saw him.

Chris had intended never to speak to her again, but he could not restrain himself now. "Where is mother?" he said. "Oh! can I see mother?"

"No," said Mrs. Lyddon coldly. She had just heard the gardeners' account of the accident, and was more angry with Chris than she could express. "You have killed Mr. Grant with your mischief, so you had better go to your room, and keep there."

The boy's face turned quite white, but he made no answer. As soon as she was gone he crept down-stairs and went out into the garden. He had killed his stepfather; no one would ever wish to see him any more.

He dared not go near the river again, it made him feel sick and cold; so keeping out of sight of the water, he ran into the woods that skirted the park, and threw himself down on the grounds. It was a bright and sunny morning, and as his shivering little frame became gradually warmed by the sunshine he grew more and more drowsy, and at last dropped off to sleep.

He must have slept a long time, for when he woke again the sun was getting low, and he was terribly hungry. He never thought of going back to the house, however; the biscuits he carried were very wet, but they were eatable, and getting up slowly, he set off to look for some place where he could spend the night. He had not gone far when he came upon a rough shelter that had been put up by the game-keepers. It was only a few hurdles tied together and thatched with bracken, but there was a heap of the dried fern inside it, and he lay down thankfully, intending to start on his travels as soon as morning dawned.

But when morning came at last, he found that there was no hope of his walking. The wetting and the fright had taken too much effect upon him, and when he tried to rise he fell back again, sick and dizzy.

And now a new terror seized upon him. What if he should never be found? "Oh, mother, mother!" he sobbed; but no one heard him, and he cried until he was too tired to cry any more.

And now the thought of his wrong-doing came to add to his troubles. All his stepfather's kind words and deeds came back to him, and for the first time he saw with what jealousy and sullenness he had repaid them. He only wished that he could have a chance of showing his penitence, but there was no hope of that. Mr. Grant was dead: he had laid down his life for his ungrateful little stepson.

The long day wore away slowly, and at last Chris became too faint to sit up any longer; he lay back in a corner of the shelter, with closed eyes, and gradually lost all sense of outward things. He did not hear steps come rustling through the brushwood, nor see a tall figure appear at the entrance of the little hut; but when some one knelt down by his side, and touched him, he sprang up with a wild scream.

"Go away! oh, go away! You are dead!" he cried, as he saw Mr. Grant's face bending over him.

"Hush, hush, dear!" said his stepfather tenderly; and putting his arm under the child, he lifted him up and gave him something from his flask.

Chris lay looking at him with a terrified expression, but he did not try any longer to push him away. "They said I had killed you," he whispered at last.

"Who said so?" exclaimed Mr. Grant.

"Mrs. Lyddon. She said—" But the remembrance was too much for him, and the child began to tremble.

"Never mind," said Mr. Grant gently; "you shall tell me another time. It was only cramp that made me sink, and I was soon all right again. But oh, Chris! you have made us so unhappy by running away."

"Did it make you unhappy?" said Chris in amazement. "I thought you would have been glad to get rid of me."

Mr. Grant took him up in his arms, and held him closely while he kissed the little pale face.

"Never think so again, Chris," he said, in a low tone.

Chris made no answer, but he put both his arms round his stepfather's neck, while the tears trickled down his cheeks.

"Now I am going to carry you home," said Mr. Grant. "I have been looking for you all day, and so have the men; but I am very glad that it was I who found you, because I wanted to give your mother back her little boy myself."

"I thought God was going to make me die to punish me for being so naughty," said Chris, as he laid his head against the strong arm that carried him so tenderly; "but now I'm going to love you all I can to show you how sorry I am."

And though many years have passed since that day, Chris has kept his word.

SOME UNFASHIONABLE SLUMS.

BY F. M. HOLMES.

(Illustrated by Drawings from Life.)

FIRST PAPER.

SUSPICIOUS OF STRANGERS.

"WELL, and what does your father do?"

"Coachman."

"Where?"

"Oh, he washes 'em now."

"Washes them, does he? What, the coaches?"

"He's on a keb job now."

"Ah! I see; cab-washer, eh?"

"Yes."

And the little wriggling, bright-eyed boy curls up his knees under his body, as he lounges on the pavement, and grins, not unpleasantly; and the other children grouped around grin also.

He is blowing soap-bubbles out of a dirty little stump of a pipe, and from water that seems very poor in lather. The water is like his face; it lacks soap. Indeed, the group all lack soap. You never saw a grubbier set in your life.

"Now blow a big bubble—as big as you can."

Stimulated by the promise of reward, the fidgety little mortal applies himself to the congenial task with much energy.

"Oh, that is a poor little thing; let me see a bigger one."

He tries again, but does not succeed much better. Even the soap-bubbles in the slums are small and poor, though iridescent hues glitter on their sides in the squalid street, as in wealthier districts.

"You go to the Board school?"

"Christ Church; he goes to the Board school," pointing to a little fellow, who, with no hat on his head and very closely cropped hair, is also playing on the pavement.

Ay, there we have it! The Board school is letting in some light and air into the slums through the children, and has become, to some extent at least, a part and parcel of their life. It does not give them food and clothes, however, and here is a girl, not far off, who rejoices in a towel wound lengthwise round her limbs as a skirt, beneath which her naked feet show clearly.

The swarms of dirty, ill-clad children; the numbers of unwashed women, sitting mostly at their doors; the dirty, squalid, mean-looking houses, which have every appearance of being let off in separate rooms to different families—all betoken the London slum.

Yet not very far off we should find ourselves amid the glories of the West End, and much nearer we should find a block of those model dwellings which are springing up in so many parts of London, and, together with the Board schools and certain new thoroughfares, are transforming the face of many districts of the great city.

And there may be advantages in these Lisson Grove slums, not perhaps quite appreciated at first by the uninitiated.

"Ye see this 'ere passage," one of the women might explain to you, "wot a 'igh wai'scot it's got? Well, that perwents Mrs. Shuckers from knockin' down the plaster when she comes 'ome drunk! And there's so many families a-livin' in this 'ouse that there's pipples constant goin' in and out, and the wall-paper and the plaster would soon get rubbed off, for they gives sich narrow doorways and sich bad plaster in pore neighbour-hoods."

You agree with your informant that a woodwork wainscot, if sound, is better than broken plaster; but suggest that it would be better still if washed.

"And who is goin' to wash it, I should like to know? I know I ain't, with my hands full o' bybies; and Mrs. Shuckers, she won't, for she's allers drunk; and Mrs. Rubbins, she can't, for she's at a lawndry, and got enuff to do washin' for other pipples. It's the landlord's bizness, that's whose it is. My 'usbin pays for our room, and that's all I've got to look after."

Like the proverbial lady's letter, the point is in the postscript. It is nobody's business to look after the passage of a house let off in tenements to different families, and it suffers in consequence.

"That is why we likes to stand or sit at the doorways; we can't be pinned up in one or two little rooms all day."

There can be no doubt of this "liking"; for go when you will into a London slum—North, South, East, or West—should the weather be at all suitable, you will see numbers of women clustered at the doorways, or standing about the thoroughfares, talking together, as in Suffolk Street or Manning Place, Lisson Grove, or in St. Giles's, or any of the numerous slums north or south of the river.

For there are many slums in London that are not in the East End or in the purlieus of Drury Lane. There are slums, little known to the public, sprinkled more or less all over the area of the metropolis. In the West End or North-West they are sandwiched between better and well-to-do thoroughfares; and the dwellers in these may know nothing of their poorer and, it must sometimes be added, vicious neighbours.

It is fashionable to regard the East End as the chosen abode of dire poverty and of crime; but there are unfashionable slums, blackening like plague-spots almost every district of London.

There have been growing up, in some of the nearer suburbs or outlying districts, slums as bad as or worse than in the East End. The term East End seems to have passed into a proverbial expression for poverty-stricken and wretched neighbourhoods; but, as a matter of fact, in Mr. Charles Booth's statistics of London poverty, there are three worse districts than the East End. They are—a space between Blackfriars and London Bridges, on the south side, where the poverty is returned at 68 per cent., and which is regarded as the poorest in the whole of London; secondly, a district at Greenwich, where there is 65 per cent. of poverty; thirdly, a district in the neighbourhood of the Goswell Road, Clerkenwell, where the poverty is 61 per cent.; while a part of Bethnal Green, in East London, comes fourth with 59 per cent.

Certain streets in Kentish Town, under the very shadow of the pleasant hills of Hampstead and of Highgate, are about as bad slums as anyone would care to see. In some respects they are typical of what may be called the "unfashionable slums." Their size is not large, compared with tracts of poor neighbourhoods existing elsewhere. They have to be sought out. In the East End the larger areas of poor-looking dwellings—though not necessarily very bad slums—combined with the traditions of the place, strike the popular imagination. In the West End the smaller separate areas of Slumdom are comparatively lost and unknown amid the pleasantness and the splendour of the surroundings.

"What sort o' people live there?" said a policeman, referring to the Lisson Grove slums, not far from the west side of Regent's Park; "well, I shouldn't like to give an opinion. Some of 'em, no doubt, are hard-workin' folk. Yes, it's pretty rough o' Saturday night, when the wimmin 'ave been drinkin' too much sherbet!"

Sober-headed as he is and looks, he is not without his trace of humour, you see—albeit of a somewhat elephantine kind.

Charles Dickens would hardly know this neighbourhood now. Monmouth Street and its old clothes have disappeared before the march of new streets, but here is some of Monmouth Street's business still lingering in Lumber Court.

"OLD MIKE": SUFFOLK PLACE, LISSON GROVE.

No thoroughfare in London is more appropriately named, for the court is filled with old clothes and dilapidated furniture, and bits of old rusty iron, and locks and keys, and lumber of various kinds.

"There—they all went down wollop!" exclaims the stalwart mistress of one of these establishments, bending her head and upraised hands to mark time with her words.

The "they" is a very heterogeneous collection of keys and pieces of iron outspread before her.

"There—wun't that do?"

"That" would not do; it would not fit the lock for which a young man was assiduously endeavouring to find a key, and with the utmost perseverance he picked out one after another in his longsome search.

You can imagine him a bold robber if you like, trying to find a duplicate key to a precious chest; but, as a matter of fact, he appears far more likely to be a little jobbing carpenter, or an expectant bridegroom trying to furbish up the lock of an old box.

"That 'll do!" he exclaims at last, as he twists the key in the lock, and finds that it answers fairly well.

"Ah, so it will!" says the lady president of the rusty iron, as though she had contributed largely to the desired result.

Perhaps the talk about the "wollup" did so in some mysterious fashion.

We can imagine that many brides and bridegrooms of the slums come to Lumber Court to furnish.

"Wot, me rorty pal! goin' to git mirried?"

The "rorty pal" is loitering down the court with his sweetheart, who is probably arrayed in a fearful and wonderful hat of dazzling red hue, with an equally wonderful feather of vivid blue curling over it, while underneath dangle a very brassy-looking pair of ear-rings.

She grins, as the "rorty pal" answers—

"Ay, ay; we're jest gettin' a few bits o' sticks.—I say, missus, what d'ye want for that lot?"—pointing to a very old table which looked as though it had lived a troubled life.

"That!" exclaims another lady president of lumber—"that! Ah, that's a good 'un, that is! Now you 'ave got one there!—one o' the best little tylet-tables as ever you'd wish to see. His legs is quite firm; and if he's lost all his paint, why, a smart young man like you can easy put him a new coat on!"

"Um!" says the smart young man, pursing up his lips, and looking it all over critically with his hands in his pockets. "What's the damage, missus?"

The "damage" is explained by the lady president to be "arf a crownd."

"'Arf a fiddlestick!" exclaims the smart young man scornfully; and his bride-elect remarks tersely—"Git out!"

"'Arf a crownd it ought to be," says the lady president; "but, as you're sich a nice young couple, you shall 'ave it for a couple o' bob!"

"Not you!" answers the smart young man, and the bride-elect says—

"Go along!"

At last, after expatiating at some length on the virtues of the table with the troubled life, the lady president says the nice "young couple" shall have it for "a bob and a tanner" (eighteenpence), "jest to give them a start in life."

Now they are coming to business, and the young man examines the table's joints, and sits upon it and shakes it, and finally asks—

"Wotcher think, 'Lizer—shall we give a bob for it?"

"A bob!" screams the lady president; "you won't have it for no bobs! You wants things for nothin', you do!"

Undeterred by these remarks, the young couple examine the table still further, and, the lady president remaining obdurate, the bride-elect, proud of having a little money of her own, says—

"Tell yer wot, Jim: you give her the bob, and I'll give her th' price of a glass. There, missus, won't that do?"

Eventually "that" would do; the one shilling and twopence is handed over, and the happy couple departs, he carrying the table, with its legs upward, on his head.

All kinds of third- and fourth-hand things may be bought in Lumber Court; and the young damsels of the slums know this second-hand clothes shop as well as their richer sisters know the gay emporiums of the wealthier streets. All kinds of apparel seem to be purchasable here; and for about half-a-crown, no doubt, the Angelina of the slums could procure a most startling coloured dress, which would flame afar in the dull thoroughfares, and attract the wandering eyes of Coster Edwin in the most satisfactory manner. Wedding outfits could no doubt be purchased here, as well as the "bits o' sticks."

But where would these "bits o' sticks" or furniture be taken when they were bought?

Probably to the young couple's one room. The families in the slums usually live in one room. For this they pay half-a-crown or three shillings per week, and four-and-six or five shillings for two rooms.

These rents are generally farmed. A person will pay the landlord about ten shillings weekly for a small house of, say, four or five rooms, and then get what he can for the apartments. He is responsible for the rent, and as probably he sometimes loses by reason of moonlight flittings, he seeks to make up what he can. For larger houses he would pay more, but the rent of about three shillings a room to the tenants appears to be the usual price.

Here, then, we can see how Slumdom dwells. For half-a-crown a week a regular customer can get a bed and use of the kitchen in a common lodging-house; or by the night he pays fourpence or sixpence, as the case may be. For three shillings he can get an unfurnished room, where he may bring up a family; for four-and-sixpence or five shillings he can get a couple of rooms. If he cannot afford even the fourpence a night, there are the Casual Ward, the Free Shelter, the dry arch, and the streets.

The prices, no doubt, differ somewhat in the various districts, but we believe these may be taken as fairly representative.

Rents also in the various blocks of model dwellings which are springing up so plentifully in many parts of London are much the same.

"We get three shillings a week for a single room," said the collector of one of these blocks, "and four-and-six or five shillings for two rooms. Then, of course, we don't let a single room to everybody—depends how many there is in the family, or we should have the inspector down on us."

That is one advantage of these blocks of dwellings.

They appear to be much more under control for the prevention of overcrowding and of insanitary conditions than ordinary houses. In some, if not all, of these buildings there are three-roomed dwellings to be obtained; and unpleasant though it may seem—to persons accustomed to a whole house of their own—to have a dwelling in a block, yet a neat and tidy suite of three rooms, for about six-and-sixpence a week, in

Her present story is clear enough. She tramps the West End, endeavouring to sell her pleasant plants, or to change them for old clothes—which probably she sells in Lumber Court—and creeps here for rest and shelter. Here no policeman will move her on; nobody will complain that she obstructs the pathway; no carriage-horses come prancing down, hurrying her out of their way. The women around a well-built block in a fairly good neighbourhood, is an improvement on ramshackle rooms in an old house in a slum.

No doubt the ideal dwelling is a small house of four or five rooms for one family; but if these small houses are let out by the room to a family, then the streets are likely to form very bad slums, and a well-managed block of Dwellings appears much better. The letting-out of the houses in single rooms seems almost characteristic of a slum, and is the beginning of a street's degeneration.

What sort of people live in the slums?

Well, take a glance, say, at Nottingham Court, not very far from Charing Cross, on this sunny day. Here, on the pavement, reclines a worn woman, looking utterly exhausted. Beside her stands a huge basket of graceful ferns.

at their doorways are as poor and the children more grimy than herself.

Or look into this other court close by. Here is a half-starved little one, sitting solemnly at a doorway. Along comes an old, old woman, her bent back carrying pieces of wood she has gleaned, apparently at Covent Garden Market. To her comes the mother of the child, asking for "one of those pretty rings"—a little wooden hoop from a small apple-cask.

With a smile puckering her already wrinkled and withered face, and with a muttered exclamation of "Little darlin'," the old dame gives the hoop, and the child stretches up its shrunken arms, and a feeble laugh overspreads its wan features as it clutches its new toy—probably its only one, save the garbage.

And the golden sunshine strikes down between the grimy walls and blesses the group.

SHORT ARROWS.

NOTES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND WORK IN ALL FIELDS.

STARTING IN LIFE.

T was exciting and cheering to see a large ship of war launched at Plymouth the other day. And yet the occasion afforded food for sad thought too, especially with the recent Victoria disaster in our memory. The ship that was launched was gay with bunting, a band played the "Conquering Hero," the chief officials of the dockyard drank prosperity to her; and yet one day she might cause the loss of many lives and go to the bottom very ignominiously. The launch of a grand ship like this must make even the most careless think of a young man or young woman starting in life with bright hopes and great expectations. And the voyage through life? What this shall be depends upon the use that will be made of the grace of God.

THE ARGUMENT OF THE LIFE.

"When I was young," said a good old man, "I did not care for the concerns of eternity, and was very different from what I afterwards became. Aye, there was an infidel once as used to come and argue with me about religion, and one day I turned to him and said, 'You knew me as I used to be before I gave my heart to God; now tell me, was I a better man then, nay, was I half as good a man as I have been since?' And the sceptic had not a word to say." There was no answering this plain argument. The sceptic knew what a sad, sinful young man this old man had been before he was brought to Christ and made a new creature in Him, and he could not deny the change that had been wrought in him. A changed life is indeed one of the hardest arguments for an infidel to answer. There he sees the power of God unto salvation.

THRONES THAT LAST.

Perhaps no baby was ever received into this uncertain life with more joy and triumph than the little son of Napoleon the First. "It is a King of Rome!" announced the delighted Emperor, as he presented the unconscious heir of all this greatness to his Court. All France rejoiced, and the early years of the young prince were of the brightest. When he was only eight weeks old a battalion was formed of eight thousand boys under the age of twelve years. These boys were called the "Pupils of the Guard." They wore a green uniform with yellow embroidery, and were divided into two regiments of six companies each, and they were placed in the service of the King of Rome. Alas! such bright days did not last long. After the battle of Moscow the wheel of Fortune seemed to turn, and the idolised little king, and the father he loved so well, never met again. "I see I am no longer a king," the child said sadly, soon after he began his altered life as an exile in the Court of his grandfather at Vienna; and here he died, at twenty-one, of consumption. Too well we can imagine the bitter contrast those last painful years of his life must have been to the brilliant beginning. In what sorrow must the proud young heart have learned its lesson of patience. When reading such changes and chances, let us remember that the humblest Christian has a kingdom which can only be lost through his own fault. God has made us to be kings and priests, and no mortal can dethrone us.

WORTHLESS READING.

It was a saying of Hobbes that if he had read as much as other men he would doubtless have shared their ignorance. The majority of people who read at all, read too much and think too little, falling into the error to which Schopenhauer alludes, when he says that the safest way of having no thoughts of our own is to take up a book every moment we have nothing to do. We often notice people when travelling through the most beautiful scenery reading horrid garbage of so-called literature instead of a page from God's beautiful green book of nature. And His Word in the Bible is neglected for the same reason.

CONTENTMENT.

We met the other day with a very short sentence which contained within it a very great deal of truth. It was this: "Analysis is the death of sentiment." "To analyse" is to break up anything into its component parts, and see of what it is made up—it is to pry into all about it. You can catch a sunbeam in a glass and analyse it, splitting it up into the various colours of which it is composed, but though wiser about it than the man who, when he saw it reflected in the wayside pool, remembered that it came from the same sun that shone on the bosom of the wide ocean, and said so, yet you may know far less of the sentiment of light and of a sunbeam than he. Be content to enjoy many things without knowing all about them. Don't pick all the rose-buds and all the daisies to pieces—don't want to know the "why" of everything. There are pleasures of ignorance as well as pleasures of knowledge. When we think of what man gained by eating of the fruit of the knowledge of good and evil, let us also think of what he lost. There are many beautiful things in the world which will be heart-food and fancy-food, and which will sing to you the poetry of life, if only you will take them as they are, and not worry them by asking too many questions about them.

BRAVELY CONFESSED.

Admiral Sir George Tryon, who by a terrible mistake caused the loss of H.M.S. Victoria, had the reputation of being a very brave man. Indeed, as one who knew him remarked to the writer, "he did not seem to know what fear was." Never, however, did he show his courage so much as when, just before going down with the ship, he said to the staff-commander, "It was entirely my own doing—entirely my fault." This confession in those awful last moments, when he realised the extent of the tragedy, recalls the words of another leader (King David), who, in reference to the numbering of the people, was too brave to blame anyone but himself—"Lo, I have sinned, and I have done wickedly; but these sheep, what have they done?"

"THIS WAY MADNESS LIES."

One day the writer was in the city of Wells and asked where a certain road led. "To the lunatic asylum," was the reply. This made him think and ask himself, "What is the road that leads most people to this sad destination?" The reply is, unrestrained selfishness. Lunatics are always thinking and speaking of themselves. What we all need to keep our minds healthy is some work or interest outside ourselves. Look unto Jesus. Observe the wants of your fellow-beings, and do something to supply them.

FRESH PAGES.

Sir Robert Ball, as a popular writer on astronomy, needs no introduction. In a volume just published by Messrs. Isbister under the title, "In the High Heavens," he has collected a series of papers written for "general readers" upon some astronomical topics which are much debated nowadays. The book is one of a class which is deservedly popular; it is at once attractive and instructing, it teaches, but it does not prose. From the same publishers we have received a pleasant volume of very readable, illustrated sketches, "In the Footprints of the Poets," in which Milton is dealt with by no less an authority than Professor Masson, and Mrs. Browning by the Bishop of Ripon.—The Rev. A. J. Harrison, B.D., is well-known as a keen upholder of Christian evidences, and in his latest work, "The Ascent of Faith" (Hodder and Stoughton), he takes up a strong position, in which he should be of great service to others who are striving to maintain the good fight. The work is one which would be invaluable to any preacher who is called upon to deal with the arguments of so-called agnostics.—From the Oxford University Press, we have received specimens of new editions of the "Oxford Bible for Teachers," printed in small but clear type on the Oxford India paper, which does so much to make these Bibles useful and portable. We spoke a few months ago of the "Helps" when they were issued in their revised and illustrated form. In these new editions of the "Oxford Bible," the revised "Helps" and the illustrations are incorporated. So the result is a Teacher's Bible, than which no more useful gift book or prize for a senior scholar or young teacher could be found.—Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton send us two small works by the author of "From Log Cabin to White House," who gives, under the title of "Hints and Helps for Young Women" and "Young Men" respectively, series of anecdotal chapters, more or less practical, somewhat transatlantic in phraseology, and not quite up to the level of his earlier work.—In "The Sunny Days of Youth" (T. Fisher Unwin), the Rev. E. J. Hardy addresses boys and young men as to the duties and tasks which lie before them, and his bright anecdotal chapters make up a volume that is an admirable companion one to his own "Five Talents of Woman."—Under the somewhat similar title, "In the Days of Youth" (Elliot Stock), the Rev. J. M. Gibbon has collected a score of good sermons to children, that are quite within the grasp of the little ones, though their author does not make the mistake of "talking down" too much.

SOME FAMOUS ORGANISTS.—I.

Yours faithfully,
Edw. J. Hopkins.

—Two handy volumes for Sunday school teachers, are issued by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton in the People's Dictionary of the Bible," by the Rev. E. W. Rice, D.D., and Dr. Pentecost's invaluable "Bible Studies" on the International Lessons for 1894.—What is there to be said of "The Biblical Illustrator," published by Messrs. Nisbet, and edited by the Rev. J. S. Exell, which we have not said when speaking of former volumes? We have just received the third and concluding volume on the Book of the Acts, and that on the Epistle of St. James. A busy preacher may here see in a few minutes an epitome of the work of years on the part of some of the best and most thoughtful commentators and expounders the Church has known. It is encyclopædic in its scope and compact in form.—Mr. R. M. Ballantyne's "Personal Reminiscences and Incidents in Book-making" (same publishers) has all the interest and value which readers of his stories, and of Mr. Blathwayt's interview with him reported in our own pages, might expect.

RELIGION.

Many people regard religion as they regard the small-pox. They desire to have it as slight as possible, and they are very careful that it does not mark them.

"Books in the running brooks."

THE MINISTRY OF LETTERS

might be much more used than it is in religious and philanthropical work. I know a good man who is in the habit of writing letters to a number of old and bed-ridden people every Saturday, so that they may have something sympathetic and consolatory to read on Sunday. He writes chiefly to people of the middle class, and especially to those who have seen better days. He gets their names from the physician who attends them, or from a friend. Though they do not and cannot reply themselves, my friend generally hears from others how much his letters are appreciated. When one man who had been written to for years died, his widow found a great bundle of the letters, and derived much comfort from them.

"BOOKS IN THE RUNNING BROOKS."

"The river glideth at his own sweet will," past flowers, reeds, trees and people, but it takes no notice of anything, and seems to be quite unconscious of its own progress. We men ought to be different in both these respects. We should try to learn from every person and every thing, and we should number our days and use them wisely instead of allowing them to slip away without regarding them.

SIMPLE REALISATION.

Our spiritual life would be rich, and our hearts would often be at peace if only we had the faith and the realisation of a little child. "How did you find your way up-stairs in the dark and get your book?" a young lady asked of her baby brother; "there was no one with you, and the lamp was not lit."—"Yes there was, sister," he replied.—"Oh, Walter, I am afraid you are not telling me the truth," she said.—"Yes, I'm sure it is quite true," he answered, "for God was there, and He lit me up with His moon."

SOME MORE NEW BOOKS.

We do not remember a series of sermons more timely and serviceable than that which our contributor the Bishop of Ripon has gathered in a volume just issued by Messrs. Isbister under the title of "The Son of Man among the Sons of Men." In a word it is manly, and if there is one thing wanted more than another on the part of our preachers and teachers to-day it is manliness.—Messrs. Morgan and Scott send us another of the Rev. F. B. Meyer's helpful little volumes—this time on the Epistle to the Ephesians and entitled "Keywords of the Inner Life." There are few living teachers who are at once so suggestive to the preacher and helpful to the private reader and student as Mr. Meyer.—Messrs. Passmore and Alabaster send us a packet of "Rare Jewels from Spurgeon," containing half a dozen daintily-got-up little booklets by the great preacher, which will no doubt be welcome to many of his old friends.—A remarkable series of biographical sketches is that which Dr. J. Elder Cumming has collected under the title "Holy Men of God: from St. Augustine to Yesterday" (Hodder and Stoughton), but full of interesting and suggestive detail.—Another biographical work from the same publishers is the Rev. J. S. Flynn's admirable "Life of Sir Robert Fowler," who was twice Lord Mayor of London and for so many years took an active part in all good works.—Messrs. Raphael Tuck and Sons send us a box of their tasteful Christmas and New Year cards and souvenirs, which are this year more successful than ever, and, especially in the direction of autograph cards, display much originality of design and treatment.—Messrs. C. W. Faulkner and Co. also send us an excellent selection of well-printed souvenirs and booklets, and with them some most tasteful calendars that deserve more than the passing word which is all we can spare.—Mr. Fisher Unwin has sent us a copy of Miss Olive Schreiner's latest work, "Dream Life and Real Life," which is one of the most recent volumes in the "Pseudonym Library." Not everyone will enjoy it, but many will, and for those who can look into this picturesque treatment of a strange side of life, the three little sketches which make up this volume will prove a rich reward.—We have also to acknowledge the receipt of "Social Romances" (Morgan and Scott); an abridged edition of "The Life of Mrs. Booth" (Salvation Army Publishing Offices); "The Pilgrim's Progress and Its Lessons," by the Rev. Samuel Wright (Elliot Stock); and the current volumes of the following, which are all brightly illustrated—"The Sunday Magazine," and "Good Words" (Isbister and Co.), "The Fireside," "Hand and Heart," and "The Day of Days" ("Home Words" Publishing Office).

DISINTERESTED KINDNESS.

The writer knows two brothers, both naval officers and both unmarried. One of them is so selfish that, as his sister expresses it, he would not give you a bit of string. The other, though he has a much smaller income, is continually spending money upon others, and especially upon people who seem to be neglected. Every day when he is at home he buys a bouquet of flowers and sends it to an old lady living near. The great pleasure of his life seems to be to surprise neglected people and those who can make no return with attention and kindness. My friend always reminds me of a certain famous man, of whom it was remarked that he always talked with the girls whom everybody else neglected—the ugly, awkward girls; the girls with red elbows, and snub noses, and sandy hair; the girls who were too shy to talk. Be kind to the people who have not many friends, who are voted slow, and dull, and uninteresting, and very likely may be so, but who are quite capable of responding gratefully to a little sympathy.

MISS SHARMAN.

(From a Photograph by Walery, Regent Street, W.)

OUR WAIFS.

We gave last month in Mr. Raymond Blathwayt's paper "With a Doctor of Charity" a portrait of Dr. Barnardo, who has the care of one of our QUIVER Waifs. Susie, the other one, is in the Orphans' Home presided over by Miss Sharman, whose kindly face we have pleasure in showing our readers on this page. This is the season at which we generally make some reference to our Waifs Fund. Quite recently we gave our readers portraits of the two children and a few words from their teachers. So we need not touch upon that side of our work at present. But we appeal to our readers, in all confidence, to support us in this work which we have undertaken in their name. If it were not for the help of such generous friends as "J. J. E. (Govan)" and "A Glasgow Mother" the Fund would not have met the expenses of maintaining more than one of the children last year. Will not more of our readers follow the example of these Scotch friends and send us a small regular subscription? We do not care to contemplate the necessity of narrowing the scope of our work. On the contrary, we would rather see it extended. The plea of "hard times" cuts both ways. There are more little ones to be helped, even if doing so does mean even greater sacrifices than usual. Any subscriptions sent to the Editor will be acknowledged as on this page.

INDUSTRY AND WEALTH.

It is quite true that productive industry is the only capital which enriches a people, and spreads national prosperity and well-being. Solomon's words are "In all labour there is profit;" and it has been said that he is a benefactor to mankind who makes two blades of grass grow where there was only one before. Hence a gambling spirit is an impoverishing one when it takes possession of a country. The gambler produces nothing. He gets money, and he has given nothing for it; he pays away money, and he has not received anything for it. The wealth of a land lies in the industry and thrift of its people. Patient industry is what tells in the end. It is seldom indeed that one hears of a gambler dying rich.

"THE QUIVER" FUNDS.

List of contributions received from October 28th, 1893, up to and including November 27th, 1893. Subscriptions received after this date will be acknowledged next month:—

For "The Quiver" Waifs Fund: A Glasgow Mother (43rd donation), 1s.; J. S., 4s.; J. J. E., Govan (73rd donation), 5s.

THE HOPE OF THE FAMILY.

MARTIN LUTHER'S WEDDING-RING.

HE wedding-ring popularly known as that of the great German Reformer is an exquisite work of art, delicate in execution and finish. It is still preserved in a collection of rare jewels, and is esteemed of great value. Luther had renounced the Romish faith—we all know something of his life—and by precept and example gave himself heartily to the promotion of the principles of the Reformation.

He came to see that the celibacy of the clergy, among other doctrines of Romanism, could be "founded on no warrant of Scripture, but is rather repugnant to the Word of God," and he resolved to enter "the holy estate of matrimony." Believing that "a good wife is of the Lord," he chose a good woman, Catherine de Bora, a lady of noble birth, a nun, and, if we may credit Holbein's portrait, a very pretty woman. Better still, she was a faithful and affectionate wife, though her temper was not the sweetest, and her tongue at times could scold. Luther loved her dearly. With him, indeed, reverence for woman was at once a natural instinct and a point of doctrine. He observed that when the first woman was brought to the first man to receive her name, he called her not wife but mother—"Eve, the mother of all living," a word, he says, "more eloquent than ever fell from the lips of Demosthenes." So when Catherine frowned he smiled, when she scolded he bantered. With the gentlest soothing he chided her anxieties, and with the most self-denying devotion he sought to make her life happy. And a happier home, it is said, than the home of Luther was not in that land of domestic tenderness. In one of his letters to his wife he says, "The greatest favour of God is to have a good and pious husband, to whom you can entrust your all, your person, and even your life, whose children and yours are the same. Catherine, you have a pious husband who loves you. You are an empress; thank God for it." And more playfully he says another time, "If I were going to make love again, I would carve an obedient woman out of marble, in despair of finding one in any other way."

LUTHER'S WEDDING-RING.

But about the wedding-ring. When Luther resolved to marry the fair sister, he seems to have ordered the ring after a design of his own suggesting. Marriage was not to him a gay event in butterfly life, to be celebrated by elaborate entertainments of frivolity and fashion. It was to him the holiest estate which man could occupy on earth—a sacred bond, symbolical of the union between Christ and His Church, and as such he entered into it, and took upon him its vows in solemn awe as well as in holy joy. He had nobly confessed Christ before the world, he had fought for His pure truth with tongue and pen against the proud claims of an imperious Church, and he would not forget Him now in this momentous event of life. All his conduct was governed by the principles of the Gospel of Christ. He had realised the presence and grace of Christ in the cloister, in the market-place, and in the Church. It was Christ that nerved his arm when he nailed his theses to the church door at Wittenberg, "with plain heroic magnitude of mind, and celestial vigour armed," and taught him to declare that "the just shall live by faith," and sustained him in passing through the great ordeal at Worms, when he boldly declared before the council: "Here I stand, I cannot do otherwise; may God help me! Amen." And the same gracious Lord was to have a place now in his hope of domestic bliss; and this was shown in the marriage ring which he devised and had made. The poet Herrick sings of the wedding-ring—

CATHERINE DE BORA—LUTHER'S WIFE.

"And as this round
Is nowhere found
To flaw, or else to sever;

He addresses her sometimes as "my Love Catherine," or "Catherine, the Queen, the Empress, the Doctress," or as "Catherine, the rich and noble lady of Zeilsdorf," where they had a cottage and a few rods of ground!

So let our love
As endless prove,
And pure as gold for ever."

And Luther's ring symbolised a pure and lasting love, a love rooted in the eternal love of Christ, "which passeth knowledge," and whose highest expression is the atonement of the Cross. It was a rich and costly ring, and was ever to keep before his wife's mind Him who is the Husband of His bride, the Church, and her obligations to Him as well as to her earthly husband. There was on this ring no Cupid with bow and arrows; there was no cooing dove; there was no emblem to suggest in the faintest degree any idea indelicate, any idea profane, any idea frivolous or trifling. Luther was a man of God, ruled by the Spirit of God. He lived to serve his Lord. The passion of his life was the passion of his wedding-day. Accordingly on the broad surface of the ring are engraved the scourge, the spear, and the pillar, which is figured in the crucifixion, with a full view of the awful scenes of the Saviour's passion. The full-length figure extended on the cross is in relief on one half of the ring, the head being in the centre, and over it is set a small ruby. On the other half are objects connected with the scene of the crucifixion. And inside of the ring there is engraved in fair characters the simple inscription—

"D. Martino Luthero Catharian Boren.
13 Juni, 1525."

Thus did Catherine ever carry about with her the emblems of the dying of the Lord Jesus. To look at her ring was to be reminded of the appeal which Christ made on the cross to the love and faith of His people. And thus did husband and wife sanctify their united lives to Him who died to redeem them.

GARTH GARRICKSON—WORKMAN.

THE STORY OF A LANCASHIRE LAD.

CHAPTER XIII.

AND so, that room empty, swept and garnished, the coming and going of doctors suddenly ceased, Roger shut up alone, Mildred was free; but she still stayed on in the quiet house in the little Derbyshire village all the summer through. They needed her, she said, and tried to prove, by making herself rather unnecessarily useful; taking the housekeeping, though easy of management by invalid Margaret's capable cook, into her own hands, and taking some few vicarage duties for which Margaret had never been able: but spending her time chiefly in the nursery—she, to whom confinement had been so unendurable.

She became enthralled; old roving habits ceased—hers whose waterproof and goloshes had been such indispensables; and hours were spent here, rocking patiently in the little chair, pacing the floor, or making tiny garments. To others she was very cold, very dignified now; in the nursery quite another creature, all the tenderness of her nature called out by Margaret's little son.

Mildred was changing: becoming less, perhaps, of her old self, more of something else—what, not yet apparent; she was in a state of transition, dangerous enough, but safer here and thus than in most places and positions, perhaps.

She had had a soul-draining experience, and bleeding is a more dangerous process for souls than that for bodies which the old quacks practised—good for soul-health too, sometimes.

And at home Garth struggled on.

Poor Garth! his lesson was hard. Even he could not help seeing, what not even his mother could, and not everyone would hide. The knots of talking women, scattering with furtive looks on his approach: the half-contemptuous smiles and surprise glances among the men: the curt reserve of some, the awkward hesitating congratulations and rough jokes of a few, had shown only too plainly how little secret his secret had been, and how opinion had gone. Popularity was at a sudden end, and, worse than that, respect and influence; his subordinates were unruly and inclined to insolence: even the lads at the night-school became so rebellious that one evening he startled them by abruptly closing it until Miss Caryl should return.

What wonder that proud Garth should draw his toga around him, and, like Caesar, "hold on his rank"?

And then his rank had been suddenly raised: Simister had left, and he had been placed on the office-stool opposite Kildare, his salary doubled, his responsibility trebled, his trials in no way diminished.

Mildred was right: Kildare tried Garth, how much even she had no idea. From boyhood these two had never agreed: when in his vacations Kildare had been here, there had invariably been some passage-at-arms: once when Garth had found him teasing a little girl, Kildare had had a lesson he had not forgotten yet; and he was inwardly determined that Garth's probation should be short: he should very soon be glad to return to the mill.

This, Garth had no dream of doing, for the wish of Kildare O'Neil: he understood too clearly the meaning of the petty annoyances, which still never attained to the dignity of insults, to which Kildare daily subjected him, and, inwardly grim, met them with a phlegm, a cleverness of fence, or a caustic repartee Kildare might have admired, but that they so intensely provoked him. Then he passed to other means.

John Caryl discovered that it did not answer to have these young men in the office together. Not that they quarrelled or that he would have cared if they had, but that mysterious mistakes were always was to be expected, even considering the years he had passed in the mill itself. Kildare was careless and indolent: many of these blunders pointed to a crass ignorance of mechanics and manufacture which occurring, and which was the culprit he could not determine.

"They will not believe it is a mistake," he said.—p. 246.

Facts invariably pointed to Garth; he was by several years the younger, and might be supposed to know less. Moreover, Kildare was clever; John Caryl was beginning to like his nephew greatly, and he had his reasons for wishing to retain him in honour. But on examination, the preponderance of evidence was in Garth's favour; he was steadier, more careful, and had a far more intimate knowledge of mill affairs than could only have been his. The very means Kildare took frustrated his plan by bringing out Garth's technical knowledge and his own deficiencies as nothing else could have done.

At last he over-did his part and roused his uncle's suspicions. He watched and listened, and saw and heard much whereof they thought him ignorant.

Kildare found Garth sent away on business which was rightly his; or kept at home in sole charge, while he was sent on less important errands. They were being weighed in the balance, he was clever enough to see. He grew angry; keenly he watched for an opportunity to throw his rival, and at last he thought it had come.

He had been away for several days, and was not expected for two or three more; in his absence all had gone smoothly, and Garth was at work in congenial peace, when he walked in one morning, passed through the office without speaking, and knocked at Mr. Caryl's door; receiving a summons, he entered, and closed it after him.

In a few minutes it re-opened, and the master's voice called sharply: "Garrickson."

Garth left his work and went in.

Mr. Caryl was sitting in his chair; Kildare stood by, his hat still on his head, eyebrows raised, lips pursed up; on the desk lay Garth's translation of that German letter. Mr. Caryl tossed it towards him. "You wrote this, I think?"

"Yes, sir."

"Are you aware of any mistake?"

"Certainly not."

"There is one, Garrickson: a serious mistake, which may cost us dearly."

Garth flushed and frowned; his under-lip was between his teeth; he took up the sheet and looked it over. "Where is it, sir?"

Mr. Caryl pointed it out and explained the difficulty. "They will not believe it is a mistake," he said; "they choose to suppose we are shuffling. This will cost me all that Continental trade which I had just with so much labour established, for which I have dropped several English houses, and dismissed Simister, who was worth his weight in gold. I would rather the mill had been burnt down in a night." It was insured.

Garth stood by the table still and grave, but the frown had smoothed itself, the flush faded, the lip was relaxed; he looked Kildare in the eyes—"Have adequate explanations been made?" he asked.

Kildare answered readily. "Certainly, they have been told plainly enough, but with this translation—the letter based upon it is in their hands—I don't see what's to be done;" and he turned round to the window, his hands in his over-coat pockets, and whistled softly.

But Garth persisted.

"What did you say?"

Kildare repeated his sentence.

"I mean to these people in Germany."

"Belgium, my good fellow—Antwerp's in Belgium. I made the best I could of it, of course. I couldn't say much until I had seen uncle."

"Garth," broke in Mr. Caryl—something in Garth's eye and expression arresting his attention—"did you do that?"

"I told you that was my copy."

"And, Uncle, the writing——"

"Hold your tongue, Kildare. Your original, Garth."

"I decline to say, sir."

"Humph! Have you the copies?"

"Yes, sir."

"Get them."

"They are not here; at home, sir."

"Send."

"I don't think anyone could find them."

Kildare turned round, and said very quietly, "No." It nettled the wrong person.

"Go yourself, then, sir," shouted Mr. Caryl. "I'll have those papers if I send the police; and, Garth," pausing as he turned to leave the room, and then speaking more gently, "change your coat and pack a bag, and tell your mother you won't be home to-night;" and Garth departed.

"What are you going to do, Uncle?"

"Don't know. If it's as I think, probably take him over——"

"He can't interpret."

"He can."

"How can you trust him after such a—an egregious mess?"

"Because I don't believe he made it."

"But he said——"

"He copied it. Look here, Kildare: go into the other room till he returns; I can't talk all day;" and Kildare went, to turn over the papers on Garth's desk in hopes of more egregious messes.

When Garth returned and laid the scribbled copies before his master, his comment was, "I thought as much."

The mistake was Mildred's.

"Now, my lad," with a keen look into the dark face, "why would you not tell me this?"

"There was no need—I copied it."

"It might have cost you your place." No answer.

"Did you suspect anything?"

"Well, sir, I was not sure—I thought Miss Mildred knew best."

"And you feared the blame for her, was that not so?" No reply.

"You should have told me."

"Yes, sir, I wish I had; but, indeed, I thought it might be nothing, and it was not my place——"

"I see. Well, now," rustling the papers together briskly, "we'll to Antwerp, and convince them; it may not be so bad, as you kept the papers." And Kildare found himself left behind, with the prospect of a dull time and a scene at the end of it.

This was not what he had planned at all. Relying on his uncle's ignorance of the language, forgetting his habit of saddling his own mare, he had fancied his opportunity for the riddance of "that upstart." He had been distressed, uneasy, and vexed by turns at Antwerp and Rotterdam; gravely anxious in discussion with one or two business acquaintances whom he met on the return boat: partly by their advice, partly to give a colour to the thing, he had called at the bank on his arrival in Hull, made certain vague representations, and then come home with the whole swollen case—John Caryl was used to drastic measures in affairs of this kind, he knew—and behold! It might not have mattered but for the Hull Bank—he would settle the fellow some other way, and they would settle Antwerp; but the bank? Of course, he had not told his uncle all of that—they might not call there: he hoped not; but unless something were done there might be a—an egregious—mess. He would run over himself, but he was in charge here, and the banks closed so—egregiously—early; and then he did not know what would be done at Antwerp—he could not risk writing. He must wait and see what had been done, and then slip over and put things right, he decided, as he took his way home, in no amiable mood.

But Kildare's inamiable moods never lasted long; dinner, postponed for him, a glass or two of his uncle's burgundy, and a few cigars cheered him up. Of course it would be all right; Uncle Caryl need never know; after all, it was just as well he should see this would not do, and put Garrickson down; he would find him helpless enough out there, no doubt. Oh, yes! it was just as well he should go and show his ignorance; they would do nothing; he himself would follow, settle things all round, and return home covered with glory as the saviour of the firm—and some others. He had committed himself nowhere but at this bank, and of course they would not go there.

Kildare went to the drawing-room to strum himself a triumphant ditty on Mildred's grand, but soon rose, yawning. What was he to do in this hole all the evening? He would go out, but it was pouringly wet, and he had had a rough passage and was tired; there was that book—he stood on the door-mat wondering where he had tossed it. Suddenly something caught his eye—a narrow line of light at the door of Mildred's room. His face changed, he smiled and crossed the hall swiftly, entered, and brought himself up abruptly. The room was bright and cosy, a little fire burning. Minnie sat at the table sewing—Miss Mildred had given her leave to sit here whenever she liked, and Mrs. Williams was out to-night.

"Hullo!" in much surprise. "I beg your pardon—a— Did I leave a book here?" looking round. The room was extremely neat—no book to be seen. "I can't find it, and I've nothing to read. I wonder if you are as dull as I am to-night, Minnie?"

"It is a little quiet, sir—"

"Quiet? I should think it was quiet! as quiet as—a tomb in a desert. The very piano is something—"

"I was glad to hear you playing just now; I opened the door to listen," half-wishing he would go and play again. Minnie was not at ease with Mr. O'Neil; she fancied he ought not to come in and talk to her as he did; and yet it was dull, and he was pleasant company. Kildare did not intend to go; it was warm here, and comfortable, as Mildred's room always was—he really had more right here than the girl; and then, she was a pretty child, and amusing in her talk, quite laughably so; she would while away an hour very well. She was not just a servant—of course, he would not stay talking to one of the maids—she was alone, and evidently lonely; it would be mere kindness to stay with her awhile, and chat.

And he stayed and chatted—leaning against the mantel-piece, afraid that if he sat down and made himself comfortable at once, Minnie would take flight and run away, as she had done before—really on no pretext at all.

Minnie did not run away; she was growing less afraid; and then she had been very lonely—wishing Garth would come and see her, wondering why he never would come to the house—why she must always go to his mother's, at best meeting him in the drive. She was rather glad of Kildare's company.

"Well, what have you been doing while I've been away?"

"Just as usual, sir."

"Sewing—sewing—sewing?"

"Mostly."

"While I have been to the Continent and back."

Minnie's eyes opened. "The Continent" to her meant gardens, palaces, cathedrals, music, and pictures.

"Have you really, sir?"

"Really—and indeed."

Kildare began to talk about things he had not seen—on this visit; and Minnie grew so interested that he managed to drop into a chair and stretch himself at ease unnoticed—for he had seen a good deal, and talked well about what he had not, even Mildred admitted.

The hour slipped away, and he talked on, while Minnie's needle lay idle, and she drank in his stories, forgetful of all else, until he happened to mention that Mr. Caryl had gone across and taken Garth. Minnie started. Garth! Garth gone to the Continent, without telling her, or even sending word! And to-morrow was her night—to go away and enjoy himself without one word.

"How long will they be away?" she asked.

"Oh, I don't know—a few days, perhaps; all the work left to me in the meantime, so I hope not long. It's nothing much, only a mistake Garrickson made—like the ass he is!"

A startled "Oh!" escaped Minnie then.

"Oh, I beg your pardon, Minnie; I quite forgot he was your—your sweetheart." And so, to do him justice, for the moment he had. "It was nothing much, only it might have been awkward if I hadn't seen it, and they wouldn't believe it was a mistake; so Uncle Caryl just took him to explain, and—and—beg pardon, you know—it will be all right, I've no doubt."

"So they have only gone on business?"

"Well, I expect they'll get a little fun in between—Uncle likes to enjoy himself—if all goes well, that is," suddenly sober.

"Was it a very bad mistake, then?"

"Well, yes, Minnie, it was rather—it was a—stupid blunder; but then, Garth is not—well, not very sharp, you know; uncle should not have trusted him, and will know better another time. Oh, it will be all right; don't trouble your little head about it. I wish I hadn't told you. See: suppose I play for you awhile," going to the piano, which had belonged to Mildred's mother—banished from the drawing-room long ago, but still kept in tune. And Kildare played for her as he could play—softly and sweetly. He was a good musician; it was part of his education, like his chat. Minnie had never heard anything like it. Not even Miss Mildred played like that; and as for Garth's harmonium—

"I wish I could make it sound so," she said, in a pause.

"Well, if you had learnt—what? Can you play at all? Come here and let me see."

Minnie protested and averred, but to no purpose; he seated her on the stool, and persuaded and insisted until she gave way, and played several of her little airs, while he encouraged her and praised her touch—advised her to practise, and promised her some easy new music that she could play on Mrs. Garrickson's parlour piano. Another hour had passed before Kildare began to reflect that it was time to put an end to this.

"Well, I must go now, Minnie. I've a letter to write."

"Oh!" looking at the clock, "I had no idea it was so late."

"Late? Do you call ten o'clock late? What would you think of—well, never mind—good-night."

"Good-night. You don't really think Garth was very wrong, do you, sir?" looking up with such sweet clouded eyes, Kildare was touched.

"You dear little thing!" he said, smiling down into them, "of course not; and I wouldn't tell you if I did."

"And you won't let others think so, will you, sir? I am sure Garth would do his best."

"Of course. Oh, I'll do my level best; don't you trouble. I'll look after Garth, if only for your sake, Minnie." And he went to the dining-room for another cigar, and a smile over his evening's amusement before turning in.

Minnie went to bed. She was late for supper, and did not want to meet anyone just then—thinking how much kinder Kildare's talk was than Garth's, and how good he was to promise to help Garth and lend her music, and wonder if—if she practised she could not give music-lessons: that would be so much pleasanter than "sewing—sewing—sewing," of which she was very tired.

If, as he said—and he must know, when he had been to the Continent, and lived in London, and knew so many clever people—if she had talent, of course, she ought to use it—of course she must have; he had thought so at once. No one had heard her play who knew anything about it, or she would have been told before—not even Garth had said so. Minnie went to sleep to dream of herself as a pianist of world-wide fame.

CHAPTER XIV.

WHEN his uncle and Garth returned, Kildare found, to his comfort, that there was to be no scene.

They had not stayed in Hull, but come straight on by the boat train; nor had they been to Rotterdam, finding the Antwerp firm easy of conviction, and being in haste to return. Indeed, John Caryl thought very little of it.

"You attached too much importance to the whole thing," he said.

"Better than not attaching enough, Uncle."

"Well, yes—if it doesn't interfere with other business; but I can't fly off to the ends of the earth for every scare of yours, Kildare. Young men are easily frightened, as a rule, but you'll have to keep a cool head of hair on if you stay here;" and that was all.

If he could but slip across to Hull 't would be of no consequence—but that bank? He had expected to be sent to Leeds, which would have made all easy; but Garth had been dropped there on that errand as they came through, and he himself despatched to Liverpool—for several days he was very busy. Kildare began to look slightly worried, and forgot to annoy Garth: instead, he rather cultivated him at odd moments, and tried quietly to extract some information of what had been said and arranged at Antwerp, but Garth was not to be "pumped."

He had a side-light of which Kildare forgot to think, and was in no mood to conciliate that young gentleman.

On the evening of his return he had found Minnie at tea with his mother, and things had not gone well. Minnie had been surprised to see him, and a little piqued, for though Mrs. Garrickson had thought he might probably arrive that evening—had set his place at table, reserved a bit of steak, and waited—she had been sure he would not come until the end of the week. Had not Mr. O'Neil said "a few days"? That meant Saturday; they would "get a little fun in," too; that took time. She said nothing, but decided privately that Mrs. Garrickson knew nothing about it, and was not pleased to find herself mistaken.

"You might have told us, Garth; you might have written," she said, a little petulantly.

"Why, dear lass, I had no time. You can't write love-letters on 'Change and on bank counters, Minnie."

"'Changes and banks are not all the places you've been to, I think, Garth."

"Indeed and they are, and an office or two. I might have written on the boat, going out, but I must confess I forgot all about it in the anxiety; and Mr. Caryl was very ill. Come, don't be vexed, my dearie. I'm a bear, I know, but you'll put up with me, won't you, Minnie?" and he held her by the shoulders, and looked at her as he had never looked before.

Now, Minnie had it in her hands to hold Garth for ever and aye—she was too pretty and sweet, as a rule, for mortal man to hold out against her. Garth was growing attached to her; a little proud of his possession, certainly his will was to be kind to his promised wife. He was glad to see her after his absence, a little pleased by her displeasure at his neglect. One little word, a look, a gesture, and he would have kissed her as he had not kissed her yet, said a word he had never said before, and even Minnie would have been satisfied. Whatever had come, nothing would have unsaid that word of Garth's; all would have been well for her.

But Minnie had not the sense to see it.

"But you were unkind to forget, to go without a word like that, and never send a line; and it was your own fault you had to go to all."

Garth loosed her.

"Why, Minnie, who told you that?"

"Someone who knows all about it."

"Mr. O'Neil, I suppose?" Minnie did not speak.

"What did he tell you, Minnie?"

"He looked in, to see Mr. Caryl lying on the floor unconscious."—p. 250.

"Nothing at all, but that you had made a mistake, and had to go and—explain—and——"

"Apologise, I suppose?"

"Well, Garth, you needn't be so angry. He was as kind and nice as possible, and said he would do his best to help you—to look after you, he said."

Garth turned and left the room.

Mrs. Garrickson spoke up gently. "Minnie, I would never have said that to Garth. You have vexed him."

"But, indeed," almost in tears, "he needn't be vexed. I think he is very easily vexed, Mrs. Garrickson."

"But not unnecessarily. You don't just understand Garth yet."

"But Mr. O'Neil said——"

"Mr. O'Neil is not a good man, Minnie. I think the less you have to say to him the better."

"He is very kind. Garth is—spoiled."

The mother looked up in quiet pain, and said no more. If he were, so evidently was someone else. And though Garth returned as if he had been but for a wash and brush, and sat down and ate his tea, and talked about his travels, the evening was a failure; he had to take Minnie home early.

When he returned he came straight to the parlour, without staying to remove cap or boots. "Mother, Minnie must not stay at the house while Miss Mildred is away."

"I was thinking of it, Garth. I will write and ask Miss Mildred's leave to have her here."

"That's a good mother!"

"What was that mistake, my son?"

"It was no mistake of mine at all. Just say nothing of the matter to Miss Caryl." In a few days Minnie was with them.

No wonder Kildare did not succeed with Garth.

Then he was sent suddenly to Glasgow. For a week all had gone peaceably, when something happened.

Garth was writing in his office one day, rather at leisure just then, when he heard a curious noise, then a heavy thud as of a fall in the inner room, the door of which was slightly ajar. He raised his head and listened, but hearing nothing, dipped his pen in the ink, and bent again; then a low groan struck his ear.

Throwing down his pen, he stepped to the door and looked in, to see Mr. Caryl lying on the floor unconscious.

Garth was startled, for his master was robust-looking; not until lately had he ever seen him ill—on the passage to and from Antwerp; but it did not occur to him to call help or make any stir; he merely, by exerting all his strength, got the heavy inanimate heap on to the couch—there was one in this else bare-looking room—loosened the clothing, and brought water, and though it was some time ere consciousness returned, he waited, persevered, and raised no alarm.

Presently he was rewarded; Mr. Caryl opened his eyes.

"Oh, Garth! where's Simister?" then remembering, he gave an impatient exclamation and lay with closed eyes again. "Get me the brandy—presently—from the cupboard."

Garth opened the cupboard by the fireplace, to find it full of bottles and medicines—a miniature drug store—and brought the brandy and a glass, of course without remark.

"Fill it up."

"Full, sir?"

"Yes."

Garth filled it, and stood by while it was taken—a stiff dose; and John Caryl's principles were teetotal, he knew. It gave strength; soon the patient was sitting up, looking more like his usual self, but pale still, and anxious.

"I must go," he said. "Get the Guide, and find the next train for Hull."

Garth, too much a servant to presume, too much a man to think much of a faint, did as requested.

"There is one in half an hour, sir."

"Ah! I can just catch it. Get me my coat," trying to rise; "and, Garth"—but it was useless, his limbs would not bear him; he sank back, a grey despair crept into his face. "If only I had Simister," he said by-and-by. "Garrickson, what's the amount at Astley's. I—I forget."

Garth went to the next room and returned with a large ledger; turning it over, and calculating rapidly, he named the amount. It was large.

"There's a run on the bank."

Garth paled; to lose such a sum would be serious, he knew—calamity.

"It's a mere scare—a few silly women and fools," Mr. Caryl was saying.

"Draw from the county and check it."

Garth forgot rank, and spoke as from man to man.

"There's not enough, unless they'd advance. If I could see Bissington—"

"I'll go, sir—he knows me. Just write an order; I'll do what I can."

Garth went to his room, locked away his books and papers, came back with his hat on: had taken the note he managed to scrawl, and gone, before John Caryl quite realised what he had done: trusted all his wealth, credit, public honour to a workman of twenty-four years.

In his life John Caryl had lived no day like this: part he spent in strengthless fret on his sofa, part in feeble anxious overturning of his clerks' books, with slowly increasing confidence. Long after the hum of the mill was silent, the watchman his only companion between the wide still walls, he waited on, but Garth did not return. At last he went home in helpless despair.

Meanwhile, Garth was fighting his master's battle as if it were his own. First he went to a local bank, where, being known, and John Caryl a personal friend of the banker, he obtained a personal interview. A few earnest words, and that gentleman secured the necessary papers, and together they went to Hull.

It was well Alexander Bissington had gone, for matters there were at the furthest extreme. Never had Garth viewed such a scene; the street in which the building stood was crowded by a mass of frantic people, a strong cordon of police vainly trying to restore order and keep the traffic going. The steps of the building were blocked by a tightly wedged crowd of all ages and sexes, young girls and feeble old women, youths and aged men, clergy and rough workmen. A body of police guarded the entrance, admitting batches of ten or twenty, but making no perceptible impression on the noisy, pushing host outside which was quite impassable.

Now, had Garth been alone he had been helpless, but Mr. Bissington knew his way: leaving the cab, they threaded some narrow lanes behind the houses, which brought them at last to the back of Astley's bank, from the front of which the roar of the multitude came in a muffled hum. Here was no door, and the windows were high and glazed. Mr. Bissington rapped on one of these with his umbrella; it opened slightly.

"Who's there?"

"Bissington."

The window went up higher, and a white-haired gentleman appeared.

"Why, Astley! however has this come about?"

"Come in, and I'll tell you. Who have you there?"

"From John Caryl."

"He will have to come. He can't have his money, Bissington, nor you; you'll swamp us between you."

"We don't want it—we don't want it. We've £25,000 for you. Just put a chair out, and we'll talk inside."

A chair was put out; and by means of this Alexander Bissington's portly person was got into the building. Garth followed, and found himself in a plain oilcloth-floored room, the door of which was closed, evidently locked; round the table were seated several gentlemen; immediately opposite was—Kildare. In his astonishment Garth forgot his surroundings: the watching eyes.

"What are you doing here?" he demanded.

Kildare met him with a British stare; he had the advantage in having seen Garth first, eased his posture, and returned: "And you?"

For answer, Garth, brought suddenly to his senses, drew out his papers and handed them to Mr. Astley.

"Eh, eh? What's this? You—you, sir—I thought you were John Caryl's man."

"His nephew."

"Do you know him, Bissington?"

"Oh yes—but what authority, eh, Garrickson?"

"None whatever. How did you know anything, O'Neil? You should be in Glasgow."

"One hears things—I came in last night. The papers—"

"There's not a breath in the papers," said one gentleman.

"As yet," added another.

"Have you no private knowledge, O'Neil?"

"He says John Caryl has failed in his Belgian negotiations, and—"

"It is untrue."

Then Kildare grew excited; neither he nor Garth ever spoke of the scene that ensued. In the end he was allowed to go free, but Mr. Bissington and Garth were detained many hours.

For long they seemed to have come uselessly. Gradually, as more police were drafted, and the people found they were being satisfied, affairs became quieter outside, and the police at the doors prevented undue crowding within; but the clerks seemed to make no impression on the continual stream of people at the counters: while those who had got their money passed on, new-comers took their place, and still the corridors filled and re-filled with successive batches of others, orderly enough, but persistent and determined, though the press and the waiting hour after hour foodless told visibly on their strength.

But at length, as night closed in, there were appearances that the excitement was subsiding; creditors began to hesitate, to question, to be willing to receive assurance; some even brought back money they had withdrawn; telegrams arrived cancelling orders. Several large firms, satisfied by Garth's explanations, and wires from Antwerp, and encouraged by Mr. Bissington's example, advanced large sums.

At last the doors were closed; weary clerks drew breath, and dropped into seats; principals grasped hands, and with broken congratulations and hopes for the morrow, separated. Astley's bank, Caryl, cotton-spinner, and various other firms and persons were saved.

Then, Mr. Bissington being carried off by Mr. Astley, Garth returned home alone.

When he arrived Mr. Caryl was at table. Thomas had orders to show him in at once.

"Well?"

"All right, sir."

"Have you dined?"

"No."

"Sit down, Garrickson.—Thomas, a knife and fork, and then you can go.—Now then, tell me all about it."

And Garth sat down, for he was hungry, and told all but two matters: concerning Kildare, and that he had drawn all his own and his mother's savings to help the emergency.

But Alexander Bissington knew.

CHAPTER XV.

A WEEK afterwards Mr. Caryl came into the office—as the mill was "loosing" at noon—with a paper in his hand—

"Here's your loan, Garth," carelessly; it was always

"Garth" now. "Better return it to the county; those local banks are hardly safe for a man like you. Or why not invest it?"

"How did you know, sir?"

"Bissington is furnished with a tongue—and another thing or two he has told. If I were you, I would invest this."

"Well, part is my mother's, sir, and she trusts Mr. Bissington and does not like investments."

"But your own! it's a good sum: more than I should have thought originally, and now—"

Garth did not understand until his eye caught the cheque; it was £500 in excess of the original sum. He started as if stung, a quick flush dyed his cheek, his eye flashed, his head was flung back.

"I—I—you must excuse me, sir."

"It is not I, my lad; it is the bank and four other firms: a mere hundred each; you can hardly refuse it, Garth, for such a day's work: for me, I've another plan. Just lock this up here," taking the paper hastily, in fear lest he should tear it, locking it into the safe and pocketing the keys. "We'll just walk up and have some lunch and a chat."

And they did walk up, and lunch and talk, and to Garth was made a revelation.

His master to be taken from his head!—to gradually, daily loose hold of the business which had engrossed him all his life!—to feel health and strength slipping away—to drift helpless, and on a sudden vanish!

And Mildred to know nothing; no one to know!

"Understand, Garth, I will have no-one suspect. My belief in your power of silence alone has induced me to tell you this, and your present knowledge. Had you rung the bell, or called, or in any way attracted attention the other day, or if they had known at Hull, the game would have been all up; the world won't do business with a man whose life is not worth a day's purchase."

This was after luncheon: Mr. Caryl sat in one of his deep velvet chairs. Garth had risen and stood, hands in pockets, in the window. He faced round now, and the window being a bow, his face was not in shadow.

"Why not sell out, sir? Is it worth while?" The tone and the bloodless face had been apology enough, were one needed; the souls of these two men were very near each other. John Caryl leaned his head against the red velvet wearily.

"For myself, not, Garth, nor if my girl had been a son, but if I sold out just now it would mean the house and land as well. I could not keep them up; and there is Mildred."

Garth faced round to the window.

"I did plan—I hoped—to take Kildare into the business. I thought if he could run the thing—he had education—and if my daughter fancied him—I confess I was beginning to think it might be rather a good thing. There was that Irish land he will have by-and-by, too. But it's no use now. If I would have him, the market would not—nor Mildred. If you cannot do what I suggest, take a partnership and go on. I must sell, however; another attack like Wednesday's would make an end."

"The amount I have is not a fair price, sir. I will not do it at less than full value."

"There is your mother."

"She will not invest."

"Not for her son?"

"No; on principle, I shall not ask her." There was a pause.

"I thought," said Mr. Caryl, meditatively then—"I thought that pretty little sweetheart of yours had something."

"She has—I shall not touch it."

"Why not—at a good percentage? As safe as anything, and safer than most."

Garth paused. How was he to explain? It was impossible.

"She would trust you?"

"I suppose so," indifferently.

"When are you to be married?"

"I don't know at all," with an inflexion of curtness and impatience.

"Well, Garth," leaning forward, his arms on his knees, his hands clasped, and speaking with grave kindness, "if I were you I should arrange and do it as soon as possible, and use your joint funds thus. I don't as a rule advise early marriage; but there are exceptional cases. You will never have a like opportunity. To no one else would I make this proposal—nor to you, but for your staunch help last week, and that you are your father's son, and, I believe, worthy of him, my lad."

And Garth returned to the mill alone—his master wanted to rest—with that grave preoccupied look which was becoming his habitual expression.

Poor Garth! his antipathy to this was great: either to marry soon or to appropriate any part of Minnie's money.

To marry lovelessly was wrong enough; to marry the girl for her money, like the supposed scamp he had fancied himself saving her from, was far worse; and the idea clung to Garth that if he married Minnie at all in the end, it would be for that reason alone. He had been growing reconciled to Minnie, even fond of her, until the girl herself had checked him; now that she was with them, she was showing an unsuspected side of her character, and Garth had begun to doubt.

Minnie was not happy; somewhere there was a jar; she was constrained and quiet with him and with his mother: neither seemed congenial to her: and how kind soever they might be, they could not really win her confidence; sometimes it was evident she had been shedding tears.

It did not enter Garth's mind to connect anyone in their own neighbourhood with the change in her. Garth fancied that, in spite of her denial, there had been a prior attachment, that a woman's inevitable preference for her first love was troubling her, and would eventually conquer; she would set him free. He could not in honour break the engagement: he must fulfil his part if she were satisfied; he must be kind to Minnie; but if he simply waited, something would happen, he felt.

"By means of this Alexander Bissington was helped into the building."—p. 250.

"All things come round to those who will but wait."

If he had only waited once before—if he had but been patient! Now all dream of other love was gone; but to bind himself thus was not his rightful destiny, he knew. To be free to spend his strength, his days one by one in working—with no reward but the doing it—not for Minnie: that were a higher life.

And now, unless he did this thing, that were impossible. The old home would be broken up, the land would know them no more. New master, new men, would come to the works; he must go abroad.

And his mother? And Mildred? What would fatherless Mildred do? Had he only waited; had he but been patient! He might have seen—he had seen—the wise path, the path of patience. Now all was mist and mire, and progress seemed hopeless.

"For he that once hath missed the right way,
The further he doth go, the further he doth stray."

And "the real way seemed made up of all the ways."

EARTHLY PARADISES.—I.

BY THE REV. E. J. HARDY, M.A., CHAPLAIN TO THE FORCES, AUTHOR OF "HOW TO BE HAPPY THOUGH MARRIED," ETC.

WE have all heard the cynical remark that marriage is the door that brings deluded mortals back to earth, but there are few of us who do not know cases that go to prove exactly the reverse. When the several parts of our bodies are in perfect health, we do not feel them, or, indeed, notice them at all, but the moment something goes wrong we feel, and cry out, "Oh, my tooth!" "My poor head!" "My leg!"

So it is with matrimony.

When husband and wife pull along happily together they forget themselves and each other, and do not speak about their happiness at all. Thus one unhappy alliance makes more noise than a hundred that are happy. A shriek of pain is heard far more easily than a hum of satisfaction. Matrimonial failures strive and cry in the streets, whereas the successes enjoy domestic felicity at their own firesides and say nothing about it.

Certainly marriage does bring people back from the airy dreams of courting days to the realities of every-day earthly existence, but it cannot be denied that it is to a very large number of people the source of all that is best and brightest in their lives.

"Sweet is the smile of home; the mutual look When hearts are of each other sure."

If many of the men about whom we hear and read most have never entered this Paradise, there are on the other hand, perhaps, as many who have done so. We have heard enough of famous men who have been unhappily married; let us think of a few who lived in an earthly Paradise as far as their domestic relations were concerned.

The Poet and Divine, John Donne, who became

Dean of St. Paul's in 1621, had married a lady belonging to a rich family without the consent of her parents, and in consequence was treated with great asperity; in fact, he was told by his father-in-law that he was not to expect any money from him. The Doctor went home and penned the pithy note: "John Donne, Anne Donne, undone," which he sent to the gentleman in question, and this had the effect of restoring them to favour. The couple were very poor at first, but things soon got brighter, and they lived most happily together until Mrs. Donne, who had been married when only sixteen years of age, died sixteen years afterwards, at the birth of her twelfth child.

Another Poet and Divine who was not undone by his marriage, but greatly helped and comforted, was George Herbert. He and his wife married on the third day after their first interview. Indeed, the match had been pre-arranged by friends who, Izaak Walton tells us, "well understood the tempers and knew the estates of both parties, and the Eternal Lover of mankind made them happy in each other's mutual and equal affections and compliance. Indeed, so happy that there never was any opposition betwixt them, unless it were a contest which should most incline to a compliance with the other's desires." In his acts of charity—a grace to which he devotes a special chapter in his "Country Parson"—Herbert found a hearty helper in his wife, whom he made his almoner, and paid to her regularly a tenth of all he received as tithes, to be spent on the poor of his parish.

We are all more or less familiar with the description which Dean Stanley has given of Dr. Arnold at home. We can almost hear his cheerful voice as he goes before breakfast through the head-master's house, calling up the several members of his family. We know that he never worked so well or so happily as when surrounded by his children, or liked any recreation so much as a "skirmish" with them over the country, except, perhaps, a quiet walk beside his wife's pony. It was what he called "the rare, the unbroken, the almost awful happiness" of his domestic life that made him what he was, and enabled him to reform the system of public schools in England.

Not less fortunate in this respect were two great friends of Arnold—Archdeacon Hare and Baron Bunsen; and certainly the Archdeacon deserved a domestic Paradise, for he made it for himself—the only way it is to be got. This is what his wife wrote about him after that, in many respects, trying time, the first year of marriage. "I never saw anybody so easy to live with, by whom the daily petty things of life were passed over so lightly; and then there is a charm in the refinement of feeling which is not to be told in its influence upon trifles." There are "strong-minded" women who talk of the "slavery" of matrimony; but it must be an earthly Paradise rather than "slavery" to live with a husband like this.

In his address at the wedding of the Duke and Duchess of Fife the Archbishop of Canterbury, when describing what marriage should be, and sometimes is, quoted with good effect the farewell words which Baron Bunsen addressed from his dying bed to the Baroness—"Most precious Fanny, my first, my only love! In you I have loved that which is eternal. No one knows what you have been to me; thanks, a thousand times, for your love!"

A Paradise on earth was lost by Wilberforce, Bishop of Winchester, when his wife died. Though he was a widower for thirty-two years, he never forgot her. At his own funeral might be seen the wreath of lilies which his hand had only a few weeks before hung over the cross that marks her grave. "My happiest time," he used to say, "was when I was rector of Brighstone, with my dear wife and my children all about me." Nothing in his biography is more touching than the references to his domestic affections. On his introduction to Court, his prevailing sentiment is that he had lost her to whom, on his return home, he might describe the scene. After her death, returning home from any place was always rather painful. When she was with him, "if I went home to her, it was beyond all words. If I went home with her, I got apart to see her meet her children; and now——!"

To be "thoroughly domesticated" is a rare attainment, for it is nothing less than the flower that indicates perfectly developed manhood or womanhood. This flower beautified and sweetened Charles Kingsley's life. How much such an example should teach us all! We cannot be preachers, poets, novelists, naturalists, sportsmen, all of which Kingsley was, but none of us need despair of making that little corner of the world called "home" bright and happy, as he did. Because the rectory house was on low ground, the rector of Eversley, who considered violation of the divine laws of health a sort of acted blasphemy, built his children an outdoor nursery on the

"Mount," where they kept books, toys, and tea-things, spending long happy days on the highest and loveliest point of moorland in the globe; and there he would join them when his parish work was done, bringing them some fresh treasure picked up in his walk, a choice wild flower or fern or rare beetle, sometimes a lizard or a field-mouse; ever waking up their sense of wonder, calling out their powers of observation, and teaching them lessons out of God's great green book, without their knowing they were learning. He had no moods with his family, for he cultivated by strict self-discipline, in the midst of worries and pressing business, a disengaged temper, that always enabled him to enter into other people's interests, and especially into children's playfulness. "I wonder," he would say, "if there is so much laughing in any other home in England as in ours." Kingsley met his future wife when he was only twenty years of age. He was at the time full of doubts about religion, and his face, with its unsatisfied, hungry look, bore witness to the state of his mind. He told her his doubts, and she told him her faith, and the former were dispelled by the latter. Sickness and other crosses visited the earthly Paradise which they made for each other when they married, but these crosses they took up together in the right spirit, and helped each other to bear them. Sympathising with a husband's anxiety, Kingsley once wrote to a friend: "I believe one never understands the blessed mystery of marriage till one has nursed a sick wife, nor understands, either, what treasures women are."

Spurgeon had also to nurse a sick wife for years, but this did not prevent his home from being very happy. "It was," says an intimate friend, "the abode of perfect peace and tender affection." Into this home were born twin sons, and the observation of their growth was a source of continual pleasure to the parents. The twins were photographed at birth and every year afterwards until they came of age. Included in one frame the twenty-one photographs were hung up on a wall of his dining-room, and the great preacher used to say, "If we could only grow in grace like that!"

Speaking of his wife when he was Dean of Carlisle, and before their terrible losses, Archbishop Tait says: "The chief happiness of her domestic life was in the children who, one after another, were born to give brightness to the dingy old deanery. Each day while we were in residence she would sally forth in our open car with the whole body of them, when an interval came from the work of the day. In spring-time and in summer we would encamp some four or five miles beyond the smoke of the city, and wander with them seeking wild flowers in the woods or loitering pleasantly by the river-side. And then, as the elder of them grew up, what pleasant hours she spent in reading with them, and how wonderfully she was able to interest their growing intelligence in all the good works which she herself did for Christ's sake."

"And, oh! if there be an Elysium on earth,
It is this, it is this."

Thomas Moore, who wrote these words, did himself taste the Elysium of conjugal happiness. From 1811, the year of his marriage, to 1852, that of his death, his Bessy received from him the homage of a lover. Whatever amusement he might find in the grand society in which he mixed, he always returned to his wife and children with a fresh feeling of delight.

Many women deserve, but few receive, such an IOU as that which Hood gave his wife in one of his letters when absent from her: "I never was anything, dearest, till I knew you, and I have been a better, happier, and more prosperous man ever since. Lay that truth in lavender, sweetest, and remind me of it when I fail."

Miss Martineau, who was a near neighbour of Wordsworth and his wife, has described how very happily they went down the hill of life together, how the old wife would miss her husband, and trot out to find him asleep, perhaps in the sun, run for his hat and watch over him till he awoke. "They seemed like sweethearts courting, they were so tender and attentive to each other."

Wordsworth made at least one joke. When he heard that the poet Browning was going to marry the poetess Miss Barrett, he said, "I hope they'll understand one another." She certainly thought that she understood him, for she wrote to a friend

—"Nobody exactly understands him except me, who am in the inside of him and hear him breathe." The poet and poetess were well matched, but they had to endure the common lot of human nature. With limited means they had to "pay away heaps of guineas" to secure apartments with windows looking due south. The soul-cure of happiness had done wonders for Mrs. Browning, but her bodily ailments were too deep-seated for perfect restoration. In the biography of Robert Browning there is a significant passage, which ought to be considered by all who would practically solve the problem: "How to be happy though married"—"The deep heart-love, the many-sided intellectual sympathy, preserved their union in rare beauty to the end. But to say that it thus maintained itself as if by magic, without effort of self-sacrifice on his part or of resignation on hers, would be as unjust to the noble qualities of both, as it would be false to assert that its compensating happiness had ever failed them."

The other great master of song belonging to our time and country was also conspicuous for conjugal felicity. Tennyson was united to a lady of exquisite taste and refinement, the worthy partner of his honours and his fame. In America, too, latter-day poets have proved that genius is not incapable of entering the Paradise of true family life. Longfellow, Lowell, Whittier, were all unexceptionable husbands.

THAT PEACEFUL TIME.

BY THE VERY REV. A. K. H. BOYD, D.D., LL.D., AUTHOR OF "THE RECREATIONS OF A COUNTRY PARSON," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER I.

HELPED BY NATURE.

HAVE had a month of absolute rest; I do not remember when I had the like before. Thirteen hours of travel part me from my parish: so that calls of duty which would be irresistible if I were within two hours' reach are disregarded. The good people must learn to do without me. And I am to be five Sundays absent from those dear friends: of which four are already past. It is a mistake for any clergyman to preach too regularly in his own church, or churches. It is bad both for the congregation and for himself. One result is that the congregation tends to become unreasonable in its expectations.

Before this little time of rest began, I had ministered in my own churches on twenty-nine of the preceding thirty-one Sundays: the two Sundays of absence being days of specially exhausting duty in two great cities. Yet some grumbled when I came away. I regarded them not, save by recalling St. Paul's wish, that he might "be delivered from unreasonable men:" the accurate translation would be "crotchety men." One's heart was more touched by repeated communications, conveyed in the kindest possible words, which represented that I was "sorely missed." That is extremely proper. One would not like not to be missed by kindly souls to whom one has given one's very best for eight-and-twenty years. When I return home in a few days, and take up the reins as often heretofore, let me hope to be greatly valued. Though I have spoken, let it be added, of absolute rest, it is such rest as is consistent with preaching morning and evening each Sunday here to a very considerable congregation in a lofty church with a great developed chancel, demanding no little exertion of a failing voice. And when I make mention of preaching, I mean (according to the use of the North) conducting the entire service, save that the lessons are read for me. And the service of Scotland takes it out of an aging man. The lessons are read with no little dignity and solemnity; and that by a man who took his B.D. with high credit.

A man who is usually driven beyond his strength is made to feel, in such a time of rest, that it would not be expedient to retire from work altogether. The interest would go from life: you would break down and depart. You cannot live upon your past work: no matter how long and hard it has been. And you forget things, sorrowfully, when you have passed quite away from them. The feeling, half painful, half pleasant, with which you sat down and took up the pen, is wholly forgot when you take up the pen no more. I know one who, having undertaken to write a considerable book, no part of which was to be published till all of it had been written, was painfully possessed by a morbid fear that he never would finish it: in which case all his labour would be lost, as (in point of fact) it never could be finished at all. Wherefore he toiled at it in a killing fashion: and often put on record in a private history always very sad to read, that if he were but suffered to finish this work, he never would attempt anything more. The book was finished: was published: was very successful: but though probably nobody ever read it with greater interest than its author, he could not bear to read the daily record of its composition. There is no one you will ever pity more than you have pitied your own poor weary self of departed days. And this without anything of unworthy selfishness. Yet that solemn vow that this work should be the last was broken like other vows. You must work on, as long as you can: work at all. It is very hard, oftentimes, to work: it is still harder not to work. And above all, if it be the nature of the being to write, he will write while he can take up the pen.

I did not come out to think of this at all. That magnificent Strath: and this miraculous summer evening! It is but the twenty-sixth day of July; yet already the golden hue of harvest is widely spread forth below: where the fine river winds down the broad valley, and the great black hills rise above the yellow gleam. The scenery is Highland; vitally and unmistakably Highland; yet it is not like Perthshire or Argyllshire. It has a character of its own: there is an undefinable but strongly felt difference. Stop: and gaze: and take things in. The ripening rustle is at one's feet: there is a fresh warm breeze which makes waves over the cornfields, which makes an Æolian harp of the telegraph-wires overhead. The landscape, vast in extent, is black towards the west; where the way tends, at the base of these great rounded hills, towards Loch Maree and Skye. Eastward, where a few miles would bring you to the sea, the valley widens into a considerable plain. The plain is now in shadow: save that, far away, there is an oasis of sunshine, a round expanse of blazing green and gold amid the gloom: like the bright days of one's life, which have gone away. When a boy, one would have thought that the people who live in those paradisaical fields must be happy. However that may be, I can thankfully testify that this beautiful aspect of valley and mountain, of dark wood and steely river, has pleasantly helped one pilgrim to-day. You come out, with some little worry stinging you; and in the second plane of the mind there is a long anxiety from which you are never free. But as you plod on, with a heavy foot, patient Nature waits for your attention: gradually she takes hold of it: weans you from your sad thoughts: smiles in your face and murmurs in your ear: till your old heart is lightened wonderfully.

Just at this point two little school-girls came cheerfully along the road, and smiled brightly upon the stranger. They stopped, and in the soft pleasant Celtic voice related what their names were, and their years: also the six miles of daily walk to and from school, and how hard were their lessons. Their ages were ten and eleven: their lessons appeared to me far too long and difficult. But the children looked so bright and happy that I felt sure their instructor was kind and reasonable. The westering sun shone upon the little faces; and a threepenny-piece to each made the faces delightful to see. So we parted, having become old friends. As the little feet tripped away, I thought of Longfellow's lines; and wondered how far they had to go. If one were the possessor of a four-leaved shamrock; ah, if one were but for a moment what Martin Elginbrod, sleeping under the sod in the Highland churchyard, dared to imagine ere he lay down to his rest: how good and happy these little people would be. I note, with great approval, the outward signs of reasonable happiness and goodness in the grown-up folk who abide all about here: and I am hopeful. I trust the little feet, when grown bigger, may never go far south of Inverness. Specially I hope that they may keep far away from Glasgow.

If I could venture to set down all that came into my mind during that lonely walk, it would not be quite suitable to this page. For I wandered off into tracts of theological thinking: and wondered at grim yet sincere religionists in lovely regions like these, who have set up for God a bigger and more powerful devil, selfish and touchy beyond expression; as little like the blessed Truth and the merciful Saviour as any horrible Hindoo image with seven heads: and then have given the holiest Name to that ghastly idol. I remember well a faithful preacher of my youth, who complained bitterly of a worthy soul who spoke of a number of happy children, hardly beyond infancy, as little angels. "Little devils," roared the kindly preacher of the hopeful Gospel: "that's what they are!" Which statement was cheering to those entrusted with their training. And yet, spite of Lord Palmerston's declaration that we are all "born good," it cannot be denied that the heart-breaking sin and misery which have sometimes been developed in later and worse years must have all been (in some sense) latent in the little heart when the little face was so innocent and bright : having so lately come "from God, who is our home." I do not care for the rigour of logic ; as matter of fact, it does not lead us to vital and essential truth. That comes oftencst by sudden intuition. And I will hold with Wordsworth as to the place we came from : as to what we are when we come. If "Heaven lies about us in our infancy," we cannot be such "little devils" after all. Yet things may be latent. Were all the processes of thought which are written on this page present in the formless fog which some would make the origin of all things : potentially containing every thing which ever was to be here ? Truly that fog was a wonderful thing, if it contained not merely all trees and flowers, those round hills with the purple heather covering them, that green grass and yellow corn, all diamonds and steel : but likewise the warm devotion which I saw last night in God's house on divers rapt faces, and this bewilderment with which I am now thinking of the whole question. It takes nothing from the miracle of Creation, though you suppose that a "first impress" gave to that unpromising original the potency of all that was to be. "I know that Thou canst do everything." The patient sufferer said those words long ages ago. The wonder is not diminished if everything was done at once.

It was a great Double-First, the most wrong-headed of the race, who put in print the tremendous declaration that he really thought that Mr. Fletcher of Madeley was better than Christ. And one thought, under that sudden blow, with what unspeakable horror that kindly saint would have heard of the comparison. Down in the dust at the pierced feet ! That is where he would have held himself worthy to be placed. And the first prayer would have been for forgiveness to the poor soul that dared that awful comparison. Yet, if kindness is to be measured by the immediate removal of pain and evil without regard to law and to consequences, there are many good women and good men who are a great deal kinder than God Almighty. That poor old creature I prayed with to-day, who has never been free from grievous pain for two years, and has no prospect before her but of increasing agony till it kills her : do you think if I had been able to work a miracle I should have come out of the cottage door leaving her as I left her ? That little boy coming along the road, that human being of five years old : do you think I should leave him the farthest chance of going to the bad if I had the power to make all his life good and happy ? Well : there is One who could do all that : and does not. My faith is firm that it is because He has good reason : and that all the crushing perplexities through which we cannot see any more than through that granite cliff will be cleared up some day. But why the long weary ages of sin and sorrow, at all ? Why should even Carlyle be able to say, looking round this terrible world, "He does nothing"? It is not so much a moral government under which this universe goes on now, as the faint dawn of a moral government coming. Yet there is enough to make Matthew Arnold see that "the stream of tendency makes for righteousness." There is enough to make Ruskin cry aloud with the voice of an old prophet, believing where he cannot prove, that "you are ultimately to get—exactly what you are worth." Yet, with it all, it cannot be denied that every Court of Justice, every magistrate sitting on how humble soever a judgment seat, every police-constable, is doing all he can to mend the imperfection, the slowness of God's moral government. When I behold a male brute abusing a poor woman, and intervene in the most decisive manner and that on the instant, is it not because though the mills may possibly grind exceeding small, yet they grind a great deal too slowly for me? It really does not suffice to me that I should look on as the cruel blows fall, and say, "Ah, it is punishment enough for you that you are such a brutal savage, and you will quite understand that in about thirty years." Yet it is to be remembered, too, that the burning wrath which has stirred in me at callous cruelty, and the prompt measures taken to stop it, form part of the lagging administration of the great Lawgiver whom we cannot see. It is the old saying, God mend all. It is the old reply (which surely Himself inspired), Nay: but we must help Him to mend it.

I do not know that any reader, seeing the track of thought into which I have got, would say that Nature has helped me much on this bright evening. Yet true it is that these black hills, and that great strath now blazing in the sinking sunshine, have made thoughts bearable which sometimes are not bearable at all. After all, the forlorn hope of humanity is but a very small minority: though this is little comfort to those who are submerged, who are beaten down. And there must be an unimaginable patience and power of looking on at hideous evil and letting it just go on, in the almighty Power which is above us all. Of a sudden, as a gleam from those ripening acres comes to one's sight, some relief comes in a way which is inexplicable. It was Arthur Helps, that wisest and kindest-hearted of men, who said that an amusing little story takes the heart away from trouble as much as anything in common experience.

I have a friend who is a singularly helpful preacher. And helpfulness is what we want now. Never in this world was good man more free from self-conceit. Yet he told me how for a moment he felt flattered, some little. He went to abide for a space at a little town by the Western sea: where the resident parson is good, but beyond words wooden. A homely elder approached him on an early day: and said, very earnestly, "Ye maun preach to us some Sunday while ye're here." My saintly and old friend was pleased. He said to himself, "Here, in this remote place, my reputation has reached before me : and there is a general desire to enjoy the privilege of my excellent ministrations." But in that moment the cold splash in the face came. For the devout old elder, holding up both hands, said with an earnest sincerity not to be misinterpreted, "Oanyboaddy, oanyboaddy, rayther than Mr. Snooks !" As though he said, "You're a very poor hand : but the very poorest is better than the awful orator we hear weekly !" My dear friend felt the incident as somewhat mortifying. But being the most self-forgetting of mankind, and absolutely incapable of the arts of the Pusher, he came next Sunday and did all he knew to guide and comfort such as were needy. I know no man who can do such work better ; very few who can do it as well.

A Pusher is detestable, and contemptible. Some day I may write an accurate history, fully vouched, of certain Pushers I know. Yet it is not pushing, in any evil sense, when a human being avails himself of legitimate opportunities, honourably open to him. Surely it was so when a decent tenant-farmer, away in Cornwall, came to pay his rent. This done, refreshments were offered. "Will you have port or sherry ?" was said, in kindly tones, by as good a woman as is known to me. But the dear man was not one to miss a chance. He answered in a monosyllable, uttered in a deep voice and with a solemn aspect. The word was Bawth ! And he got them both : and departed apparently none the worse.

I turn to go back to where is my temporary home : recalling certain words of a forgotten or in any case unread author, to the effect that there is natural scenery so sublime that it could soothe even remorse. That of course is nonsense : rank nonsense. A sudden bursting upon the view of a scene of inexpressible awfulness might for the instant quite engross the mind, to the exclusion of everything else : but the terrible inward pang would speedily be back again. It is quite another thing to say that nature can calm away fret and worry. The stillness soothes nerves and heart : the grand beauty takes us out of ourselves. Surely it has been so since "Isaac went out to meditate in the field at the eventide." Yet exceptions will occur. I know one who once, thirty years ago, stood for a full hour in a sheltered nook, whence he gazed on one of the grandest of the Bernese Alps. The sharp peaks cut into the blue sky : the great snow-fields were stretched out : every now and then there came the thunder of an avalanche. And these things were new and strange. Yet, all the while, the thought of a petty and sordid trouble possessed him : and the cowardly anticipation of vexation which seemed sure to come, but which in fact never came. Ah, little things are great to us little folk. And sometimes not even the Alps can get at the quick of us. I knew, in departed days, a very hard student who had gone in for certain competitions whose result then seemed as life and death. As the decisive day drew near, he was wrought into a fever of anxiety, which ceased not waking or sleeping. Wherefore, hoping to be calmed, he betook himself to his young sister's grave. It was in a grand churchyard : in a quiet spot of it : and there, time after time, he tried to recall the sweet face and the last words : tried to take in how little all present anxieties would seem when he came to be laid down there : how soon that might be : and even asked her if she could hear him, to say a word up There for her poor restless brother. Sad to say, these things availed not at all : and he turned his steps towards the old quadrangles unrelieved. That was his experience. In the issue, everything went well. He got all he ever wished, or hoped. But he said he would not willingly go through the like again. And he wondered when people talked of academic quiet. It seemed to him a specially nervous and feverish life : for such as aimed at the highest rewards. Of course, these men were few. The most took things easily. For myself, when I look, most days, at the athletic and unworn frame of a famous Senior Wrangler, I always think How anxious you must have been ! Hard enough for him : much harder for those whom he eclipsed. Yet he walks away, with a grand swing, the most unaffected of men : just as if he were nobody in particular. I suppose on most days he forgets all about it.

We do not look far on, we who have grown old : we are content with a little thing. That field of intense green can meanwhile (God be thanked) soothe eye and heart. The long slope of that great mountain (it is a mountain, and a famous one), with the setting sun over it, is enough. Far away from this place, I look continually at the top line of a green hill against the sky : I see it every day. I cannot explain how or why : but, as certain fact, it commonly suffices to somewhat cheer. Often has one looked at it when cheer was greatly needed. And on this beautiful evening of a restful day, I have of a surety been helped by gracious Nature. No doubt this gentle influence gets home, because there is nothing now to greatly worry. One has known times of great anxiety, not about things of personal concern but of public, wherein so mild an anodyne would not have sufficed. You remember how Wordsworth desired, "in hours of fear, or grovelling thought, to find a refuge" in sublime architecture. The sonnets are renowned : are classic : are quite beyond being quoted. Give us that too : though there have been days in which Westminster Abbey would not have helped : in which Winchester Cathedral did in fact leave one very perplexed and anxious. Beyond æsthetic thrill, there is something to be found in a church : there is an end now of "no praying allowed here" : though this strange help, which I have seen sought with a face that seemed near to despair, may be found under the shadow of Ben Wyvis as well as under the roof of King's College Chapel. Indeed, there is no limitation at all, either of time or place. We have supreme authority that fault will not be found though we "pray without ceasing" : though we "pray everywhere."

PHOEBE GRAY—WITCH !

BY C. N. BARHAM.

CHAPTER I.

“S” EE at hinder housen, by'es ; there's the owd witch agen ! Coome along, or her'll do us all a mischeff, together; surely.”

A group of urchins hurried around the corner of the village street, a peal of coarse laughter followed, and a moment later a stone struck the wall of a small cottage, at the open door of which a girl of perhaps twenty summers was standing.

The girl looked up quickly, and a flush either of pain or anger mantled her fair cheek when she heard the unfeeling remark. Then, as she muttered a few words in an undertone to herself, the colour receded, leaving her as pale as before, and she turned and entered the house, closing the door behind her.

As she entered, a bird fluttered from off a shelf above the fireplace, and, uttering a chirp of welcome, perched confidently upon her shoulder ; while a lame dog of nondescript breed crept forward, and, thrusting its cold nose into her warm hand, looked up at her with its soft brown eyes.

The girl smoothed the bird's glossy plumage and pressed its hard yellow bill to her own rosy lips before she gently replaced it upon the shelf from whence it had flown. Then, after fondling the dog's shaggy ears, she took a dilapidated volume out of a cupboard, and sat down upon a low stool to read.

It was a strange book to be found in such a home—a book whose pages, printed in black letter, were adorned with representations of birds, beasts, fishes, trees, and flowers, none of which flourished in East Anglia or upon its coasts, and with geometrical figures—triangles, circles, and pentagons.

The dog stood for a moment ; then, with a little sigh of contentment, it lay down at the feet of the girl, who read on slowly and carefully, tracing every line with her finger, and forming and puckering her mouth whenever she came to a hard word or a sentence which she found it difficult, or even impossible, to construe—which was not seldom.

Presently she laid the book aside, and started to her feet, exclaiming, “What a head I have ! I had quite forgotten the dickey, I do declare !”

Passing through the bake-house, as the scullery was called, the girl went out into the little back garden, which abutted upon the common.

Here she half-filled an old wicker-basket with chaff, among which she proceeded to mix a handful of bruised oats, and gave utterance to a low but prolonged cry.

As if in response to this cry, a rough head, which belonged to a tinker's donkey, was thrust over the low palings, and a pair of long ears expectantly twitched backward and forward.

The girl raised the basket, saying, “Come along, Neddy,” whereupon the donkey, whose back bore traces of the galling saddle, as well as of chronic ill-usage, contentedly began to eat.

A sparrow flew down from the eaves and perched saucily upon the fence, within a foot of where the girl was standing ; while a wasp, after buzzing about her face, quietly alighted upon her naked arm, where it was permitted to remain undisturbed.

As soon as the donkey had finished its welcome repast, the girl threw her arms around its neck, looked intently into its large sad eyes, and, with a sigh, returned to her seat and to her book.

The cottage in which the girl lived all alone, except for her pets, and which her father, old John Gray, had built for himself ten years before he died, was one of a class common in rural districts. It consisted of living-room and bake-house down-stairs, and two small bed-rooms, which were approached by means of a ladder, above. The walls were mud-daubed, and the thatch, thickly overgrown with houseleek, descended to within six feet of the ground. The furniture fitly corresponded with the surroundings. The bake-house contained the large brick oven, an open hearth with hanging hake above, a copper, washing-stool and tub, and a faggot of sticks, with the inevitable jack-towel suspended behind the door. The living-room, cleanly sanded, with a patchwork rug lying in front of the fireplace, presented a more comfortable appearance, with a snowy dresser, three rush-bottomed chairs, an eight-day clock, a triangular nest of book-shelves, and the tidy mantel-piece surmounted with a pair of china dogs, and a couple of old-fashioned brass candlesticks. In one of the rooms up-stairs stood an old trestle bed. The other room was empty.

The cottage stood at the entrance end of the village street. The boldest villager would have hesitated to pass it after nightfall : though labourers, returning late from the ale-house, used sometimes to stand at a distance to watch the flickering lights in the window, wondering what “wicked cantrips” the witch might be engaged in.

For Phoebe Gray was reputed to be a witch. She could, so it was said, transform herself, at will, into a dog or a hare, ride upon a broomstick : milk the farmers' cows at night, or blast either man or beast with a look. Besides, had not old Susannah Wilson, who had previously enjoyed the best of health for upwards of eighty years, become suddenly palsied within a week after Phoebe Gray had smilingly wished her "Good-morning"?

It was certain that the girl sprang from a bad stock, whether these and similar allegations were true or false.

Her father, John Gray, had been, for the greater

For a time, and, indeed, always when sober, he seemed to be afraid of his wife; there was something in her manner which overawed his boorish nature. But this moral cowardice drove him oftener to the drink, and in his drunken fury he behaved more like a beast than a man.

"Sat down upon a low stool to read."—p. 260.

portion of his life, a dissolute village ruffian, a suspected poacher, and had once narrowly escaped a conviction for rick-burning through a flaw in the indictment.

Gray had always, from his boyhood upward, cared more for pleasure than for regular honest field work: while he was notorious for his self-willed disposition, and an ungovernable temper.

He married Agatha Lee, a girl who came from the other side of the county: and directly after the wedding, began to lead her a miserable life.

After the child Phoebe's birth, he became worse than before.

When the child was scarcely two years old, and just began to lisp prettily, as children of that age will do, Gray, with no other apparent object than to vex his wife, taught her to repeat blasphemous oaths and profane ribaldry, and would drug her with strong drink until she rolled helpless upon the floor.

It is impossible to say what the end of such cruelly wicked conduct might have been; for at four years of age the child suddenly disappeared, having, as was generally supposed, been stolen by gipsies; and no trace of her whereabouts could be discovered.

After this, John Gray simply loafed and drank, as if he were resolved to loaf and drink himself into his grave. But he ceased to ill-use his wife, who, by the exercise of her superior will, had regained the mastery over him, though she was unable to check his vicious courses.

At the end of six years he died somewhat suddenly, and within a month from that event Phoebe Gray, who had grown into a tall, angular, pale-faced girl of ten, returned to her mother, who had, it was currently reported, been apprised of her whereabouts in a dream.

The widow at once took charge of her daughter's education; and, if the villagers were to be credited, nothing could have fallen out worse for the child.

Phoebe and her mother were regular in their attendance at church, and the clergyman had not a word to say against either of them. Indeed, he entertained a secret respect for the widow—who possessed knowledge far above that which was usually enjoyed by persons of her station in life—and was, in his old bachelor fashion, attached to Phoebe. But the clergyman was the only person in the village who gave the Grays a good word.

The Widow Gray, by degrees, became known far and wide as the "White Woman of Glemham," and at length was in considerable request among her neighbours.

This was not surprising, for she was possessed of an intimate acquaintance with the medicinal properties of herbs and simples; could cure the effects of adder-bites, understood the various diseases of cows and pigs better even than did the veterinary surgeon from Benhall; and, most mysterious of all in the eyes of the ignorant and superstitious rustics, was able to charm bees. It was whispered that the White Woman had more than once been instrumental in tracing and recovering stolen property, causing the thieves to disgorge their booty. This rumour was not, however, corroborated: the persons who were most deeply interested cared least to talk about such matters.

The widow died when her daughter was eighteen years old; since which time the girl had lived in the cottage alone, except for her pets.

Phoebe Gray was both feared and hated. She had, it was said and believed, inherited the worst vices of both her parents. There were not wanting those who were ready to swear that the White Woman, before she died, had taught the girl a spell, by the employment of which she would be successful in whatever she undertook.

Although the girl was shunned by her neighbours, she was not friendless. Everything that flew, ran, or crawled seemed to recognise a friend and protectress in her. The birds, from rook to linnet, would, after circling around her, alight at her feet, or even upon her shoulder: and no bee or venomous insect had ever stung the hand over which it was free to crawl at pleasure.

This familiarity with the brute creation was regarded as an additional proof of her natural wickedness of disposition, and did more than anything else to cut her off from all association with the villagers. If she had not sold herself to the Prince of the Powers of the Air, they argued, it would have been impossible for her to have controlled such wild things by a word or look.

What bird had ever been known to alight upon the head of George Welham, noted bird-catcher and nest-finder though he was? And as for Phoebe Gray's dog, which she had rescued from the hands of Tom Sadd, who was going to drown it, while it followed the girl like a bewitched thing, would not the mere sight of Tom send it whining and sneaking away? But the most conclusive proof that Phoebe Gray was a witch was furnished by Arthur Brightwell's, the tinker's, donkey. This savage creature was the terror of children, who had teased it until it would run at them open-mouthed, and had never been known at any time to respond to its master's call; yet the girl would fondle its coarse hairy head by the hour together.

The great church clock, which gave the time to the village, had just struck twelve: and, as the last stroke died away upon the ear, Phoebe Gray arose from her lowly seat. With an air of relief she laid her book aside, spoke a word to the dog, gave the bird fresh seed and water, and putting on an old straw hat, which was fantastically trimmed with a long trailing peacock's feather—an unlucky thing to have about the house, people said—passed out through the back yard and emerged upon the common.

The broad breezy waste appeared deserted, except for the girl who hastened onward across the brown sere grass, past the purple heather and the golden gorse, until the village was lost to sight. Then, having first glanced rapidly around to assure herself that no one was within view, she sat down in the welcome shadow of a bush, and folded her hands meditatively in her lap.

Presently a chaffinch settled on a branch above her head, and commenced to sing.

At the first Phoebe did not appear to notice it, but presently other warblers assembled in the bushes, and rendered the glade vocal with their songs; whereupon she took a handful of seeds and bread-crumbs from her pocket and scattered them at her feet.

There was no response to this for a little time, then the songsters, one by one, descended to the feast, until, growing bolder as they were not disturbed, they even ventured to perch upon the recumbent form of the maiden herself.

The wild fauna of our fields and woods are constantly on the alert. Being rendered watchful by an ever-lurking fear of danger, which has been inherited from one generation to another, they quickly discover the presence and whereabouts of a possible foe.

With a simultaneous movement the birds flew away. A shadow fell upon the grass at the girl's feet.

"Phoebe Gray!"

Phoebe sprang to her feet with a startled cry, but quickly sank back into her former position.

The old clergyman stood beside her.

"So you are at your old tricks again, Phoebe Gray," he said, not unkindly.

"The birds were, sir. You saw for yourself how well they know me."

"A shadow fell upon the grass at the girl's feet."—p. 262.

"Yes; and how they trust you, my child. They are either wiser or more foolish than men and women."

"They come to me for food, and I have taught them to love me. I began, you see, when the snow was on the ground."

"It is a wonderful gift. God has endowed you with singular powers, Phoebe Gray; but they ought to be used very wisely and cautiously. Up to the present they have brought you little good, and much misfortune."

"That is true, Mr. Blissard; but it was my mother who taught me how to treat all creatures so as to gain their affection; she declared that if only I persevered all would come well in the end. She gave me a marvellous spell. I am almost afraid to use it sometimes; I don't believe that anything could resist it."

"You must not talk in such a sinful manner, Phoebe," the clergyman said gravely. "I don't like to hear you talk about either spells or charms; the best spell is a kind heart."

The girl answered, "I know it, sir."

"Yet, Phoebe Gray," Mr. Blissard continued, while the shadow of a smile hovered around his thin lips, "I am informed that you have been seen collecting thunder-bolts, which no one may do without risking a headache; and fairy loaves for your forbidden feasts with the little folks."

"But, surely, Mr. Blissard," the girl replied earnestly,

"you know that those stones are fossils, the remains of—dear me! I forget their hard names, but they lived, oh, ever so many thousands of years ago."

"Belemnites and echinæ, my child: you have done no harm. There is nothing wrong in gathering curious stones and shells, or in loving God's living creatures," he said. "If you never do worse than that, you will be an innocent girl indeed."

"Do you think so?" Phoebe asked. "If that is so, why does everyone in the village hate me?"

"Not everyone," he answered gently.

"No, because you do not. But all the others do."

"They do not understand you as I do."

"It isn't that," she replied; and for the first time there was a note of defiance in her voice. "I know things that they don't; and so they fear me. I know all the herbs on the country-side, and when to gather them. I could tell you strange things about the commonest flowers. I could indeed, sir."

"It would be better if you couldn't, Phoebe Gray: your knowledge has done you no good; but come; I will see you safe home, and you may tell me what you will."

"No, I don't want to go home yet. I want to stay, and think. Besides, if I am alone, the birds will come back again."

So the good clergyman left Phoebe Gray, who remained where she was hour after hour: and her feathered friends sang on merrily and fearlessly.

When the sun was setting, she arose to her feet, and wandered on, still in the direction farthest from the village.

The girl wandered on and on until the air was filled with a heavy odorous scent. Looking over a gate, she saw a field of beans in full bloom. Utterly regardless of the local belief that those who fall asleep in a bean-field will either have awful dreams or go crazy, Phoebe gathered great bunches of the flowers, and danced with them in her hands, and laughed and played, and spoke to them as though they were living things; and then, weary as a child, she lay down nestling among her favourites, and was soon asleep; and when the white moon rose and shone upon her pale face and upon her small white hands, her sleep looked like death.

The night grew colder, and a heavy dew lay upon the grass when Phoebe awoke. A night-owl was hooting in the adjacent wood, and that eerie sound amidst the solemn stillness might have affrighted a less unsophisticated child of nature than the witch-girl. But she was not afraid: night was her favourite time.

CHAPTER II.

THE girl arose to her feet, threw away the withered flowers, and started upon her journey homeward.

The air upon the common was cool and fresh, and the splayed patches of gorse looked strangely beautiful in the moonlight.

Presently Phoebe heard a measured footfall behind her, but she neither turned her head nor quickened her pace. Then something rough, hard, and cold pushed against her arm. It was the tinker's donkey.

An hour later Phoebe crept like a guilty thing into the village.

She was hastening stealthily towards her cottage when she became conscious that someone was watching her; with a movement almost as swift as that of one of the wild things she loved, she darted into the house and disappeared, closing the door behind her.

A man named Walter Hazell stepped from out of the shadow of the old church.

He murmured—

"So the witch has been walking to-night. We shall hear of something in the morning."

Walter Hazell was the village blacksmith. He was tall, dark, and saturnine in appearance, a man of irreproachable character, well-to-do, and a bachelor.

All who knew Hazell liked and respected him: from the farmers who employed him, and the labourers who hung around his glowing forge, to the women who impressed upon their daughters what a good catch he would be for some fortunate girl.

The blacksmith had a foible. He hated Phoebe Gray, believed firmly in her powers for evil, lost no possible opportunity of injuring her by word or deed, and because of her refused to attend his parish church.

"How can I go to church to hear that man Blissard?" he would exclaim, when expostulated with. "His marching orders say, 'Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live,' and yet he is hand-and-glove with Phoebe Gray. The girl has bewitched him, that's what it is."

At daybreak next morning Arthur Brightwell's donkey was found lying dead, with its throat cut, within a hundred yards of the witch's cottage, while Phoebe Gray was kneeling beside it, sobbing as if her heart would break.

Brightwell, with several of his neighbours, was soon upon the scene of the outrage. He started forward to seize the girl. As he touched her shoulder she sprang to her feet, and stood confronting him with flashing eyes.

The cowardly ruffian sprang backward in hapless terror.

"Somebody knock her down!" he howled: "she'll do us all a mischeff with them 'ere eyes o' hern, together." But not one of those present cared to run the risk of laying hands upon Phoebe Gray.

"Monster that you are!" the girl cried, in high shrill tones; "this poor unhappy creature has escaped your malice. You tortured it almost to death, though it was as much superior to you as that sun is high above the earth; but"—and she almost choked as her tearful eyes fell upon the poor dead creature—"it won't feel your blows now."

"Shut up, foul witch, and don't let us have any more of your cursing! Who killed the donkey?"

"Aye, who killed it?" she retorted, with the air of a pythoness. "You shall every one of you know who did this cruel thing. Only wait until the sun stands directly above your heads in the sky to-morrow, and the crime shall be brought home to the hand that struck the blow."

"In course she knows all about it, Brightwell: for she's the wery beggar wot did it, witch as she is," snuffed a fellow; but the tinker had disappeared. The other men, one by one, withdrew, leaving Phoebe Gray alone with the dead beast.

The same day a little group of working-men, with the aggrieved tinker, Arthur Brightwell, among them, assembled at the blacksmith's forge or smithy.

Hazell was the first to speak.

"It's time, mates," he said, "that we took and showed ourselves men, and dealt wi' this 'ere matter together, as it ought to be dealt with. There's a way o' finding out whether a body's a witch or not, and if yeu'll all stand by me, I'm of a mind to try it."

"Aye, Walter, lad," they all growled, "trust us; we'll see it through."

"Then what I have to say first is this, Ony taking this ere winter and spring, we've had our owd friend Farmer Geator's sow die; Joe Barnes's cow dropped, too; the widow Garrett's shop was broken into; the chimney at 'The Lion' caught fire; then the measles went through the willage; and now there's this outrage on Brightwell. We can't bear it; and we oughtn't to do so."

"We can't, Hazell: it ain't to be expected."

It may be observed that the smith said nothing of his having been abroad on the preceding night.

"Then, if you're all agreed," Hazell went on, "the next time anything happens, we'll put that witch-girl to the trial."

Phoebe Gray, ignorant of this decision, and careless of the hostility which she had long before learned to despise, remained for some time longer beside the body of the animal that had loved and trusted her. Then she withdrew into the cottage, and sat for the greater portion of the day poring over the abstruse volume of old-world lore, or meditating upon the events of the night and morning.

Night fell at length.

"I am afraid I have startled you, Phœbe Gray," he said.

"Is it you, Mr. Blissard?" she asked, wonderingly.

"Yes, Phœbe. I am in a difficulty. Brightwell, the tinker—you know him—was knocked down and "You call me witch! Fear to provoke me too far."—p. 267.

Phœbe Gray was sitting in the gloaming, when she was startled by a knock at the door.

She looked up bewildered: such a thing had never happened before. She had no visitors.

The knock was repeated.

The girl stood irresolute for an instant, then with a firm hand she withdrew the bolt.

A man stood before her.

run over by a wagon this evening. Freeman says 'there's no hope for him'—a ruined constitution, you know; he may go before morning. Now, I want a woman to sit up with him, and can't find one. What is to be done? I have come to you."

Phœbe looked at the clergyman with a strange expression as she answered—

"I will sit up with him."

"Will you, though? That was exactly what I hoped you would do, Phoebe; although I scarcely dared to ask you to do so. This is a case in which your knowledge will be peculiarly valuable. When will you be able to come, eh?"

"Now, Mr. Blissard, at once."

"Then come with me. There is no time to lose."

Brightwell lay unconscious upon a broken-down pallet-bed. Only an occasional moan announced that he was alive.

"There is your patient," the clergyman said, pointing to the sufferer. "Will you be afraid to take charge of him, do you think?"

"No, indeed—no."

"Remember, he may die, Freeman says, at any time. I suppose he is fearfully crushed internally. Don't remain alone if you have the slightest fear; I will try to find someone else to take the place."

"I saw my mother die," the girl replied simply.

"Ah! I forgot. You must make yourself as comfortable as you can, Phoebe Gray. There doesn't appear to be much available for the purpose, but do your best. It is not at all cold, and your patient is not likely to give you much trouble. If there should be any perceptible change for the worse, you had better run over for me. If not, I shall be here early in the morning. That is all, I think."

When the clergyman left, Phoebe sat down and watched the sufferer.

The hours passed slowly, wearily, and there was no change.

The sufferer continued to moan at intervals, and the watcher adjusted a bandage or applied a lotion from time to time—that was all.

A grey light was beginning to show in the east when Brightwell opened his eyes.

His gaze fell upon Phoebe Gray, and he stared at her with a frightened expression upon his grey face.

"Where am I?" he asked faintly.

"Hush!" she replied. "You must not talk."

"But where am I? and what are you doing here?"

"You must be very quiet. You are in your own house; but you have met with a bad accident, and I have come to nurse you," the girl answered, in a low firm tone.

"But you're the witch, ain't you, now? Don't kill me with that 'ere ugly look o' yours!" he wailed.

The girl winced, but she forced herself to reply—

"I am Phoebe Gray, and am not going to hurt you; but you must go to sleep if you wish to get well."

"Yes, I know: you're Phoebe Gray, the witch. I've spited you lots o' times. Keep off, I say—keep off!" And the sick man's voice rose into a shriek.

Phoebe approached the bed, and, leaning over him, uttered a few words in his ear.

Whatever they may have been, they produced a magical effect.

A look of restfulness came into his face, and he murmured—

"Yes, that's what my old mother said. Nobody ever told me that but my mother, and she's dead—only you've got her voice. Tell me it again."

She did so.

He smiled, and said—

"Tell them that the witch is an angel!"

That was Brightwell's last effort; he relapsed into unconsciousness.

Day grew apace, and Phoebe Gray shivered in the cold morning air; but she remained, sleepless and watchful, at her post.

The clergyman relieved her at six o'clock.

At ten o'clock the tinker died.

The news of his death spread quickly, and a meeting was hastily convened at the smithy.

"This is the end on 't, mates," Walter Hazell said firmly; "the gal 's killed Brightwell, for sartin. The parson wor gull enow to send her there last night, and 't worn't likely as she'd miss her chance; but it's our turn now! What do yeow sa'? Shall we do it?"

A loud and angry cry of "Yes!" burst from the throats of a score of excited men; and, led by the blacksmith, they hurried off in the direction of the girl's cottage.

Phoebe Gray saw them coming; but if she guessed their errand, she made no sign.

The men derived courage from their numbers.

Hazell opened the door, but he hesitated to cross the threshold—brave as he undoubtedly was, he felt afraid; but he had gone too far to turn back.

The girl arose and faced them, without a trace of fear that they could discover.

She asked unfalteringly—

"What do you want here?"

To which Hazell replied—

"We want you!"

Thereupon someone from behind shouted—

"Drag the witch out, and let's drown her in the pond!"

The girl took no notice of the ominous words, but, as if she had not heard them, asked again—

"What do you want with me?" Then she added boldly: "Tell me your business and go, for I have no time to waste in foolishness."

Hazell answered brutally—

"Phoebe Gray, you have been a curse to Glemham long enough; and now that you have killed Brightwell—don't deny it!" he interjected, as a look of horror crossed her face—"we mean to put an end to your devilries!"

Phoebe Gray realised the peril in which she stood, and her heart sank within her; but she replied, bravely enough—

"I have never knowingly injured anyone, Mr. Hazell; and, so far from having wilfully hurt Mr. Brightwell, I would rather have saved his life if it had been possible."

"Aye, yeow'd ha' saaved his life, saame as yeow did his owd dickey's, gal. We know yer tricks, we do!"

By this time the smith had advanced into the room.

His companions crowded in after him.

The lame dog snarled savagely, but a hasty kick sent it howling underneath the table.

This outrage upon her canine favourite roused all the passion in the girl's nature.

"Cowards and bullies!" she panted, "isn't it enough that you must break into an honest woman's house with murder in your black hearts, but you must hurt one of God's poor defenceless creatures? You call yourselves men—paugh! you are worse than brutes! Go at once!"

"Stow it, missus, or else we'll may-be cut up rough."

"Do, if you dare!" she exclaimed. "You call me witch! Fear to provoke me too far."

But the burly smith, seizing her roughly by the shoulders, said—

"It's of no use, my laady; yeow've played that game oncet too often; yeow've gotten to coome wi' us. We be desprit 'tarmined min, and aren't going to be balked neow!"

"Take her charm away fruv her, Hazell; she'll be helpless then."

"Aye, so I will!" the smith made answer, and he clutched at a thin ribbon which Phoebe Gray wore around her neck.

The ribbon broke, leaving a red weal upon the girl's neck.

"Here, we've gotten it!" Hazell cried, holding up a small silken bag which contained something thin and square.

"Give it to me, please do; it was my mother's," the girl tremblingly said; but her cry was drowned in fierce exclamations—

"We've gotten her neow; let's duck her!"

Phoebe Gray fell back. As she did so a few flecks of foam gathered upon her lips, and she gasped for breath.

"What does this mean? For shame!—you are a disgrace to the village. Make room, and let me pass."

The fellows sullenly fell back, and the clergyman entered.

"What are you doing here?—explain!" Then Mr. Blissard saw Phoebe, and he cried: "You have killed this poor child, you ruffians! Stand back—let me get to her."

He knelt down, unfastened the bosom of her dress, and laid his hand upon her heart.

"She is a witch, sir," Hazell growled sulkily.

"A witch!" the clergyman repeated, contemptuously; "then I wish she could bewitch you all, and you would be better men than you are, or ever have been."

"Look at this, sir," Hazell said, holding out the little bag, "and if that doesn't prove that she has dealings with the Evil One, I'll beg your pardon, and hers too, blamed if I don't."

"It is too late for you to beg her pardon. You have killed her, I am afraid, between you; but if you have, you shall smart for it, as surely as there is a law in this land. Go now at once. Send Dr. Freeman here immediately; and, see, meet me at the vicarage at seven o'clock this evening, everyone of you. Stay away at your peril!"

The abashed intruders slunk away like schoolboys who had been detected in a crime.

Dr. Freeman was quickly at the cottage. His practised eye immediately detected the rapid approach of death.

"It is useless to do anything, Blissard," he said; "she is going. The excitement may have hastened the end, but her heart was in a bad state."

"Will she become conscious, Freeman?"

"No. See, she is going now. There! This is the end."

Phoebe Gray heaved a deep sigh, her eyes opened, they rested upon the face of the clergyman—the only person who had understood her—and her spirit fled from the scene of earthly trial.

Hazell and his companions were punctual in their attendance at the vicarage. It was with no enviable feelings that they waited upon the clergyman, whose salutary reproofs gave evil-doers many a bad quarter of an hour from time to time.

They were shown into the study.

The vicar arose, and met them with grave sternness. He did not invite them to sit down; but proceeded at once to speak.

"You know, all of you, that Phoebe Gray is dead," he said.

There was a rustling of feet, but no reply.

He continued, "Fortunately for you, the medical man gives the cause of death as heart-disease. You may thus escape the punishment of all human law: but ask yourselves whether, before God, you do not stand guilty of that poor girl's blood?"

"She wor a witch, sir, and she kilt the tinker's Dickey, an' he too," one of the men found courage to reply.

"Even if she had done so—which she did not—you had no right to take the law into your own hands, Wheal. But the tinker admitted, before he died, that he killed the donkey himself in a passion; while you are all of you aware that if it had not been for poor Phoebe Gray, Brightwell might have died like a dog: for not a woman in the place would go near him."

Hazell, who had not yet spoken, now said, "That is all very well, sir, as far as it goes; though we've only yer word for it, do 'ee see? But, I repeat it, the gal wor a witch: an' the Bible says, 'There shall not be among you a witch.' Neow, here's her whole bag of tricks, and if yeou'll take it, I shall be glad to get quit on 't, for I don't know what rippery it may contain."

The clergyman quietly took the bag, which the smith held out, and opening it, produced a piece of cardboard, in size about five inches by four, which had been closely written upon on one side in a woman's handwriting.

"Listen, all of you," Mr. Blissard said solemnly, "to the spell which you fear so much; and he read slowly, reverently, and clearly, so that all might hear, "Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord. Therefore if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing, thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head."

"God forgive us!" Walter Hazell groaned, when the minister concluded; "but we've made a terrible mistake, together."

"Parson," Wheal said, "that gal wor better 'n eny on us; and that's a fact. I'm mortal sorry, I be."

When the men left the vicarage, they set to work honestly to clear the character of the dead girl from the cloud which had rested upon it during her lifetime; and they did this so effectively that the cottage which drunken John Gray had built was visited as if it had been a shrine.

A head-stone, provided by subscription, to which even the poorest contributed their mite, was erected over the grave of the witch, and contained the simple but eloquent inscription—

"Phœbe Gray, aged twenty-four; died June 14th, 1886.

"Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good."

HARBOURS OF REFUGE.

JESUS HOSPITAL, BRAY.

OUR title is, of course, borrowed from the beautiful "poem on canvas" which, through the generosity of Mr. William Agnew, has lately become the property of the nation, and is now one of the great centres of attraction at the National Gallery. Frederick Walker's picture of almshouse-life, entitled "The Harbour of Refuge," cannot but touch a sympathetic chord in every heart, whilst it appeals not less forcibly, by its beauty of line and colour, to the educated eye of the lover of "Art for Art's sake." The old lady, bowed beneath the weight of years and infirmities, whose tottering steps are supported by the towering strength of the younger woman, suggests the thought which is so happily expressed in the title of the picture. The quiet evening light, the dozing figure of one old man upon the commodious garden bench, and the easy and unexciting occupation of those who listen to the reading by a confrère of news from the outer world, with which one feels they have no longer any intimate concern: all point to the quiet enjoyment of life's evening;

young figure of the mower typifies its close. The picture arouses again within us the pathetic interest we have all felt in visiting those old-world institutions which have, in days gone by, proved veritable "harbours of refuge" to many a storm-tossed human vessel, and will, we may well hope, yet extend their friendly shelter to many generations of the deserving poor, who love not the great gaunt wards of the Union workhouse.

The buildings represented in this picture are those of the Jesus Hospital at Bray, near Maidenhead; but the artist has not followed with literal accuracy the details of that picturesque group of almshouses. He has given greater importance to his principal figures and more variety to the whole picture by substituting for the level garden and paved footpath a terraced causeway protected by a dwarf wall, and terminating in steps which descend to the level of the lawn, in the centre of which stands a statue upon a high ceried window of late and somewhat debased perpendicular Gothic style, of which the faults will reveal themselves only to the eye of the architectural expert, whilst its picturesqueness is apparent to everyone.

The hospital—the word is used, of course, in its original sense, “a place of hospitality”—was founded by William Goddard, a member of the London Fishmongers' Company, in 1609; the buildings were commenced in 1623, and completed in 1628. It accommodates thirty-four poor persons of both sexes, selected from amongst the parishioners of Bray, and six “Company's almspeople,” who are either old and decayed freemen of the Company, or connections of such freemen; but as some of the nominees are married, the actual number of residents varies between forty-five and fifty. The allowance to parishioners is six shillings each per week if single, eight-and-sixpence if married. The Londoners—presumably to compensate for having no friends at hand to help them, and in consideration that “London poor would be less able to assist themselves by their labour than parishioners”—are in receipt of the comfortable little income of eleven-and-pedestal, said to have been painted from one which formerly stood in Soho Square. Yet how fitly is it introduced here, its friendly shadow reminding us of the sheltering benevolence of the founder whom it may be supposed to represent.

But the painter has retained the general character of the buildings and the chapel, with its tra-sixpence each weekly if single, or sixteen shillings if married (for husband and wife, although residing together, cannot both become “brother” and “sister” of the charity, that right being vested in one only, although it has now become usual, in case of the death of a married “brother” or “sister,” to elect the widow or widower to the vacancy).

But, accepting the courteous aid of the resident chaplain, who is also the curate of the parish, let us see something of the inner life of the hospital. The gateway by which we have entered passes beneath the chaplain's house, a two-storeyed building, corresponding to a certain extent in height and appearance with the chapel on the opposite side of the quadrangle. On either hand are low buildings of one storey, but with “dormer” windows pleasantly varying the lines of the tiled roofs, as do also the chimneys which peep up behind. As a rule, each doorway has a window on either side of it, and, in fact, opens upon two inner doors, leading to two separate apartments. Each brother, sister, or married couple has but one such apartment to serve as bed-room and living-room; but it is of fair size, with a window at either end, a fire-place across one corner, and a second door, carefully screened to keep out the draught, leading into the garden behind, where each inmate has his or her own plot, usually devoted to vegetables and fruits, though not destitute of floral adornments. Up some steep steps, hardly suited, one thinks, to aged limbs, is a loft, lighted by one of the dormer windows we have already mentioned, where the fagots are stored, fuel being supplied to each person under the original indenture of foundation.

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL, ABINGDON.

FORD'S HOSPITAL, COVENTRY.

Some of the apartments which we enter are marvels of neatness, cleanliness, and comfort, hung round with prints and portraits, and gay with flowers and the song of pet birds. One old lady, whose eyes are dim with age, will perhaps mention in conversation some friend whose picture "hangs somewhere on that wall, or used to"; another, with failing memory, will ascribe a fabulous antiquity to the heirlooms she displays for your gratification; but her affection for them is so genuine that her very exaggerations kindle your regard and sympathy.

These old people seem to have but little dread of the Great Leveller; they will talk with smiles upon their faces of their approaching dissolution. There are some faces here, indeed, which it is a pleasure to look upon—faces which wear a perennial smile, which eighty winters and more have not been able to rob of the colour of health, whilst they have bowed the frame and whitened the hair; and if there are others which remind us that life is full of cares and troubles, let us rejoice that in the evening of their days they have found refuge in this quiet haven, under kindly Christian care, with at least no anxieties regarding their daily food—except, indeed, the cooking of it.

Two of the almspeople act as "keepers," to open and shut the gates, ring the chapel bell, etc.; and in one corner of the quadrangle we find the tiny workshop of the tailoress, who looks after the repairs of the clothing of the inmates, each of whom receives out of the funds of the charity a new garment every second year—a blue coat in the case of the men, and a blue gown in that of the women. These coats and gowns are worn on all public occasions—such as the Sunday services—each ornamented with the badge of the hospital.

The chapel is light, cheerful, and even pretty. It still contains some of the original carved woodwork in screen and pulpit.

Another Thames-side town—Abingdon—contains a very interesting almshouse, known as Christ's Hospital. This charity is of much greater antiquity than the Jesus Hospital, for we learn that it was old in 1388, having been founded by a confraternity of "Brethren of the Holy Rood"—one of the many religious communities which were suppressed by Henry VIII. The trust was revived, however, by Edward VI., and endowed with about three-fourths of the old endowments. By the Charter the governors are required to keep in repair the bridges over the rivers Thames and Ock at Abingdon, besides maintaining the almshouse and carrying out other charitable schemes. The grammar-school has, in fact, been rebuilt, and a public park laid out in recent years with funds derived from the endowments.

The ancient building, part of which is represented in our sketch, occupies one side of the churchyard of St. Helen's Church, and accommodates thirteen almspeople. It is remarkable especially for its cloister, or screened passage-way, running the whole length of the front, with a picturesque timber porch; and for the panelled central hall, in which prayers are read, with its carved and moulded pilasters between the panels, its massive old tables, and the pretty lantern in the roof. and the corresponding gable at the other end, are decorated with quaint old paintings; and the hall contains portraits of the principal benefactors; for here, as in almost all other cases, the original endowments have been largely increased by later bequests. Time and again some well-to-do man, elected to a governorship of the charity, would find his interest in it and his conviction of its usefulness growing until he would give it a place in his will; so does a close acquaintance with good works stir us up to emulate them.

Besides this building, there are two others close by—one of which occupies another side of the churchyard—of more recent date, built and maintained out of the funds, and forming part of, "Christ's Hospital." The three buildings accommodate thirty-six persons, of whom, at the date of our visit, every one was over seventy years of age, several over eighty, and one over ninety. That a pension is almost a guarantee of long life is proverbial, and the same may be said of a nomination to an almshouse—which is surely a strong argument in favour of the pension and the almshouse.

It must frequently happen amongst a community of aged persons that one and another will become bed-ridden or too feeble to do even the day's necessary duties. For such the assistance of a "nurse" must be of the highest importance; and here at Christ's Hospital we find two, one in each of the principal buildings. The allowance to the inmates is eight shillings each per week, out of which the recipients find their own food and fuel.

Abingdon has several other almshouses, one of which, indeed, occupies a third side of St. Helen's churchyard. It was built in 1707 by Charles Twitty, for three old men and three old women, inhabitants of Abingdon, and originally, like Christ's Hospital, had a central hall, which, however, is now used as a nurse's house.

Coventry is another city well provided with almshouses, two of which are of special interest, and particularly the fine timber building known as Ford's Hospital—a very perfect and beautiful example of its style, and in exceptionally good preservation. This was founded by William Ford, a citizen of Coventry, who, by his will, dated 1509, ordered that an almshouse should be built beside the Grey Friars' Gate, for five men and one woman to dwell in, each to have fivepence weekly. His executor, William Pisford, by will, dated 1517, provided funds for the maintenance of six poor men and their wives, about sixty years of age or older, in the hospital, which therefore had evidently been already built. The allowance to each couple was to be sevenpence-halfpenny; money was much scarcer in those days than in these. The original building contains twelve apartments of two rooms each, one above the other, and a large room formerly used as the chapel, but adapted as a dwelling. Accommodation is now, however, provided for seventeen or eighteen almspeople, who, strange to say (considering that the hospital was originally built for the use of poor men), are all women. About thirty non-resident almswomen receive the same pension as those in the hospital—namely, four shillings each weekly, and a ton of coals every winter—and from these non-resident almswomen vacancies are filled up as they occur, the right of nomination to the benefits of the charity being exercised by the members of the City Council in rotation.

Bablake Hospital, in the same city, although not so fine a building, is still of great interest. It was founded by Thomas Bond, Mayor of Coventry, in 1506. There are sixty almsmen in receipt of the allowance of six shillings weekly and fuel, of whom eighteen reside in the hospital, where they have the services of two nurses. There is a common kitchen, where the food is prepared by the nurses, and a common sitting-room. In this case also the property of the charity is administered by trustees, who hand over the net proceeds, amounting to about £1,000 a year—nearly double the revenue of Ford's Hospital—to the City Council, to be applied to the purposes of the charity; and two members of the council attend each Sunday, when the roll is called over, and the almsmen parade, in their black gowns, to the adjoining church. The hospital is a long, low, two-storeyed building, backing on to the street and opening into a court-yard of very picturesque character, as our sketch shows. Two other sides of this court-yard are occupied by the buildings of Wheatley's School, founded in 1560 by Thomas Wheatley, who was also a mayor of the city. Admission is obtained to both institutions through the gateway shown in our illustration of the exterior. The fourth side of the court-yard is open to Bablake Churchyard.

Not less picturesque is Leicester's Hospital at Warwick, with its chapel of St. James built over the west, or "hongyng" gate of the town. The eastern gate, at the other end of the High Street, has also a church, now disused, built over it. Our own visit to Leicester's Hospital was made early one spring morning—indeed, before the gates were opened, and when the air in this high position was almost intoxicating in its freshness. From the terrace surrounding the chapel we watched the morning mists clear away before the advancing sun, and a glorious landscape grow before our eyes. We were in time to see the first rasher of bacon put down in the common kitchen for the morning meal, and doubtless enjoyed our own breakfast all the better for its appetising smell. This common kitchen is itself the depository of a curious collection of old arms, brought hither by one and another of the inmates who from the great Elizabethan earl's own time have been selected principally—almost exclusively—from men who have seen military service.

The hospital was originally the hall or mansion of the United Guilds of the Holy Trinity and St. George, and after the dissolution of the religious houses was acquired by Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester—the Leicester of Scott's "Kenilworth"—and by him altered and converted to its present purpose. The almsmen have always worn on public occasions the blue gown with the cognisance of the founder—a bear and ragged staff—on the left arm. Our drawing shows the stone gateway, just beyond the nearest cottages (which do not form part of the hospital), through which access is gained to the building. Near to the foot of the steps leading up to the chapel we find an arch, through which we pass into the quadrangle, with the master's house, once occupied by Thomas Cartwright, the eminent Puritan, opposite to us, and on our right a covered outside staircase leading to the first-floor rooms. Between the main building and the chapel a door opens into the Great Hall, in which, in 1617, King James I. was royally entertained by Fulke Greville, Chancellor of the Exchequer, but which is now divided by wooden partitions into a number of little closets for the storing of the almsmen's coats, and, indeed, seems fast hastening to decay. Each brother now receives an allowance of £80 a year.

The almshouse for women at Castle Rising, in Norfolk, is worthy of mention as probably the last place in England where the tall steeple hat is still worn. With the blue gown and the Howard badge (in memory of the founder), it forms part of the regulation costume for public occasions.

Curious also is the costume worn by the "Corporal" of the Coningsby Hospital at Hereford—coat, waistcoat, and tight-fitting trousers, all of military red, and a flat-crowned hat. This, again, is a hospital for old soldiers, natives of the neighbourhood, and was built by Sir Thomas Coningsby in 1614, on the site of an earlier religious house, some portion of the ruins of which still remain, including an outdoor stone pulpit of great interest.

The very picturesque Hospital of St. Anne at Appleby recalls to our minds an interesting statement which we find in Nicholson and Burns' "History of Westmoreland." The endowment of this charity consists in part of property formerly the "Hospital of St. Nicholas." This hospital (which shared the fate of other religious houses at the time of the Dissolution) was given by John de Veteripont to the Abbey of Shap; and the donation was confirmed by the Bishop of Carlisle on condition that maintenance should be given to three lepers for ever. Fortunately for us, such a condition is entirely obsolete.

The Hospital of St. Anne, which we have just mentioned, was founded by Anne, Countess Dowager of Pembroke, in 1654; and the same deed provided for the yearly distribution of £4 to the poor of Brougham, at the Sundial, which had then been lately erected, "in memory that the said Countess and her dear mother Margaret, late Countess of Cumberland, did there last part, and took their last farewell of each other."

As an example of the more imposing class of building which we occasionally find devoted to the purposes of charity, we give an illustration of Archbishop Abbot's Hospital at Guildford. This hospital was founded in 1619, and appears to have been a pet scheme of the good archbishop's, who frequently lodged here himself in the master's house, which occupies the south-east corner of the quadrangle, and is celebrated for its fine oak staircase. The hospital, which stands in the High Street, a little above the picturesque town hall, is entered by a gateway beneath a fine brick tower which reminds us of Hampton Court, and which possesses a pair of exceptionally fine wrought-iron gates. The second floor of this gate-tower is the "strong room," in which the ill-fated Duke of Monmouth was lodged, on his way to London after his disastrous defeat at Sedgemoor. From the roof above a fine view of the town and surrounding country can be obtained. The west side of the quadrangle affords accommodation for twelve brethren, and the east side for eight sisters, all of whom are over sixty years of age. There is a chapel, a wainscoted hall of great interest, with the original massive oak dining-tables of enormous weight, and above the hall a board-room, with a fine carved oak fireplace and over-mantel. The spandrels over the doors are filled with fan-shaped flutings of very delicate workmanship.

But perhaps the most interesting institution of the kind in all England is the Hospital of St. Cross at Sparkbrook, near Winchester, founded by Henry de Blois, Bishop of Winchester, in 1132, for the maintenance of thirteen poor and aged men, and to provide dinner for one hundred other poor men "of modest behaviour." Tradition, indeed, says that a religious house existed here long before that date. The guardianship was vested in the Master and Brethren of the Hospital of St. John of Jerusalem, but transferred by Henry II. to the Bishop of Winchester, Cardinal Beaufort, in 1444, greatly enlarged the buildings, providing accommodation for two priests, thirty-five brethren, and three sisters in lodgings which he termed "The Almshouse for Noble Poverty." The Beaufort Tower and the great hall, with its Minstrel Gallery, its timber roof and open fireplace, date from this period. The "wayfarers' dole" of bread and beer is still freely given to all comers at the gate—at least, until the day's supply is exhausted. The brethren receive a weekly allowance of five shillings, besides dinner, which is provided in the common hall, but usually taken by each to his private apartments. There are certain "gaudy days," when the brethren may truly be said to "fare sumptuously." They dine together in the hall, in their black gowns with silver badges, with extra allowances of meat and beer, and such delicacies as "mince pies and plum broth." The scene is a picturesque one, and carries the mind back to the "ages" whence the custom is derived, and which, however "dark" they may have been, did not ignore the moral influence of a hearty meal. The present age seems to be returning to a similar practice.

TOUCHING THE KETTLE.

BY THE REV. JOHN TELFORD, B.A.

JOHN RUSKIN'S Præterita has given the world many a pleasant glimpse into the homes of his boyhood, at Hunter Street, Brunswick Square, in the heart of London; and then at Herne Hill, where, under his mother's patient training, he learned the great lessons of his life—"peace, obedience, faith—these three for chief good; next to these, the habit of fixed attention with both eyes and mind." We see the little fellow plodding through that notable feat—committing to memory the 119th Psalm—afterwards to become of all parts of the Psalter the most precious to him "in its overflowing and glorious passion of love for the law of God." The tasks set to the boy were not always easy, but he long ago recognised what a debt he owed "to that discipline—patient, accurate and resolute," which his mother brought to bear on his early training. John Ruskin was an only child, but that fact was not allowed to become an excuse for indulgence and foolish blindness to faults of temper or disposition. His mother lavished all her care upon her little son; she sometimes seemed too rigid a disciplinarian in the eyes of her friends, but she had caught the spirit of the great maxim, "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it." Her very fear of spoiling her boy made Mrs. Ruskin sometimes hide her love under a seeming show of severity. "It seems that she did not consider her child as a toy, but as a trust; to be taught by experience, or when that failed, to be punished into obedience, and into something like her own self-control. When he tumbled down-stairs she whipped him that he might learn to be more careful; and he certainly acquired an adroitness and presence of mind which have often surprised his companions in mountain-climbing. When he came in to dessert, or played among the fruit-trees, she drew the line at one currant; and there are few men of his artistic and poetical sort who are less tempted to self-indulgence in anything. When an affectionate aunt sent him a gaudy Punch and Judy, they were put away, and he was thrown on his own resources for amusement."*

* Collingwood's "Life and Work of John Ruskin," I., p. 16.

This seems to our more modern notions rather harsh training. There is no doubt that it lacked tenderness, and gave the boy, who had neither brother nor sister, nothing to love. But it had its compensations; it taught the art critic of the future to use his imagination and his eyes, to invent games for himself, and turn a sort of microscopic gaze on fruit and flower and tree which invested them all with an unfailling charm in the eyes of the boy observer. We see one of the delights of that cloistered boyhood in a touching little reminiscence. "For many and many a year to come—until, indeed, the whole of life became autumn to me—my chief prayer for the kindness of heaven, in its flowering seasons, was that the frost might not touch the almond blossom."

One story of Mrs. Ruskin's home training sets the reader musing. It is said that as her baby was specially charmed by the bright tea-kettle and cried to handle it, his mother forced the nurse to let him touch it and dismissed him screaming. It is rather a grim bit of baby biography, but its lesson is needed in many a home to-day. A mother must be something of a Spartan who could let the tiny fingers touch the bright kettle filled with boiling water. We may be sure that a very gentle touch was all that was allowed, and that there was little damage to the small fingers, but the child was taught the first lesson of experience: things are not always what they seem. Some dim notion crept into the little brain that there might be danger lurking where it appeared as though there was nothing but brightness and smoothness to draw the eye and tempt the touch. The child began to see that it is not always well to have what we wish. Surely that is a lesson worth learning, even at the cost of some little tingling of the fingers! A few early lessons of such sort sometimes save a life from shipwreck. Old Roger Ascham, who was tutor to Queen Elizabeth, has some wise words in his famous "Schoolmaster" on the place of experience and of instruction in the formation of character. "Surely long experience doth profit much, but most need only to him (if we mean honest affairs) that is diligently before instructed with precepts of well-doing; for good precepts of learning be the eyes of the mind, to look wisely before a man, which way to go right and which not. Learning teacheth more in one year than experience in twenty; and learning teacheth safely, when experience maketh more miserable than wise. He hazardeth sore that waxeth wise by experience. An unhappy master is he that is made cunning by many shipwrecks; a miserable merchant, that is neither rich nor wise but after some bankrupts. It is costly wisdom that is bought by experience." Thus speaks the famous master of his day. There is no doubt that he is right; shipwreck and bankruptcy are too high a price to pay for our experience. But many a man has had to thank God that he touched the kettle when he was a boy; some small smart warned him off from the road to ruin.

Seventy years ago there was a draper's apprentice in the little town of Wigton, in Cumberland, who was fast going astray. He had left his home at Mealsgate because he could not bring himself to hang about half idle with only the prospect of being little better than a farm-labourer before him. At thirteen he began the battle of life for himself in the neighbouring town. It was arranged that he should sleep in his master's house, but take his meals at a neighbouring public-house. There he saw nothing but wickedness and drinking; his master had given way to drinking, so that there was no better influence to save the boy from sin. When he became head apprentice, he had to give a glass of spirits and water to all the good customers; even if a man bought a five-shilling waistcoat he had to be treated at the public-house. The boy now began to play at cards; he soon played every night at the inn for high stakes. Sometimes he stayed at the card-table till daybreak. Gambling was fast becoming a passion with the draper's apprentice.

He used to leave a lower window in his master's house unfastened so that he could raise the sash and push back the shutters. Then he crept silently up-stairs to his bed in the attic. The draper heard of his apprentice's bad ways, and one night nailed down this window. At five o'clock next morning—the day before Christmas—George tried vainly to get in. He was not to be beaten. He ran down the lane and climbed to the ridge of the lowest house. Then he crept along the intervening dwellings till he reached the top of his master's shop. He slipped down the slates, clung to the waterspout, and thus hanging over the street got his feet on the window-sill and managed to push up the window with his left foot. The boy was scarcely in bed before his master came into the room. He pretended to be asleep, but heard Messenger threaten to turn his apprentice adrift in the morning. Even those threats did not bring the boy to a better mind. It was only when the "waits" came round singing their Christmas carols that the lad awoke to a sense of his wrong-doing. He thought of the grief his conduct would bring to his father, and resolved to give up card-playing and gambling for ever.

He lay in bed almost without moving for twenty-four hours. Then his landlady got two friends to intercede with George's master. The apprentice was forgiven, and by God's grace kept his good resolution. All the world knows the lad's history. George Moore became one of the merchant princes of London; one of the noblest philanthropists of the world. The marble tablet to his memory in Carlisle Cathedral pays him a well-deserved tribute.

"A MAN OF RARE STRENGTH AND SIMPLICITY OF CHARACTER, OF ACTIVE BENEVOLENCE AND WIDE INFLUENCE, A YEOMAN'S SON,
HE WAS NOT BORN TO WEALTH,
BUT BY ABILITY AND INDUSTRY HE GAINED IT, AND HE EVER USED IT,
AS A STEWARD OF GOD AND A DISCIPLE OF THE LORD JESUS CHRIST
FOR THE FURTHERANCE OF ALL GOOD WORKS."

On a beautiful window in the church at Wigton he is represented as the Good Samaritan ministering to the sufferer on the highway. Who would have dreamed that the gambling apprentice would have won such a memorial! The turning point of George Moore's life on that Christmas Eve when by God's grace he shook himself free from the vice which was leading him fast to ruin, may be described in a single phrase—

HE TOUCHED THE KETTLE WHEN HE WAS A BOY.

Many a life has been ruined because it had not passed through some such crisis. In mistaken kindness, friends and kinsfolk screened the boy or girl from the consequences of their sin or folly, so that they never learned to loathe wrongdoing. They became self-indulgent, and ran farther into evil ways. A sharp experience like George Moore's might have opened their eyes, but they never were allowed to know the bitter truth. Lives that might have been a blessing to others have thus lost all high purpose and sunk down into something almost beneath contempt. I never see such a life without saying, "What a pity he did not touch the kettle when he was a boy!" A stinging lesson like that is worth more than tongue can tell if it but burns into our hearts the fear of sin and makes us shun the road that leads to death.

"Did you let him touch the kettle?" would not be a bad question to put sometimes. When a father tells of evil habits into which his children have fallen, one might say, "Did you let them taste the shame and misery due to their untruthfulness or carelessness?" When the master speaks of the bright young scholar who has become idle and listless, one might ask, "Has he learned to feel ashamed of himself at last?" God is always teaching men by such means. You cannot touch the nettle by the wayside without getting a lesson in caution. Nature does not forgive. If a man touches the kettle his fingers are burnt. Many a minor sting and smart opens our eyes to such facts, and saves us from great calamities. So it is in the moral world. He is blest whose earliest wrongdoing comes home soon to roost.

"That penalty's the best to bear
Which follows soonest on the sin;
And guilt's a game where losers fare
Better than those who seem to win."*

The penalty is not always light to bear, but it leaves a blessing behind it in that horror of evil ways which is one of God's great safeguards against sin.

POOR PRIDE.

BY ISABEL BELLERBY.

CHAPTER XII.

THE astonishment of that section of Winchmore society likely to be interested in the event when Miss Foster's companion returned from her brief Christmas holiday as Mrs. George Harrison was something worth witnessing.

One incident immediately preceding that return is worth relating. Mr. Maver was aware his friend contemplated taking a second wife—Mr. Harrison had so far confided in him—and when Mr. Maver, like the rest of the world, took it for granted that Miss Foster was the lady alluded to, Mr. Harrison did not contradict him, but listened to all he had to say—rocking gently the while in anticipation of future amusement when the truth should become known.

Mr. Harrison went away for Christmas—to visit friends, it was supposed; no one in any way connecting his absence with that of Lillian Paule.

On Christmas Day, after making a good dinner and demolishing an enormous quantity of hardbake, Mr. Maver dressed himself with more than his usual care, and sallied forth to make a call.

His destination proved to be No. 31, South Terrace, he and Miss Fraser having soon made up their quarrel. Twist welcomed him noisily, and Scott—who prolonged his visit indefinitely in preference to returning to his rightful home—rubbed against his trousers as he was being shown to the drawing-room.

Miss Fraser was enjoying a nap when he called, and was not very amiable at being disturbed; but Mr. Maver, wrapped in deepest thought, failed to notice the stormy expression of her eyes as she asked—

"To what do I owe the pleasure of a visit from Mr. Maver on Christmas Day, of all days in the year? I thought folks were supposed to stay at home on Christmas Day and eat more than is good for them and go to sleep afterwards—a rule I have been carrying out in full to-day."

"I ate as much as I could," began Mr. Maver absent-mindedly, twirling his watch-chain in his fingers, and gazing reflectively at Miss Fraser's moustache.

"Oh, you did? Well, I don't see that it's a thing to boast about. May I ask—I feel interested in getting a reply—may I ask why you did not go to sleep afterwards, instead of coming and disturbing me?"

"Did I disturb you?" he asked softly. "I never thought of that; it never occurred to me you would be asleep, though of course you would—it stands to reason you would be asleep. How thoughtless of me not to have known you would be asleep! But it shall not occur again, Miss Fraser: I will remember not to disturb you again."

"Thank you, sir."

Miss Fraser may be pardoned for suspecting that

Mr. Maver had not only eaten as much as he could, but had also put a considerable quantity of wine down his throat quite recently.

"I was lonely!" he said musingly. "I was realising how much I shall miss George Harrison when he marries Miss Foster. No doubt you, Miss "Well—what have you to propose, Mr. Maver?"

"What have I to propose? To be sure, I have never done it before; but I always understood it was sufficient—all-sufficient to—propose."

"No doubt."

Miss Fraser eyed him carefully, mentally wondering

"'Won't you shake hands?'"—p. 278.

Fraser, have thought now and then that you will miss her when she marries my friend? We shall be mutual losers by the event."

"I don't see that—their door will not be shut against either of us, that I am aware of. And if it should be, I rather think I could exist without Amelia Foster's friendship."

"Not so me," replied Mr. Maver, with speculative vagueness. "I enjoy cheerful society; hitherto I have always found it in George Harrison's company. If I lose him—and Miss Foster does not favour me, I know—I lose all that makes life pleasant. Therefore I have come to-day to propose to you, Miss Fraser."

how many glasses he had had to reduce him to his present condition of serious imbecility.

"A proposal is a proposal," resumed Mr. Maver, "and now, having proposed, I await your answer, Miss Fraser—dear Miss Fraser—or, may I venture to say, dear Betty?"

"Oh, my goodness!" exclaimed Miss Fraser, as the truth suddenly dawned upon her. "Do you mean, Thomas Maver, that you have been proposing to me?"

He looked around the room to see if there was anyone else to whom his proposal might have been addressed.

"To you, of course, dear Betty."

"Be quiet, man, or I'll set Twist at you! To come here proposing to me—me of all people! A woman of my sense! And on Christmas Day of all days! Isn't it enough for George Harrison and Amelia Foster to be thinking of making fools of themselves, without you and me following their example? I'm really ashamed of you, Thomas Maver—a man of your years! But, there, it's what might be expected of a man who chews pops, even though he has had the sense to keep single so far. Don't glare at me like that! Stop twiddling your watch-chain, and ring the bell; my nerves require tea after such a shock as you have given 'em."

"If," began Mr. Maver, meekly doing as he was bid and ringing the bell—"if it is that my former business is against me—"

"But it isn't! There's nothing against you—except that you are a man."

"In that case, I—I think I had better go home. You—you will shake hands and not think any the worse of me? I won't do it again—ever."

"I should hope you wouldn't."

"I won't; I don't like it well enough. Won't you shake hands?"

"What for? Just sit down, will you? What will my servant think if she comes in and finds you standing there looking so ridiculous? You're going to have some tea with me, and then we'll have a game of chess. You owned you were lonely, and so am I; but I hope it isn't necessary for people of our age to get married before we play a game of chess together. Well—if you will—there's my hand. Now sit down and don't talk any more nonsense. I've liked you uncommonly ever since we quarrelled; but as to marrying you—"

The servant entered with tea, and thus put an end to the personal nature of the conversation.

Mr. Maver unconsciously slipped a bit of hard-bake into his mouth, after which he began to feel himself once more, realising that he was more relieved than he could say at the way his proposal had been received.

That was the beginning of many similarly cosy evenings, and if Winchmore talked—which it did—neither Miss Fraser nor Mr. Maver minded one little bit, so there was no harm done.

At Long Reach Christmas Day passed slowly. Margery had had a long letter from Stuart Fergusson in the morning, which gave her very real pleasure, the only drawback being that she could not share it with Drusy, Fergusson's name being amongst those tabooed between them, he having been a party to the deception practised on Drusy.

Phil was more indignant with her sister than remorseful for the part she herself had taken in the matter.

"She can't really care for him, you know, Theo, or she would not behave so ridiculously," she said again and again.

And Theo would shrug his shoulders and reply that there was no understanding a woman, and that Drusy, in spite of her fragile appearance and clinging, dependent way, was as much a Weston as either of them for pride and obstinacy. At which Phil would pretend to take offence, and then would follow the pleasure of speedy reconciliation.

Mrs. George Harrison's joy at astonishing Winchmore was considerably dashed by the discovery that things had gone wrong with Reginald Warre's courtship.

A ten minutes' call on Miss Foster, to inform her that another new companion—of Mrs. Harrison's choosing—would arrive on the morrow, acquainted the bride with that fact.

"I don't quite understand the rights of it," said Miss Foster; "but, you know, Sarah's sister is kitchen-maid at St. Ouans, and all the servants there are saying that Captain Warre went away for Christmas, and a week afterwards came back quite suddenly, called at Long Reach, and then went home; since when he has shut himself up and seen no one except his father. Clara Fagan nods her head and looks knowing about it, but she doesn't say anything."

"Are you sure he is at St. Ouans?" asked Mrs. Harrison, looking very grave.

"Quite sure. Sarah has seen him in the grounds twice this last week, walking about with his head bent like an old man, she says."

"Are the Westons back yet, Miss Foster?"

"They haven't been away—they changed their plans at the last moment."

"Not been away!"

Then surely there was something very wrong indeed!

Mrs. Harrison went home with a very sober expression on her face; but she left Miss Foster happy by intimating to her that she might publish the marriage now as soon as she liked.

George Harrison saw there was something wrong when his wife returned from her visit to Miss Foster.

"What is the matter, Lilian?"

"A great deal. Will you mind if I write to Captain Warre, and ask you not to see the letter? It is a stiff thing to ask you, I know; but you promised to trust me, didn't you?"

"I did, my dear. And I'm not the man to go from my word. Write to anyone you like."

"Thank you: you are very good to me. I will tell you about it as soon as I feel free to do so."

When the reply came to her letter Mrs. Harrison was in a position to judge exactly how things stood, and how they had been brought to pass. She put on her bonnet in great wrath and called at No. 32, South Terrace.

Mrs. Pearson was treating Miss Fagan to an afternoon call—it was the four o'clock post which brought Captain Warre's letter—and at sight of her Mrs. Harrison's eyes expressed inward satisfaction. She shook hands in silence, totally disregarding Mrs. Pearson's laboured congratulations, intended to be vastly patronising, on her changed position.

"I am glad to find you here, Mrs. Pearson. I was coming to see you when I had talked to Miss Fagan. I want to know which of you wrote that?"

"That" being the letter Drusy Weston had received, signed by Scott and Twist.

At sight of it both ladies looked a trifle blank and queer about eyes and mouth, though Miss Fagan said, more promptly than grammatically, "Not me!"

"I—er—fail to understand the—er—motive——" began Mrs. Pearson.

"I will soon make my motive apparent," interrupted Mrs. Harrison coolly. "This letter alludes to me in a way my husband considers damaging to my reputation; and he and I are agreed that, unless an apology is immediately forthcoming from the writer, an action for libel will be established."

It was a bold stroke; but it went straight home.

"And—er—supposing the apology is—er—made?" Mrs. Pearson's hesitation was, for once, quite natural under the influence of fright.

"Oh, then we shall say no more about it. I remember the conversation mentioned here well enough; but Messrs. Twist and Scott did not hear aright—in fact, they got sadly mixed. Miss Weston never met Mr. Eden in her life: the letter went quite to the wrong person. Now, which of you wrote it?"

"Miss Fagan—er——"

"I didn't!" snapped Clara Fagan.

"I was not about to say you did!" Mrs. Pearson spoke with dignity, and, in her anxiety to get the thing over and done with, she pocketed her "ers" and said plainly enough: "Miss Fagan told me of your frequent meetings with Captain Warre, and I overheard the scrap of conversation in question. We both agreed that—considering the Captain was paying ardent attention all the time to Miss Weston—she ought to be made aware of his flirtation with you and his allusions to herself. I didn't wish to harm you, Mrs. Harrison—in fact, I thought you might be engaged to Captain Warre. I apologise for having joined your name to his, and for having written what annoys you."

"Thank you, Mrs. Pearson. I may now tell you for your satisfaction—both of you—that if you wished to make mischief between Miss Weston and Captain Warre you have failed."

She marched out of the house, holding her head very high, though saying mentally: "Another fib! But I'd tell a dozen if I could remedy the mischief those spiteful cats have done by their prying, and eaves-dropping, and interference. That poor fellow! And he has been so good to me! Well, Lilian Harrison, you've got to right it somehow, if you perish in the attempt!"

The baffled conspirators watched her out of sight; and then Miss Fagan said in a thin voice—

"Seems to me you're making the place rather warm for you, Mrs. Pearson. First the Westons cut you, then Betty Fraser, and now Mrs. George Harrison, who, if I mistake not, will become a power in Winchmore."

"And—er——" Mrs. Pearson raised a gold-rimmed eyeglass, through which to examine her hostess, "you were about to say—er—Clara Fagan no longer desires—er—the pleasure of your acquaintance? Because, if not, I—er—decline the further pleasure of Miss Fagan's acquaintance."

She departed in triumph, leaving Clara Fagan open-mouthed with surprise and chagrin; and thus ended the alliance between those two.

From that day it was observed that new lines appeared in Mr. Pearson's forehead, and that old ones became deeper. People said it was because he could no longer go to Mr. Harrison's snug smoking-room: not but what he would have been welcomed always; but Mrs. Pearson forbade him to enter the house. And the chances were that if he looked in at Mr. Maver's, in passing, that gentleman would be absent—possibly at No. 31, South Terrace, where no objection was taken to his munching hardbake during a lengthy game of chess, on condition that he offered none to Twist.

A very keen observer, such as Margery, for instance, might have noticed the advent of a faint line or two on Drusy's forehead during those weeks after Christmas when the New Year was establishing its right to an ever-increasing share of the past. And Margery sighed as she noticed, for Drusy would not speak of the pain she suffered day and night.

The girl's heart longed for the love her pride kept from her. Under the sharp tutelage of suffering she learnt that Reginald Warre had always been dear to her; it was only his qualities of mind and heart having been made apparent while he was known to her as Rex Eden which had caused her to believe she loved a mythical personage. She could not at first realise that it was one man, not two, she had known; but when she did realise it, she knew she had given that one the best love of her life—all that her heart was capable of feeling for any man.

Yet, though she felt she could forgive him now—for what will true love not forgive?—pride still kept her silent. She did not know but what he might have forgotten her by this time; and if not, he was still a Warre of St. Ouans, and it should not be said that a Weston sought to obtain by marriage what belonged to them by moral right.

So she continued to nurse her pain, and Margery looked on helpless to say or do anything, and feeling that she was horribly selfish to be anticipating happiness for herself when Drusy had, apparently, said good-bye to it for ever.

The three months were nearly up; her "probation" would soon be over. Not once had she wavered in her allegiance to Stuart Fergusson; and there was certainly no intimation of his having changed in the undertone of tenderness which had of late crept into his letters. Possibly he allowed it to appear on purpose, that she might know his love was as great as ever.

"Have you read many of Browning's poems?" he had asked in his last letter. "I fought shy of him in my young days, and, since, there has been so little time to take up a new 'subject'—if I may call him such; and he wants a deal of thinking about, does Robert Browning. I am not alluding to his longer works: they are beyond me entirely until my second period of leisure arrives—I mean when I retire from active service in the world. But I came across a little volume of his 'Selections' the other day, and I was struck by the generous way he has of flinging his thoughts about. In a short piece called 'Cristina' there is an immense amount of 'thinking : ' in three consecutive verses you get as many ideas thrown to you.

" 'Oh, we're sunk enough here, God knows !
But not quite so sunk that moments,
Sure tho' seldom, are denied us,
When the spirit's true endowments
Stand out plainly from its false ones,
And apprise it if pursuing
Or the right way or the wrong way,
To its triumph or undoing.

'There are flashes struck from midnights,
There are fire-flames noondays kindle,
Whereby piled-up honours perish,
Whereby swollen ambitions dwindle,
While just this or that poor impulse,
Which for once had play unstifled,
Seems the sole work of a lifetime
That away the rest have trifled.

'Doubt you if, in some such moment,
As she fixed me, she felt clearly,
Ages past the soul existed,
Here an age 't is resting merely,
And hence fleets again for ages,
While the true end, sole and single,
It stops here for is, this love-way,
With some other soul to mingle ?'

"I like that last thought, don't you ? Further on comes—

" . . . . . the secret's mine now !
She has lost me, I have gained her ;
Her soul's mine."

"Poor old Rex could say that : I think I'll copy the entire poem, head it 'Drusilla' instead of 'Cristina,' and send her a copy—it would apply from beginning to end. On second thoughts I'll post you the book to-morrow : I want to send you a valentine ; are you old-fashioned enough to care for valentines? And if so, will you accept one from me? Then you can give Drusy the poem to read. Really, if I didn't know Browning had written it, I should have said Warre was the author.

"Buttons has just arrived with a note from partner; I must go.—Always your sincere friend,

"STUART FERGUSSON."

CHAPTER XIII.

"WILL you accept one from me?" Margery could not get the words out of her head; she knew so well that by that simple question he meant her to understand that he was unchanged.

The day was fast approaching when she would be able to take herself and her life and give both to him. Only one more letter would she receive from him before she was to write the words that would tell him she was all his own.

The little volume of Browning's "Selections" arrived on the morning of the fourteenth—Sunday. She sent a little note of thanks that evening, and smiled to herself as she wrote—"Dear Dr. Fergusson."

"Will he remember that it is the last time I shall address him so stiffly? I know he will. I can't help the letter being short to-day: it is next to impossible to write of the weather, and so on, when I am just longing to tell him that I love him—I love him!"

She went out to post her letter, and when she got back she found Drusy had got hold of Browning; but she was not reading just then—her eyes were gazing into the fire, and they were full of unshed tears.

Curiously enough she had opened the book at "Cristina." Perhaps Fergusson had bent back the covers on purpose for the leaves to fall apart just there. And Drusy had read:—

"She should never have looked at me
If she meant I should not love her!
There are plenty . . . men, you call such,
I suppose . . . she may discover
All her soul to, if she pleases,
And yet leave much as she found them:
But I'm not so, and she knew it
When she fixed me, glancing round them."

She felt somewhat as Stuart Fergusson had felt—that Reginald Warre might have written it, especially when she came to the words—

"But this life's end and this love-bliss
Have been lost here. Doubt you whether
This she felt as, looking at me,
Mine and her souls rushed together?"

"Oh, observe! Of course, next moment,
The world's honours, in derision,
Trampled out the light for ever:
Never fear but there's provision
Of the devil's to quench knowledge,
Lest we walk the earth in rapture!
—Making those who catch God's secret
Just so much more prize their capture!"

"Such am I: the secret's mine now!
She has lost me, I have gained her;
Her soul's mine: and thus, grown perfect,
I shall pass my life's remainder."

Life will just hold out the proving
Both our powers, alone and blended;
And then, come next life quickly!
This world's use will have been ended."

"The world's honours," thought Drusy, "the world's pride! Where's the difference? It has served to part us. I have lost him—for ever."

She had not told Margery, but she had met him two days before: he was walking slowly on the other side of the road, and he had passed without so much as a bow.

"I cannot stay here now he is always at St. Ouans," she said to herself, with those unshed tears still in her eyes as she looked into the fire, which looked blurred and dull and very large through the tears. "I must go away where I shall never see him. Some day he will marry; then I can come back. Why did I let that wicked letter make me so angry? It said what was not true about him and Miss Paule. She is Mrs. Harrison now, as he said she would be. Why was I so cold and hard? Ought I not to have loved him all the more, even if he did wrong for love of me? It was all done for love of me, and there was no great wrong in it. There was no treachery to me—only to my abominable pride, which I have nourished as a friend, and now it has ruined my life. You were right, my darling; I have already learned to repent that I let my pride conquer my love. But it was only for a time, Rex—only for a time, though the effect must last for ever!"

Margery watched her a moment; then, when the tears welled up at last and ran down her cheeks, the door opened and closed softly, and she was left alone with her penitence and her grief.

The week passed uneventfully until Friday, which was the nineteenth—the day Margery was to write the words that would seal her fate. She went about looking grave but very happy, and, for once, she failed to take much notice of what was going on around her.

After dinner she shut herself into her own room, saying she had an important letter to write; by-and-by, when it was posted, she would tell Drusy all about it. The weather was quite warm for February—a genial foretaste of spring—and as she felt able to sit in her room without a fire, so Drusy, down in the breakfast-room—with fire and sun to warm it—decided that it would be pleasanter to wander into the orchard and pass the afternoon on the stile, with her thoughts for sole company. She wanted to summon up courage to tell Margery of her determination to leave home—for a time. If Margery did not take kindly to the thought of a long absence from Winchmore, she would have to go alone; but her sensitive spirit shrank from the prospect of loneliness and independence.

She was going up-stairs to fetch her hat and cloak when the hall-door bell rang and she heard a voice inquiring if Miss Weston was at home.

The visitor was shown into the drawing-room, and the card the servant handed her bore the inscription—

"MRS. GEORGE HARRISON."

What could Mrs. Harrison possibly want with her? Drusy stiffened herself mentally and physically as she remembered it had been at this woman's instigation that Reginald Warre had "masqueraded" as Rex Eden. Lilian's heart sank as she noticed the expression of Drusy's face. How was she to know that, underneath that granite-like exterior, was a softness produced by keen regret and Robert Browning!

"You are no doubt surprised to receive a visit from me, Miss Weston; but it has come to my knowledge that I have unwittingly worked harm to someone who has been a true friend to me, so I have ventured to call to see if I could—if there is anything I can say to—to undo that harm."

This was not at all what she had intended to say. It was not likely that she had waited nearly two months to blunder in this style; but all diplomacy was knocked out of her head by that look of seeming icy indifference and cold hauteur in Drusy's face.

"I don't understand you, Mrs. Harrison!" said a voice as cold as the face.

The plunge was taken and diplomacy drowned, and all that remained was for Lilian Harrison to swim to shore as speedily as might be.

"I don't suppose you do, Miss Weston; I expressed myself very clumsily. But I am talking of Captain Warre. He loves you as a man can only love one woman in his life; and I have separated you, when my great hope was to bring you together."

"Really, Mrs. Harrison—"

"You must hear me out, please, and forgive me for performing my task in so rough-and-ready a way; it is a task I have set myself. Captain Warre stood my friend when I was in sore trouble. I vowed to myself in my gratitude that if ever an opportunity arose to help him in return I would do so. Circumstances combined to bring me to Winchmore as Miss Foster's companion. Bearing my resolution in mind, you will not wonder that I kept eyes and ears wide open to learn all I could about Captain Warre. I soon discovered his love for you; and the history of how your branch of the family came to lose St. Ouans, which was told me almost on my arrival here, taught me to understand why you would not let yourself listen to him. I forced his confidence, and suggested that, as it seemed unlikely he would ever win you as Reginald Warre, he should at least try his fate under another name. Should he meet with success, my advice was that he should immediately confess the truth and cast himself on your mercy. He chose to continue the deception long after you confessed to caring for him, though, as you have since learnt, his disguise was only partial. He did not wish his father to know that it was necessary for him to wear glasses, and I think that influenced him a little."

"Necessary? What do you mean?" Drusy looked startled; she thawed several degrees.

After a quick look at her, Lilian Harrison began to recover her native diplomacy.

"You need not hesitate to speak freely to me, Miss Weston; he mentioned it to me as soon as he became convinced of the truth himself."

"What truth?"

"About his sight, of course. Why pretend you don't understand? But it has turned out much worse than was anticipated. That is why I have come to you to-day, to see if there is at least a little pity in your heart. Love there cannot be. I understood at once that you did not really love him when you refused to forgive him for what you considered his deception, because, all along, the oculists have said that every annoyance—ever so small—must be carefully kept from him; and yet you, knowing this, could strike such a terrible blow—"

"Stop! For pity's sake stop! I never knew—he never told me—oh! it cannot be true! Tell me quickly, I implore, is—is he—?"

"Blind? Not quite, I think, but very near it; and total blindness is bound to come." And then Mrs. Harrison stopped in some dismay, for Drusy looked as if she was going to faint.

"Rather overdid it that time! Go it easy now, Lilian!" So said the visitor to herself, as she opened the nearest window and loosened Drusy's dress at the throat.

But love conquered the faintness; and the girl sat up.

"I am all right: never mind me. Tell me about him. I give you my word I did not know anything ailed his sight."

"If I'd known that, I'd have told my tale differently," was Mrs. Harrison's mendacious reply. "I just came to see if pity wouldn't make you pretend to some feeling for him. How was I to guess he had kept you in ignorance? Maybe, if you'd known he was going blind up at St. Ouans all these weeks you'd have done something before now. But he has kept it close, I'll own; he didn't want people about here to know. Fancy his never saying a word to you, though!"

"Does he?"—Drusy was dying to ask the question—"does he know you have come here—to me?"

"My gracious, no! He's every bit as proud as you are. If you think of seeing him, I can tell you you'll have your work cut out to conceal from him that 'tis only pity makes you go to him. Well, you'll want to think it over, no doubt; so I'll say good-afternoon. I hope you'll excuse my having taken the liberty to speak out. You see, it seemed so hard-hearted for you to go and do just what you knew would injure him. I felt quite wild when I got to know all about it. Say you'll excuse me, Miss Weston!"

"Excuse you! I shall be grateful to you all my life! I only hope you will forgive me for receiving you so disagreeably. You see, I—I have known him—Captain Warre—ever since—" her voice quavered and broke, and she burst into tears.

Lilian took her in her arms and soothed her, with full comprehension of what she was suffering, and a heart full of pity.

"You needn't mind me, Miss Weston; there's no shame in loving a man like that. And I know what love is: he died years ago."

With which abrupt announcement she disappeared, and walked home with a lump in her throat, in spite of a feeling of thankfulness that she had righted things at last.

And Drusy sped through the orchard, across a field, and into the woods in order to reach St. Ouans by a side-entrance she knew of. Never had she entered the grounds before; but all nervousness was swallowed

'n the feeling that she was going to Rex, and that Rex was blind and helpless—rendered so by her cruelty.

Boldly she opened the door through which he had gone in and out so often ; but, once inside, she paused in ignorance as to which path she ought to take. There was one to the right and one to the left, both disappearing around the belt of trees that faced her. She chose to turn to the right ; and, before she had gone a hundred yards, she stopped and drew her breath sharply. In front of her was Rex himself, walking slowly with bent head, just as she had seen him two days before, when she had thought he wished to cut her.

He stood still, listening a moment.

"Is anyone there ?" he asked.

Her heart throbbed at the sound of his voice, but she could not speak.

Presently he resumed his walk, and she followed him. Evidently he was making for the house, and she told herself she must speak to him before he reached it. But no words would come, and she knew nothing of the distance, so it was not surprising that they were close to the house before she had summoned courage to so much as utter his name. One end of the old manor was in view—a recently added wing, with a covered terrace running along outside the French windows, two of which stood open.

Guiding himself a little with his stick, and intimate with every step of the way, Reginald made for one of these windows. Drusy hesitated, and stood a moment under the trees, fearing to be seen by anyone in the house ; but some impulse bade her follow, and by the time he had passed through the open window and, throwing off his cap, had made his way to an arm-chair, she stood on the terrace.

"Is that you, father ?" he asked, hearing the step.

Seeing that he was alone, and unable any longer to refrain from making her presence known, Drusy entered the room, went close to him, and touched his hand.

CHAPTER XIV.

His fingers closed over hers, and she could feel him tremble as he peered into her face with his poor dim eyes, and passed his other hand over her sleeve.

"Is my dream come true at last, or am I only sleeping now ? Drusy, my heart's darling, have you come to me at last ?"

Then the power of speech returned to her ; she knelt at his feet and drew his arms about her, as she said in broken, imploring tones—

"I can see that you are kneeling at my feet."—p. 284.

"Oh, Rex, forgive me dear! Forgive my wicked pride! I never knew till just now about your poor, poor eyes! Oh, tell me it is not all my doing! Say you forgive me, Rex!"

But he could say nothing just then for the sudden need he felt of taking all the kisses he had been starving for the last two months; and they told her she was forgiven before he uttered a syllable.

"My little darling! My own dear girl! I knew you would come to me some day. The time has been so long—so long, Drusy."

"Say you forgive me, Rex!" That was all her prayer.

"Why, of course I do, dear. You have forgiven me, haven't you? And you have had more to pardon than I had."

"Nay! You never destroyed my sight with your cruelty."

"Well, and whose sight have you destroyed? What notion have you got into that little head?"

"She told me—Mrs. Harrison—that it was my doing—that my cruelty had made you blind."

"So Madam Lilian has a finger in this pie, has she? She vowed she'd reconcile us sooner or later—bless her warm heart! But she told you a fib, dear. The blindness was coming; and I knew it would have to come before any operation could be performed. What has happened hastened it a bit, that is all. By this time next year I hope to see as well as ever; whereas, by the natural order of things, I should have been years going blind."

"But to think that I have done it, my Rex! And that I have not been with you to guide your footsteps! Rex, you ought not to go out alone. You must not again, do you hear? I met you on Wednesday, and I thought you wouldn't see me. If I had only known! Why did not someone tell me?"

"No one knows, dear, except my father and my own man. I can see a little yet, you know. I can see that you are kneeling at my feet, though I should not have known it was you if my heart had not told me it was so. Get up, my Drusy; I cannot have you kneel to me. Oh, heart's dearest, how madly happy you have made me! This is worth going blind for."

"But what has caused it, Rex?"

"The eyes have been getting weak for some time, dear; but I hoped it would pass. When I figured as Rex Eden I was downright glad of the glasses, and I found the difference when I left them off. That was what made me consult an oculist. I went to the best in town just before I settled myself at Norwood. He examined my eyes, called the weakness some long name which I can't remember, and told me I should go quite blind—that I must, in fact, before anything could be done. He advised my not worrying about things, and said I was to take life easily, and not use my eyes more than I could help. That rather knocked my literature scheme on the head, and I was a bit vexed, because I had made a good start. Ever since that miserable day when you refused to have anything more to say to me, my sight has been going rapidly. Had it not been for that we intended turning out and handing St. Ouans over to you and your sisters; but I would not agree to my father roughing it, so I told him he must wait a year or two until I could go to work again. He wanted to let you know how things were, but I made him promise not to say a word to anyone. I didn't want you to pity where you would not, or could not, love."

"You know I loved you all the time, Rex. It served me right to be punished; but it isn't fair that you should suffer."

"I shan't suffer much, dear, now I can look forward to passing my life with you. You will marry me directly the operation is over, won't you, Drusy?"

"Before that, Rex!" she whispered, pressing a hot cheek against his. "I am going to marry you at once—just as soon as a licence can be obtained. No, don't speak! If you are so terribly shocked at my forwardness that you would rather not marry me, give me a little push; and if you are not—"

She never got to the end of her sentence, for he kissed her until she panted for breath, while he called her every endearing name he could think of.

A clock somewhere struck five.

"Margery will think I am lost. She doesn't know—anything. Not even that Mrs. Harrison called to see me."

"Suppose we go and explain? Will you invite me to tea, Drusy? But I must leave a message for my father."

"Won't he think it strange—my being here? And the servants—?"

"Never mind what my father thinks; the servants are a different matter. There are writing materials somewhere about, aren't there? Put a sheet of paper in front of me, dear, and see how cleverly I can write without looking to see what I am about."

He felt in his pocket for a pencil, and scribbled these words—

"Drusy has come to fetch me to Long Reach for tea. Please send a carriage, or, better still, come and fetch me at half-past six.—R."

"There; now put it into an envelope. Stay, though; suppose you write, 'The servants don't know I am here,' and sign your initials. . . . Done it? That's right. Seal it up, and I'll address it. He's sure to come here to look for me. Now, dear, your arm, please, and we shall be at Long Reach in less than a quarter of an hour. A new experience for you, my Drusy, to have someone to take care of! We will reverse all that some day, won't we?"

The clock striking five had startled Margery a little; most of her afternoon had been spent in happy dreaming and a wonder of what she should say in her letter. The beginning was easy enough—

"My dear Stuart!"

And she thought the words looked very nice; but oughtn't she to add something to them?

Yet, here was five o'clock, and not another word written; and, what was worse, she could not think of anything else to say except, "I love you! I love you!" and she was not going to write that. At last in sheer desperation she decided to let those three words stand alone—he would understand. She looked at them once more, pressed her lips to them with a sudden swift blush, and signed her name, "Margery," that was all: surely the briefest love-letter that was ever written!

As she dropped her letter into the red box in the wall not far from the house, she opened her eyes in amazement, for there, coming down the hill arm-in-arm, were her sister Drusy and Reginald Warre.

What joy there was at that small tea-party! No sooner was Rex in the house, and Margery understood something of the truth, than she took his face between her hands, gazed tearfully into the dim eyes, and kissed him on the brow, saying as she turned to hug Drusy—

"Oh, how thankful—how very thankful I am!"

Then, before they had finished tea, old Mr. Warre came in, full of excitement, to know what had happened, and how it had happened, and who had brought it to pass; and, as he gave Drusy a fatherly embrace and shook his son's hand warmly and continuously, he made a little speech.

"Ever since I came into the property I have felt I had no right to it; it came upon me with a kind of revelation that the man who was farming these acres was the real master and owner of St. Ouans, and not myself. But I had married, and it was not fair to my wife to make any change without her cordial consent; so I held my peace, and said not a word even to her. Then my son was born: that was a fresh temptation to keep silent. But, in time, my wife was taken from me, and no other children had been given me, and I began to think I was being punished for keeping what was not rightly mine—even as my father had been punished before me. Yet the means of restitution was there: I could, after the death of my wife, have made over the property to you at any moment, and have brought up my son to work for his living. But the devil tempted me. My neighbour Weston had daughters born to him, and I said to myself: 'My son shall marry one of them, and right things that way. It is not fair to him to make him give up what is, after all, legally his. If one of Weston's daughters reigns at St. Ouans, all will be well.' At times Reginald has said to me: 'I shall never be master here; I have brains, and I will work; and when the property comes to me I shall hand it over to the Westons; no blessing will rest on us as long as we keep it.' But now my dream has come true: Weston's eldest daughter should, by rights, be mistress of St. Ouans. We will put it to her. If she wishes to take possession, well and good; if not—"

"I will write to her to-night!" interrupted Margery impulsively. "I know what her answer will be, dear old Phil! Theo would never leave his beloved work, and she would never leave him. So three cheers for Queen Drusilla! Three times three for Rex and Regina of St. Ouans!"

"But I can't spare you, Bob."—p. 287.

They all caught the infection of her gaiety, though neither guessed what extra cause she had for feeling so superlatively happy. But it was enough for Drusy and Rex to know that all was well, at last, between them. As for old Mr. Warre, he was ready to shout for joy.

He carried them off to St. Ouans for dinner, not knowing how to make enough of his future daughter-in-law; and before they were allowed to return to Long Reach every servant in the house knew that Captain Warre would be married almost immediately to Miss Drusy Weston.

He spent nearly the whole of Saturday at Long Reach, and when Margery, with a great pretence at primness, told him that it was not becoming of him to quarter himself on two unmarried ladies with no chaperon to countenance such a proceeding, he said coolly—

"Very well. Then we'll go to town on Monday, and I'll 'quarter myself' on Phil. I bet any amount you'll be pleased enough to see Fergusson again. Meanwhile, Drusy, let us spend our afternoon in the woods, and leave Miss Propriety the whole of the house to feel prim in."

So it happened that Margery was alone when she heard a familiar footstep coming up the garden path straight to the lower door, as if its owner had known the house all his life.

One peep into the hall satisfied her that neither of the servants was in sight, and that the kitchen door was shut. Then, before bell could be rung or knocker knocked, she opened the front door and stood face to face with Stuart Fergusson.

Taken by sweetest surprise he looked at her for five seconds with all the love of his heart shining in his eyes; then he caught her in his arms and carried her into the breakfast-room.

After half an hour or so they began to talk coherently, and Fergusson produced from his pocket the envelope containing the nearly blank sheet of paper he had that morning received from her.

"Did man ever have such a love-letter before?" he asked. "Just examine it, Miss Margery Weston, and tell me if the writer ought not to feel ashamed of herself for sending such a mean, niggardly scrap to the man she knew was thirsting to be told she loved him?"

"I couldn't help it," she declared. "It took me all the afternoon to write it. Don't scold, Stuart; I am sure I have made up for all my shortcomings now."

"Scold, sweetheart? I shall never get a letter more to my liking if I live to be a hundred. It is so thoroughly Margeryesque! I wondered again and again what you would write—whether you would inform your 'dear Stuart' that, on thinking it over, you had come to the conclusion that you didn't mind giving him a trial, or whether you would discuss the weather and the crops. But when it came I seemed to have known all along that this was just what you would say—this, and nothing more. And I came off as soon as ever I had been to Doctors' Commons and got the licence for Rex."

"What licence?"

"Ah! Now I've let the cat out of the bag! But never mind: you won't tell, I know. I went to Wollaston when I had had your letter, to let Kershaw know he must do without me for a day or two; and there I found them in great excitement over the news you had written to Phil, which had been followed this morning by a telegram from Warre asking Kershaw to procure a marriage licence for Reginald Warre and Drusilla Weston, and either post or bring it at once. So I thought I had better get it and bring it along; it is in my pocket at this moment."

"Drusy told me she meant to marry him very soon, as she considered he wanted someone to take care of him; but I fancy she will open her eyes at such despatch."

Which was just what she did; though she only hesitated one little moment when Rex said imploringly, turning his almost sightless eyes on her—

"Dear, you promised to come to me at once. You will marry me on Monday, Drusy?"

And after that brief pause she put her hand in his, and said—

"Yes, I will, Rex."

Somehow the news got abroad, and the church was full when Rex entered, holding Fergusson's arm—Stuart had offered his services as best man.

Drusy did not keep them waiting long. She had put on her prettiest dress—a soft cream cashmere with a lot of lace about it, and a veil her mother had worn at her own wedding, with the self-same orange blossoms.

Old Mr. Warre gave her away with beaming face, and Margery was sole bridesmaid; though old Nurse waddled up the chancel with the wedding-party, determined to make one of them.

It was very pathetic to see the bride guiding her young husband down the church when the ceremony was at an end. Directly they reached the porch a ringing cheer was raised by the crowd assembled outside the church; and many a hearty wish was offered for the happiness of the young squire and his wife.

Then back to Long Reach for lunch, and time to change the cream cashmere for a blue serge, and by two o'clock Captain and Mrs. Reginald Warre had started for a month's honeymooning in Cornwall, down among the fisher-folk.

An hour later Mr. Warre, Margery, and Fergusson left for London—Mr. Warre to visit Lady Vanborough again, and Margery to stay at Wollaston until she considered she was ready to move permanently to Ellesmere—at least, so Stuart said.

It was doubtful what they would do with Long Reach; for the present Nurse was in charge, and content to remain so as long as they liked.

Mr. and Mrs. George Harrison received cordial invitations to St. Ouans, when—the operation being successfully accomplished—Rex and Drusy established themselves there, Phil having cheerfully given up the honour of reigning at the old house to her sister.

Miss Fraser was a frequent visitor, and even Miss Foster—now in possession of a companion as old as herself—was made welcome. Twist and Scott—the latter had never returned to his first mistress—paid occasional Saturday-to-Monday visits, trotting through the grounds side by side in a friendly and most comical fashion.

Mr. Maver, also, might be seen there occasionally, growing so intimate as time went on that he even ventured to scrunch hardbake at Mrs. Reginald Warre's musical "At Homes"—perchance sitting stiffly the while in a rocking-chair which was generally spoken of as "Mr. Harrison's." It had been shifted thither from No. 30, South Terrace, at Miss Foster's earnest request; she said the sight of the rockers made her present companion feel queer.

Only Miss Fagan and the Pearsons were left out in the cold—Mr. Pearson by choice and by desire of his wife.

Clara Fagan revenged herself by saying spiteful things of the Warres to people who didn't know them: no one who knew them would listen to her.

Mrs. Pearson revenged herself by drawing fresh lines in her husband's forehead, and by making life a burden to all who had much to do with her.

Not long since Bob sought his master's presence one day and begged to give notice.

"But I can't spare you, Bob! What is the meaning of it, man?" said Mr. Pearson, looking sadly harassed at the thought of losing an old and valuable servant.

"If you please, sir, it's not as Bob that I wishes to leave, only as Robert. I'd like to stay on with you as Bob as long as you'll keep me, but Robert can't stand the missus's tantrums not no longer."

Mr. Pearson looked relieved. Bob was retained; and an ambitious youth from the stable, owning the elegant cognomen of Hardaway was promoted to drive Mrs. Pearson, who, in the new circle of acquaintances she had entered as a Triton amongst the minnows, was much given to say that—

"Hardaway—er—is simply invaluable as—er—a coachman."

In spite of her clerical descent, Mrs. Pearson has turned Radical: for the Warres have always been Conservatives; and it is understood that Captain Warre has decided to stand for Winchmore at the next election.

THE END.

THE TWO CROWNS.

BY THE REV. HUGH MACMILLAN, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S.E.

"Woe to the crown of pride, to the drunkards of Ephraim, whose glorious beauty is a fading flower."—ISAIAH xxviii. 1.

"Blessed is the man that endureth temptation; for when he is tried he shall receive the crown of life."—JAMES I. 12.

THESE two texts are set over the one against the other. The one speaks of a crown of pride that fades, and the other of a crown of life that endures. The crown of pride is worn by those who are overcome by their lust; the crown of life is given to the man who triumphs over temptation. A deep woe, a væ victis indeed, is pronounced against the conquered; an immortal blessedness is promised to the conqueror.

Let us look first at the crown of pride worn by the drunkards of Ephraim. The image is very appropriate. Ephraim for a long time was the grandest of all the tribes of Israel. The right hand of Jacob had conveyed to its founder an ampler blessing than to the others; and this larger blessing was realised in the history of his descendants. To Ephraim belonged the great hero of the nation, the leader of the whole people. And in consequence Joshua's tribe inherited the finest portion of the Land of Promise. For centuries the chief sanctuary of the nation, the Tabernacle of Shiloh, was within its boundaries. And after the revolt from Judah in the reign of Rehoboam, the tribe of Ephraim became virtually the whole kingdom of Israel. The capital and chief city was Samaria, situated like a diadem on the top of a circular hill, surrounded by a very fertile valley filled with vineyards and orchards, and encompassed with a ring of green hills. The prophet could therefore speak appropriately of the crown of pride of Ephraim. It was a royal tribe. It wore the crown of supremacy over all the other tribes: it prided itself upon the greatness of its power and the grandeur of its history.

But the culminating point of the glory of this haughty and exclusive tribe was by this time past, and a period of decadence had begun. All its physical advantages turned out to be moral disadvantages to it. Owing to its political separation from Judah, it was shut out from the temple services at Jerusalem, and from all the national feasts connected with the worship of the living and true God. It therefore set up a religion and a shrine of its own, and established first at Bethel, and then at Samaria, the old idolatrous calf-worship of Egypt. With this dark nature-worship came in the profligate pastimes that were usually associated with it. And the people, unrestrained by the fear of God, lost all control over themselves, and gave way to the full indulgence of their lusts and passions. The tribe of Ephraim, possessing the finest vineyards in the whole country, became notorious for its intemperance. Its chief men lived only for the gratification of their depraved appetites. The writings of the later prophets abound in denunciations of their luxury and profligacy. Isaiah was especially severe. In scathing language he exposed their mingled pride and degradation, their loss of all manliness and patriotism. They were in a situation of peculiar danger between two formidable foes longing to possess their heritage—Assyria on the one hand and Egypt on the other. And they were unconsciously playing into the hands of these foes, weakening their strength and impoverishing their resources by their vicious indulgences. They could not defend their territory when assailed, and the enemy would gain an easy victory over them. And then their crown of pride would be trampled in the dust, and that which they thought was their glory would prove a burning shame to them.

It was a common custom both in the Eastern and Western world for the guests at a religious feast to crown their brows with chaplets of green leaves.

made of this material upon his brow, and he prided himself upon his gallant appearance.

And we must acknowledge that there was a singular suitableness in the nature of the chaplet. There could not, indeed, be a more appropriate crown for these effeminate sensualists in their revelries. The ivy is remarkable for its greenness and freshness. It never seems to wither like other plants, or to change with the changing seasons. It flourishes when other plants decay, and seems at all times full of life.

"A Ruin."

The worshippers of Bacchus, the god of wine, put upon their heads wreaths of ivy, because that plant was sacred to the god, having according to the legend sheltered him from the fierce heat of the sun when he was born. Wherever this god was worshipped in Egypt and Palestine, as well as in Greece and Rome—for his worship extended everywhere—chaplets of ivy were worn in his honour at feasts. Formerly an ivy-bush was a common tavern sign, and gave rise to the proverb, "Good wine needs no bush." The crown of pride, which Isaiah says the drunkards of Ephraim wore at their bacchanalian entertainments, was composed of ivy-leaves in conformity with this custom. Each person at these idolatrous orgies had a crown

For these reasons the revellers wove its leaves into a garland for their brows when life for them, owing to the excitement of the festival, seemed at its highest point. It represented their own vigour and joy, the freshness of their feelings and the strength of their hopes. By the intoxicating cup they were lifted above all the sordid cares and ills of life. The troubles that vexed other men had no existence for them. The primeval promise of the Tempter was fulfilled in their experience: "Ye shall be as gods." They seemed to breathe a diviner air. The horizon expanded around them, their pulses were quickened, and all possibilities of joy were within their reach. Crowned with the ivy-wreath of pride they seemed the sceptred sovereigns of their destiny.

But all is not flourishing that looks green and vigorous. The glory of the crown of pride is only on the surface, only in appearance. Look beneath the ivy, and what do you see, hidden by it—a ruin! Fresh and full of life as the ivy looks, it grows on decay. It loves the mouldering pile. Its clasp is fatal to the object to which it clings. It disintegrates by its roots the wall that supports it. The mortar crumbles and the stones fall out. It brings damp and moisture to complete the work of destruction, until at last the noble old castle or venerable abbey becomes a rude heap. Or, if it clings to a tree, it chokes it by its luxurious growth; it shuts out the vital air and sunshine and showers from the trunk and branches. And so the tree, to which the ivy imparts an appearance of extraordinary verdure and vitality, gradually withers and dies in its fatal embrace; and you see leafless boughs, like gigantic antlers, rising above the masses of glossy green foliage. And is it not appropriate that a plant, with such a power of producing decay and death in the object to which it clings, should be used to crown the head of foolish revellers? Like the ivy, the vice that seems to adorn and enrich the life saps the foundations of it. The temple of the body is turned into a ruin by this fatal crown of pride. It becomes physically worse; the spring of its vigour is dried up; the organs by which it can hold communion with the world of sense and with the higher world of soul are stifled and wasted. The very capacity of enjoyment is paralysed. Truly, to be carnally minded is death; truly to live in pleasure is to be dead while so living. Truly, the "owl in an ivy bush" of the familiar proverb, denoting the union of wisdom with conviviality, is a sad contradiction in fact!

Then, too, how full of suggestion is the creeping habit of the ivy! It cannot grow upright like other plants, or unfold itself without support. Strong and vigorous as it looks, it is in reality feeble and grovelling. It would fall helplessly to the ground if it found no object against which to lean. You notice that every part of its stem that comes in contact with a wall or tree, or other supporting object to which it can cling, sends out from one side of it a fringe of white fibres, which are not, properly speaking, roots, but holdfasts. With these myriads of feet it creeps slowly on the stones or over the trunk of the tree, making sure of its footing at every step. And does not the spray of the creeping ivy, twined into a garland for the reveller, betoken the feebleness and dependency to which his vice reduces him? It takes away all the manly, self-respecting, self-supporting elements out of him. It reduces him to poverty and dependence upon others. He loses all sense of his own degradation, and sorns upon others for the indulgence of his lust. A drunkard is the weakest, most helpless of God's creatures; and if he wears a crown of ivy at his miserable feast, it only symbolises his parasitical habits. Like the ivy, his seeming strength is weakness; and his life of self-indulgence is neither profitable to God nor man.

Thus the crown of pride with which all who yield to temptation adorn themselves is a mockery. They are deluded by their sin into mistaking shame for pride, degradation for glory. They imagine that they are happier than others while the glamour of their indulgence lasts. But afterwards comes the bitter reaction of dreariness and despair. Satan tempts all his victims to sin with a crown of pride. The sin will crown the life, make it grander and fuller, give it more freedom and enlargement. He offers the ivy-wreath to all whom he can influence as the reward of their allegiance. But there is no sadder heart in the world, no lonelier and more miserable life than that which is thus garlanded with the false semblance of pleasure. The crown of ivy is the symbol of an utterly enfeebled will that is led captive by the devil; and underneath the fair flourishing exterior are the ruins of a wrecked and desecrated life.

Such, then, is the woe that comes to the crown of pride, the miserable end of yielding to temptation. Let us now look at the other picture—the blessedness connected with the crown of life which rewards the overcoming of temptation. The Apostle Paul tells us that those who gave in their names as competitors in the public games of Greece and Rome subjected themselves beforehand to a severe course of training. They abstained from everything that would be likely to enfeeble their frame or exhaust their energy. Luxuries of all kinds were carefully avoided; only the plainest food was partaken of, and that in small and fixed quantities at regular intervals. They mortified the flesh, and lived the lives of ascetics, in the most impressionable period of life, when temptation has such a fascinating power over youthful appetite. And all this to win a corruptible crown, a mere wreath of fading laurel, put upon the head of the successful candidate, amid the applause of the spectators at the amphitheatre! But the Apostle James tells us of a far higher reward held out to the man who overcomes temptation; a reward worth going through far more trouble and self-denial than were involved in the preparation for, and in the actual struggle of, the Olympic games. The successful competitor in this case is crowned with the crown of life.

The crown of ivy does not belong to the tree to which it clings. It is not part of its life. It is an outside, separate thing—a different plant altogether. It has roots of its own. It crowns the tree with a crown of leaves that have not been nourished by its sap, and are therefore a hindrance and not a help to it, choking it instead of enabling it, as its own leaves would do, to grow and enlarge. The garland of the amphitheatre had no conformity with the nature of the contest in which the victor had been engaged. It was a mere arbitrary symbol, which with equal appropriateness might have been anything else.

There was no true relation between the enjoyment of the bacchanalian, while he made merry at his feast of wine, and the insensible ivy-wreath that crowned his head. But my text tells us that the crown with which the victor over temptation is crowned is not an arbitrary symbol, something external, but a part of himself. The overcoming of the temptation itself makes the crown. It is with his own life made nobler, richer, fuller, freer, by the conquest of temptation, that the conqueror is crowned. The substance, the essence of his crown, is a larger and more blessed life than he enjoyed before. Such a man emphatically "lives."

Look at a plant. It grows up and struggles with the adverse circumstances in which it is placed; with the beating winds and rains, with the frost and sun, and at last it produces a beautiful blossom on the top of its stalk. That blossom is its own growth, the product of its own life. It unfolds at the top of the stem, to show that in spite of every hostile condition it has fulfilled the end of its existence. That blossom is its crown of life, its living reward for all its brave life-work. It is not something external put upon it, but the result of its own development. It is formed of its own substance, it is moulded after its own pattern; for the flower is only a metamorphosed leaf, changed in shape and hue by the circumstances of its growth to suit its new requirements. It is the very life that has toiled and struggled that is crowned and made to show what hidden beauty and sweetness were in it, waiting the struggle of life to make them manifest. And so your life, too, flowers in the same way when you overcome the temptations that are opposed to your growth and well-being. Through the struggle your life puts forth its highest powers and unfolds its brightest qualities; and when you have gained the victory you are crowned with the blossom and fruit of your own achievement. It is not an extraneous reward, but a vital product. It is not put on you—you have wrought it out yourself. God gives the crown, but it is at the same time the natural spontaneous outcome of character, just as the sun gives the plant its flowery crown, but it is the growth of the plant itself.

Our fathers believed that every plant was created just as it is; that it has never changed in a single line or hue from the beginning. It was put in the soil at the very first a complete and perfect object as it is now; and during all these intervening ages, it has mechanically grown from seed to flower and fruit within the same rigid mould, monotonously repeating all its parts without a single variation. The modern scientific idea, on the contrary, is that every plant owes its present shape and colour and adaptation to a long struggle with its circumstances; that it has grown slowly and gradually to what it is, by an arduous vital process of conquering the difficulties of its situation, and accommodating itself to its environments. There is not a tint or a curve on leaf or flower but can be traced to this struggle, and is the permanent crown of its victory. How much grander is this conception, of the way in which the forms of life which we see around us have come into existence, than the old idea! Of course it will be understood that this process of adaptation involves the creative and protective act of God, and simply indicates to us His method of working.

And similarly, a too prevalent idea of Christian recompense gives us a mechanical ready-made heaven, to which we are transferred after death, as a pebble might be transferred mechanically to a cabinet. There is no affinity between the state and the character. What correspondence is there between wearing a crown of gold, and overcoming temptation? Such a reward would yield no true or lasting happiness, owing to this want of congruity and adaptation. There is much more of the true philosophy of religion in the old savage idea, that when the flesh of a brave man or of a ferocious tiger is eaten by the slayer, the spirit of the man or the tiger passes into the conqueror, and he is made bolder and more courageous by it. This superstition implies at least that there is a relation of kind between the conqueror's act and his reward. And it is true, as a matter of fact, that when we, by Divine grace, successfully overcome temptation, the power of the temptation changes sides; it becomes weaker and we become stronger. We speak of virtue being its own reward. It is so, because the ennobling of our own life by it is a better reward than any mere external gift, however valuable, could possibly be. Supposing that you were offered a money-payment for some generous act, would the possession of that money yield anything like the joy which the exalting of your own life through the performance of that generous act produces? And would you not refuse the money-reward as altogether unsuitable? It is evident, then, that the only heaven that can satisfy beings like us must be one to which our nature has become adapted, to which we have been harmonised by a long course of heavenly-mindedness.

All the promises made to the seven churches of Asia are connected with some special sin, and are in exact accordance with the nature of the overcoming. And the larger promise of heaven must be the carrying-out of this principle in the most perfect manner. Whatever may be the actual conditions and circumstances of the heavenly world, it is obvious that there must be a close vital correspondence between that world and the world in which we live now. The framework of this world is indeed but the rough draft of the finished heaven; and if in this world there is an effort more or less successful to balance character and circumstance, and to adapt them to one another, we cannot but suppose that heaven will be the perfect harmony of character with environment. This is what is implied in the words of the angel to the mortal regarding the inhabitants of heaven; "These are they that have come out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. Therefore are they before the throne of God, and serve Him day and night in His temple."

God rewards not as man does. Man can only reward by outward things. The world rewards its heroes and great men with its wealth and honours; but that reward is a mere material crown which is not co-natural with the man who enjoys it. The workman is paid wages or salary, but this so-called price of or equivalent for his services has no correspondence with the labour which he has expended, the waste of bodily tissue, the exhaustion of muscle and nerve, and the consumption of precious life. Wages are given to him merely to purchase the necessities of life in order to sustain and prolong life; the reward of his work is the satisfaction which he has in it, the moral discipline of his own nature, and the good which his work does in the world. But God crowns you with the crown of life, gives you no arbitrary reward from without, but the fruit of what you yourselves have sown and cultivated. He gives you not a dead material crown of gold, but a living crown of spiritual blessedness—the crown of your own life enriched and ennobled. Overcoming temptation, not in mere outward act only, but in heart and life, your own living victory will be a crown of joy and rejoicing to you. You will have in you the strength of your own convictions, the blessedness of your own purity. Doing good, you will be crowned with increased power and opportunity of doing good. Loving God and your fellow-men, you will be crowned with greater capacity of loving and greater enjoyment in it. God always pays in kind. His crown for spirituality is more spirituality; for purity, increased purity; for godliness, higher degrees of godliness; for faithfulness, more power of being faithful. The crown of Christ Himself is the salvation of the souls for whom He died. Paul, addressing the Thessalonian saints, said, "For what is our hope or joy, or crown of rejoicing? Are not even ye?" The disciples are the crown of the teacher. He is crowned with the living crown of his own work. And so, too, the mark and the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus our Lord are the same; the mark is likeness to Christ, and the prize is the enjoyment of this likeness; for to be like Christ as well as to be with Him is the most blessed heaven that man can know.

The crown of life emphasises the great distinction between joy and happiness, which we are continually confounding. Happiness is what happens to us, what comes to us from without, from the favourable conditions and good chances of the world; whereas joy is the rich experience of our own heart—the welling-up of a bright sweet fountain of gladness within—created by its own right and good condition—filled with the transforming love of Christ. It is joy and not happiness, therefore, that the Word of God always promises—that the overcoming of temptation gives. The overcoming may not in every case lead to happiness; it may be against our temporal interests to overcome certain temptations to worldly compliance that are presented to us. But in the absence of outward happiness and success, we can have this joy of the Lord as our strength. We can be satisfied from ourselves. And judging in this way, how many crowned ones are there of whom the world is ignorant—obscure men and women who overcome temptation in the humble spheres in which God has placed them, and are getting in their own souls the richness of their own experience! On the head of those who have perhaps failed to win any of what the world calls the prizes of life is set the crown of life. Their defeat is greater than victory. Their failure involves a higher success. They are rich in faith, strong in hope, blessed above all worldly blessedness in the exceeding sense of inner spiritual glory, which can raise and transfigure them above all the sufferings and privations of earth. Those who thus suffer with Christ reign with Him; they are made kings unto God, and need no external crown to show it.

You get this reward all along your life. You have not to wait till after death, and you reach heaven, to enjoy it. It will be yours every time that you overcome temptation here, and now. Every day that, by the grace of God, you are victorious over some besetting sin in yourself or some temptation in the world, will be a coronation-day. The strength that you take from the temptation which Jesus enables you to overcome will become your own, and will enrich and ennoble your life. You will be the lord of your circumstances, and not the slave. You will be made more than conqueror through Him that loved you, and triumph over all temptation—more than conqueror, for Christ has already overcome the world, and your faith in Him is the victory that overcometh the world; more than conqueror, for all your losses will turn to gains, and you will carry the fruit of your victories through the grave, and they will follow you up to glory. Your crown of life you will take with you to heaven, to be crowned there with a richer, fuller life in the land of perfect adaptations. "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life."

DEBBIE: A MISTAKE.

HY, Jim, you must be cranky! Fancy me a-sitting down and writing all that, and answering the shop-bell every minute or two." But it was no use talking. Jim, he wouldn't take no for an answer, like most of the men, and he declared I must try and do my best. So what with his worriting, and the children teasing me, I got 'Ria to come and mind shop to-day while I've come right away up-stairs to write the old story. I'd a deal rather be in the shop, and I did say summat to Jim about getting some author chap that might be wanting a day's work, to come and do the writing for me. Jim says there's lots of them as are always ready for a job, but he wouldn't hear of it.

"Tell your own story, missis, plain and simple. If you give it to one of them fellows they'd varnish it up till you couldn't tell what was truth and what wasn't," he said. So that settled it, and here I am, looking out of the window on the chimney-tops and wondering how to begin. Dearie me, it was thirty year ago, on a lovely summer morning just like this, that I looked out of another window, and something come up in my throat and nearly choked me; and if poor Debbie hadn't been so ill, I should have given way to my feelings. There! I meant to begin quite different, and not blurted it out like that, for I made up my mind that I ought to tell my story as if no one had ever heard it before; but I never was one to pretend, and I don't know how to manage that way now. Well I must begin again from the very beginning, and try to think that I am writing to folks who are quite strangers to me, and not my own children and grandchildren at all.

The fact is, Debbie and me was orphans, and though we wasn't relatives, we lived together in one room and worked in the same factory, and was very fond of one another, and wasn't often seen apart. I was strong and healthy, but Debbie, she was a poor delicate ailing thing. Many a time I've watched her through the night, when her attacks came on, and then gone to the factory the next morning without a wink of sleep, but it never hurt me. Lots of the girls there was very wild, and got into no end of trouble, but somehow Debbie and me didn't see any fun in playing up like most of them. We had to stand a lot of chaff, and they called us the steady twins; but we didn't care, for somehow it seemed to pay to be steady. We did enjoy our holidays, when we mostly went to the Forest, or 'Ampstead 'Eath, or some other such place. And the next day we weren't knocked up, or, worse still, locked up, like some of the girls who had been enjoying themselves in their way. We used to save a trifle every week: not so much, though, as I now spend in postage-stamps to write to my boys in foreign parts. After living together like this for two or three years, we had one shocking hard winter and a very late spring. Then Debbie fell ill, and what with getting medicine and tempting things for her to eat, all our savings went, and we didn't know which way to turn. Just about that time, too, something happened which sometimes made me miserable and sometimes made me happy. I never spoke of it to Debbie, and she never guessed it, I'm certain. There was a very nice young fellow who lived round the corner. His father was a costermonger, and he used to go his rounds with him. He got to know me through me buying fish off his barrow for Debbie, and he was that civil and obliging, and when he found out I was buying for a sick friend he picked out the nicest fish he had. Then he began to look out for me and ask after Debbie, and one night he came to the street door and gave me a lovely eel and a bunch of primroses.

"The eel is for Debbie and the flowers are for you," he said, rushing away before I had time to say a word of thanks. I don't know how I felt, but I just went up-stairs to Debbie with the fish and the flowers, and somehow I couldn't tell her that the flowers had been given to me. I said, "Look what he's brought us." I believe Debbie liked the flowers even better than the eel, for she kept hanging over them and touching them with her bits of fingers until I felt—no, I won't say that, for I never did feel jealous about Debbie.

One thing followed another after that, and he and me grew quite like old friends. Sometimes he brought flowers for me and something else for Debbie, but I never told her that the flowers were for me, but let her keep them in a mug by her side all the time. One day he said to me, "I do want to see that friend of yours. Seems to me that she must be something out of the common, your thinking such a lot of her and being so good to her."

"Debbie is something out of the common, as you'll say when you see her," I said. As for Debbie, she just loved him before she saw him; but then she was always so loving and clinging. All the time I was telling myself that I knew just how it would be when once he did see her, for she was such a pretty little thing, and had such nice gentle ways. He kept hinting and hinting that he would like to see her, and at last one evening when Debbie was able to go out for a breath of fresh air in the Park, he offered to go with us. I saw him look and look at Debbie as if he was struck, and he might well be, for she was just like a lily, with a bit of rose-colour on her cheek from the excitement of seeing him. By-and-bye he offered her his arm, and she took it, and then said, "Oh, Mr. Grant, thank you ever so much for the lovely things you've sent. The fish and fruit's done me so much good; but I think the flowers have been best of all."

He looked across at me quite sharp, and I looked back at him, and shook my head, and he took the hint, and only said, "I'm glad you liked 'em all." Somehow, I hadn't the heart to say much that evening; I couldn't help seeing that them two was made for each other. I didn't want to be a selfish wretch and make trouble for them, but while Debbie was sleeping quietly by my side that night, I lay wide awake saying over and over again that I could never love anyone else as I loved him. Debbie very quickly got well then, and was soon back to work, and things went on as they used to do, except that he took us out every evening for a walk. Sometimes I'd pretend as I didn't want to go, and then he would look so surprised, and say, "We can't do without her, can we, Debbie?" And Debbie would take my arm and say, "What nonsense! of course we can't." Sometimes when he saw me alone he would talk about Debbie, and say how delicate she was, and how he wished she hadn't to work so hard; and once he said, "I wouldn't have her at that old factory one more day if I could help it, would you, Sissie?" Of course I said no, but I did think it strange that he should talk to me like that before he had said anything to Debbie about their getting settled. But he didn't seem to be in a bit of hurry, though I was always contriving to give him a chance to speak. As for Debbie, she was as happy as a bird, and trusted and loved him with all her heart.

Well, we three just went on in the same way until there was going to be a general holiday, and he said he'd take us both to the Forest. Debbie got wild with excitement, and I made sure he'd speak plain to her that very day, and I was glad to think it would soon be settled, for I felt I couldn't go on that way much longer. The worst of it was that we was both very badly off in the matter of dress. We'd only got a trifle saved, as we'd had such a bad winter. It was just enough to get a cheap new dress for one of us, but it wouldn't do no more. So I made up my mind that Debbie should have it, and I bought some stuff and made it up for her, and trimmed up her old hat, and declared that she should look nice on that day. She made a great fuss, and said it was a shame, but things should be different some day; and if she didn't go and tell him all about it the evening before! He just gave me one look out of his big eyes, and I felt glad that I had made Debbie have that dress. Debbie went to bed early to get a long night's rest before the excitement of the next day, and he and I stood chatting at the door.

"Well," he said presently, "I must say good-night to the best woman in the world," and he squeezed my hand and looked into my eyes till I pulled my hand away and ran up-stairs. I stood outside our room choking down the sobs, and then I went in and saw Debbie's dress all laid out, and she in bed looking so pretty and happy, and I said to myself, "Bless her, she shan't ever know that he said that to me, for he couldn't quite have meant it." In the dead of the night, when all was quiet, I lay and thought it all over; what I'd do when they were married; how I'd go into some situation and get right away from them; and I only got to sleep as the clocks were striking five. I'd slept about an hour, when I was woke by a choking sound, and I jumped up to find Debbie gurgling and gasping, and the blood coming thick and fast from her lips. I knew what had happened then, for it wasn't the first time she had broke a blood-vessel. I did what I could, and sent a lodger for the doctor, and he told me to keep her quiet and give her ice and everything I hadn't got. So I took her new dress and pawned it, though it went to my heart to do it. When I got back with the ice and things, Debbie opened her eyes and whispered, "Did you tell him?"

"No," I said, "he'll be coming round and then I can tell him."

"I must see him myself; I'll get up if you don't let me," said Debbie.

"Don't say a word more, and I'll bring him up-stairs," I said, for I was terribly afraid she would bring on the bleeding if she talked. She closed her eyes, and when I heard his knock I went down-stairs and told him the news. He turned quite white, and caught my hand, and would you believe it, he said, "Oh, my poor Sissie, this is hard for you."

"It's worse for you," I said, quite astonished.

"No, it isn't indeed, for I've seen it coming on long enough; but I did hope that we'd all have one more happy time together." I didn't understand him in the least, and I took him up-stairs, and only said, "Don't let her talk," just outside the door. Debbie must have heard, for she said, "But I must talk; and, Sissie, you just go over to the window, and don't listen, there's a dear." I went to the window, but not before I'd seen him bending over her as loving as a mother. I didn't want to look, after that. I grew dizzy and sick, and had to catch hold of a chair to keep myself from falling. By-and-bye he called me in a husky queer sort of a voice.

"Sissie, you're wanted here."

So I crossed the room, and there was Debbie as white as death, with her eyes closed.

"Do you know, Sissie, Debbie says she isn't going to get over this, and she wants you and me to promise that we'll be all the world to each other before she leaves us, and she says she won't die happy unless we do. I'm ready to promise; won't you?" I looked down at his honest face, with its loving eyes, and then at the face near to his, and felt so dazed that I couldn't say a word. Debbie dying, and Jim—yes, it was Jim, of course, you know—talking like that to me.

"Say yes, quickly, Sissie," whispered Debbie faintly.

"But, darling, Jim doesn't care for me, and I can't say yes like he can, even to please you."

"Tell her, Jim."

"I do love you, Sissie, with all my heart, if you'll only believe it."

"You'll be so happy, and I'll be happy too, perhaps happier than you." Debbie's face looked like an angel's as she talked, and I slipped away from Jim and knelt down beside her.

"If you'll only live Debbie, we'll be all happy together," I sobbed.

"Don't cry, dear; there's nothing to cry for. I might have known I was dying by inches, but I did want to live," and she laid her hand on Jim's head, for he had knelt down by the other side of the bed. "I don't want to live now, for I'd always be delicate and a fine handful for you, but I'll be quite well soon, and I'll never forget you." Debbie's blue eyes rested once more on me and then on Jim, and she whispered, "Kiss me." We both kissed her, and then she just put one hand in mine and one in Jim's and slept her life away.

I was ill myself afterwards, and Jim fetched his good old mother to come round to nurse me, and he came and sat with me every evening. One evening, when I was mending and able to talk, he told me all about it. We had been talking of Debbie, and he told me how the grass was beginning to look fresh and green on her grave. So I asked him if he hadn't ever cared for Debbie more than me. He said No, he had always loved me best from the first, though he only sometimes fancied that I cared for him. He knew that Debbie loved him, and so he wouldn't speak to me, for he knew all along that she was dying fast, and he couldn't bear to give her any pain; and sometimes he thought that I guessed what he meant, and was pleased that he should wait a while, and sometimes he didn't know what to think. Only he felt all the time that it was kinder to Debbie to let things go on; for though he loved me, she was just like a sister to him.

Just as soon as I could be moved, his mother took me to her home, and then when her husband died, the dear old soul came to live with Jim and me. My 'Ria remembers her well enough.

Jim has got on ever so well since that time, being so steady and hardworking, and he's had a shop of his own for these many years.

Now I think that's all I've got to tell, and I'm right glad that my writing's over. It's took me all day, and it's about the hardest day's work that ever I did, and I don't envy them writing fellows one bit if this is how they feel after their day's work.

"FOR ME."

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A.

THE world is full of sad and disappointed ones; and their sadness and disappointment have come to them by many different paths.

To some has come the loss of money, and all the dreams of possessing what money can procure have vanished.

To some has come the loss of position, and their place as regards honour knoweth them no more.

Some have loved and lost, and life's banquet has been snatched from their lips; and others who hoped that some day such a banquet would be spread for them have outlived that hope, yet none the less do they remember it as a hope, and grieve, it may be with bitterness, it may be only with chastened sorrow, that it has not been fulfilled.

Here is a man who has toiled, and toiled, and never could make a fortune, while this one and that, with perhaps less cleverness than his, have prospered in all that they have touched, and that with very little toil.

Here is a girl with a heart full of capacities for love, with great yearnings for love; she sees this one and that chosen, and herself passed by—none wanting her heart, none her suitor, to beg for her as his very own.

Here is one whose gifts entitle him to position, to honour, and to all that they can confer, but he sees very cripples in comparison with himself pass him on the road of life, hobbling along with some crutches, which he does not need, and the use of which he would despise.

One has a childless home—another no personal attraction that she should be desired—another no longed-for retreat from the worry and bustle of life; and all these, and many similarly circumstanced, are longing for what they have not got—and cannot get, and never perhaps will get—but as yet they have no peace. They have not realised—"This or that (whatever it may be) is not FOR ME."

I should like to speak a word in season to him that is weary, to bind up the broken-hearted, to strengthen the feeble knees, to draw some of the way-worn ones under the shadow of a rock in a weary land.

The one great Rock casting the only true restful shadow over the burning sands is Christ. In Him, and in Him only, can the soul's rest—the heart's rest, life's rest—be found; but, bearing this in mind, there are some thoughts which may be helpful to us in all these disappointments and sorrows, and upon one of these I wish to dwell now.

The thought is a very simple one; it is comprised in those three little words—and especially the last of them: Not for ME.

Now, first of all, let me dwell for a moment on this little word me. Indeed, all that I have to say depends upon the emphasis you lay upon this little word—upon the power of isolation that you give it—upon its being able to separate you from all the world beside, while you are considering your sorrow, or trouble, or loss, whatever it may be that is the cause of your depression or grief.

There are two great mistakes which we are liable to make when we think of ourselves; and, as is so often curiously the case, they are in diametrically opposite directions.

The first mistake is that we are likely to make ourselves everybody, the second is that we are likely to make ourselves out to be nobody.

The first comes from pride and inordinate self-esteem—the second from a mistaken humility, and from our not having that proper measure of self-estimation without which we can never take our place aright in the great family of man, and in the varied circumstances which fall to his lot.

Each of these mistakes has its own proper class of evils.

The man who makes himself everybody is generally an arbitrary man—he is his own standard, and he wants to impose that standard on everyone else—and this is always offensive; for he is looked upon as wanting to impose himself.

Moreover, such a man is sure to be more or less short-sighted—he can never see far away from himself, he can seldom grasp a question in its relation to others: he cannot look all round it.

And so he is a man of judgments, and, as is generally the case under such circumstances, a man of misjudgments too.

And there is yet another evil. This undue estimate recoils upon the man himself. Making as much of himself as he does, he thinks that nothing is too good for him—often that nothing is good enough—and, as the world will not take him at his own estimate, he is sure to be continually thwarted, and disappointed, and humiliated; and so, no end of mortifications lie before him in life.

If your trouble, good reader, has come to you by this road, perhaps you will get rid of it altogether, or at any rate of much of it, by lowering your estimate of yourself.

But there are others who make a mistake in quite another direction: they make themselves out to be, as it were, nobody. This cannot be. Somebody each one is—himself, and no one else—and somebody he must continue evermore. No one can take your place in creation, nor can you take that of anyone else. You have your own position in the eyes of God, and no one else can fill it.

Now, this mistake, of making oneself out to be nobody has some very bad effects.

One of these is false humility. There is a humility which is a tower of strength, there is one also which is a source of weakness. It is one thing to have a true humility which would prevent us from taking the highest room; it is another to have a false humility which would make us stay away from the feast altogether, as unworthy to accept the invitation received.

Moreover, if we do not count ourselves as individually somebody, we lose ourselves in the mass; and with the loss of individuality very often goes the loss of the sense of responsibility.

And this is why men will do as corporations, societies, churches, nations, what they never would do as individuals, as those with personal responsibilities.

There is a common saying, true, though somewhat coarse, which exactly expresses this state of things. It is said of corporations that they have neither souls to be saved, nor bodies to be kicked.

In corporations and large bodies of which a man is a unit—an individual member—all that may be left to him, is the liberty to protest; but if he is to recognise the responsibility of his individuality, this he must do—everyone must give an account of himself to God.

We must take up the standing of our individuality. We must realise the I, the ego, the sum (I am), and that, "as I have an existence connected with others, so also have I one confined exclusively to myself."

Now, in order to do this, we must see that there is a positive and a negative side to our individuality. We shall never have a due estimate of what concerns ourselves personally until we do this. There is a "to be" and a "not to be" connected with each of us as regards himself, and himself alone. Immense good will come to each of us from realising this; and it is in order that we may get this good that I write these lines.

We pray for a "right judgment in all things," and one is as precious here as in some of the most important affairs and relationships of life; indeed, much of the peace and power of our spiritual and our temporal life may come by our knowing the meaning of these words "For me," or "Not for me," as the case may be.

What it is to realise this, and the good which will flow practically from it, is what I would offer to the reader now. I am quite sure that by a right understanding here, he can be greatly helped.

I look, then, first at the negative side of my individuality. I can see that it has limitations and privations. I—I myself—am under limitations: I am in ways in which perhaps others are not. I may have simply limitations, which may not be privations; or I may have those which are both.

Perhaps I am circumscribed in my powers of thought, or in those powers as acting in any given direction. I may have no talent for mathematics which another man has, or for music, or for art. I may be greatly limited in attaining proficiency in what I enjoy: I may not be able to preach, to write, to paint as this one or that; I feel I am limited. I have not the powers, the gifts that this one and that has. If I am called upon to have to do with any of these things, I must do my best as regards each of them—that is my duty—but I must do them, whether I like it or not, under the law of limitation, so far as I am concerned. In other words, it is "not for me" to excel in this or that.

I am not the least afraid of making you idle or faint-hearted by getting you to recognise what are the limits under which you are to work; on the other hand, I am sure I am being helpful to you, as I hope you will presently see. Do your best in all positions in which you are placed—in everything which it is given to your hand to do—but when you honestly perceive the limitations within which you are to act, then accept them; and, believe me, it will wonderfully help you to know your true position in life, to adapt yourself to it, and enable you to do what you can do, and not lose your time, energy, and patience in trying to do what you cannot do.

I know that there are lazy people who would pervert what I am saying, and make it an excuse for doing nothing, or doing what little they do ill; but everything is liable to be abused.

For each one of us there are unquestionably limitations, and many of us are liable to think ourselves aggrieved thereby. But let us consider for a moment. All nature, all life, is full of this law of limitation. The lofty oak has its limitation, as well as the humble lichen; the one as much as the other, if it could speak, would have to say the words, "Not for me." Voice! sight! strength! limitation meets us in them all—our wisdom is to see where the limit touches us, in mind, body, or estate; and to accept it, as far as we individually are concerned—what is, is; and is so for me.

No doubt this may meet us in the way of privation, and it does, too. In fact, limitation often involves privation. Well, if it do, we must accept it, none the less.

If I have but one leg, I am certainly a limited individual in many respects. Unquestionably I cannot hop well, neither can I dance, nor run; moreover, I cannot go the excursions which others do: that privation is for me. It is not for others (except my companions in wooden legs), but it is for me. My wooden leg and I are inseparables. I have no business with other people's legs. It is their lot to have two; it is mine to have only one, and I have to do with myself. A two-legged life is "not for ME."

I have nothing to do now with the question why it should not be; I am only concerned with what is. If you want to go into the question why it should not be, you are forgoing into depths where I cannot follow you. I confess I am unable to go into the depths of Divine providences and arrangements. I am puzzled continually with the differences which I see in human lots. If I had not a belief in Divine sovereignty and providences—in the wisdom, and goodness, and justice of God—all to be vindicated in the long run, I do not know what I should do. I have to do with what is, and not with what might be, or might have been.

But there is a positive as well as a negative side to this "for me." If there is that which is "not for me," there is also that which is "for me." Each one has his own peculiar gift or gifts—each one has his own peculiar alleviation. These are his, for him as a single person—an individual—himself and no one else before God, and in the world.

No one is passed by, no one is entirely unendowed—of those possessed with reason—of those for whom I write. The individuality of those who are not possessed of reason I leave with God. He knows the mystery of their being; and we may safely leave all connected with it with Him. Thank God, we are not called upon to solve the mysteries in creation.

I have to do with myself in this matter—what have I—what is given to me, to comfort me, to compensate me, to give me a place and position and power in the world? If there be a great deal which is not for me, surely there is something that is for me, which is mine—my very own. It is "for me."

Now, the effect of this realisation will be very useful upon both our outward and our inner life.

It will make us take a conscious place in outer life. The world is made up of individuals, and I am an individual. I am a part of the world, therefore I have to play my part in the world.

No one should allow himself or herself to be shelved—put aside, unless absolute retirement is for him the plain providence of God. If it should be so, then in that retirement he will be taught, if he wish to learn, what is, and what is not, for him.

"Me" involves in it a sphere of some kind in which your individuality is to manifest itself; and that will save you from the depressing feeling of being nobody. In one sense, and a very important sense, you have no right to consider yourself "nobody." There is something for you to do, and be, and you should do and be it.

This is one benefit that will accrue in outer life from your recognising yourself. There is another which I should mention, before I speak of the great blessings which accrue to the inner life.

You will be kept from wanting to take a place in life for which you are not perhaps fitted, for which you were never designed, or for which, however well fitted naturally, you are not destined in the providence of God.

You will be kept from jostling other people; you will pursue your own path; and you will be saved—who can tell how much loss of time and strength, how much failure, vexation, and sorrow?

But what I want to dwell upon chiefly is the immense benefit which will come to us hereby in our inner life.

To be able to say, "This or that is 'not for ME,'" is to have a very calming and sustaining influence operating on the mind. It will make us feel settled. The matter is decided, so far as I am concerned. A calm often follows the settlement of a matter, even though that settlement has not taken exactly the form which we should have chosen. We are something like David: when the child was alive, and there was a possibility of its recovery, he fasted and wept; but when it was dead, he rose up and ate and drank—he accepted the inevitable. While things are in doubt, and we do not know which way they will turn, we are often agitated, unsettled—nothing is accepted—and this can only be met by our putting ourselves into the hands of God, determined each one to accept what is or is not to be for him ("for me," or "not for me").

And when, as is many times the case, we are not to have what we wish to have, and it may be another gets it, we shall bring God and ourselves together in one thought, and say, "It is not for me."

And that will sustain us. We need keeping up at these times; and this holy philosophy will stand to us in our hour of need. We shall say "ME! I am existing before God in this matter."

This will save us also from making many mistakes in action. We sometimes want to go into spheres and embark in enterprises which are not for us at all. They are for others, but not for us. It does not follow that because a thing is good, it is good for me—that because another is called to do it, I am called also.

Sometimes a Christian admires such and such a work, and he thinks that, because it is good in the abstract, he must go into it, and he does so, and finds out his mistake by his failure. It was not for him at all.

At times a man makes foolish imitations—innocently enough, but foolishly—and if only he knew how to use the words "Not for me," he would be saved from much of the annoyance and ridicule and absurdity which flow from his folly.

I can imagine a man being fired with the eloquence of some great preacher, and, with no gifts at all similar to his, endeavouring to follow him. He has a certain measure of power in his own sphere, he certainly has that which God meant him to have. He has none in the other man's sphere—it was not for him; he may at first say so with a sigh, but there are "gifts differing," and these words will bring him back to the use of his own. He will travel far and well in his own little shoes; he would only have tumbled and floundered about in another man's seven-leagued boots.

When a man has learned to say, "This and that are not for me," he is helped much also in the way of concentration. Concentration is power, and the lopping-off of extraneous diversions gathers a man in upon what he himself is really to do or be. That sphere, that work, is not for me, therefore I dismiss it from my thoughts as a sphere of action, I gather in my mind upon that which I have to do.

Contentment also travels by this road. We often half-fret ourselves away by discontent. We thrust our personality into other people's affairs and positions, and are vexed because they are not ours. But I myself have really nothing to do with such and such a man's honours, or riches, or whatever it may be that is envied; my discomfort arises from trying to fit together what are not meant to be fitted. "Not for me," rightly said, would get rid of it all.

And this would ennoble us. Peace would come into our hearts, pettiness would depart from them. We should seek for power in our own sphere, and to be what we can be in it. We should be our own real selves; and no man can be otherwise than weak when he is anything else. We shall live our individuality, our "me" before God, and we shall feel the conscious relationship between Him and us.

Yes! this will give us a nearer personal life with God. We shall be living in the consciousness and the acceptance of His will; we shall not be striving with Him because of our limitations, whether of mind, body, or estate; we shall have learned, like the apostle, in whatever state we are, therewith to be content. The fret which is so disturbing to the divine life we shall be free from, and our peace will be that of the accepted will of God.

Our individuality will be a balanced one. "Me" will be put in its right place, and power and peace will flow therefrom. We shall know what is our business, and do it; we shall know what is our sphere, and fill it; we shall recognise what is outside our appointed circle, and leave it.

And we shall be kept from judging others unduly, and often wrongly.

Sometimes we blame them because they do not plough with our heifer, because they do not embark in this and that in which we are embarked, because they do not see things exactly as we do.

How do we know but that these various things are not for them? We perhaps are forcing them into a sphere which is not theirs at all. Their own Master has appointed them their own work and place, and to Him they stand or fall. Attend to what is manifestly appointed for you, and I am sure that in most cases this will be enough for you.

There were two clergymen talking one day, and one of them said to the other that, owing to health, he found great difficulty in attending certain services in the church. The other did not denounce him as some rigorous clerics might have done, but said to him, with the sweetest of Christian smiles on his face: "Then those are not God's means of grace for you." Ah! how much more charitable, how much more discriminating, should we be, if we remembered that there are weak and strong in body, and in mind, in the Church of God. There are Boanerges and Barnabas, there are those who are weak and cannot eat all sorts of meat, and there are strong ones who can eat anything, and each stands by himself before God.

It was not for Moses to enter the Promised Land, though he was to lead the children of Israel up to it. It was not for David to build the Temple, although he made preparation for it. It was not for the ancient prophets to see the day of Christ, though they earnestly desired it. "Not for me" is a voice not of to-day, or yesterday, but of the far-off ages which have past.

One word more. The dispensations for the individual, the "ME," may be different at different times, but the individual is ever to be kept in view. What may be for ME to-day may not be for ME to-morrow. And yet there is no inconsistency in the dealings of God. Evil came to those who had no changes. Ephraim was a cake not turned, and therefore worthless.

The one great thing is this: to be certain, each one of us, that he lives before God as an individual, that he is himself, and can be only himself before Him; that for him it is ordered what he is to have, and be, and what he is not to have, or be. That will be his strength and peace, and, perhaps, enable him to say with a smile what he otherwise could not have said, save with a sigh—"NOT FOR ME."

BROTHER JOHN.

BY MARY BRADFORD-WHITING.

ETTIE, just look here! I've cut a fearful hole in my tennis shoes."

The speaker was a good-looking young man, clad in flannels, who had just come up to the hammock in which his sister was lying.

"Put on another pair," said Hettie, scarcely opening her eyes as she lazily rocked herself to and fro.

"I haven't got another pair. You might as well sit up and try and suggest something. I shan't be able to take you to the Stamfords' party, that's all!"

"Take John's," said Hettie.

"Good thought! John will never know, or, any way, he will never care;" and Gerald strode off across the lawn to ransack his brother's possessions.

John Douglas was the eldest of a large family, and Gerald and Hettie were the two youngest, consequently there was a gap of more than ten years between them. The intervening brothers and sisters had either married or settled abroad, and when the father and mother died, it seemed to be the natural thing that John should make a home for the two who still needed protection.

It seemed as much a matter of course to John as to anyone else, and giving up his hopes of a London consulting practice, he looked about for a country partnership, and took his brother and sister to live with him. John was hard-working and dependable, and his value was speedily felt by all with whom he came in contact, so that when Dr. Hamilton's health began to fail, he had no hesitation in leaving the practice to the care of his partner.

Hettie and Gerald had never known what poverty meant; they trusted implicitly to their brother, and never troubled their heads with the cares of every-day life. Gerald had passed from school to college, in fulfilment of the wish that his father had expressed for him, and Hettie gave herself up to her own enjoyment.

She was always daintily dressed and tenderly cared for, and it seemed to her that these things were no more than her right.

She got up slowly from her hammock as Gerald entered the house, and prepared to follow him. The two were much alike in appearance, with fair hair and complexions, and a grace of manner that made them very attractive to all with whom they came in contact. They were much alike in mind also, and shared all their pleasures and sorrows, while they seemed to take it for granted that John had little interest in their concerns.

It was Gerald's vacation now, and he and Hettie were about together through all the long summer days, boating, picnicking, and playing tennis. They were going this afternoon to a garden-party at the house of some people who had only recently come to the place; and finding that it was later than she thought, Hettie hurried through the hall on her way up-stairs.

"Hettie!"

A voice called her as she ran up the staircase, and she stopped impatiently, and answered, "What is it?" in no very gracious tone.

"I want you here for a minute."

It was John's voice, and receiving no answer, he came out of his study.

Hettie made a pretty picture as she leaned over the old oak balustrade, resting her cheek against her hands, while the sunlight from the window above her glittered on her hair.

"What do you want?" she asked, with a little pout as she looked down at him.

John Douglas was totally unlike his brother and sister; he was a plain man, with heavily-cut features, of middle height and stalwart build, the intelligence of his eyes and the kindness of his smile alone redeeming him from ugliness.

"Where are you going?" he asked, as he looked up at the bright face above him.

"I told you at lunch-time," said Hettie, rather crossly; "Gerald and I are going to play tennis at the Stamfords'. I really haven't a minute to spare. What did you want?" she added, as he turned away.

"I have had a sudden call to a house nine miles off, and I shall not be back till late. I wanted you to put up some sandwiches for me, and to write a letter while I get the things I must take."

"Well, I'm very sorry I can't stop," said Hettie. "Jane can get the sandwiches if you just ring your bell."

"Yes; but Jane can't write my letter," said John, with a touch of vexation in his voice that was lost upon Hettie, who was already at the top of the staircase.

The whole thing had passed from her mind almost before she reached her room. John was always wanting something or other: it was impossible to bother about him.

John was just getting into his dog-cart when she and Gerald came out of the front door. They looked like an incarnation of summer in their brightness and gaiety, and it hardly occurred to them that John was of the same order of being as themselves as they saw him drive away with what Hettie called his "medical face" on.

"I should hate fagging like that!" said Gerald, swinging Hettie's tennis shoes round and round as he spoke.

"Oh, John likes it," said Hettie carelessly. "Don't break my shoe-laces, you bad boy, or I shall make you trudge back to the house to fetch me another pair."

"You have not brought your brother, then?" said Mrs. Stamford, when they arrived at last in the cool shady garden of Westfield Lodge, and sank down to rest on the chairs that stood under the trees.

Hettie looked rather puzzled. "Gerald is with me," she said.

"Oh yes; but I meant Dr. Douglas. I hoped that he would have come too."

"What do you want! she asked"—p. 300.

"He never goes out," said Hettie; "he is always much too busy to think of anything of the kind. I did not mention your invitation to him, for I knew it was no use."

Mrs. Stamford looked surprised, and perhaps a little displeased; but Hettie scarcely noticed it, for Nora Stamford came up at the moment to ask her to join in a set of tennis, and she thought no more about it.

The afternoon wore pleasantly away; and when Gerald and Hettie returned home they still talked over their new acquaintances as they strolled about the garden, until they heard the returning wheels of the dog-cart.

"There's John at last," said Gerald.

"Yes," said Hettie. "I believe Jane has kept something hot for him."

She led the way towards the dining-room window; and while John ate his meal his brother and sister leaned on the sill outside, and narrated their experiences.

"Colonel Stamford is a charming man!" said Hettie. "I didn't care for Mrs. Stamford so much: she has rather a snappish manner; she seemed quite vexed that you did not come with us."

"I wasn't asked," said John.

"Oh yes, you were," said Hettie; "but I quite forgot to tell you, and of course you wouldn't have gone, any way."

John said nothing, and went on with his dinner, while Gerald took up the tale.

"We had some capital tennis: Nora Stamford is one of the nicest girls I've met for a long time. That was an awfully pretty dress she had on, Hettie."

"It didn't fit well," said Hettie.

"Rubbish!" said Gerald. "That's the kind of thing girls always say about one another. Come along, and let us walk round the garden again."

They sauntered away, leaving John to finish his solitary meal and to write the letter that he had had no time for before he went out.

Two or three days passed away, and nothing more was said about the Stamfords. Hettie thought that John had forgotten all about them, but she was mistaken. She had just asked Gerald at lunch one day if he would call at Westfield Lodge with her, when John, who sometimes heard what was said when he seemed to be most absorbed, turned towards her, and electrified her by saying, "Are you going to call on the Stamfords? I will go with you."

"You!" exclaimed Hettie, in utter astonishment, while Gerald looked up from his plate with eyes of wonder.

"Yes," said John. "You say that Mrs. Stamford included me in her invitation, and therefore it is only right that I should call upon her."

"But Gerald is going," objected Hettie, who had no fancy for making calls with her plain and silent elder brother.

"Gerald can go too, if he likes," said John quietly. "No, thank you!" said Hettie. "It's impossible for a whole tribe to go making calls together."

"Well, I mean to go, anyhow," said Gerald. "I like the Stamfords, and I want them to ask me to tennis again. If John is so keen on making a call, he can go and see old Mrs. Wilson."

John rose from the table without taking any notice of this remark, but as he left the room he turned towards Hettie, and said, "I shall be ready at half-past three."

"What on earth has come to John now?" said Gerald, stretching himself, with a yawn, as the door closed on his brother.

"I don't know, I'm sure," said Hettie crossly.

She always felt that if she expressed a wish it ought to be attended to directly; and John was generally so willing to gratify her that it made it all the more vexatious when he showed any will of his own.

Both she and Gerald looked rather sulky as they met John in the hall at half-past three; but he did not appear to notice it, and talked pleasantly to them as they walked towards Westfield Lodge. Mrs. Stamford and her daughter were sitting on the lawn, while a thin and long-legged boy lay on the grass beside them.

Hettie had a fixed idea that John did not know how to behave in society; but though he had not her ease of manner, he had a frank straightforwardness that some people liked even better. He began at once to talk to Mrs. Stamford, while Gerald seized the opportunity of securing the vacant seat by Nora's side.

He was not left long in peace, however: Mrs. Stamford was a fond mother, and she saw the look of boredom that had settled on the face of her only and beloved boy. "Mr. Douglas," she said, "I am going to ask you a favour. Will you be so kind as to have a game of tennis with Dick? He is going up to Oxford next term, and he would be glad if you would talk to him a little about it."

Gerald looked up with a dismayed expression. "I should be delighted," he said; "but I have no shoes."

"I can lend you some shoes," said Dick eagerly; "and there are heaps of rackets and things."

He bore off his captive in triumph, much to Hettie's amusement, for she knew the utter despair that Gerald must be feeling. She was so taken up with watching them that she paid no heed to what was going on at her side until she was roused by the sound of approaching tea-cups. They must have been there an hour at least; and she wondered what John could have found to talk about.

He was speaking with such animation that she felt constrained to listen to find out what it was all about, but she nearly laughed when she caught the words—"Old-Age Pensions" and "Outdoor Relief."

"You must be quite worn-out with listening to my brother's ponderous wisdom!" she said, turning towards Nora. "He means well, but he goes so little into society that he does not understand the art of conversation. Gerald and I get fearfully bored sometimes."

"I have been very much interested in what Dr. Douglas has been telling us," said Nora, with some coldness in her voice.

"I don't see why you admire Miss Stamford, Gerald," said Hettie, as she walked home between her brothers. "She has just the same snappish way that her mother has."

"She struck me as a very sensible girl," said John. "Oh! You would think anyone sensible who pretended to take an interest in old women and sick babies!" said Hettie flippantly.

"I don't care whether she is sensible or not," said Gerald; "I only know that she has lovely eyes, and that she looks very pretty when she smiles."

Hettie laughed rather scornfully, but she made no reply, and, as John said nothing either, the conversation died a natural death.

Unless John was absolutely obliged to do so, he never talked about his patients, and therefore it came as a surprise to both Gerald and Hettie when a garden party at Westfield Lodge was postponed on account of Colonel Stamford's illness. It was only one of his accustomed attacks of gout; but it was a severe one, and John was obliged to visit him every day. He was coming down-stairs on the afternoon on which the party was to have taken place, when he saw Nora going through the hall with a basket on her arm.

"It is a hot day for a walk," he said, as he caught her up.

"Yes, it is," said Nora; "but I am going to the workhouse, and I do not like to disappoint the people if I can help it."

"You are not going to walk all that way!" exclaimed John, looking down at the slender figure at his side, and then out into the glowing heat.

"The horse has gone lame, so I cannot have the carriage," said Nora. "I have often walked to the workhouse and back before, and I can manage it quite easily."

"I wish I had my dog-cart here, and I would drive you over," said John, with a tone in his voice that brought a deeper colour into Nora's cheeks.

"I really do not mind walking in the least," she said; "but I think I had better start now, for I want to be back by six o'clock."

She moved away as she spoke, and John stood looking after her, with a feeling in his heart that he had never experienced before. He wished that he had insisted on walking with her; he wished that he had made her wait while he went to fetch the dog-cart; he wished a hundred things which filled him with a strange restlessness.

All of a sudden, however, a new and happy thought came into his mind: he had a patient not far from the workhouse, whom he had intended to visit on the next day; he would go there this afternoon instead, and if he happened to pass Nora on the road—

The rest of the sentence was not put into words, but the light came back to his face, and he hurried off to his own house.

"William!" he called, as he entered the yard; and there was an impatience in his tone that was seldom heard there.

William was a taciturn man, of slow and impassive manner; but as he came out of the stable with a fork in his hand and a piece of straw in his mouth, he looked at his master with some curiosity.

"Put Dandy in the dog-cart as quickly as you can," said John, "and bring him round to the door."

William gave his straw another turn in his mouth, and made no answer.

"Bring the cart round as quickly as you can," repeated John, as he turned to go into the house.

"Can't do it!" said William.

"What do you mean?" asked John sharply.

"Mr. Gerald's taken it," said William.

"Taken the dog-cart?" asked John, in a tone that made William's "backbone creep," as he told the cook afterwards.

"Yes, sir. He come out here about half-past two, and said he was going to drive over to Ryelands, and I was to put Dandy in at once. I asked him what you was going to do, and he said if you wanted to go out you could ride Bullfinch."

A more hasty-tempered man than John would have given vent to his anger in no measured terms, but though his brow was knitted and his lips closely pressed together, he uttered no word but a brief "No" when William asked him if he should saddle the horse; and no one could have told by his manner during the rest of the afternoon that there was anything going on beneath his calm exterior.

Gerald certainly had no idea of it when he met his brother at dinner.

"How's the Colonel to-day?" he asked. "He might just as well have put off being ill until after the party. Hettie and I had nothing on earth to do, so I drove her over to the Ryelands flower-show; it was rather slow, but still, it was better than nothing."

"I found you had gone," said John, in a significant tone.

"Oh! did you want the dog-cart?" said Gerald easily. "I told William to tell you I had taken it."

John sat silent, wondering what he should say to make Gerald understand that he was displeased. His brother and sister were so accustomed to go their own way and put him entirely on one side, that it was difficult to explain his objection; besides, he did not fully know himself why it was that he had felt so angry. He was summoned to a patient before he had come to any conclusion, and by the time he returned Hettie and Gerald seemed to have forgotten all about the matter.

It was not long, however, before John discovered the reason of his new feelings. Colonel Stamford's prolonged illness kept him in constant attendance at the house, and the more he saw of Nora the more her image haunted him by day and night. But though he soon knew what it was that he wanted, there were difficulties in the way. Hettie and Gerald were so entirely dependent on him that he had never allowed himself to think of marriage, and he knew how the mere idea would excite their amazement and disapproval.

His brother and sister, meanwhile, were entirely ignorant of all that was going on, for it was not likely to strike them as even possible that John could put anyone before them in his consideration.

"I want to speak to you for a minute," said Gerald, going to the study door one evening.

"Come in," said John, looking up from his writing.

"I want to talk to you about my allowance," said Gerald, as he paced the room with his hands in his pockets. "It's quite impossible that I should go on without an increase. I've never been able to make ends meet since I went up, and it would be much better to allow me more than to oblige me to run up bills."

"Who obliges you to run up bills?" asked John.

The question was rather an awkward one to answer, and Gerald chafed under it.

"There's no help for it," he said. "A man can't live without things; and if he can't pay for them he must wait till he can."

"What do you mean by 'things'?" asked John.

"Why, I mean the things that make life worth living," said Gerald: "not mere necessities, which are all that you care for, I know, but the things that are the charm and finish of existence!"

John looked at his brother while he spoke, and pushing back his chair suddenly, he rose and stood in front of him.

"Gerald," he said, "I have treated you as a boy too long; just listen to me for a moment. You say that I only care for the necessities of life, and you have often cast the same taunt at me before; but what do you think would have become of you and Hettie if I had not shut my eyes to everything but the duty of providing a home for you? You know that I do not grudge you anything; but I think that instead of asking to have your allowance increased, you ought to be thinking how soon you can take your affairs upon your own shoulders."

Gerald listened to this speech in undisguised astonishment. He had been so accustomed to receive everything from his brother, that he had come at last to look upon him almost as a piece of machinery, whose sole office was to provide for his wants. It was very disagreeable to have the illusion so rudely dispelled, and, like most people who feel that they are in the wrong, he tried to shift the blame upon somebody else.

"I think you might as well have told me before," he said. "I hate people making martyrs of themselves like that. Of course, if I had known all this I should have acted very differently."

"How did you think you were provided for, then?" asked John. "You knew perfectly well in what state my father's affairs were left. However, I do not wish to discuss it with you, and I must finish these letters for the post."

He sat down at his writing-table as he spoke, and after looking at him discontentedly for a minute or two, Gerald went to the drawing-room to look for Hettie.

"John is in a most tearing temper to-night!" he said, lounging up to the window where she was sitting with her book.

"Is he?" asked Hettie, in a tone of surprise, for she could not remember that she had ever seen John in a temper in her life. "What have you been saying to him?"

"Only asking him to increase my allowance."

"Oh! Of course that explains it; people always get cross if they are asked for money. But I wish that you had not upset him just now, for I wanted to ask him to give me something extra this quarter. If we accept Ethel Cardale's invitation, I must have some new dresses."

"He'll soon cool down again," said Gerald. "Just wait a day or two, and he'll give you anything. It would be a pity to refuse the Cardales: we are sure to have lots of fun."

Hettie determined to follow his advice and wait, but after breakfast on the next morning John called her into the study.

"I want you to send out invitations for a garden party," he said. "I have been meaning to give one for some time, and now that the weather is so fine it will be a good opportunity."

"We can't have a party now," said Hettie. "Gerald and I are going to the Cardales', and I daresay we shall stay with them some weeks."

"This is the first I have heard of it," said John.

He spoke with his usual quietude, but his face was stern. Gerald's question of the night before had led him to review his position, and he had come to the conclusion that as soon as his brother was off his hands he would be justified in marrying. He had set his heart on asking Nora Stamford to the house, and Hettie's absence would upset all his plans.

"I must ask you to put off your visit for the present," he said. "I have made up my mind to give this party, and you and Gerald must be at home."

"I don't mean to give up the Cardales," said Hettie, "and so I tell you. If you must give your party, September will do every bit as well."

"September will not do at all," said John. He did not choose to say that he thought the Stamfords

"Why, that is surely one of the plants."—p. 305.

might be away, so he fell back upon a plain command. "I very seldom interfere with your plans, but it will not suit me for you to go away now, so you must pay your visit at another time."

He went out of the room without another word, and Hettie was left to swallow her wrath as best she could.

"I can't imagine why he wants to give a party," she said to Gerald. "He never did such a thing before."

"I believe he is in love with Nora Stamford," said Gerald.

He uttered the words thoughtlessly, but he was quite unprepared for their effect.

A flash of anger lit up Hettie's face. "How dare he think of such a thing?" she exclaimed.

"Well, really, Hettie, I don't quite see that!" said Gerald. "I suppose John has as good a right to think of it as anybody else."

"I don't believe he ever thought of it at all!" exclaimed Hettie, with a sudden change of ground. "It is all her doing, of course; but I will save John yet."

Gerald made no answer; he was angry with John himself, but somehow Hettie's remarks jarred upon him, and he walked off, leaving her to recover her temper alone.

Lazy and pleasure-loving as Gerald was, there were yet some sparks of good in his nature. For the first time he fully realised the sacrifices that his brother had made for him, and a healthy feeling of shame began to stir within his heart; he kept out of Hettie's way as much as he could during the day, but when his brother came home he went at once to find him.

"I've been thinking over what you said to me last night," he began; "and I'm going to ask you a favour. You told me that you would pay for a tutor for me this vacation, but I would not agree. If you are in the same mind still, I shall gratefully accept, and will pay back the money as soon as I can. I have made up my mind to look for a mastership in a school, and of course it is important that I should take a good degree."

No one could have called John plain who saw the light in his face at these words. He did not say much, but Gerald understood him, and the two brothers were drawn nearer together that night than they had ever been before.

"Do you see that, Hettie?" said Gerald, half an hour later, as he held an envelope towards his sister, so that she could read the address.

"Hugh Mowbray, Esq.? Why, that is the tutor John wanted you to read with."

"Yes, I am going to him next week."

"Gerald!" cried Hettie indignantly. "You promised me not to go! You don't mean to say that John has over-persuaded you?"

"John has said nothing more about it. It is my own doing. I think that I have been a burden on him quite long enough, and I mean to turn over a new leaf."

"John is the most ungenerous person I ever knew!" cried Hettie passionately. "Of course he wants to throw us off now that wretched girl has got hold of him."

"I really think you go too far, Hettie," said Gerald. "I wish I had never made that remark; but if it should be true, you ought to be glad, and not go on in this kind of way."

"Nobody thinks anything of me," said Hettie, with a burst of tears that sent her brother out of the room.

Like all selfish people, she was quite incapable of looking at the matter from any point of view other than her own, and it seemed to her very unjust that she should not have the first place with everybody. She determined to do all in her power to hinder Gerald's idea from ever coming to pass, justifying it to herself by saying that she was acting for John's real welfare. She made an early opportunity to go and call at Westfield Lodge, that she might find out how things were going.

Nora was alone in the drawing-room when she arrived, and the first thing that caught Hettie's eye was a rare plant that stood on the table.

"Why, that is surely one of the plants from our greenhouse?" she said.

"Yes, it is," said Nora. "I have often wished to have one, and when Dr. Douglas heard me say so he kindly brought me this."

Hettie's face grew dark; John was so choice over these particular plants that she needed no further evidence that there was some truth in Gerald's suggestion, and she resolved to lose no time.

"My brother is very fond of flowers," she began. "It is almost the only amusement he has, for he is completely wrapped up in his practice. However, he is most anxious to get away now for a little while; he has a very strong attraction in London just now, and I think even his work will hardly keep him away."

She ended with a little laugh and a meaning look, and seeing from Nora's face that she understood what she intended to convey, she changed the subject, and after talking for a little while on indifferent topics, took her leave.

She felt triumphant, but a little guilty, as she walked home. She had said nothing more than the truth, but she had omitted to add that the "attraction" in question was a brother-doctor on leave of absence from a foreign appointment. Her conscience was not at ease, and she was relieved to find that John would not be home to dinner.

It was late before he came in, and she ran up-stairs as soon as she heard him, but before she had time to shut her bedroom door he followed her up the stairs and came into her room.

"I saw you going up, Hettie," he said. "I want to speak to you."

"What is it?" asked Hettie sullenly.

"I want, first of all, to tell you of my engagement to Nora Stamford," said John. "It is your doing that it has come about so quickly, and in that way I am grateful to you. But you must give me an explanation of the extraordinary statements that you have made."

"I don't know what you mean," said Hettie.

"Yes, you do. I went to Westfield Lodge this evening, and finding that Nora's manner had utterly changed since the last time I saw her, I told her that I must know why. It was a long while before I could get at the truth, but at last she told me what you said to her this afternoon; and when I had proved to her that it was all a fabrication, I asked her to be my wife, and she consented."

John's words were matter-of-fact, but he drew a deep breath of happiness as he ended, and stood for a minute absorbed in a reverie that made him oblivious to all else.

An impatient sound from Hettie recalled him to himself.

"What explanation have you to give me?" he asked.

"I only said what was true," said Hettie. "If Nora chose to put her own construction on it, it has nothing to do with me."

"You may not have said an untruth, but you implied it," said John sternly. "It is very hard to forgive you, Hettie; I could not do it if I were not so happy."

"I don't want you to forgive me," said Hettie; and seeing that nothing could be done with her in her present mood, John left the room and went downstairs, sorely missing the sisterly sympathy that would have made his joy complete.

Left to herself, Hettie indulged in a passion of self-commiseration.

"Nobody cares for me!" she exclaimed. "I will never stay here to let that girl triumph over me! I will go away and earn my bread by the sweat of my brow, and then, perhaps, John will be sorry for what he has done."

The more she thought of it, the more the plan pleased her. She would go now; the Cardales would be delighted to have her, and John deserved a fright for a punishment.

She set to work at once to choose out a few things that she could carry conveniently, and as soon as morning began to dawn she stole quietly down-stairs, and, unlocking a side door, slipped out of the house. It was a long walk to the station, but her excitement kept her from feeling any fatigue, and she reached it in time to get something to eat before she started on her journey.

It was late in the afternoon when she arrived at the town of Lockhurst, and a short walk brought her to the well-known gate, with its pretty avenue of trees. Two figures were visible at the other end, and as Hettie came quickly up the drive she recognised Ethel. She was walking with a lady who was a stranger to Hettie, but, without pausing to think, she sprang forward with an eager gesture, crying, "Ethel! Ethel!"

"Is it you, Hettie?" said Ethel, in amazement.

"Yes, it is," said Hettie, with a sob. "I have come to you for shelter and protection."

"Will you excuse me for a moment?" said Ethel, turning to her companion, who had considerably walked away a few steps; then, taking Hettie by the arm, she led her into the house and up to her own room.

"What is the matter?" she asked anxiously.

"Oh, Ethel! I think my heart will break," sobbed Hettie. "John has been so unkind to me that I could not stay in the house. He is going to marry a designing girl, and bring her in over my head, and he will not listen to a word I say!"

Ethel began to look grave, and Hettie was not slow to divine her feeling.

"How cruel you are!" she cried. "If you were in trouble, I should care for nothing except to help you."

"I am quite ready to help you if you are in trouble," said Ethel; "but I really cannot stay to talk about it now, for we have a large garden-party going on, and I must not be longer away. I will send you up some tea, and you can have a rest; and I will come back as soon as I can."

Hettie made no answer; this was not at all the kind of reception that she had expected. She had imagined that the whole family of Cardales would cry over her, and listen unwearyingly to the outpouring of her woes.

But Ethel had already gone, and as there was no one to hear her grievances, she was obliged to bear them as best she could.

Ethel, for her part, was very glad to escape. She knew Hettie's nature well, and she was quite prepared to find that her troubles were all of her own making. She felt that she must consult her mother before she took the responsibility of giving advice, and as soon as the guests were gone, she asked her to come and see their unexpected guest.

Hettie did her best to make out a case for herself, but Mrs. Cardale felt as strongly as her daughter had done that it was she, and not her brother, who was in the wrong.

"You can stay here for a few days, of course," she said; "but my husband must write to Dr. Douglas to-night; and if you take my advice, you will go home as soon as possible, and ask his forgiveness."

Hettie was more angry than she had words to express, and though she received Mrs. Cardale's admonition in silence, she made up her mind that she would not submit to another.

Ethel was obliged to go out on the next morning, but directly she returned she went to find Hettie.

Her room was empty, and Ethel was just going to seek her in the garden when a piece of paper caught her eye, on which a few words were written:—

"I see that you do not want me here. Do not attempt to find me, for you will never succeed."

Ever since John had discovered his sister's departure, he had been in a state of the utmost uneasiness. Mr. Cardale's letter had relieved his mind for a time, but the telegram that told of her disappearance realised his worst fears.

There was nothing for it now but to tell Nora, though he had hoped to be able to spare her the knowledge of a fact which must be so painful to her. Many and anxious were the consultations that they held, but no clue to Hettie's hiding-place could be discovered; and as John could not possibly leave his patients, he sent Gerald up to London to pursue the search.

Hettie had very little strength of purpose, but she had a great deal of obstinacy of character, which, under some circumstances, answers the same end. She engaged a room in a small house in one of the outlying districts of London, and tried her best to procure something to do. It was a long time before she was successful, for she had no idea of submitting to anything that she did not like; but at last starvation began to stare her in the face, and she was obliged to humble herself by teaching the children of a neighbouring shopkeeper.

But Hettie had never been trained to work, and the daily bondage chafed her so much that she began to think whether there was any way by which she could communicate with John without sacrificing her pride; for she felt certain that he would take her back without a word if only he knew where she was. At last she determined to write to Gerald; he would be sure to send the news to John at once, and then John would come and ask her forgiveness and take her home.

She waited in a tremor of anticipation after her letter had been despatched, and when, in a few days' time, she was told by the landlady that a gentleman was in the parlour, she knew that she had not hoped in vain. But when she entered the room and saw John's grave, stern face, she suddenly began to tremble with alarm.

"Hettie," he said, "Gerald has sent me the letter that you wrote to him, and I have come to tell you that I cannot receive you into my house again—at present, at any rate. I have been to see your cousin Anna to-day, and she is willing to have you with her for a time."

"I shall do nothing of the kind!" exclaimed Hettie. "You are very unkind to me, John; but of course I know that it is not your doing."

"You are quite mistaken. Nora tried hard to persuade me to have you home, but I cannot feel that it would be right. You must show me that you are sorry for what you have done before I can trust you again."

"Very well," said Hettie; "I will stay here and earn my living; and if I kill myself over it, it will be nothing to you."

"You are very unjust," said John sadly; "but we will not dispute about that. I shall continue your allowance, and if at any time you wish to write to me I shall be very glad to hear from you. Nora would not fix a day for our marriage until we knew where you were, but it will be very soon now."

The first part of his speech had softened Hettie's heart, but the last words hardened it again, and she made an ungracious assent. John still lingered, trying to win her into a better frame of mind; but seeing that it was of no use, he at last took his leave, giving the landlady his address as he left the house, that she might be able to communicate with him in case of need.

Whenever Hettie felt inclined to give way during the weary weeks that followed, she kept up her resolution by thinking of Nora's treachery; and even when the unwonted strain began to tell upon her, she would not allow herself to flag, till at last a day came when she could not leave her bed, and the doctor whom the frightened landlady summoned shook his head, and said that she was in for a bad attack of rheumatic fever.

It was a dull December afternoon, and a thick fog filled the air, and penetrated even into the room where Hettie lay. She had been in a kind of stupor all day, only moaning piteously when anyone touched the bed, and she did not open her eyes when the door opened; but when a cool hand was laid upon her forehead, she looked up with a start of surprise.

"Who is it?" she asked.

"It is I, dear: your sister," said a voice that she did not recognise, for her senses were dulled with weakness and pain.

She made no attempt to question further, but gave herself up to the enjoyment of being tenderly cared for.

Mrs. Clay, the landlady, was very kind-hearted, but she was as rough a specimen of womanhood as could well be found, and her ministrations were agonising.

Hettie soon knew who her gentle nurse was, but she felt miserable in her presence, for her shame and remorse were almost more than she could bear.

"Nora," she said one day, "where is John?"

"He has gone home, dear; he was here when you were so very ill, but you did not know him. Do you want to see him?"

"I should like to ask him to forgive me. I don't wish to get well. I have behaved so badly that no one can ever love me again."

Nora bent down and kissed her gently. "We all love you," she said; "and as soon as you can be moved we are going home together. I hope it will not be long now, for John is all alone."

"How long have you been married?"

"Nearly two months."

"Two months!" exclaimed Hettie; "and you have given up all this time to me? Oh, Nora! why did you do it?"

"Because you are my sister," said Nora. She did not add how she had urged John to let her go in the place of the nurse that he was sending, feeling that if she missed the chance of reconciliation now, it might never come again. The sacrifice was great, but she saw how the estrangement from Hettie grieved him, and for his sake she could have endured anything.

Hettie was glad when the meeting with John was over, and she had received his kiss of pardon; her proud spirit had been subdued by all she had gone through, and her selfishness was checked by Nora's example. It was a sore trial to her to go home and meet the curious looks and comments of their friends and neighbours, but she took it meekly, as part of her punishment, and was only anxious to make amends for all her bad behaviour.

Hettie has never fully recovered from the effects of her long and terrible illness; she will always be more or less of an invalid, and the old days of brilliant health and spirits are gone for ever. But she is far more happy now than she was when she lived for self alone; and she and Gerald have long since agreed that the best and kindest thing their brother ever did for them was when he gave them their sister Nora!

BLIND.

BLIND Ignorance still gropes its painful way Through the thick darkness of our earth-born mist,

Whilst distant Knowledge strives to send a ray

Of torchlight guidance to direct, assist

Its tottering steps towards the distant goal.

Such light is but a mockery to the blind;

Through darkened orbs it reacheth not the soul;

Unconsciously it leaves this guide behind.

But in that hour of dangers manifold,

When many perils gather thickly round,

When o'er the snow-clad streets, smooth, soft, and cold,

Vast Traffic passeth with a muffled sound,

Fair Sympathy, arrayed in woman's guise,

Draws near, and takes the wanderer by the hand,

And at the kindly touch, with glad surprise,

He feels no more deserted in the land:

Trusting this guidance, gentle, true, and pure,
 Darkness itself seems once more full of light;
 By Hope inspiréd and in Love secure,
 He walks henceforth by faith, and not by sight.

When Christ doth ope those sightless orbs above.
 Far more than others they will drink delight
 From lustrous scenes of mountains, groves, fields, streams,

Deer seems the fate of blindness on this earth,
 And eagerly we strive to bring it light;
 Yet, till the hour of death that heralds birth,
 We all must walk by faith, and not by sight.

For those doomed ne'er to see this world so fair
 It may be that our Father's gracious love
 Reserves a joy intense, ecstatic, rare,

And lovely brilliant cities robed in white,
 Sparkling with gems, as visioned in our dreams.

In that blest hour all earth-born chafe and fret,
 All faithless, hopeless weakness, and despair,
 All dull despondency and vain regret
 Will vanish utterly in Heaven's air.

LESSONS ON OLD TESTAMENT HISTORY.

FEBRUARY 18TH. GOD'S JUDGMENT ON SODOM.

To read—Gen. xviii. 20—33.
Golden Text—Ver. 25.

INTRODUCTION. Remind how Abraham and his family were living in the South of Canaan. Had not sufficient pastures for their very numerous herds—obliged to separate. Lot, Abraham's nephew, chose the fertile plains of Sodom, but, leaving his flocks to herdsmen, lived with his wife and daughters in the city of Sodom, where the people were very wicked. To-day's lesson tells of the threatened destruction of the city, and Abraham's prayer.

I. SODOM CONDEMNED. (20—22.) Why?

Because of the great sins done there. (Ezek. xvi. 49.)

Pride, luxury, sloth, oppression of the poor.

Besides many sins of which it is shame to speak.

God will Himself inquire into the matter.

If they have not repented, He will punish.

This punishment would be earnest of future judgment on whole world. Used as such for a warning by Christ. (St. Luke xvi. 30.)

LESSON. Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish.

II. SODOM PRAYED FOR. (23—33.) By whom?

Abraham, the righteous man, friend of God.

Uncle to Lot, living with his family in the city.

Perhaps hoped Sodom might be spared when the other cities were destroyed.

Lot much pained by their wickedness. (2 Pet. ii. 8.)

Therefore Abraham interceded with the Lord.

He stood to plead, as Moses for Israel. (Ps. cvi. 23.)

He drew near to pray—i.e., realised God's presence. (James iv. 8.)

Notice these points about his prayer :—

It was humble. Calls himself "dust and ashes."

Recognises God as righteous Judge of all.

Submits implicitly to His decision.

It was pleading. Will God destroy the righteous?

Noah and his family were saved in the ark.

Surely some means will be found to save Lot?

All God's ways are perfectly just and equal.

Therefore righteous and wicked cannot be treated alike.

It was persevering. Abraham prays again and again.

Keeps reducing number six times—from fifty to ten.

Ten about the number of Lot's family.

So Jacob wrestled in prayer till daybreak. (Gen. xxxii. 24.)

Christ prayed the same prayer three times.

It was earnest. He must do all he can for Lot.

He will even risk God's being angry at his importunate prayer. (30, 32.)

It was typical of Christ's constant intercessions. (Heb. vii. 25.)

LESSONS. 1. The power of prayer. Abraham was heard and answered in God's way. Lot was saved.

2. The manner of prayer. "Fervent prayer availeth." Still, "Not my will, but Thine, be done."

FEBRUARY 25TH. TRIAL OF ABRAHAM'S FAITH.

To read—Gen. xxii. 1—12. Golden Text—Heb. xi. 17.

INTRODUCTION. Abraham still living in South of Palestine, journeying from place to place. Isaac, the promised son, has been born, and Ishmael, Hagar's son, been turned away with his mother. The little family of three living in happiness at Beersheba are to receive a great shock. Isaac is to be slain.

I. ABRAHAM'S TRIAL. (1, 2.) What does "tempt" mean?

Either, To entice to sin—as Satan did Christ (St. Matt. iv. 1); or, To try, or prove—as God did the Israelites (Dent. viii. 16).

As Queen of Sheba to Solomon with questions (1 Kings x. 1), so God tried Abraham to test his faith and obedience.

See the greatness of Abraham's trial as follows :—

(a) To offer his son—only son—not a sheep or ox.

(b) That son specially loved—"Isaac," child of joy.

(c) To slay with his own hands—without delay.

(d) To offer up as whole burnt offering—nothing to remain of the corpse for burial.

(e) To do so on a distant mountain far from home.

II. ABRAHAM'S OBEDIENCE. (3—12.) How shown?

By answering not a word, but just obeying.

By starting at once—early the very next day.

By taking all things necessary for the sacrifice.

By doing all things told him to the last moment.

See how his great faith appeared in all :—

He believed that he and Isaac would return safely.

Accounting that God could raise him from death.

(Heb. xi. 19.)

Shown by what he said to the servants. (Ver. 5.)

He believed that God would provide a victim.

Whether his son or some animal he knew not.

Shown by what he said to Isaac.

Anyhow, he trusted himself and Isaac entirely to God.

LESSON. Without faith it is impossible to please God.

III. ISAAC A TYPE OF CHRIST. How?

Christ was the beloved, only Son of God. (St. John iii. 16.)

He was willing to suffer and to die. (Is. liii. 6.)
Christ carried the wooden cross on which He died.
Both suffered on the same place, Mount Moriah.
Isaac was "as good as dead," but Christ died.
The ram was slain instead of Isaac, and Christ died for sinful men.

IV. THE NATURE OF SACRIFICE. It must be—

Willing—the whole heart given up to God.
Costly—something not valueless but prized.
Whole—keeping nothing back as did Ananias.
Acceptable—such as God appoints.

LESSONS. What sacrifice can we give?

1. An offering of a free-will heart will I give Thee.
2. Whoso offereth Me praise, he honoureth Me.
3. Present your bodies a living sacrifice.
4. He that giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord.

MARCH 4TH. SELLING THE BIRTHRIGHT.

To read—Gen. xxv. 27—34. Golden Text—St. Luke xii. 23.

INTRODUCTION. Not long after Isaac's sacrifice, Sarah, his aged mother, died. He then married his cousin Rebekah, brought from Abraham's old home by his faithful steward, Eliezer. Twenty years passed before they had any children. Then God gave them twin sons, Esau and Jacob—a few minutes only separating their birth. It is of them we read to-day.

I. THE SIN. (27—34.) Notice these points:

Isaac was sixty years old when his sons were born.
Esau was a hunter, bold and full of strength.
Jacob was meek and peaceable, staying at home.
The father loved Esau, because of his game.
The mother loved Jacob, the more domestic son.
She had been told that the younger should rule over the elder. (Ver. 23.)

Esau, the rough hunter, forgot God.

Jacob feared God, and was loved by Him. (Rom. ix. 13.)

What was Esau's sin? Describe the scene.

Jacob "sod pottage"—i.e., was boiling herb soup.

Esau, faint with hunger, asks for some.

Jacob bargains for the birthright in exchange.

Esau parts with it for present gratification.

What did the birthright include?

1. A double portion of patrimony. (Deut. xxi. 17.)
2. The privilege of the priesthood. (Num. iii. 13.)
3. Authority over his brethren. (Gen. xxvii. 29.)
4. His father's special blessing. (Gen. xxvii. 28.)
5. The being ancestor of the Messiah.

All this Esau ignored, despised, and gave up.

II. THE PUNISHMENT. All the family suffered.

The parents—for their having favourites—each lost sight of their favourite son.

Esau—for his profanity and forgetting God, lost worldly and spiritual blessings.

Jacob—for his craftiness to his brother, lost his friendship and lived many years in exile.

III. THE WARNING. Esau never regained his great loss. Is held up to all as a warning. (Heb. xii. 16.)

He is a warning against many sins—e.g.:

Gluttony—in his greediness for the pottage.

Pride—in profanely despising his birthright.

Sloth—in his indifference to God's blessing.

Thus he put his bodily appetites before his soul's good. (Golden text.)

LESSON. What shall it profit a man, if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?

MARCH 11TH. JACOB AT BETHEL.

To read—Gen. xxviii. 10—22. Golden Text—Gen. xxviii. 15.

INTRODUCTION. Isaac, old and infirm, desires to bless his sons before his death. Forgetful of God's design that the best blessing should be given to Jacob, the younger of the twins, he intends to give it to Esau. But his intention is defeated by the scheming of Rebekah on behalf of Jacob, her favourite. The latter dresses up as Esau, and obtains the eldest son's blessing. Esau in anger threatens his life. Isaac sends Jacob away to Abraham's old home, and bids him take a wife from there. Jacob leaves home with his father's blessing upon him.

I. JACOB'S JOURNEY. (10, 11.) Notice:

He was leaving home for the first time.

He was leaving father, mother, and friends.

He was estranged from his only brother.

But he set out with his father's prayers.

He had promise of earthly and spiritual good.

He was going to his mother's old home.

So his feelings must have been very mingled.

Lonely, desolate, home-sick, and a wanderer.

But cheered by hope, faith, and promise.

LESSON. The blessings of a good home.

It is happy, because of presence of loved ones.

It should be holy—sin should not enter.

It should be heavenly—with God's blessing.

II. JACOB'S VISION. (11—19.) What was it?

A ladder reaching from earth to heaven.

Angels passing up and down between God and man.

The Lord standing above to renew His promise.

What did Jacob think when he awoke?

God had been near him; he is full of awe.

This is God's House—he must honour Him.

So he sets up his pillow-stone as a pillar.

He dedicates it with oil as a memorial.

He calls the place "Bethel," the House of God.

LESSONS. 1. God is near us—be sober and reverent.

III. JACOB'S VOW. (20—22.) Three things:

He will always acknowledge and serve God.

The place shall always be holy to the Lord.

He will devote a tenth of his substance to God.

IV. THE TYPES. The ladder—Jesus the Way to heaven. (St. John xiv. 6.)

Christ, like Jacob, on earth had no resting-place.

LESSONS. 1. Fear not, for I am with you.

2. Draw nigh to God, and He will draw nigh to you.

ART AND EAST-ENDERS.

A TALK WITH CANON AND MRS. BARNETT.

BY RAYMOND BLATHWATT.

THE GREAT HALL OF TOYNBEE HALL.

ST. JUDE'S Church, its vicarage, and the closely adjoining Toynbee Hall, of which Canon Barnett is the Warden, form a veritable oasis in the midst of a howling wilderness of bricks and mortar, squalor and poverty, noise and restlessness. Here in the church is hushed repose and grateful silence; in the vicarage gentle sympathy and cordial welcome are offered to all comers; and in Toynbee Hall there is culture, reasonableness, strong principle, and manly activity.

To stroll into that quiet church, how sweet it is, and how perfect the contrast within to that which is without! We stood for a moment—my hostess and I—in front of Roscoe Mullins' beautiful and touching group—Eau at his father's feet, that bitter wail of his almost expressed in the cold stone itself, "Wilt thou not bless me, even me, oh, my father?"

"Is not that the parable of the East End in stone?" remarked Mrs. Barnett, as we slowly passed from the church and its beautiful lessons in sculpture and on canvas.

We returned to the vicarage drawing-room—a large, lofty, and artistic room to which the parishioners are ever welcome, and from which no poor and destitute one is ever turned away because of his poverty—and settled down for a chat.

"What our hearts are bent upon now," said Mrs. Barnett, as I took my seat, "is the building and establishing of a real Art Exhibition where people from this neighbourhood can come, and not only look at the pictures, but where they can have quiet rooms in which to study works of art, and be taught about beauty of form, colour, and handicraft. You do not know how much art power lies hidden in White-chapel, and which only needs help and encouragement to bring it out. For instance," continued my hostess, as she placed in my hand a very beautiful specimen of beaten copper work, "this was done by a poor man here who would have been a porter to this day had we not happened to see some pictures from the Illustrated London News which he had coloured, and which showed wonderful appreciation of art and its principles. Our people have a great deal of natural imagination, which, though it is beaten down—"

"Yet"—continued Canon Barnett—"it shows itself in their love of funerals, in their delight in tales of travel, in the willingness with which they yield themselves to the charm of rhetoric rather than to cold reasoning. But it is difficult to guide and control this imaginative faculty, these aspirations after something which lies outside their wretched every-day surroundings.

"Our hope, therefore," he continued—"and you can help us by making it known—is to secure a large hall in this neighbourhood (in which a large number of penny and twopenny fares converge, and which is the great centre of East London), and to hold in this hall, thrice every year, a picture-show which shall extend over six weeks or two months each time. Round this hall we would group art—distinctly art—schools, where the students could be constantly refreshed with photographs and engravings from the old masters and from the great artists of our day, and where art-lovers would come and talk to them and take real interest in their work. Do you know that already we have 1,247 students on the Toynbee weekly roll? There is a certain amount of art taste going to waste here for the want of a few people who could draw it out. Now, if this hall could be established and artists could come here, they would soon find out what the people think, what is in their hearts; they would give a voice to the dumb. They would draw out art-power from the people, and it is impossible to say what new art, or rather what new expression of art, might not be forthcoming from them."

"Don't you think," I ventured to remark, "that it is possible to attach too much importance to art? Are there not social questions, religious questions; is not, indeed, the great labour problem of the day more pressing, infinitely more vital?"

"I don't think," said Canon Barnett, "that it is easy to attach too much importance to art. Its good influence shows itself in many ways. Girls, for instance, who care for pretty things never become quite so degraded as those who care nothing for beauty and refinement. I believe that many a poor fellow gets drunk so that he may for a brief moment lose sight and consciousness of the squalor and ugliness by which he is surrounded. If only artists would live down here! they would get much nearer the Life of the people, which, I can assure them, is not wholly ugly; they would find beauty in it: and how much good they might do! Well, if this hall can be built, if someone, or some body of people, will give £10,000 or £12,000 for the building, some of these things may be accomplished, and a useful thing will be done!"

"People here don't want bread so much as that which man needs more than bread. And yet a distinguished philanthropist condemned a poor woman for buying a picture while her children wanted comforts!"

"But surely, Canon Barnett, he was right to condemn a woman who would think of art before her children's wants?" I urged, in absolute astonishment.

"I do not see it," was the reply. "Art is an educational influence. It is because philanthropists, labour leaders, and clergymen have hitherto persisted in looking on art merely as a means of relaxation, as offering other interests, but never considering that it has a close relation to poverty, progress, or religion, that East London is left to put up with a lower standard of life. Once let it be proved that the knowledge of art will tend to improve the material condition of the people, and we shall soon see a welcome change in the public attitude towards this question. Real art is the servant of religion. 'The artist keeps up open roads between the seen and the Unseen; art is the witness of what is behind the thing seen.' I hold, you know, Mr. Blathwayt, that art is the expression of truth, and we have Divine authority for saying that it is the truth and the truth alone that will make us free. Now the best expression of the truth is by the aid of art; but the whole question of the relation existing between art and truth has yet to be fairly faced by the people."

"Oh, but, Canon Barnett," said I, "surely both spiritual and temporal needs require something more pressing, more direct than mere pictures and statues and music, good as they undoubtedly are; both John Burns and General Booth would tell you that, I am sure."

"As I said some few months back," replied the Vicar, "so I say again: the mass of the people will go on misunderstanding the Bible and religion until they realise the relation of literature to dogma, and learn how to think of things unseen. The difficulty of the moment lies in misunderstanding; rich and poor, masters and miners, do not understand one another. It is misunderstanding which divides men, which often makes legislation futile and mocks the efforts of leaders; all this while art—which is perfect expression, which is the only means by which men on earth will ever express their highest—is neglected."

"Am I wrong, therefore, in my longing to supply the people of this awful district with what I in my conscience believe to be the one thing needful?"

"Of course," interpolated Mrs. Barnett, "neither my husband nor I would for a moment say that pictures can do everything: they will not save souls, for 'it takes a Life to save a life;' but what we do urge is, that art can colour and influence life and help to make it a high and holy thing. The people want life, the fullness of life, and ought we to deny it to them? Art may do much to keep alive a nation's higher life when other influences fail adequately to nourish it; and how shall we neglect it in these times of spiritual starvation?"

"You do not realise, perhaps," continued Canon Barnett, turning to me, "for few people do realise, how art helps in the teaching of religion. The people to-day, as in Christ's day, learn religion by allegory; it helps to give them a consciousness of God and the unknown. It is to many a fresh light by which they see anew old truths. A great many poor people come to this room for one reason or another—quiet chats, religious meetings, and evening parties, and they appreciate more than you would believe that beautiful picture, 'The Angelus,' by Millet," and as he spoke the Canon pointed to the well-known depiction of two French peasants to whom in a twilight field there comes the sound, borne upon the evening breeze, of the Angelus bell, and who at once uncover and bend in prayer. "That picture speaks much to people of all classes and creeds."

"And then," added Mrs. Barnett, "such a picture as Richmond's 'Sleep and Death,' which depicts the strong, pale warrior borne on the shoulders of Sleep, while being gently lifted into the arms of Death, simple in colour, pure in idea, rich in suggestion, is good for the poor to see. Death amongst them is robbed of none of its terrors by the coarse familiarity with which it is treated; with them funerals are too often a time of rowdiness and debauch. But death thus shown to them is a new idea, which may produce, perhaps, more modesty about the great mystery of our existence."

A moment of silence followed the last words, broken at length by the voice of the Canon.

"But we must be practical; our object now is to build this hall. We propose to try to get the parochial authorities, under the Public Libraries and Museums Act, to take charge of such a building and keep it up out of the rates, using it indeed for other purposes if necessary. It might be a glorified Town Hall, for instance; and, so if the Art Exhibition is attached to the living, visible body, it would run no chance of being stranded as long as local people worked it and were strongly interested in it."

"Ah! but I want it to be only for art," struck in the lady; "we don't want party politics to be mixed up with it."

Her husband smiled.

"Anyhow, we must first try and make the world see that the Exhibition will have a distinct educational influence, and not only in East London."

"Isn't there just a possibility of art being responsible for the manufacture of a good many East End prigs?" I asked.

"And what would that matter?" cheerily replied Canon Barnett; "priggishness, after all, is only a phase, and not always an unuseful one either; they'll come through on the other side in the end all right. Prigs often turn out thorough good fellows. As a matter of fact, however, I think art makes them humble. We must not confuse means and ends," continued the Canon, more earnestly. "The end in view is the raising of man to his calling in Jesus Christ, the development of the Divine in the human. For this purpose art has a greater part to play than is often imagined, but it will be a great mistake if it is thought that a little more beauty in surroundings, or a familiarity with good pictures, or even a greater power of expressing ideas, will meet the needs of East London. There is only one thing which is absolutely needful, and that is the knowledge of God, which is in the reach of the simplest, and opens to his vision the things which are not seen and are eternal."

As I passed down the long, unlovely street, hideous with noise and unsightly in its squalor, I felt there was great truth in what the Canon and his wife had just been saying; and all of those who seek to do good—and what a daily increasing army is theirs!—will continue to bid Canon and Mrs. Barnett "God-speed," both in East London and in that no less important sphere of labour to which they have so recently been called.

SHORT ARROWS.

NOTES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND WORK IN ALL FIELDS.

A RECIPE FOR HAPPINESS.

O demand nothing," says a French writer, "and to complain of no one, is an excellent recipe for happiness." This recipe may be too negative, too stoical, and too little Christian, but it deserves attention. Some of us are like children sighing for the moon. We expect too much from life, and think that we have a right to happiness which we have not. Then when we make mistakes we put the blame upon others, and this encourages the fault-finding, unhappy disposition.

MAKING THE BEST OF IT.

Two friends of ours, when on a holiday trip this summer, came to a place which was so pretty that they wished to stay a little time at it. They got rooms, but the house and all its arrangements were so uncomfortable that they determined to leave at once. There was, however, one who saved the credit of the establishment, and induced our friends to remain for a week or two in it. This was a young sister of the two ladies who kept the lodging-house. She was sweet-tempered, obliging, and full of fun in spite of her hard work, and it was "a positive pleasure to be in the house with her." Florrie (for that was her name) was not yet twenty, but she had well learned the art of making things easy for others. Spoons and forks were a minus quantity. Toast-rack? there was none. The crockery was broken, the carpets were worn, the beds hard, but Florrie was always "so sorry" and so sympathetic, and did all she possibly could to smooth down difficulties. Are we all strenuously trying, as did Florrie, to make the best and not the worst of our surroundings, and of those of other people? Are we trying to make the little corner of the world in which we have been placed better and brighter than it was before we came into it?

VENERABLE TREES.

When we see a very old tree, we try to imagine the scenes it has looked upon, so to speak, since it was a sapling. Generations of men have gone, and it has remained. Lovers have whispered and rivals have quarrelled beneath its shade. And yet we cannot properly speak of a tree's experience, or say that it grows in wisdom. Trees do not think and reflect. Do we? If we do not, why should we boast of our experience, or think ourselves wiser than those who are very young?

"It is not growing like a tree,
In bulk, doth make man better be;
Or standing like an oak, three hundred year,
To fall a log at last—dry, bald, and sere."

REAL BEAUTY.

Bacon says that "the best part of beauty is that which a picture cannot express;" and if Bacon had lived in these photographic days he would have said this still more emphatically if he could; for beauty does not by any means always consist in regularity of feature, or in the colour of the lip, or cheek, or hair, or eye. The attractiveness of the countenance comes in many an instance from its giving an outer indication of the soul within. Men have been able to discern beauty in faces in which there was not a single beautiful feature. This is the beauty which the photograph cannot always copy—which, indeed, in its perfection no artist has ever been able to portray. There is a story told of an artist who determined to paint as beautiful a picture as could be produced; and so he took the loveliest eyes from one model, the nose from another, the mouth from a third, with, as a result, the production of an ugly, inharmonious picture. We cannot, any of us, make ourselves beautiful in feature, but we can with God's help acquire that beauty of which Bacon speaks—that best part which cannot be painted. The goodness that beams in the eye, the loving-kindness and cheerfulness which play around the mouth—no painter can fully represent these, and these may be ours.

DWARFS.

There are dwarfs in mind as well as body. A man requires nourishment and exercise to grow in his mind as well as in his body. Stanley and Schweinfurth, the African travellers, tell us that the inhabitants of the great forest in the heart of Africa are dwarfs and not men because they have not sunshine, good food, or hard work. "The mind's," as the poet says, "the measure of the man;" and according to this standard, some are very small indeed. Nowadays, anyhow, there is plenty of nourishment to be had for the mind, and hard work in all directions, if only men will do it.

SOME NEW BOOKS.

To readers of THE QUIVER few names are better known than that of Professor W. Garden Blaikie. Messrs. Thomas Nelson and Sons send us a volume from his pen entitled "Heroes of Israel," the object of which is to give a series of Bible biographies, illustrated from the historical and topographical materials which modern research has supplied. Needless to say the work is thoroughly done, and the volume is one which should afford a wealth of suggestive illustration for teacher or preacher, while it is so pleasantly written that the general reader will find it at once interesting and profitable.—Messrs. Cassell are issuing a series of "Bible Biographies" in handy little volumes which are well worth the attention of all readers. First among them we take up Dr. J. R. Macduff's "The Story of Jesus" in verse, dealing, of course, with only the leading incidents in the great story, but telling them in a manner which will, perhaps, appeal to readers who would not take up a new recital of the Divine story in prose. The Rev. J. W. Gedge deals with "The Story of the Judges, and its Lessons for Today," the Rev. George Bainton is responsible for a similar treatment of "The Story of Joseph," and "The Story of David" falls to the Rev. John Wilde. The series is one we can heartily commend, and one which we are sure our readers will appreciate.—A voice now silenced by death is that of the Rev. Aubrey L. Moore, and more than usual interest is thus given to a volume of sermons from his pen, entitled "God is Love, and Other Sermons," published by Messrs. Nisbet, and claiming the attention of readers of every denomination as the work of a thoughtful, earnest man.—Mr. Henry Frowde, of the Clarendon Press, sends us copies of what he says are "the smallest Bible and Reference Bible ever published." When we say that the Reference Bible, bound in limp morocco, weighs only three and a half ounces, and is very little more than half an inch thick, although it contains over twelve hundred pages, we have said enough to show that the work is a marvel of print and paper. For portability nothing could be better than these tiny editions, in which, although the type is necessarily small, it is yet very clear.—Under the title of "The Key of the Grave" (Hodder and Stoughton), Dr. Robertson Nicoll has written a most beautiful book intended to carry comfort to those who are bearing the burden of a present sorrow. To thoroughly appreciate a work of this kind one should, of course, be among those for whom it was intended, but, so far as we can judge, it is admirably calculated to fulfil the purpose with which it was written, and certainly points most clearly the lessons which Scripture has for those who "sorrow not as others which have no hope." From the same publishers we have received a tasteful little volume, entitled "Lux Diurna," in which, to quote its title-page, is to be found "light for the day, gathered from the words of Holy Scripture and other writings, ancient and modern, with appropriate collects." The book is prefaced by an appropriate introductory chapter by the Bishop of Winchester.—Messrs. Cassell have just issued the first part of "The Family Prayer-Book," containing morning and evening prayers for every day in the year, together with an indication of appropriate Scripture readings and special forms of prayer for use on special occasions. The introduction is by the Dean of Canterbury.

"MANY PEOPLE IN TOWN?"

Some persons whose clothes are better than their Christianity, however they may profess religion, speak of "the masses," and "the common people," as if they did not belong to the same animal kingdom as themselves. Or they ignore the "dim millions" altogether, and do not recognise their existence, about which, by an unpardonable mistake, they had never been consulted. An undergraduate was entertaining some working men who had come to Oxford from London on a Whit Monday. He had been told to talk to them "quite naturally, as you would to men of your own class." At first he was a little shy, but he at last ventured on the following remark to his neighbour: "Ahem! many people in town just now?" The workman looked at him for a moment with pity, and replied, "About five millions!"

THE RECOMPENSE OF CHARITY.

Although charity is not to be done for the sake of reward (and, indeed, if it were done with no other motive, it would not be charity at all), still, no good deed is left of God unrecompensed, and what He graciously promises we may thankfully look forward to. It may be that He will reward in this world, it may be in the next, but we may leave all that—the time, the measure, the way—with Him. A soldier one day called at the shop of a hairdresser, and asked for relief, saying that he had outstayed his leave of absence; and that unless he could get on the coach, fatigue and severe punishment awaited him. The hairdresser gave him a guinea. "Sir," exclaimed the soldier, astonished at the amount, "how can I repay you? I have nothing in the world but this" (pulling out a dirty piece of paper from his pocket): "it is a recipe for making blacking. It is the best that ever was seen. Many a half-guinea I have had for it from the officers. May you be able to get something for it to repay you for your kindness to a poor soldier." That dirty piece of paper proved worth half a million of money to the hairdresser. It was no less than the recipe for Day and Martin's blacking, the hairdresser being Mr. Day. Though charity be not done for the sake of reward, let us be sure that reward in some form will come—sometimes in very unexpected ways. God has His own ways of rewarding. His resources are infinite; and often from quarters altogether beyond the beat of our ordinary sources of enrichment, He can restore us an hundred- and a thousandfold into our bosom.

PRIZES FOR POLITENESS.

The other day the writer was shown with great pride, by a poor woman whom he was visiting, a prize which her son had won at school "for politeness." This is an excellent premium to give children; for though all cannot be clever, all may be good and polite. Then we all know the connection that exists between genuine politeness and true religion. Certainly its absence in professing Christians may well astonish those who become acquainted with these unpolite Christians (is not this a contradiction in terms?) for the first time. The Honourable Madame A.

Hok, who visited this country upwards of two years ago, was one of the first Chinese ladies of high position (with the exception of the wives of Chinese ambassadors) who came to the United Kingdom. During her voyage over she was constantly struck by some of the passengers not being as kind and polite as they might have been. "Is it possible," she said, "that they are Christians, and can do so and so? Why, I thought that they all believed in the God of love." We had better offer more prizes in our schools for politeness. It would help the missionary cause.

HE REMEMBERED IT.

If only we remembered the consequences of past sins, we would thereby very often be enabled to resist present temptations. If the drunkard would remember his headaches, his having made a fool of himself—perhaps some worse evils—as the consequence of his drink, he would perhaps keep from what is now offered so temptingly to his lips. And so with all sin, and, indeed, folly of every kind. There was a man who, not content with getting drunk himself, one day took it into his head that he would make his dog drunk. So he poured liquor down the dog's throat, and made him very drunk indeed. Their way home lay over a wooden bridge which crossed a stream, and the poor dog, not being able to keep his feet, fell over and was very nearly drowned. Next day, when they were both sober, the man and his companion started together for the public-house. When they got there, however, Pincher sat himself down at a very respectable distance from the entrance, and not all the whistling or coaxing of his master could induce him to take another drop. Pincher's memory, and Pincher's action on his memory, would do us a great deal of good. Alas! instead of keeping a "respectable distance" from the place of evil, how often have we gone deliberately into evil: we have sometimes pursued sin, instead of sin's pursuing us. The proverb that the burned child dreads the fire was truer with poor Pincher than with us.

"THE QUIVER" WAIFS.

We have received the following letters about our two waifs, which we are sure our readers will be glad to see. Dr. Barnardo, in whose care Sydney Lawrence is, writes:—"I very gladly and gratefully acknowledge your renewed contribution towards the support of Sydney Lawrence, 'the QUIVER Waif,' and beg to enclose you our customary official receipt with a cordial 'thank you.' Sydney is still boarded-out at Tetbury, Gloucester, and my latest report about him states that his health is 'much improved,' and that he is getting on satisfactorily both at his home and in the school. He is now in the third standard. I hope he will do credit to all friends who are so actively interested in his welfare." And on behalf of Miss Sharman, the following acknowledgment of our payment from the "QUIVER Waifs Fund," for Susie Lank's maintenance for another year, was sent to us:—"I am requested by Miss Sharman to enclose the receipt, with her sincere and very grateful thanks to yourself and the readers of THE QUIVER, for your kind subscription on behalf of little Susie Lank. The dear child is quite well, and seems very happy. She is a bright little girl, and of a very affectionate disposition. She really does beautiful needlework for so small a child, and takes great interest in her lessons." We acknowledge further subscriptions on page 320, and shall be glad to receive any new ones, addressed to the Editor of THE QUIVER, La Belle Sauvage, Ludgate Hill, E.C.

NO GOSSIP GIVEN.

A friend of ours asked an acquaintance to whom he was writing to send him some gossip from a place where he had been living. The reply he received in reference to this request is worth quoting:—"I know no M—— gossip, and if I knew any would not tell you, because I wish you well, and in my opinion it does people no good to tell them gossip. It is hardly ever true, and even if true it is better buried." At the entrance of many exhibitions and places of amusement may be read the notice—"No change given." Let us as plainly inform our friends that no gossip is given, and after awhile, instead of considering us stupid and unentertaining, they will respect us for it. We should talk of things rather than of persons; of whatsoever is good, true, and beautiful rather than of whatsoever petty personality enters an idle and shallow brain-pan.

"DON'T MARRY TO BE UNKIND!"

"Yes, I know I was unkind to you when I first married," we heard a man (he is called a gentleman!) say one day to his wife, the mother of their only child, who had just been taken from them by death. "But I did not like you, or marriage; I hated to be tied, and I hated you because I was tied to you!" The woman answered nothing, but I think the angels, downward bending, saw and photographed the look of wounded anguish that passed over her face, and carried it up to God. If it were possible for the poor lonely heart to feel its grief more bitterly, surely it was such a remark as that coming from one who should have helped her to bear it. Theirs had been a love-match—so the world said. But the husband allowed his relations to come between him and his wife and child. It is so, too often. Some day he will recognise his error, and he may vainly sigh for the love he threw away. "The mills of God grind slowly, but they grind exceeding small." Young man! don't marry unless you are determined, with God's help, to make your wife happy; unless she and your children are to be your first care. Don't marry to be cruel! Marry your profession, or marry your relations, if you like. But don't marry a woman, unless you mean to love and cherish her!

SOME MORE NEW BOOKS.

The substance of a short series of lectures delivered by the Rev. Dr. Pierson in the Pastors' College will be found in a useful little booklet published by Messrs. Passmore and Alabaster under the title of "The Reading of the Word of God in Public." Such a work was badly needed, and is well carried out in this instance.—Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton send us two more volumes of their "Silent Times" series; first Dr. J. R. Miller's "Week-day Religion," and secondly Dr. Theodore Cuyler's admirable "Christianity in the Home." Both works are beautiful alike in tone and in the manner in which they are presented. From the same publishers we have also to acknowledge a copy of "The Diary and Letters of the late Dr. Andrew Bonar," a man of singular beauty of character and exaltation of spirit. Many a reader will be grateful for the glimpses which this volume gives into the life and work of a really good and devout man. Dr. Maclaren carries on his "Bible Class Expositions" (Hodder and Stoughton) in a volume devoted to the Gospel of St. Mark, in a series of chapters addressed in the first place to teachers, but appealing to all thoughtful readers by their force and originality. Two stories are before us as we write. One (from the same publishers as the last-mentioned book) is "Philip and Gerald," by Edward Irenæus Stevenson, an American writer who has been known to us hitherto simply as an occasional writer of verse, but who proves in this volume that he can write a story decidedly acceptable to boys. The other story is "A Threefold Mystery," a tale of Monte Carlo, written by Miss Constance Serjeant and published by Mr. Elliot Stock—a well-written tale, not too long. Mr. Elliot Stock is also the publisher of an admirable little manual, beautifully printed and carefully compiled, in which, under the title of "The Master's Guide for His Disciples," all the recorded sayings of our Lord are carefully classified and arranged for easy consultation and systematic reading.—We have also to acknowledge the receipt of "Be Perfect," a series of meditations for a month by the Rev. Andrew Murray, and "The Christ-Controlled Life; or, the Secret of Sanctity," by the Rev. E. W. Moore, both published by Messrs. Nisbet and Co.; "A Book of The Heavenly Birthdays" (Elliot Stock); "Union and Communion," being thoughts on the Song of Solomon, by the Rev. J. Hudson Taylor (Morgan and Scott); "Trees Planted by the River," by Frances A. Bevan (Nisbet and Co.); "The Baptist Handbook for 1894," which is the eighty-second year of its publication (Veale, Chifferiel and Co.); and the annual volumes of Biblewomen and Nurses (Cassell and Co.) and the ever-popular Mother's Friend (Hodder and Stoughton), which well deserves its title.

RICHES AND VIRTUE.

We make too much of riches both in our thought and in our life. Many and many a man would have probably been great or good, or perhaps great and good, if he had not been hindered, either by wealth that he possessed, or wealth that he desired. Riches have a narrowing power, an enfeebling effect;

Suffer little children to come unto me

"SUFFER LITTLE CHILDREN TO GO TO HIM."

they can prevent a man's soul from rising, they can pull it down when it has risen. We once heard a man say that if he were left a fortune the first thing he would do would be to consecrate a substantial portion of it in perpetuity to doing good—not, said he, as a religious act at all, but simply as an insurance against his heart becoming hardened by money. Lord Bacon said that "he could not call riches better than the baggage of virtue—the Roman word is better—impedimenta; for as the baggage is to an army, so are riches to virtue; it cannot be spared or left behind, but it hindereth the march; yea, and the care of it sometimes loseth or disturbeth the victory."

SUFFER LITTLE CHILDREN TO GO TO HIM.

God's love is shown alike in what He gives and what He denies. In our days of health and prosperity we do not realise this; but when sorrow and death come to us, and instead of the beloved presence of our children we weep alone in the empty room, and kneel in our soul's agony beside the little bed where once we used to waken our darling with morning kisses, then, in the stillness of the silent chamber, we hear the voice of Jesus: "It is I, be not afraid. My peace I give to you." The same loving Father who sustained Catharine Tait as she saw the "five little sisters" all snatched from her in five terrible weeks, watches by every weeping mother. Our children are only gone up-stairs to a brighter room, to enjoy far more love and care than we could have bestowed on them. We must try and meet them again by growing worthier of them, and by keeping near them as they grow in Paradise. It is a noble aim in our lives that is set us by God, to reach those happy saints for ever blest. Let us take up our cross and go on rejoicing, not mourning. Soon our tears will be changed for songs of triumph. Let Him strike home, and bless the rod—

"Never so safe as when our will Yields undiscerned by all but God."

EARLY FAILURES.

Let us not be discouraged by the early failures of others, or by our own. Many who have signally failed in youth have done much in after-life. Disraeli's first speech in the House of Commons was a complete failure. Moreover, though we fail in one thing we may succeed wonderfully in another. Before Dr. Livingstone went abroad as a missionary he placed himself for a time under the tuition of the Rev. R. Cecil, of Ongar, Essex. The Congregational minister of Stamford Rivers being taken suddenly ill, he could not take the evening service, and applied to Mr. Cecil for help, who at once sent young Livingstone. The young Scotchman soon surprised the congregation beyond measure; for, having taken his text, he became bewildered, and could not utter a word. Then, without any apology, or remark of any kind, he snatched up his hat, and made his way to Ongar, leaving the congregation to think what they chose. This was the man who was afterwards not afraid of men, nor of lions. The ranks of great men are full of those who were early failures; but they were not content to remain always failures, and continuous effort meant with them eventual success.

A "CHEAP" BARGAIN.

It was once proposed to the Duke of Wellington to purchase a farm in the neighbourhood of Strathfieldsaye, which lay near to his estate and was therefore valuable. The Duke agreed. When the purchase was completed, his steward congratulated him on having made such a bargain, as the seller was in difficulties and forced to part with it. "What do you mean by a bargain?" said the Duke. The other replied, "It was valued at £1,100; and we have got it for £800." "In that case," said the Duke, "you will please carry the extra £300 to the late owner, and never talk to me of cheap land again."

"THE QUIVER" FUNDS.

List of contributions received from November 28th, 1893, up to and including December 22nd, 1893. Subscriptions received after this date will be acknowledged next month:—

For "The Quiver:" Waifs Fund: A Glasgow Mother (41th donation), 1s.; Mrs. Travers, Altringham, 10s.; C. Embleton, Piccadilly, 10s. 6d.; M. H. R., Hampstead, 41; A. M., Braemar, 41; J. J. E., Govan, 5s.; and a packet of Christmas Cards sent anonymously.

For Dr. Barnardo's Homes: Mrs. W., Falkirk, 5s. Dr. Barnardo also asks us to acknowledge the receipt of the following amounts: Anti-Jesuit, 10s.; Eliza, 5s.; R. C. R. H., 41; A Lover of Children, 4s. 6d.

* * * The Editor will be glad to receive, and to forward to the institutions concerned, the contributions of any of his readers who desire to help external movements referred to in the pages of this magazine. Amounts of 5s. and upwards will be acknowledged in THE QUIVER when desired.

THE SWEET SPRING-TIME.

HOW GOD DELIVERS IN TIMES OF NEED.

BY THE REV. PROFESSOR W. GARDEN BLAIKIE, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S.E., EDINBURGH.

BISHOP BURNET AND WILLIAM OF ORANGE.

THE Ninety-first Psalm is one of the most beautiful in the Psalter. The conception is beautiful—a man overshadowed by the Almighty carrying a charmed life, and passing through a very thicket of deathly agencies as unhurt as Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego in Nebuchadnezzar's furnace. And the working-out of the conception is beautiful; the words could hardly be cast in a finer poetical mould: "thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night; nor for the arrow that flieth by day; nor for the pestilence that walketh in darkness; nor for the destruction that wasteth at noon-day." It is interesting, too, to observe how the speaker changes, as if the several parts had been designed to be sung by various bodies of singers, until at the very end God comes in, and personally ratifies the whole, crowning it with a sublime promise, "With long life will I satisfy him, and I will show him my salvation."

Yet few persons read the psalm with unqualified satisfaction. The thought cannot but press in on them, Is all this verified by fact? Do those who live near to God really escape all dangers and mortal diseases as the psalm represents? Does not the Book of Job, next neighbour to the Psalms, show the very opposite? Did not our Lord, in His reference to the tower of Siloam, expressly warn us against supposing that earthly calamities are determined by men's character? The Apostle James seems to have been as good a man as Peter, yet Herod was allowed to slay the one while the angel of God rescued the other. We know, too, what befell John Williams at Erromango, Bishop Patteson at Santa Cruz, and Bishop Hannington in Uganda. What became of Captain Gardiner and his companions in Tierra del Fuego, and of the countless missionaries who have perished on the Congo? When we think how good and bad seem to suffer promiscuously in public calamities, are we not reminded of the words in Ecclesiastes—"time and chance happeneth to them all"?

But this, of course, is but a transitory impression. All devout persons, we believe, will be able to read the Ninety-first Psalm with unqualified satisfaction if they take a right view of its structure and design. To us it seems an allegorical psalm. In allegories, we use the external to denote the internal, the sensible to portray the spiritual, the visible to suggest the invisible. Under the material image of a man shielded by God and His angels from every form of material evil, there is conveyed in this psalm the idea of the godly man protected from all that would hurt his soul, from all that would do him real harm, all that would interfere with the gracious process whereby he is becoming meet for the everlasting inheritance. In its allegorical structure, we class this psalm with the "Faëry Queen" and the "Pilgrim's Progress." You must look through the allegorical veil to get its real meaning. And that real meaning is very glorious: if you live near to God, He is just as careful of your best and highest welfare—the only welfare that will count in the eternal world—as if He shielded you literally and completely from every danger and trial.

But besides this, there have been times when it has been manifestly God's design to show, outwardly and visibly, that His servants in this world are under His special protection and care. Although God works usually by general laws, there may be exceptional cases where special influences are brought into play. These special influences may bear on the history either of communities or individuals. The case of Israel was one of these special cases, for Israel was God's peculiar charge, and the history of Israel was an allegorical or sacramental history, designed to teach by outward signs God's method of dealing with His people inwardly. The deliverance from Egypt, the deliverance from the Midianites under Gideon, and from Assyria under Sennacherib, were great outstanding instances of Divine interference in moments of critical and apparently desperate peril. It pleased God at these times to come out of His place, to make bare His holy arm in the sight of the nations, and proclaim far and wide, in a voice of thunder, Israel is My son! The majority of men are insensible to spiritual truth; and when God had a great lesson to teach the whole world, He taught it in a language that the whole world could comprehend; He answered the prayers of His people by terrible things in righteousness, and calling to Him the mighty forces of nature, said to the enemies of Israel, "Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm!"

The lesson has been repeated in a similar way at various periods of history. May we not count the fate of the Spanish Armada an instance of Divine interposition, not unlike those of Hebrew history? Historians seem at one in holding that never were the interests of British freedom and Protestantism in greater peril than they were towards the end of the sixteenth century. Spain, so low and feeble to-day, was then at the height of its pomp and power. Philip II., ambitious for himself and ambitious for the church of which he was so devoted and unscrupulous a son, felt that all his schemes, and especially his designs in South America and in the Low Countries, depended on the subjugation of England. Never were the Jesuits more active, and never did the public aspect of things seem to promise better for their success. In the Low Countries the Prince of Parma, on behalf of Philip, seemed to be fast gaining back the revolted provinces. In France the Catholic party had entered into a league to prevent the Protestant Henry of Navarre from succeeding to the throne of that country, and were hand-a-d-glove with Philip for this end. In Holland the Prince of Orange had been got rid of by assassination. The hope was cherished that in Scotland James might become a Catholic and thus secure for himself not only the undisturbed possession of the Scotch throne, but the succession to that of England. It was believed by the friends of Philip that even in England itself the Catholic party and many Protestants were so shocked at the treatment of the Catholic priests, and at the death of Queen Mary of Scotland, that, as soon as a foreign force landed in the country, they would rally to the standard of the Spaniard. Never were the clouds thicker and darker over England than in the beginning of 1588.

Years had been spent in the preparation of the Invincible Armada, that was to invade the shores of England and land a foreign force on her soil. At length, in the end of May, it started after much delay from Lisbon. Its first experience was a disastrous gale in the proverbial Bay of Biscay. Two months more had elapsed, when its sails were descried from the Lizard, and the beacon-fires of England spread the alarm along its coasts. The effect was to send a thrill of patriotism and a determined purpose to resist through every English heart. Was the soil of England, forsooth, to be trodden by the Spaniard, and the people of England manacled with Spanish handcuffs? Never! Who does not yet follow with a beating heart the brave little English fleet, that, far inferior in naval force, made up for the difference in bravery and seamanship, and in indomitable purpose? Who can help rejoicing in the work of that week, when, favoured by the wind, the English vessels kept up a skirmishing attack on the huge ships of the Armada, dealing staggering blows to them on every side? At length the English admiral, his ammunition being nearly exhausted, resolved to face an engagement. Hard though it was, it was not decisive. The bulk of the Spanish vessels still remained, and even to a brave seaman like Drake seemed "wonderful great and strong." A bold dash by the Spaniards against the English vessels might have so crippled or scattered them that the object of the Armada would have been gained. But the Spaniards had had enough of fighting. They resolved to retreat to Spain by the only course open to them—that of a circuit round the north of Scotland. Drake and others followed in pursuit, but were obliged to give up the chase through failure of supplies. But a mightier foe completed the work of destruction. The fugitive ships were caught on the north of Scotland with such furious storms as to become little better than helpless wrecks. "In October," says one of our historians, "fifty ships reached Corunna, bearing ten thousand men stricken with pestilence and death. Of the rest some were sunk, some dashed to pieces against the Irish cliffs. Eight thousand Spaniards perished between the Giant's Causeway and the Blaskets. On a strand near Sligo, an English captain numbered eleven hundred corpses that had been cast up by the sea." The sense of Divine interposition was so strong in Great Britain that "the pride of the conquerors was hushed before the sense of a mighty deliverance." When the news came, the feelings of our people could be compared only to those of the Israelites surveying the remains of the Egyptian host washed up on the shores of the Red Sea, or to those of their descendants in a later age, looking on the corpses of the Assyrians.

Passing over, on account of limited space, the Gunpowder Plot of 1605, we note the remarkable circumstances under which, in 1688, William of Orange effected his landing on the shores of England. The wind, that had proved so adverse to the Spaniard, was singularly propitious to the Dutchman. It was a very serious crisis for England. Under James II. liberty and Protestantism seemed as nearly doomed as they would have been had the enterprise of the Armada succeeded. One can hardly realise the intensity of feeling under which the friends of liberty invited William to come to the rescue and William himself agreed to come. In the case of both it was at the risk of life, and all that was dear to them personally, and, what must have been far more serious, at the risk of ruining the public cause to which they were so much attached. But William was prepared to run all risks, and he found his people favourable to the enterprise. When he bade the States-General farewell, the scene was very touching. He thanked them for all their kindnesses to himself personally, and especially he thanked them for the assistance which they had granted him towards his perilous enterprise, which he assured them that he undertook for the defence of the reformed religion and the independence of Europe. If he should never return, if he should fall in this expedition, he commended his beloved wife to their care. There was hardly a dry eye in that grave assembly, and when he went to his yacht public prayers were offered for him in all the churches of the Hague.

Like the Armada, his fleet was doomed to encounter a preliminary storm that drove them back to the shores of Holland. In a few days it was again at sea, and on the 1st of November an east wind bore it rapidly along. On Saturday, the 3rd, it had reached the Straits, and William, in the Brill, followed by six hundred sail, passed rapidly along, intending to land at Torbay. Sunday, the 4th, the anniversary both of his birth and his marriage, found him opposite the Isle of Wight. Monday morning was hazy, and the pilot, unable to see the landmark, carried the fleet too far to the west. It seemed a fatal mistake. It was impossible to return in the face of the wind. Plymouth was the next port, but there a strong garrison was placed, and the landing might have been successfully opposed. Besides, the royal fleet was now in pursuit, and every hour was precious. Some of William's friends looked on the venture as lost, and there is no telling what William's own feelings were. "At that moment," says Macaulay, "the wind changed; a soft breeze sprang up from the south, the mist dispersed, the sun shone forth, and under the mild light of an autumnal noon the fleet turned back, passed round the lofty cape of Berry Head, and rode safe in the harbour of Torbay." The disembarkation had hardly been effected when the wind rose again and swelled into a fierce gale from the west. The royal fleet that followed the Dutch had but caught sight of the Dutch topmasts when the gale struck them and drove them to Portsmouth for shelter.

There is a story that Bishop Burnet, who was an ardent Protestant, hastened to congratulate William, and that he put a question to him regarding his plans. The Calvinist prince cleverly turned the subject of conversation by asking the Arminian doctor what he thought of predestination now? Everything seemed so clearly to betoken a Divine purpose and plan.

Burnet replied that he should never forget the signal manner in which Providence had favoured their undertaking.

In the history of the Waldenses there were not a few memorable instances of what had all the appearance of Divine interposition. Perhaps the most remarkable of these took place when after "the glorious re-entry," the remnant, under their pastor, Henri Arnaud, made their escape from the fortress of Balsille to the mountains beyond. In crossing the Alps in the face of powerful enemies they had encountered incredible dangers and difficulties. The united armies of the King of France and the Duke of Savoy subjected them to fearful harassment. It was of great importance to find a place of safety in which to spend the winter. It was determined that the Balsille rock should be their place of refuge, and in the darkness of night they set out for it, and reached it before day-break. On looking in daylight at the path by which they had travelled their very hair stood on end. But though the place was comparatively safe, they had no provisions, and the ground was covered with snow. To their great relief, they found that the crops of the season had not been reaped, so that their heavenly Father provided for them a table in the wilderness. Every day their Captain-Pastor Arnaud called them to prayer, and on Sundays he preached to them. When spring returned, the French-Italian army, amounting to twenty-two thousand, began to renew their attacks, the Vaudois being but a few hundred. Planting heavy artillery against the fortress, they made a breach in the entrenchments. Next day would complete the demolition of the fort. The French commander was so sure of victory that he published a proclamation in the town of Pignerolo, that next day the entire Waldensian army would be hanged two by two. A large supply of rope had been provided for the purpose, and waggons to convey the prisoners. But man proposes, God disposes.

The Vaudois resolved to make their escape; but how could it be done? Their enemies, in view of such an attempt being contemplated, had kindled watch-fires all along, turning night into day, and were ready to fall upon them should they stir from their fort. But the mercy of God frustrated the devices of the foe. When the case seemed desperate, a thick mist began to fall, the watch-fires were shrouded in its folds, and the brave Vaudois set out along a fearful road on the edge of a precipice. "Groping," says one of their historians, "with bare hands and feet, sometimes crawling on all-fours, they silently follow their experienced leader. At their first outset a slight accident had nearly betrayed them. As they were passing close to one of the enemy's sentinels, a kettle carried by one of the fugitives escaped from his hand and rolled on the ground. 'Qui vive?' cried the soldier. 'Fortunately,' says Arnaud, 'with a peasantry which we should not have expected from the grave commandant, the kettle, not being one of those which the poets tell us uttered oracles in the forests of Dodona, made no reply, and the sentinel did not repeat the challenge.'" At dawn, they descended the precipitous Guigne-vert in deep snow which revealed their line of flight to their pursuers.

Possibly their last estate would have proved worse than the first, but for a most unexpected event. A rupture took place between the Duke of Savoy and the King of France—their alliance was dissolved. The duke saw that these brave Vaudois would be of great use to him. He made them most friendly offers: their old inheritances were restored, and for a time—but, alas! only for a time—they enjoyed the free exercise of their religion.

This was not the only occasion on which a cloud proved the means of Divine protection to the Vaudois. Once when a handful of them were pursued by their enemies, and it seemed impossible for them to escape, they lifted up their hearts to God, when a thick cloud came between them and their pursuers, so that they were enabled to escape to the rocks unseen. So in like manner it is told of Peden, the Scotch Covenanter, that once, in an extremity of peril, when he and his friends were utterly exhausted, but closely pursued, he besought the Lord to let down "a lap of His cloak upon them," and sure enough the mist came down and covered them from their foes.

Often, too, the wind has proved the means of deliverance. About the end of last century, encouraged by the French and the Americans, a daring pirate of the name of Paul Jones used to sail about the coasts of Scotland, inspiring no little terror, and committing no small ravage wherever he had the chance. On one occasion, at the head of a little fleet, he sent a summons to the wealthy seaport of Leith, demanding a subsidy of £2,000, else he would come and help himself. A favourable east wind bore his vessels swiftly up the Firth, and as he passed Kirkcaldy, he was within a mile of the shore. The people there knew well that when he had plundered Leith it would be their turn next; a multitude was gathered on the beach, watching the turn of events. A venerable Seceder minister, of the name of Shirra, proverbial for his strong faith and lofty spirit, summoned them to pray. Very earnestly he wrestled with the Lord to deliver them. As they were praying the wind changed to the west, and it was at once apparent that the pirate's opportunity was gone. Before another west wind came the threatened seaports had time to defend themselves, and the rebel commodore came no more. For many a long year it was felt deeply that the deliverance had come direct from the hand of God.

MISS GAYLE OF LESCOUGH.

BY E. S. CURRY.

CHAPTER I.

LESCOUGH ABBEY.

"Are not such Used to be tended, flower-like, every feature
As if one's breath would fray the lily of a creature?"

"It is a curious thing."

"What, father?"

"That plant in the Salt-marsh pastures. I met Hardy at the Sessions to-day. His cattle have suffered too. He has sent it to experts in London, and has had them down to Deepfen.
They can only advise that all that reclaimed land should be ploughed."
The speaker sighed. "It seems futile either way."

The father and daughter were sitting in the long low drawing-room at Lescough Abbey. Rowan's tea-table was drawn near the fire, and she had just laid down her book on her father's entrance.

The two were as much alike as a man of nearly sixty and a girl of twenty can be. But Rowan's years did not warrant the calm quietude of her attitude and gestures. Living much by herself, and, since her return from her German school two years ago, entirely without the companionship of girls of her own rank, in that out-of-the-world country where were no comparisons and no emulations, she had unconsciously adopted some of the old-world dignity of the dead forbears who looked down on her from the walls of Lescough.

Just above the broad deep sofa on which she now sat there shone out of a large canvas the three-quarter figure of a woman in a soft white dress, the head slightly turned towards the long windows opposite, the grey eyes fixed on the garden scene without. If Romney could have walked into that old-fashioned room on this April afternoon, he would have beheld the great-great-granddaughter of the woman he had painted just a century before, reproducing in life her ancestress's every trick of feature and attitude.

It was partly for this reason that people in Lescough did not think Rowan pretty. There was something old-world, aloof, and old-fashioned about her which did not altogether please them. No one likes to have their ordinariness made manifest; and other people somehow looked very ordinary when Rowan was near.

Just now her face was perturbed.

"That land troubles you a good deal, father. Couldn't you sell it?"

"Sell it?—that?—never!" Mr. Gayle's eyes flashed sombrely. "Why, Rowan, that land was contested almost inch by inch—not only with the sea, but with the Hardys. Your grandfather would turn in his grave if he heard you! And, besides, Hardy would buy it; that wedge would be useless to anyone else."

"And why not?" the girl said softly, smiling. "Could you wish him a worse bargain? And there will be no one to mind, father, after you go—no one but me," she added gently.

Mr. Gayle turned from his position in front of the fire, and looked down at his daughter's upraised face.

The western sun shining in through the big bay which formed the further end of the long room gleamed over her hair, touching the little outstanding tendrils with glints of gold. The cooler light entering through the long narrow windows which pierced the wall opposite the fireplace revealed a rather pale face, in which the great grey-blue eyes, shadowed by almost black lashes, looked out, so far, rather uninterestedly on life. They were beautiful eyes, revealing possibilities in a nature which hitherto neither passion nor suffering had touched.

What Mr. Gayle thought as he looked down at her was perhaps faintly expressed in what he suddenly said.

"I must take you to town, Rowan, in a few weeks. Your aunt says you are wasted down here."

A delicate flush stole into the girl's cheeks.

The hint of marriage, which had been more than once suggested, was displeasing to her, and she had followed her father's thought sufficiently to read that she was to be taken to London to be seen, and perhaps married.

The thought was an unwelcome one. She had beautiful old world dreams of what love and marriage should be, utterly out of harmony with what appear to be the beliefs and hopes of her class in these days. Sacrifices and self-denials for love's sake were what she dreamt of—not a convenient marriage.

"Your aunt," went on Mr. Gayle, misunderstanding the delicate flush, and deeming it a sign of pleasure, "is very anxious that you should be presented. Eh? How would you like it?"

"I should think it out of place and unnecessary for me. I have to live my life down here, father," she answered, considering in her deliberate way. "I do not think I care for such dissipations much."

"Turn your head and look at the other Rowan," said her father. "See! she is smiling at your degeneracy."

Rowan turned and lifted her eyes to the portrait above her.

A gleam of the declining sun had found its way along the room, and was now shining on the pictured face. The pretty piquant mouth, with its slightly parted lips, seemed to be quivering with suppressed amusement, and into the blue eyes had crept a gleam of lifelike mischief.

The expression was so vivid and startling that involuntarily Rowan's eyes turned towards the windows opening on to the garden, expecting to see she knew not what, to cause that amused arrested look. And just then—just when the sunset gleam was on the picture, and the light of expectancy on the living face below it—the door opened, there was the announcement of a name at the other end of the room, and slowly towards the fireside group advanced the figure of a man.

Both father and daughter had been so much occupied with their conversation that the quiet opening of the door and the servant's announcement had not been heard. Now, however, at her father's slight exclamation, Rowan turned, with the interested expectant look still lighting up her face, to meet the arrested glance of the most brilliant eyes which had ever before looked into hers.

At the same moment Mr. Gayle advanced to meet the visitor, to whom he gave a greeting of an almost exaggerated courtesy, even from one so old-fashioned as himself; and no surprise manifested itself in Rowan's face when her father ceremoniously introduced to her—

"Mr. Hardy."

She had instantly guessed that this must be the man about whom she had heard so much lately from the elaboration of her father's welcome. It is not on one's friends and intimates now-a-days that one expends the flowers of courtesy. They are kept for the folk we dislike or fear, or whom we consider beneath us.

The man, whose vivid eyes were meanwhile quietly searching the room and his companions' faces, seeing everything while apparently looking at nothing, was a remarkable-looking one. He was very tall—some six foot two in height—and, though still young, broad nearly in proportion. His thick dark beard and moustache shading here and there to copper and gold, were dressed Tudor fashion, in a deep point, his hair cut closely and squarely after the mode of some of Elizabeth's élégants. This and his vivid eyes added to the foreign air which he undoubtedly possessed, and which was perhaps accentuated by his carriage and movements, which were perfect. Although so big, he was absolutely graceful, his size only giving him an appearance of perfect health and strength. He was dressed for riding, in a red-brown tweed which harmonised accurately with his colouring.

He had asked for Mr. Gayle; indeed, he had never given a thought to Mr. Gayle's belongings. And he was as surprised as he was pleased, when he realised that the picture on the wall which had dazzled his quick glance as he advanced to the fireplace, with the reddening sun shining full into his eyes, was reproduced by the delicate pale face of the living picture below it on the sofa.

"I called for my letters on my way out," he explained, straightening himself from his bow to Rowan, turning to Mr. Gayle and handing him a letter; "and I thought you might like to see what the learned in London say about the plant."

"Thank you; I am much obliged to you."

Mr. Gayle answered a little uneasily. He felt oppressed by this big presence of his enemy in his own drawing-room. He forgot even to ask him to sit down.

"This seems to settle it," he went on, after reading the letter, looking over his spectacles at the young man, who was just taking a cup of tea from Rowan's hand. "If this creeping ranunculus, or whatever it is, spreads—and I see they say it is most rapidly growing—it will do away with any chance of pasture-land there or near, eh?"

"Oh, I gave that up last year," said Mr. Hardy; and Rowan, listening, detected a certain triumph in his voice. "I ploughed it all up, all those Lessdyke pastures, where I lost some bullocks before I discovered the weed. And the corn is springing, and looks well. They ought to be fine yields."

"Corn!"—in an accent of profound disapprobation—"corn! in that wet land?"

"It need not be wet. It is not wet now;" and again the note of triumph sounded to Rowan's finely attuned ear, though her father did not detect it.

"Drained—already?" he asked.

"And a pump or two at work when necessary."

Mr. Gayle's expression changed, and a satirical smile crossed his handsome old face as he turned to his daughter.

"This gentleman, my dear, is the amateur engineer you may have heard us talking about lately, and—pardon me—disbelieving in"—with a courteous gesture to Mr. Hardy—"who wishes to plant the Salt-marsh with pumps!"

Rowan glanced up at Mr. Hardy sympathetically. She knew her father's moods, and was aware that on occasion his tongue could lash.

"Well, father, why not? You cut it up with drains."

"The drains are not of much use in getting rid of the water there," said Mr. Hardy quietly, "though they may collect it."

"And what would you do more?" the old man asked, rather hotly. "What can you or anyone do with land below the sea-level, and under water every time the tide's a bit high? Even if you plant your pumps, where's the water to go to?"

"Back into the sea. Heighten and widen the dykes, as I've been urging on the Commissioners till I'm tired, and the pump will do the rest."

The exclamation that followed sounded very much like "Bosh!" before Mr. Gayle remembered that it was his enemy who was a guest in his house, eating his tea-cakes. He pulled himself up with an effort, and said, smiling—

"You young people are ready to re-make the world, and have no respect for your fathers. I believe the curse of those who add land to land is on all who meddle with that Salt-marsh. You are admiring our cedars?" he added, observing the direction of Mr. Hardy's eyes as he gazed through one of the windows garden-wards, and wishing to turn the conversation. "Of course, you have never seen them? We will show you the gardens.—Rowan, get your hat."

"I was admiring this room, too—the proportions are so fine," the young man said, as Rowan obediently rose, and he returned from opening the door for her. "I did not expect to find so fine a room down here. And the low ceiling is such an added charm! How homely and cosy you have made it."

He looked around admiringly.

"That is my daughter's doing. She would have it restored to its old appearance—to what she thought was its old appearance, at least. You young ones are trained in art matters now-a-days."

And he smiled affectionately at Rowan as she entered the room and crossed to an open window.

They stepped out upon a raised terrace which ran the length of the house. It had a pierced balustrade about a foot in height, with, at intervals, the usual vases, brilliant now with sweet spring flowers. The dining-room, as well as the drawing-room and other windows, looked out upon this terrace, which, at the west end, curved round the bay of the drawing-room. The walls and red-brick gables were clothed with ivy, wistaria, and magnolia, and the gardens were worthy of the house.

Below the terrace, fronting the long and rather narrow windows of the living-rooms, were lawns of the softest, smoothest, most velvet green, respecting which might have been said what was said to an American inquirer by a Cambridge college gardener:—

"Lay them down, and roll and mow and water for three hundred years. Then you'll match these lawns."

And that was what had been done here. And with what a result! Walking on them was a delight, a liberal education in the value of things o'd.

The lawns were bounded by a narrow moat-like lake, and beyond that, again, groves of elm-trees, where the rooks were busy in the evening light.

But the chief feature of the gardens lay in the long green alleys stretching away to the right, between hedges of cedar and cypress of an immense thickness and height. These had been originally cut at the top into quaint forms of bird and beast; but Rowan's taste had led her to implore a careful neglect in this respect; and the forms were now all vague, and harmonious, and massive. The green alleys between, both straight and winding, led to a sheltered rose-garden, which was now sweet with violets; and the whole garden was enclosed in a coped and buttressed red-brick wall of great thickness and height.

It was a lovely home to discerning eyes—one too which quite observed Bacon's maxim of what a home should be, "built to Live in and not to Looke on": a picture of another time, when the world went slowly, and men had leisure to live and admire.

As Mr. Hardy paced by Mr. Gayle's side, putting quick appreciative questions or listening to his host's remarks, his eyes sometimes sought the quiet face of the girl who walked on her father's other side. It had for him an unspeakable charm. The clear-cut delicate features were presented to him cameo-wise against the sombre cypress background.

Once, in answer to his remark, she leant forward and looked at him across her father, with the setting sun lighting up her bronze hair, and the grey eyes luminous with the thought he had presented to her, and then suddenly there came to him an inspiration.

His dark eyes unconsciously arrested and held hers for the brief space of his sudden thought—it might have been a moment, it might have been an hour, for all he knew—and the red flush which surged across his face as he caught his breath seemed to him to be faintly reflected on hers. The wishes that thronged tumultuously kept him silent and unalert till they reached a gate in the wall leading to the stable-yard. Then he recovered himself.

"I am very much obliged to you," he said; "this is lovely. I had no idea—I shall never forget this picture." The brilliant eyes included Rowan in the glance which feasted on the spring-time beauty. "I shall find my horse this way, I think."

And his hand was on the gate, busy with the latch.

"Oh, we will see you off," Mr. Gayle said hospitably: "our walk often ends at the stables."

"This seems to settle it."—p. 325.

"He turned now to glance back."—p. 331.

They passed into a large courtyard flagged with cobble-stones, with a bowling-green in the centre, and surrounded by more buttressed age-toned walls clothed with greenery. A groom was leading a big bay horse up and down, at sight of which Rowan gave an exclamation of pleasure.

Mr. Hardy glanced at her quickly.

"You are fond of horses? I have some young thorough-breds"—he turned to Mr. Gayle. "Will you ride over some afternoon, and let me show you some two-year-olds? I think they will be fit for an emperor. And my old nurse will give Miss Gayle some tea."

An indescribable expression crossed Mr. Gayle's face. His daughter, noticing his frown and indecision, feared that a rough negative was hurrying from his lips; but the answer came at last, stammeringly, hesitatingly, as though the speaker were held back from saying what he really wished to say.

"Thank you—I will think of it. I have not been"—and he stopped, as if by some over-mastering thought, turning a questioning gaze full of meaning into the dark eyes looking somewhat wonderingly into his.

What could this emotion mean? Mr. Hardy thought.

And then to his mind vague recollections presented themselves, accounting perhaps for Mr. Gayle's hesitation.

He said hastily—

"I have been so much away until lately that I had forgotten. Think no more of it, if you would rather not. Perhaps I ought not to have come here."

He took off his hat, and was in the saddle before Mr. Gayle's unready tongue could do more than call after his receding figure—

"No, no—glad—come again."

As the clatter of his horse's hoofs died away, Rowan turned her thoughtful eyes to her father.

"What did he mean, father?" she asked, as they turned to walk together across the cobble-stones back to the gate in the wall, through which the setting sun was shining redly.

But her father was buried in thought—not of too pleasant a nature, to judge by his face—and he did not answer her question.

CHAPTER II.

AN OLD STORY.

"My soft skies shine above,
And on all seas the colours of a dove,
And on all fields a flash of silver greys."

It was an old and forgotten story—half a century old now—that of which the details came gradually into Amyot Hardy's mind as he rode homewards. He only knew them vaguely, as romantic recollections of his boyhood; and the pictures of people of that time, and faint reminiscences of conversations probably not meant for him to hear or understand, returned to him now across the fifteen years of his absence.

Foremost among the old memories was the figure of his grandfather, another Amyot Hardy, dark and big and foreign-looking, like himself, about whose wildness and prowess—chiefly in smuggling—in the days of his youth stories without end had been eagerly listened to by Amyot. The little grandson—paying his long summer visits with, and sometimes without, his pretty young mother, to his father's birthplace—had admired and wondered at the fierce old man about whom such romances could be told. Thinking over them now, Amyot settled that they must have been fables, with perhaps a spice of truth in them to beget them.

A son—older than his own young father, who had been killed fighting in India—had succeeded to the estate, and his isolated life had been spent in such a way as to hand on the evil report of the family for yet another generation. It was easy for fables to arise and for stories to linger in that thinly populated district, whose flats and marshes, reclaimed from the sea, tempted no new settlements, and made unusual deeds traditional among its inhabitants.

Amyot knew that the origin of his own family there was enveloped in a mystery which could never be solved. Stories of a masterful and fierce bandit-like man of immense size and strength, possessed of fabulous wealth, who had landed from a ship with servants and luggage, and had gradually bought or annexed all the seaboard land he could lay his hands on, had filled his young mind with delight. Who was he? None knew. Amyot le Hardi: that was the name that first figured in any deeds of which he had ever heard. Many suggestions as to his birth had been made. The one most believed was that he was a French robber of high, if not the highest, birth, exiled for evil deeds. Certainly his evil deeds followed him to his new home, if all the tales were true, and his posterity kept up his character.

Amyot, musing as he rode homewards, was for some unrecognised reason suddenly profoundly dissatisfied with the ancestry from which he sprang: until he recollected his mother—dead ten years ago. Ah! yes: she certainly was the equal of a Gayle, and yet had married a Hardy, which was the strange way that the thought of her presented itself just then to him. His disquietude passed. He raised his head, urged on his horse, and let his eyes wander over the smiling landscape, with renewed admiration of its possibilities both to the farmer and the engineer. He was riding along a firm white road edged with soft grass, bounded on either side by a wide ditch, or, in the language of the country, "drain," into which the drainage of this flat and lonely land was gathered. Meadows, intersected by hedges now and then, and lines of pollard willows along the banks of these sleepily flowing water-courses, extended far and wide on either side, before him and behind. It was a land of green, the fresh, beautiful, young green of spring, with the redness of the dying sun gleaming over it and warming it like a blush.

Amyot was riding nearly eastward towards the coast, so that the sun was behind him. He turned now to glance back.

In the near distance shone the red roofs of the little market-town he had left, enclosed in the elm-trees which as yet only showed the tenderest colour. Slender, graceful steeples rose here and there into the sky, with wide distances between, and stood out dark against the sunset. No one who has not seen either a sunset at sea—which is the nearest approach to its beauty—or in these wide desolate fens, can appreciate what a sunset can show. Nowhere else does the wide dome of sky stretch itself into such infinite distances as it does there. Nowhere else do the clouds gather into such majestic masses, or the cloudless blue appear so wide and far.

Amyot, with a sigh of sympathy—feeling the desolation of the wide landscape through every fibre and thrill of nerve—turned again and faced eastwards, —leaving the glory and the companionship behind him—to the grey and dim distances, where a small dark shadow breaking the horizon-line showed to his practised eye the grove of tall elm-trees which guarded his home.

And then, as he rode on, a dim recollection came of that other story, the thought of which had prompted his last words to Mr. Gayle; and almost like a presence before him rose up the tall, slight figure of a woman—grey-haired, with mournful, introspective eyes, as he had once seen her standing at her door by the sea. He could see her now, and he could remember what had been told him of her, though he could not recall who had been the speaker. She had been Miss Gayle of Lescough, and she had run away and married a wild outcast Hardy, whom the fierce old man, Amyot remembered, had disowned and disinherited. And darker things were said of her. She had found the bonds she had entered too unendurable, and the outcast husband had died. There had been a time of suspense, and suspicion, and disgrace, but nothing was proved; and she had settled down in that cottage on the sea-bank, at whose door one day Amyot had seen her standing alone. As memory came back, Amyot caught his breath. That sad woman was Mr. Gayle's sister, and must therefore be Miss Gayle's aunt. That reckless Hardy was his own uncle, his father's elder brother.

Where had his thoughts gone to, when he recalled them from musing that what had been once, might be again? But this miserable marriage had only strengthened the feud between the families. Amyot's passing visit to-day had been a sudden and unwitting break in the inimical relations of years.

Memories came back as he slowly rode along the quiet lanes. He understood, now, numerous little episodes and allusions which had gone unnoticed hitherto, in his absence of interest in the Gayle household. He never remembered seeing a Gayle at Deepfen, and, so far as he knew, his visit to-day at the Abbey was his first. The indifference and lack of hospitality with which he himself had been received in the district, when he had appeared a year and a half ago to take possession of an inheritance he had never expected, had never struck him so much as now. He had put down lack of callers to lack of people, and to the unsavoury life of his predecessor. But he had been too busy hitherto, to care for society of any kind. His engineering education, part of it pursued abroad, added energy and zest to the peculiar situation and circumstances in which he now found himself. Study, scientific farming, and a hand-to-hand fight with the sea which he anticipated with delight, filled his time and thoughts. And London, which was within two hours by rail, had given him all the outside interests he needed.

But to-day life had changed. The eyes and delicate face of a girl had come between him and his dearest pursuits. A picture shut out his landscape.

He rode along through a hamlet or two, where the women stood at their doors gossiping and knitting, and the children stopped in their play to gaze as he went by. And soon, after passing through a larger village, with an old church standing in its midst, he turned off the firm high road into a lane, where the tread of his horse's footsteps was muffled in the soft silt of which it was composed.

Still he rode on—past outlying cottages, where the doors began to be shut, and the lights to twinkle, and the mothers to call the children in to bed; until, after curving round a largish sheet of water, he was stopped by a white gate leading into a field.

It was just a field, large and wide and long, like everything in the landscape, but the white gate opened on to a gravelled road which intersected it, and was bounded on one side by a low wire railing painted white, and on the other by a hedge of rose-briar and blackthorn. White sheep, taking their evening meal, were dotted over the meadow; the occasional low "baa" of a mother was heard, calling to an errant child, with the answering "baa" and frisking return of the little one; the rooks were cawing wildly in the elm-trees on the left, and a light or two were beginning to shine dimly from the lonely house which Amyot called home.

It was a largish house, originally a mere farmhouse, but added to and partly modernised by its successive masters; it stood in the midst of its own pastures, with no road near. Another white-painted gate shut out the approach to the house.

As Amyot passed through it, and his horse's steps crunched the loose beach gravel of the drive, there was a loud barking of many dogs near at hand, and echoing barks from more distant kennels. A bell rang out, and a groom ran round the house simultaneously with the opening of the hall door, through which shone a welcoming rosy light.

The sweet strong scent of hyacinths greeted his nostrils as he mounted the white steps, which now in the gathering dusk gave their immaculate evidence of care and much scrubbing. Amyot turned with a grateful sense of welcome to the flower-beds under the windows on either side, where the hyacinths were blooming. In an instant he was carried back to the terrace at the Abbey, and the sunshine was gleaming on a girl who stood beside him.

His whole being thrilled. Would she ever stand beside him here? His imagination ran riot; he felt her soft hand upon his arm, her breath upon his cheek, saw the luminous eyes lifted shyly.

His eyes gazed over the wide landscape across which he had ridden with an indescribable yearning and sudden sense of loneliness. Almost he thought he could see the glimmer of the Lescough lights—the shadow in the horizon line which would mark the Lescough elms and spires: six miles away, as the crow would fly. Was ever man so foolish? He almost laughed aloud at himself. But at any rate these same stars glimmering through the blue, one by one, would be looking down on her too—no space could distance them. And—what was more than distance—no caste, no evil ancestry, no misdeeds and sins could come between their soft radiance and Rowan Gayle.

"Rowan Gayle." He said the words with catching breath: the sound was in his ears like a soft wind in June.

Then he turned and entered his home.

"Ask Nurse to bring my coffee, Peter," Mr. Hardy said, an hour later, to the man who had been ministering to him through dinner. "I will have it in the study. She had better bring her knitting. I feel lonely," and he smiled into the man's face.

Perhaps it was the smile, perhaps it was a certain wistful look now and then in the brilliant eyes, which appealed to his servants' hearts, and bound them to him. Peter, leaving his tray of gleaming glass and silver, hastened up-stairs to a pleasant fire-lighted room, where the woman who now ruled at Deepfen was busy.

"The Master wants you in the study, Nurse—you and your knitting. I'll bring the coffee to the door for you." Then Peter went on anxiously: "I think he seems a bit put out about something—thoughtful-like, you know. He's been thinkin' hard instead of readin' all through dinner, and never said a word that the things was good: but they was, never you fear," as an interested questioning look crossed the woman's face: "everything done to a turn and hot; only somehow"—and he hesitated—"do ye think as he'll go the way o' the others? Is the curse on him?"

"Curse, Peter? you're a fool!" was the quiet reply; but the old woman's eyes sent forth an angry flash. "You go and wash up your dinner-things, and leave curses to your betters!" Nurse said it simply: indeed, to her, familiar from her babyhood with the ways and words of the Hardys, curses were but the natural accompaniments to betters. Certainly none of her own class could have used them with more force and frequency; the old house, if it could have spoken, would have rung with them.

Nurse smoothed her white hair, and tied a clean cap over it, and, with her knitting in her hand, descended to the study. Outside stood the reprov'd Peter, carrying a little silver tray with the coffee; Nurse took it in, and setting it down on a small table by Amyot's elbow, on which were arranged a reading-lamp and a pile of newspapers and magazines, crossed over to the opposite side of the fireplace, and quietly sat down. She was often summoned in this way: generally when Amyot was too tired with a day out of doors to read or work, or when he wanted information, being singularly ignorant of his family history, or when, as her quick instinct gathered to-night, he was perplexed or troubled.

At first, although he had sent for her, he took no notice of her; then, as gradually her soothing presence fitted in to his thoughts, he lifted his eyes and let them rest on the quiet upright figure sitting there in a certain assurance of being wanted and welcome. With her soft white hair nearly covered by her close net cap, and her swiftly moving fingers, she made of the cosy study a home and place of rest.

"How quickly you knit, Nurse," Amyot said at last, smiling, as, after one or two furtively observant glances on Nurse's part, their eyes met. "Are those stockings for me?"

"Yes, sir." The answering smile came a little wistfully as she met his glance. "I must set you up asked. "It seems to me there are very few about here."

"About here, yes!" was the answer, in a contemptuous tone. "But the Hardys don't need to wed from here. Your father found a bride, Mr. Amyot, from the South; she was a pretty creature."

"But my father was a soldier, and ladies do not care to come and live on out-of-the-way farms?"

"Was it true what she did, Nurse?"—p. 334.

against the time when I hope you'll bring a lady here. We want one sadly."

The dark eyes turned to the fire, and a frown gathered on Amyot's face.

"Do you think this a place to bring a lady to, Nurse? Wouldn't she pine away with loneliness?" he asked presently.

"No, sir," she answered sturdily. "She needn't be lonely: the house is big enough; and her little children"—the old woman's voice grew soft and pleading—"would soon be company for her when you was out."

A dark flush leapt into Amyot's face at the picture conjured up; he stirred uneasily as his imagination followed Nurse's words. What would it be like to see a slender figure flitting up and down the wide stairs? to hear children's voices through the silences around? He grew restive as he thought of his own loneliness: it oppressed him.

"And what lady am I to bring, Nurse?" he

"Your mother loved being here, sir," Nurse answered quickly: "she often said so; and she used to ride about, and I never heard her say she felt lonely. Your grandfather thought a lot of her; it was for her that the young horses were trained and the new carriages bought. She made the place respectable again, as it used to be, and as it will be again, I hope, sir."

"How old are you, Nurse?" Amyot asked suddenly.

"Nearly eighty-three, sir, and I have lived in this house since I were sixteen, except for the three years when I married my husband; he were coachman here, and went to a grand place in London, but it wasn't grand for me; and then, when he died, I came back. I had learnt a lot, and seen a lot of wickedness; and first I was old Madam's maid—she used always to be called Madam—and after she died I was nurse and housekeeper; and a time I had to keep things straight!"

"And you know all the family histories? Tell me some of the stories, Nurse."

The old woman looked at him, her eyes travelling up the big, half-recumbent figure to the dark eyes seeking hers.

"Nay, I wouldn't bother myself about the stories, sir: let 'em be bygones; no good in taking up old faults."

"But I want to hear. I want to know about my father and his brothers."

A thoughtful look came across the old woman's face.

"Your father went from school to a tutor and into the army, and was scarcely ever here from a boy; only when he came back from India—I think he was stationed at York, and had married—he brought your mother here, and she was like sunshine. She got round the old master, and she heartened up everybody; the maids would fly round to please her, and she took no heed to the talk; she even tried to befriend that poor daft body at Lessdyke"—Nurse stopped suddenly as she came to an intricate point in the stocking she was knitting.

Amyot's eyes followed her every movement closely, but a look of keen interest crossed his face at Nurse's last words.

"And then your father went out to India again, and was killed, and after that she came often, bringing you with her; but when the old master died and Mr. Albert came home, she did not come; and then she, too, died. And Mr. Albert's wife had gone—it was a dreadful time—but I kept the household straight, in spite of his wickedness"—the old woman's voice was triumphant. "We kept up all the old ways, and many's the man and maid I've sent on to fine places from here. Why, I sent one footman to the Prince of Wales himself, and he was always wanting me to go to London and see how grand he was, and how he'd got on. Poor fellow, he'd got no mother!"

Nurse had rambled on, pretending not to be alive to the interest that had awaked in her hearer's face when she had mentioned the "body" at Lessdyke; but now, when she stopped, Amyot asked—

"And the lady at Lessdyke, Nurse? I remember her quite well; but, oddly enough, I never thought about her all these years until to-day. What about her?"

"And what, may I be so bold as to ask, sir, made you think about her to-day?" Nurse questioned back, stopping her rapid knitting to look keenly at him.

"I can't tell; suddenly she came into my head when I was talking to Mr. Gayle. I asked him to come over here."

Nurse's hands fell on to her knee; her face was full of interest.

"You did, sir? And what did he say? The Gayles are a proud family."

Amyot did not follow her thought.

"But are we not as good as they?" he asked, surprised.

"As good? As old, and perhaps older: no one knows." Her voice was triumphant. "And I can remember when the Hardys were a much grander family. But there was always a quarrel; they said it was about the land at Salt-marsh, and the disgrace made it worse; the families never spoke nor met."

Amyot smiled.

"Well, Nurse, I went there to-day. I did not know things were as bad as that between us; I daresay I should have gone, anyhow; it all seems to me old rubbish. But Mr. Gayle seemed troubled when I asked him to come here—and then I remembered that story: she is his sister, isn't she?"

"Yes. I haven't heard that she's dead, sir?" Nurse spoke questioningly.

"I know nothing about her; but it seems rather cruel to have left her in that lonely place, and for no one to go near her. Was it true what she did, Nurse?"

"People said so," responded Nurse cautiously. "Anyhow, she was a beautiful young creature, and he—he was worse than a brute!"

"But she would have done better to have gone away. If he were so cruel, no one could have blamed her for that."

"She was proud. She wouldn't own that she'd done wrong or made a mistake. It was an awful time. And I always thought she didn't know what she was doing. I went to see her for Madam once, when she'd heard the way things were going, and that he'd beaten her to get hold of some money she were holding back. Poor thing! Poor thing! What she had to bear! And it was all true. I saw her beautiful arms myself black and blue from his grippings—and the wrist broken. It was cruel!"

Nurse's voice sank away.

Amyot sprang up, the passion of his race suddenly leaping through his blood overmasteringly.

"Stop, Nurse! don't tell me any more. I was a fool indeed to-day!"

He walked to the window hurriedly, pulled back the curtain, and looked out. The wide skies and level earth had always so great a charm for him, that he had ordered that the shutters were never to be closed. Now, like a cooling hand laid upon a fevered head, the soft radiance of the spring night, revealing the wide expanses of sky and land, soothed his heated blood.

But oh, what a story! A woman—a lady—to be so treated by one of his kin!

With a hasty "Good-night, Nurse—I shan't want anything more. I will shut up here," he opened the French window, and went out into the night.

A woman—a gentle, delicate, softly nurtured woman—to be treated thus! Amyot grew sick with physical sickness as Nurse's graphic story went on ringing through his brain. He went back into the past, and beat his memory for recollection of her. But Rowan's quiet face replaced the one memory tried to conjure up, and the mournful eyes which looked into his were luminous and grey. Why did Rowan's face so persistently haunt him? he wondered.

It was a perfect spring night. The full moon, riding high in the heavens, lighted up as in a cold daylight, devoid of the warmth of sun, the features of the landscape—if, indeed, such a landscape can be described as having features. Amyot, leaving the drive in front of the house, crossed the stable-yard into the home field beyond; and without any special intention in his mind, started off at a swinging pace along the firm cart-road which led to his farm buildings, about three miles away.

Over level pastures and arable land, where the corn was already springing, by large potato and mustard fields, the firm white road lay naked and open in its uncurving length. The wide "drain" beside his path reflected the intense sapphire of the sky; here and there a fringe of willow withes or a tuft of rushes made a black shadow in the still waters. Everything was intensely still. There was no sound but the tread of his own feet, and now and then the faint sighing of the wind blowing in little cold gusts from the sea.

Presently a wide bank—the dyke raised by the Romans to resist the sea's encroachments—crossed his path. The road ascended it, and a path at the top, with palings placed for some yards along its summit to prevent the cattle straying, checked his rapid progress. He paused, with his arms along the top bar of the gate, and looked ahead.

Straight onward lay the road, with its border of shining water. Far ahead, some two miles away, a little to the left, lay a patch of shadow, marking his farm buildings and the trees which sheltered them. His land, level after level, stretched to the coast—now some six miles away, though the dyke on whose elevation he was standing had once marked the sea's limit. He was looking over highly cultivated and fertile land, where centuries before the sea had flowed.

As he looked, a sudden thought came into his mind.

Changing his course, he turned to the right, and started off again along the summit of the dyke. His blood was still hot, but the rapid bodily exercise was restoring his mental equilibrium. He was thinking coherently, instead of in a confused struggle with an oppressive fact. The picture which Nurse's few words had presented to him was burnt in indeed upon his brain; but surrounding it now were all kinds of misty issues—vague shadows thronging one over the other, clouding and suppressing its cruel outlines.

But through all, the one question clamoured. This woman, who had been so cruelly used by one so near to him in blood, his father's brother, was of the blood that flowed in Rowan's veins—was near, as near to her. Were they two, he and she, henceforth to walk apart—separated by a cruelty, and possibly a crime?

He had no very clear intention in his mind as he strode along, but some impulse urged him to go on, and look with his bodily eyes on the scene which surrounded the woman whose image was so present to his mental vision. As he walked on and on—sometimes descending a little, to avoid the inequalities and irregularities of the wonderfully built bank—sometimes leaping over the intersecting gullies which had been cut in more modern days to let out the inland waters—his emotion gradually cooled down, and he began to wonder at himself for having been so moved by an old-world history. He made some calculations of dates and ages, and concluded that if she were still alive, the unhappy woman must be nearing seventy years of age.

"But she may be dead," he thought, "otherwise I should have heard something of her—so much as I have been about there lately."

As he neared the sea, the air grew colder and stronger, and even the rapid pace at which he was travelling scarcely availed to keep warmth in his body. He was without an overcoat, in a smoking-jacket and the evening clothes to which he had changed before dinner. How lonely it was! In what lifeless solitude the great fen lay round him, its surface only broken by an aspen or a willow here and there, standing like silent sentinels in the cold moonlight.

At last a glimmering line lay before him, the silver line which marked the estuary of the Less, and he leapt down from the bank on to a firm white high-road, and paused to think about his next proceedings.

CHAPTER III.

LESSDYKE—A MEETING.

"The miserable have no medicine,
But only Hope."

AT Lessdyke, a bridge as old as the Roman occupation connected the two banks of the Less, and the road thenceforward curved more inland, bringing the scattered farms of the district into communication with their fellows. Eastward of Lessdyke, the river gradually widened into an estuary of the Wash, an estuary which every fifty years or so had been perceptibly diminishing in area. As the sea receded, the land had been drained and included in their cultivated fields by the two chief land-owners of the district. The Hardys, with the family boldness which their name betokened, had not been behindhand in annexation, and had continued the construction of the big dyke which the Romans had initiated. This was necessary if the reclaimed land was to be cultivated, as an unusually high tide coinciding with a strong east wind would flood the country, and perhaps make the labour of the year a swamp and a desolation.

The dykes were wonderfully constructed of piles and stones and fagots, with a surface of silt and sand planted with bent-grass, which, when firmly established, bound the whole closely together, and under ordinary circumstances defied wind and sea. But it was needful to watch them carefully and to repair immediately, as the smallest leakage might endanger the whole. The bed of the river for many miles down, as far as the tide ascended, was dredged and deepened, and its banks strengthened after the same fashion. This was done under the direction of an old-established Drainage Commission, with which body Amyot Hardy was beginning to come into collision. Mr. Gayle was its chairman, and he—after the first prejudices attaching to Amyot's name had been got over—was much attracted by the clever schemes and energy of his neighbour.

It had been hitherto the custom for the reclaimed land to be added to the already large pastures which distinguish this district, still bearing the name of the Marsh from its condition in old days, though that appellation is now a misnomer. For the last year or two, however, before Amyot's succession, the mysterious and unaccountable death of cattle in those distant outlying fields, had led to their being disused and neglected. Amyot, after a year of scientific observation and trial, had strengthened his dykes, enlarged his drains, and had converted his pastures into arable land. He was now anxiously observing the result of his audacity, against which many things had been prophesied by local wisdom.

"Do you think that what has been must always be?" Amyot had questioned, at the conclusion of a stormy meeting, when, amongst other business, he had pointed out, and proved, serious mistaken deductions on the part of the Commissioners' engineer. "When I was in Holland, I went thoroughly into this matter. You will find I am right. I don't say that corn is my ideal crop for those lands. It isn't. They would work most profitably in petite culture. But in existing circumstances I shall make it answer—as it is out of the question now for pasture. And I will prove to you," he finished sternly, his dark eyes glancing round, "that what has been shall no longer be."

Many of the obtuse bucolic intellects listening to him heard a threat in his words which they considered almost blasphemous. Others of the more enlightened took them with a far different meaning. Amongst these was Mr. Gayle, who that day, for the first time, sought out Amyot afterwards, and talked friendly with him, as in some measure a fellow-sufferer and a neighbour and equal. No one had dared to speak to Amyot about the relations which had till then existed between the families, though he had been quick-sighted enough to feel the embarrassed nature of the overtures which had been made to him by the farmers dwelling round. He knew enough, however, of the later history of his uncle's life not to be surprised or resentful at this. He realised that he had to lift his name out of a slough: a not particularly pleasant inheritance for a proud, quick-tempered man.

On this night, when emotion had raised him above physical discomfort, and the heat of his mind had triumphed over the cold of his body, as Amyot neared Lessdyke, the thoughts that had possessed him, insensibly merged into reflections on the other interests connected with his immediate surroundings. He loved this outlying part of his land—this prodigal snatched from destruction, and yet returning kindness with ingratitude and harm—as he loved no other fields on his estate. As he hurried rapidly along the firm road, his foreshortened shadow rushing in a stunted and distorted fashion ahead, his eyes glanced interestedly over the dark ploughed land between himself and the sea. In the moonlight, bright though it was, no tender green betokened the springing crops. What though the green had vanished in this sunless light? He knew that it was there, and his mind's eye saw the marshalled lines of narrow blades balancing gently in the breeze. Far to the right this dark ploughed land extended; and bounding it, and now also his vision seawards, as he neared it, was the broad dyke he had helped to construct. In a few minutes he stood upon the bridge, and looked over the water.

How beautiful it was! Far away it was gleaming in silver brightness; here, between the river-banks, it was rippling along in tiny dark waves. The tide was coming in, as he had already guessed from the freshening of the breeze, and the fresh salt scent was grateful to his senses. Several little boats and canoes were drawn up high on the sloping banks and chained to their moorings.

Probably no one besides himself was about, or even awake, in this lonely land, over which he could see for miles all round him. He turned round to look over the bridge, and along the road to the north, which he could see like a white ribbon curving inland; and his eyes rested curiously on a cottage standing by itself, above the other cottages of the little hamlet beyond, on the raised bank of the river.

It looked shut up and still, with its white blinds drawn down, as over sightless eyes. As memory came back to him, he believed that this was the cottage where used to live the unhappy woman he could just remember to have seen that once, whose personality must have made a very strong impression, for one so young to remember her at all. Somewhere near the bridge he knew it was—and this looked like it.

His mind returning to this track, he fell to wondering who could have been his companion that day in his childhood, who had touched upon this miserable part of his family history. Could it have been his mother? He did not think so; he remembered no special emotion or pity in the words conveyed to him, and he felt sure his mother must have felt both. Nurse had said that she had tried to befriend her. His companion must have been a servant—a groom, perhaps, with whom he was riding. But he remembered her mournful eyes, and the look they had fixed upon himself as he passed. What had that look meant? She could have no cause for any feeling but hatred to one of his name and family.

Amyot felt inclined to think very leniently of her, even if she had been guilty of the crime she was suspected of; for her provocation must have been intense. He thought of it rather as a tragic story, than as a real passage in the human life of an accountable and responsible person. And had she not been punished? Amyot flinched as he reflected what her life must have been since her marriage. What misery the thirty, even forty years of exile—he was vague about dates, and resolved to get accurate details from Nurse—passed in this lonely flat must have meant! What made her remain here? Who knew anything about her? Whence did she subsist?

Of one thing he somehow felt quite certain: that the girl at Lesscough was completely ignorant of her existence. Vague thoughts and hopes rushed into his mind that this might be a bond between them: that when she knew of the connection which united them, she would accept him as a friend and intimate. But would she ever know? He could not be the one to tell her, if her father wished her to remain in ignorance. But others might. Somehow, Amyot hoped they would.

Thinking thus, he slowly traversed the bridge and the narrow footpath turning from it along the river's bank; and almost without volition of his own, he found himself in front of the cottage. He walked round it, and saw that it was larger than he had supposed: consisting probably of five or six rooms. At the back was a small garden enclosed in a high privet hedge. All was dark and still.

The keenness of the easterly wind was not favourable to sauntering, and he was turning to walk back towards the bridge, when suddenly he saw a woman's tall dark figure hastily cross the bridge and advance along the pathway towards him. The moonlight shone full upon her face, whilst his own was naturally in shadow. He saw her pause for a second as she caught sight of his advancing figure, and then come on more slowly, with slightly hesitating footsteps. A thrill of expectation filled him. She was not dead, then. Here was the answer to his desire for knowledge, in flesh and blood before him.

He was conscious that she was observing him closely, keenly.

As she neared him, he saw that she was dressed in a long grey gown of some homespun material, and that a close-fitting bonnet of a bygone style framed her face. He involuntarily stopped as she approached, and moved aside to make room for her to pass along the narrow path. She came on quickly, her eyes fixed on his, which, now that he had turned, were also in the full moonlight. He looked a rather striking figure in that hour under the cold light. His dark velvet jacket was buttoned tightly, and the foreign air which characterised him was further emphasised by the little cap above his hair.

"What do you want?" the woman asked quickly, stopping as she reached him.

Her voice sounded almost as if there were expectation in it, and Amyot noticed also—the moment's pause during which he allowed himself to think—what looked certainly like a gleam of hope shining in the sorrowful eyes; for they were sorrowful. He had remembered correctly.

He felt ashamed and sorry that he had been thus caught prowling round her dwelling at this late hour. But what did she expect or hope? he wondered.

"Pardon me," he said—and at the words he saw her start slightly, and her face grow cold and hard—"I had been much moved to-night at hearing a story; and—I came here without thinking or meaning anything. I am sorry to have intruded."

As he spoke, he removed his cap, and he was conscious that she was observing him closely, keenly, with eyes which now glittered with some other feeling than hope, or sorrow, or regret.

"A story?" she asked quickly. "What story? Whose?"

"Yours," he answered gently; "at least, I think so. You are Mrs. Hardy?"

He saw a quiver cross her face, and her lips move as if to speak, but no words came. She stood as if turned to stone—spell-bound; her eyes searching his, with what meaning in their depths he could not fathom.

It was intensely still; except for the gusts of wind and the little ripple of the waves now coming fast into the river, there was not a sound anywhere. What a strange meeting, Amyot thought. And, his dark eyes arrested almost against his will by her absorbed gaze, he was silent as if waiting for her answer. At last it came.

"Hardy?" she said, her breath catching the voice and changing it to a whisper; "you are a Hardy. No doubt about that—none!" Her voice gained strength as she went on passionately: "I knew you when you began to ride about here a year or two ago, and I heard you shouting at the men." She waved her hand towards the dark flat beyond the sea-bank, then she went on rapidly, her passion increasing: "You Hardys, you think God's earth and sky and sea were made for you alone! Ay, and God's men and women too! And you take the land, and you bound the sea, and you break women's hearts; you die, even, accusing and deceiving! But as there is a God above"—and she flung up her right hand high above her head—"your punishment is coming! I can see it; I often see it now! Destruction and a storm, and waves surging round!"

She paused a moment, and turned to gaze seaward, her voice dropping as if she were relating something she had actually seen.

"Once it came—I have read of it—and it will come again, 'over the smiling land, the level pastures, and the quivering grain': you have made that possible now;" turning her head and flashing a glance of triumph at Amyot's still face. "I wondered how it was to happen. But God will bring all your counsel to naught!" her voice sank, and she trembled.

Amyot had listened at first pityingly, recalling Nurse's "poor, daft body"; then, in spite of his cool reason, he had shivered slightly at her graphic words. Now he stood impressed against his will by her prophecy, his dark eyes gazing over the black fen. Presently she turned her eyes again on his troubled face, and began in softer tones—

"I had expected a message; I thought it was come when I saw you. Had you nothing to bring me?"

There was intense pathos in her question, and her gaze lingered scrutinisingly on his face. It flashed across Amyot that she was hoping for some reconciliation with her own people, and as he saw her slight figure and grey hair, and remembered the desolation of her life, he felt roused to intense pity for the cruelty with which she had been treated. A sudden resolve flushed his face, and he impulsively held out his hand.

"I will bring you a message—trust me, I will bring you one. Not just yet, perhaps," he said, cool reflection convincing him of the difficulty of what he was promising; "but it shall come. There is a girl—" he stopped. Was it cruel to raise hopes he might not be able to gratify? But, no. He thought he had read aright a gentle nature in that girl's sweet face; and at least this lonely woman might like to hear about her. He went on softly: "There is a girl in your old home at Lescough, and she looks sweet and gentle; and some day, when I can, I will bring you a message from her. Will that do, at first?"—he asked, as the face he was looking at slowly changed, and the expression of keen hope and expectation gave way to one of cold disappointment—"only at first? And she will tell her father that you are longing to see him, and will perhaps bring him here, or —"

He stopped, amazed at the change in her face from disappointment to anger, suspicion, even jealousy. Was he reading it aright?

"Here!" she exclaimed, scornfully. "Do you think he will condescend—a Gayle—to come on to your land? No; as long as I remain here I shall never see him!" her voice grew mournful; "but I thought he would some day send a message."

Then her mood changed.

"A girl?" she questioned quickly; "what girl is there at Lescough?"

"Mr. Gayle's daughter. I saw her this afternoon," he went on, as he noticed the unmistakable astonishment with which his news was received. How was it possible that she, living within ten miles or so of Lescough, should not know all about her people there?

"You saw her there? you went to the Abbey?" she asked slowly.

"Yes, I did," he said, smiling slightly, amused at her tone. "Was it a very dreadful thing to do?"

"Dreadful? It was a very—unusual thing to do." She had hesitated for a word.

"Oh, but unusual things seem to me usual here!" he said lightly. "Why should you not go to see her—your niece, too? I think she would be a comfort to you," he went on, disregarding her gesture of dissent; "she looks gentle, and good, and pretty."

As he watched, her face softened.

"And the Abbey is lovely. They were in the drawing-room, and Miss Gayle looks like a picture there—on the wall by the fireplace—do you remember it?"

Her eyes gave an assenting look, though she said nothing; and she seemed to be listening eagerly for more. How he pitied her, this sad, lonely woman, who, if she had done wrong, had been wronged far more bitterly; who had spent her life among clods awry from her kind; after, as he guessed, a terrible experience of ill-usage and suffering. Well, he at least would try to make the rest of it more endurable.

"Do you never hear or see anything of them?" he asked, with tender deference.

The answer came slowly—coldly.

"I? I never ask," she said quietly. "They are nothing to me."

"Pardon me. They are your brother, and your brother's child, and your old home."

He saw the keen eyes grow misty—the firm, thin lips quiver.

"I left it all," she said softly, as if speaking to herself; "home, and mother, and father, and sisters—all; and I found—a demon!" She turned her head away with a gesture of passion. In spite of the strong words and the long isolation in which she had lived, Amyot could not help remarking the delicacy and refinement of the intonation and enunciation of her speech. There was in it no echo even of provincialism: every word was as purely articulated as those of her niece.

"But you will let me come and see you now, won't you?" he pleaded. "I should often be glad to look in for a rest, when I am in the Fen all day. And I am lonely, too," he went on, with a cunning worthy of a woman. "Will you not come and see me? I will bring a carriage for you whenever you feel able to come."

She shook her head, and gazed at him blankly. But he was battering down all her strongholds by his daring, and she was evidently considering his novel proposition.

"This girl?" she questioned presently; "you have not told me her name: what is her name?"

He wondered if she had not understood.

"Her name? She is Mr. Gayle's daughter!" he answered, "and her father calls her Rowan—a strange name, isn't it? Rowan Gayle." His voice lingered on the soft syllables.

"Rowan Gayle!" she said, whispering the words to herself. "Rowan Gayle! I am Rowan Gayle!"

And without a farewell or another glance, she turned away, and went swiftly along the path to her cottage.

AN OLD NORWEGIAN CHURCH.

THE BELFRY.

IT stands in a quiet Norwegian valley, this old church of Borgund. Not so utterly out of the world to-day as it once was, however; for a great highway, connecting Christiania with the western fiords, has opened up this lonely region, and every passing traveller pauses to wonder at and examine the strange old building. But, among these mountain solitudes, what are a few travellers? They go their way, and the silence and loneliness are but the more impressive.

We were on the last stage of the long drive from Christiania to LaerdalsØren when we reached Borgund.

The snow-peaks of the Jotunheim were far behind, and we had entered a beautiful valley—one of those valleys so peculiar to Norway, which stretch long arms from the breezy fiords to the very heart of the mountains, where the only sound is the chatter of a mountain stream, the thunder of a distant waterfall, or the musical tinkle of a cowbell on the nearer slopes. In such a quiet spot, close to the high-road, and on the banks of the river, stands a new church, fresh and bright, and beside it is a small, strange, black object, which, though difficult to realise, is the famous church of Borgund. Beside the freshly painted walls of its modern neighbour, it looks almost uncanny. Yet it is a precious relic; it dates from the twelfth century, and is now the carefully preserved property of the Antiquarian Society of Christiania.

THE PORCH.

A fantastic object it certainly is, with its black wooden walls and roofs, its many gables, its dragon-heads (the old Norse safeguard against evil spirits), its outside gallery and its carved doorways, with their ancient Runic inscriptions. Windows there are none, and the interior is quite dark, save for the dim light which comes through the opened doors. In the twilight within may still be seen the old stone pulpit, the font, the communion-table, and a primitive money-box, made out of a log of wood. To liken cathedral pillars to the trees of a stately forest is a favourite comparison, but here the pillars are actually trees, tall red pines, unpainted and unpolished.

Altogether, the whole appearance of this strange old church suggests rather a Chinese pagoda, or a heathen temple in some far-off island of the southern seas, than the work of a sober people like the Norwegians.

Yet many memories cling about it. Through all these centuries it has stood here, alone in this quiet valley, untouched and unmoved by the changes taking place around. Peaceful peasants, living their simple lives in this lonely region, and unconscious of the progress of the great world beyond their hills, have answered, year after year, the summons of the bell in the old belfry close by, to come here from their scattered homes, and gather within those blackened walls. The thought of the generations that have held here their simple earnest worship, of the wedding and baptismal services that have taken place in its dark gloomy interior, of the graves of many a household in the quiet churchyard outside, gives a real and pathetic interest to the weather-beaten little building.

We lingered an hour to satisfy our curiosity, and then forgot for a while this quiet valley in the wonders and dangers of the journey which lies between it and the western sea. A more terrible and desolate region than this can hardly be imagined.

Through a gorge where the cliffs press so closely on each other that to pass seems impossible, the road makes its way, winding down and down, in many a twist and curve, while the rocks rise sheer above, in some places overhanging the road; and the river, now a thundering torrent, rushes along, boiling and foaming in cauldron-like depths, a hundred feet below.

Not till the cliffs were left behind could we breathe freely again; between their jagged walls a sense of suffocation oppressed us, and with a feeling of relief we at length emerged from their grim shade into the broad light of a wider valley. As we drove along mile after mile, this, too, seemed a dreary place, though with signs of life and movement in its wayside huts, its barley-fields, and its busy peasants. Behind these towering hills the sun soon sinks, and it was in the long northern gloaming that we turned the last corner of the winding road, and saw before us the twinkling lights of the little town of Laesdalsören.

But though the traveller of to-day passes on so quickly in search of new scenes and fresh adventures, the old church, and the solemn mountains, and the tumbling river, still remain, to tell their tale afresh—not noisily, but silently and appealingly, to those who have the ear of sympathy to hear. ## THE BOOK OF RUTH.—II.

BY THE RIGHT REV. W. BOYD CARPENTER, D.D., LORD BISHOP OF RIPON.

HERE are moments which we may call the seed-moments of life. In them the future lies enclosed. Such a moment was that when the men of Athens resolved to fight at Marathon, and so preserved the civilisation of Europe; such a moment was that when Cæsar crossed the Rubicon, or when William of Orange resolved upon the war with Spain. At times like these the future of an empire or the freedom of peoples was at stake. These were the seed-moments of history. They determined issues which touched the interests of coming generations. In the narrower sphere of individual life there are such moments of crisis, which seem to determine our career. Such a moment came to Ruth when Naomi resolved to return to her own land; to her came that tide in her affairs which led, not merely to fortune, but to what was nobler than fortune—a development of character.

It would be interesting if we could note the exact spot where this decision was taken, for we love to identify the places in which the great scenes or decisive actions of human history took place. It may have been on the banks of the Arnon, or close to the Jordan, or perhaps more probably on the long range of hills which terminate the tableland of Moab, and which look across the Dead Sea towards the land of Israel, that the words of Ruth's decision were spoken. The land of Moab was fading out of sight, and the heights of Judæa were coming into view. On the hills opposite, Lot had made his famous choice, selfishly preferring the rich plains of Sodom and leaving to Abraham the less fertile ranges of the Judean uplands. To the right, on the edge of the Jordan, in later years the people who gathered at the preaching of the Baptist made their great decision in a baptism. At a place, then, which recalled the evil choice of Lot, and which was destined to witness the nobler choice of those who resolved for the baptism of repentance, the decision of Ruth was given. On the one side there was her own country, with its pleasant, easy-going, and prosperous inhabitants, her old acquaintances and friends, and the natural prospects of re-establishment in domestic life. On the other side there was exile, an exile associated with the scornful glances of a narrow-minded and prejudiced people, with little hope of any companionship save that of her mother-in-law, and but scant probability of shelter or protection when the elder woman was dead. Naomi saw the issue clearly, and in the fact that she stated it distinctly to her daughters-in-law we see her unselfish and noble-minded character. Few people, when they reach an age of weakness and prospective solitude, are able to forget themselves or to identify themselves with the aspirations and the needs of the young life. It is hard to grow old gracefully; it is harder still to keep the heart fresh and sympathy ready when the frame grows weary, the mind inelastic, and the sense of physical weakness tempts us to selfishness of habit. But Naomi could remember her youth. Her attitude is a favourable contrast to the narrow churlishness of an old age oblivious of its prime. What she says amounts to this. "Remember, that in coming with me you have no prospect for yourselves. In your own country you may meet with friends—in all probability, restoration to domestic happiness in a household of your own; but if you come with me, you can hardly expect this. It is not likely that any in the land of Judah will seek the hand of a Moabitess in marriage. If, therefore, you, young as you are, wish to have rest" (by which she seems to mean the protection and peace which a home of her own affords to a woman), "seek it not in Israel, but in Moab."

We must remember that in Oriental life and in olden days the happiness and occupation for a woman's energy lay chiefly in a domestic career. The enlightened wisdom and the enlarged spheres of interest which Christianity has opened to women were then unknown and unthought of. The only future which a woman in Naomi's position could contemplate for Ruth and for Orpah was to be found in a second marriage. When the issue was so plainly put, it worked different results in the minds of the two women who heard her. Stated in its plain and uninteresting truthfulness, it determined Orpah to return. She still had a certain fondness for Naomi, but when the issue was so clearly put she could not endure the test, and, like those whose goodness is as the early dew and whose life cannot stand the strain of an unselfish heroism, like the grass which grows on the housetop and withers before it be grown up, Orpah's better impulse died away. She kissed her mother-in-law and returned.

Her action made the decision of Ruth all the more difficult, but it also threw brighter colour over Ruth's resolve. She clung to Naomi; she decided, and her decision has won the heart of the hard world, not only because of her noble unselfishness, but because of the eloquent words in which she clothed her resolution. How sweetly she combats every petition of Naomi with the answer of unswerving fidelity and love! Does Naomi, seeking to dissuade her, tell her there is no home to welcome her in Israel, while there are many in Moab, Ruth answers, "Whither thou goest, I will go." Does she urge that Ruth is venturing among an alien people, her answer is, "Thy people shall be my people." Does she hint that it is better for her to return with her sister to her gods, she answers, "Thy God shall be my God." And when Naomi pleads that her life can be only a dark and sunless one, "Be it so," Ruth seems to say, "be it so, yet will I follow thee to the very darkest land, to the very gate of death. Where thou diest will I die, and there will I be buried."

It was a noble resolve. Poets, musicians, and painters have striven to give it varied beauty of expression. Even to this day, though thousands of years have rolled by since the words were spoken, they still cause a thrill in all true human hearts.

But great words do not always mean great deeds. Sometimes our emotions enable us to be eloquent when our conduct, perhaps, may prove to be prosaic. Were the words of Ruth pitched in too high a key? Did feeling at the moment outrun the power of consistent action? The test is soon to come; we shall soon know whether the heroism of the lip will outstrip the heroism of the life; but for this we must enter upon a second act of the drama.

The scene is Bethlehem. The gossips of the place have all expressed their wonder and their superficial compassion at the return of Naomi. There is a pleasant babble of excitement in the place for the time, and the news is shouted by shrill voices upon the housetops that Naomi is come back, and that Naomi is come back in a state of comparative destitution. It is always pleasant to talk of one's neighbour's misfortune, and it affords in dull times an interesting subject of conversation. But such excitement soon fades away. The people return to their normal condition, and they forget all about Naomi. The eager gossip of the neighbourhood has brought no help, and the two women are left to their own devices. Fortunately, the season of the year is promising, for they have come to Judah at the beginning of barley harvest. The stern and sorrowful days of famine are at an end. The Lord hath blessed His people, and the harvest is rich in the fields. It is not the richness of the harvest which is to their advantage alone. It is the humane law of Moses which is ready to help them; for had it not been for the generous provision which that law afforded to the poor, the lot of Ruth and Naomi had been hard indeed. In that noble law, falsely accused, by those who do not understand it and do not read it, of being cruel and harsh in its provisions, there is made an especial provision for the poor, the widow and the fatherless. "Thou shalt not wholly reap the corners of thy field, neither shalt thou gather the gleanings of thy harvest." "When thou cuttest down thine harvest in thy field, and hast forgot a sheaf in the field, thou shalt not go again to fetch it; it shall be for the stranger, for the fatherless and the widow: that the Lord thy God may bless thee in all the work of thine hands." "When thou beatest thine olive tree, thou shalt not go over the boughs again: it shall be for the stranger, for the fatherless and for the widow." "And thou shalt not glean thy vineyard, neither shalt thou gather every grape of thy vineyard; thou shalt leave them for the poor and stranger: I am the Lord your God." "And thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in the land of Egypt, therefore I command thee to do this thing."

It was this beneficent law which gave the opportunity of a subsistence to Ruth and Naomi. The old law rather than the hearts of the people was, then, the protection of these two women; for there were none, it seems, amongst the kinsfolk of Naomi, the daughters of Israel, in whose veins flowed the same blood, to succour her in her poverty. Thus it came about that Ruth, an alien in blood, "less of kin, but more than kind," took upon herself the care of Naomi, and by her toil found a subsistence for her mother-in-law and herself. She is ready to take the first fair opportunity for honest work. But it was not an easy task for her. She had been accustomed to easy circumstances, to the ready service of others. But now she must school herself to be a tolerated gleaner, snatching at the loose ears of corn as they fell, or dragging up the overlooked stalks. It was an unaccustomed toil, and unaccustomed toil is ever hard; but it was toil also which was carried on in the presence of those who probably resented her action. We all know how amongst all classes the idea of some prescriptive right makes them hard upon new-comers. The crossing-sweeper feels that he has a right to a particular crossing, and no doubt the gleaners of old who were habitués of the place felt that they had a right of perquisite in certain fields. The presence of any new-comers would seem to interfere with their rights, and would naturally be resented. But what was worse, in the case of Ruth the new-comer was a foreigner; and though the laws of Moses were strongly in favour of the stranger, the habitual attitude of the people was scarcely generous or welcoming; her nationality would expose her to contempt, and perhaps, even more than her foreign blood, her unquestioned beauty would provoke the jealous animosity of some. It was a hard lot, bitter with unkindness and exhausting through its unwonted toil. Certainly there must have been moments at such a time when she began to doubt the wisdom of her choice. Her imagination and her memory might travel back to her sister-in-law's lot in Moab. She could see Orpah in her native land. She might picture the rich farmers and graziers of Moab, laughing and chaffing with the young widow whose prospects of settlement appeared very near. But Ruth's lot was that of a friendless woman in a strange land, with a responsibility of toil upon her, and limited to the society of a sad-hearted, broken-spirited, and rapidly ageing woman. But though in outward circumstances her choice may have seemed a mistake, when we lift the veil and look beneath the surface we know how greatly she gained. No person acts nobly without gaining morally, and the heroism of Ruth's choice proved a real gain to her character. She has stepped, moreover, into a higher moral atmosphere. She has left behind the low levels of selfishness where the miasma of evil desires rises to cloud the brain and to enervate the heart. She has reached the clearer heights of self-sacrifice, where the vision of nobler things is not only possible but certain. She has gained even more. Unknown to herself, the courage of her conduct and the simplicity of her actions has begun to wear off the rough edge of prejudice, and the hearts of those who disliked the alien are slowly disarmed of their prejudice. Doubtless we must not attribute too much to the kind words which are used of her in the fourth chapter, for at that time her success was complete: and amongst those who congratulate the successful, complimentary language is not wholly sincere; but still the recognition of her noble conduct was honest on the part of many, for it could not fail to excite the admiration of all who were true-hearted. Their sympathy responded when they saw this young thing leaving all, her home and her kindred, for the sake of an old woman who had no claim of blood upon her, and working for her with more devotion and more industry than her own sons could have done. Such conduct certainly justified the panegyric which was pronounced later by those who said to Naomi, "She is better to thee than seven sons." Further, she is upon the road which leads to great things; she is not destined to be a mere cipher in the world's history, but Ruth the fair is to be the ancestress of David; the mother of kings, the sharer in the great Messianic purpose of God's providence, she is to be much more than a gleaner in life's field—she is to be a responsible worker in the great development of a nation's life.

From the story, so far, we may deduce three conclusions. First, the dignity of all honest work. It is well to remind ourselves of this in an age which is often ashamed of work. There are people who cultivate flabbiness. They are happy if only they can pass themselves off as genteel and above the suspicion of work. In society they ignore the factory or the shop. They are ashamed of their trade. It is a bad thing for society when men or women shrink from acknowledging the glory and necessity of work. But in a time when wealth is the only idol, it is not to be wondered at that work should be thought of in shamefaced fashion, for the necessity of work hints the possibility of poverty; and where wealth is worshipped poverty is an unpardonable sin. But this genteel affectation of idleness is not a mere modern vice. It was rife in Solomon's day, and the wise king satirised it in words which are full of delicate and suggestive irony: "Better is he that worketh and hath a servant than he that honoureth himself and hath no bread." There are many who would be glad to meet Ruth, honoured as she is in every age, the ancestress of David and the ancestress of Christ, but who, if they had met her in the harvest field with her arms full of the new corn, would have been ashamed, probably, to claim her acquaintance. Yet what made her great was not the providence which made her the wife of Boaz, but the grand heroism which made her worthy to be named in the roll of the Messiah's ancestors. Her greatness lay in her character, in her sublime devotion, in the high-souled chivalry which did not scorn for love's sake to touch the soil, and led her to expose herself to the companionship of the rude harvest folk. It lay in the spirit which found the rough fare of those laborious days more tolerable than the genteel selfishness which might leave Naomi to starve, or than that disdainful indolence which contributes nothing to the sum-total of human happiness. Idleness ought to be intolerable to any human being who has a high sense of duty or of the splendid purposes for which God has created us. But how many and how feeble are the excuses under which idleness veils itself! "I cannot dig, to beg I am ashamed." Self-respect pleads that it cannot work. But what self-respect is that which honours idleness and despises honourable toil, and which bows down to fashion, or to the opinion of the world? Our actions will never be heroic if we wait for the good word of the world. Noah, Moses, Joshua and Samson and St. Paul, our Lord Himself, and a host more who, through faith, followed Him, were of that spirit which, in conviction of what was right, went against the opinion of the world. But idleness has another plea. She pleads that there is something due to our position in society. It is perfectly true our responsibilities are measured by this; we have certainly no right to act in any way which may diminish the sphere of our usefulness. It is right enough that we should undertake that work which belongs to the legitimate station to which the providence of God has called us; but the kind of work is one thing, the duty of work is another. Toil, however humble, is always better than idleness. There are always ways of utilising the waste material of human life and of employing human energy for the good of the world. This is true of women as well as men. In our own day we realise that toil is neither unfitting nor undignified in womanhood. To educate those who need education is not degrading but ennobling work; to nurse the sick, to diffuse the knowledge of fresh discoveries in science, to spread various useful information concerning health and household happiness amongst the masses of mankind, is work which, while it elevates the world, elevates those who have the courage to devote themselves to it; and those women who have given themselves to such work are leading the advance guard of a nobler and a happier age. Obstinate prejudice and superficial gentility, uneasy about its own claims to respectability, may sneer, but meanwhile the workers do their work, and these gleaners in the harvest-fields of the world will yet return with joy, bringing their sheaves with them; but no reaper will pause to gather the empty grass which has grown up upon the housetops of genteel selfishness.

Secondly, I infer from the story the power of life's discipline to call forth latent nobleness of character. In her own earlier life Ruth might have been like many other young women—empty, frivolous, pleasure-loving, capricious, sillily exacting; but however this may have been, it is generally in the sharp winter of adverse fortune that people show if they have the right stuff in them. In Ruth's story it is in the days of adversity that she develops a heroism which was probably little suspected before. The history of the world is full of similarly noble examples. It is in the hour of supreme trial that Lady Russell, seated beneath her husband, proves herself a heroine. Marie Antoinette, frivolous and extravagant in her days of prosperity, is twice a queen in the prison cell; the cold, phlegmatic Dutch grow grand in unswerving courage when, in the hour of their adversity, they fight for their land and freedom of faith against Philip, Alva, and the sea. There are hundreds upon whose characters there comes a divine irradiation as they descend from the bright heights of prosperity into the low levels of adversity. There are many to whom the higher power has only come in the sorrowful and in the trying hours. Souls have grown noble through trouble. They are those to whom the Divine Voice has often said, "I have known thy soul in adversity."

Thirdly, I gather that the summons to higher illumination often lies in the path of simple and obvious duty. Who can doubt that the story of Ruth is the story of the way in which God drew a stranger to Himself? But how was she drawn? We read of no exalted revelation given to Ruth in the land of Moab. There seems to have been little, if any, manifestation of the God of Israel as wonderful and gracious in the early days of her life. No dream came to her in her sleeping hours which filled her with ecstasy through some splendid vision of things Divine. The revelation did not reach her in this fashion, but rather through the one simple appeal which the lonely lot of Naomi made to her heart. That which claimed her was a solitary woman's great need, and her heart responded. It was ready to fulfil the simple though hard duty of human love; and in this she showed that her nature was the fitting soil for the sowing of some heavenly seed. It was in simply doing the duty which her human love prompted her to do that she found the shelter of that God of Israel under whose wings she learned to trust. It is perfectly true, indeed, that love of man has as its foundation the love of God. There can be no human love but through and because of Divine love, and yet the discovery of that great fountain of universal love is made by many through the instrumentality of their own human love. It is not given to us to find the fountain first and the stream afterwards, but it is given to most of us to find the stream, and then to slowly track it to its source and find that its source is God. If Divine love is the source of human love, human love is often the means of discovering Divine love. There is one illustration of this in the Acts of the Apostles. Cornelius knows little of the great strength and the varied outpourings of Divine love, but he is a devout man who thinks kindly and provides generously for the needy who are round about him. His prayers and his alms—that is to say, his aspirations after what was good—and his loving tenderness to the needs of men were, in a sense, the preparation for the discovery of God's great love. He followed the tender and kindly instincts of human love, and he was the one to whom St. Peter was sent to declare that God was no respecter of persons, but that in every nation he that feared God and worked righteousness was accepted of Him.

In the Old Testament we find the same. The widow of Zarephath had a kindly heart, and with much self-denial supplied the needs of the stranger-prophet. To the woman who at much cost had followed the instinct of humanity, the revelation of a Divine love was given when her heart was gladdened by that power which gave her dead son back to life to her bosom.

And Christ sanctions the same. The Syro-Phœnician woman is guided to the feet of Christ through the yearning of the mother's heart which longs to see her daughter restored to life again. In following the promptings of human love she came face to face with that Divine love which called all men children, and did not refuse the crumbs of His mercy to the neediest and the most unworthy. The obvious duties of humanity and the natural stirrings of love, if traced to their source, cannot fail to lead us to Him who is their author and their life. It follows, then, that the best path in Christian life is not to be found in seeking out new and great ways, or in discovering, as we imagine, very spiritual duties for us to do; but it lies rather in doing simply, lovingly, and intelligently the plain and perhaps commonplace duties which are set before our hands. "Let them," says St. Paul, with a little touch of scorn, but with much good sense—"let them learn to show piety at home." He saw that there were people in his day who were anxious, restlessly anxious, for great spiritual things to do. But the mood to him was intolerable, because restless dissatisfaction is not one with the noble discontent which aspires to better things. It was rather self-pleasing eagerness and weak curiosity. It was the egotism which closes the eye to the venerable divinity of little things and to the heavenly light which shines upon the humblest duties. There are in the world many unknown heroes; there are hundreds of lives which are being lived with unrecognised courage in obscure corners. There are many who, like Ruth, are content to toil where duty has called them, satisfied in the humble task of working and winning bread for some loved one, or little comforts for the feeble and infirm. The world knows nothing of these, but these are they upon whose path the light of God shines more and more from day to day. These are they who will be known as heroes only when the perfect day of God dawns and puts out the petty lights of earth. That brighter day will show us that the sham jewels which dazzled with their brilliancy in the artificial light of conventional imagination cannot stand the test of the light of God. In that day only that which is true and real will stand in the light which will enable us to see God as He is, men as they are, and things as they are. We shall then learn that the things which abide are simple love, simple faith, simple truth, and simple duty faithfully done; for these things outlast all the glittering rubbish which mammon has been heaping up.

Thus from the story of Ruth we may learn that universal lesson that it is so easy to feel is true, but which it is so hard to make true in our lives—that the least thing may, after all, be the great thing; that a small duty may possess marvellous significance; that the cup of cold water to thirsty lips may carry refreshment which will last through eternity.

CHAPTER I.

THE CURATE MAKES A DISCOVERY.

HE Rev. Sydney Clare laid down his pen, pushed his manuscript from him, and leant back in his elbow-chair, waiting for his visitor to speak.

He was not kept waiting long.

"Is it permitted that the sheep speak their mind to the shepherd? Can the parson hear a sermon?"

Young Godfrey spoke in a loud, clear voice, and his eyes twinkled as he flicked with his riding-whip the booted leg which he had carelessly flung across its fellow.

The curate nodded, and smiled good-humouredly.

"Fire away, Austen," he said. "You will listen to me to-morrow, so you had better take your turn to-day."

The week-day preacher sprang from his seat, and planted himself upon the hearthrug. Fair and blue-eyed, with his handsome head flung back, and his figure drawn to its full height, Austen Godfrey was a specimen of young English manhood well worth looking at; and in his scarlet racing jacket he was seen at his best. It would have been hard to find a greater contrast than existed between him and his friend the curate. Clare was pale and narrow of chest, and there was already a stoop in his shoulders; indeed, he would have looked altogether commonplace but for his eyes. They were small, and dark, and deep-set, and, though they possessed none of Austen's frank open brightness, they burned with a strange inward fire which marked him out as an enthusiast.

The preacher from the hearthrug flourished his whip and began—

"For the maintenance of a sound mind, a man requires a sound body. The remark is not original, but I believe it is beyond dispute. My dear Sydney, why were you not on the course this morning?"

"Too busy."

"Nobody ought to be too busy to give his brain an airing; and a parson has less excuse than anybody else. We had a splendid run."

"Well, you see, I get my exercise in another way—the parish is tolerably wide. Besides, you know, I have views about horse-racing which we won't enter upon. They are as contemptible to you as—as—well, to be frank, Austen, as contemptible as yours are to me. It's a question of mind and morals. You think the one weak in me, I think the other weak in you, and we are not likely to agree."

Godfrey begged the question.

"The vicar was there," he said, "and so was Miss Nelly—looked charming, I assure you. What an uncomfortable thing a man's religion must be when it brings him to loggerheads with his own vicar and with his wife—who-is-to-be."

A look of pain passed across Clare's pale face.

"Nelly is very young," he said, "and I don't quarrel either with you or the vicar for not agreeing with me. If I did, I should have to quarrel with my two best friends."

"You're a good fellow, Clare!" cried Austen. "I only wish you could be a little more practical."

"Can the parson bear a sermon?"—p. 345.

"Explain yourself," said the curate. "Tell me why you think me unpractical."

"If I wanted an illustration, I don't expect I should have to look far," said Godfrey. "I expect that sermon of yours would furnish an example. What is it all about?"

Clare coloured painfully. He knew his friend far too well to feel any offence at his freedom of speech; but he was a shy man, and it was his habit to keep his "office" as much in the background as possible when he was not in the pulpit. Godfrey mistook his hesitation, and hastened to apologise.

"No, no, Austen," cried Clare, "I wouldn't have you think that I mind being criticised. You may see the text I have chosen."

He turned over the pages of his manuscript, and Godfrey, looking over his shoulders, read the words written at the top of the first sheet:—

"Whosoever smiteth thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also. And if any man would go to law with thee, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloke also. And whosoever shall compel thee to go one mile, go with him twain. Give to him that asketh thee, and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away."

Godfrey whistled softly to himself—a long, meditative whistle—and returned to his place on the hearthrug.

"Do you mean to say that you are actually going to preach from that text?" he asked.

"Yes. Why not?"

"Well, I grant that the proceeding is practical enough in one sense. If you believe it, you must preach it; but how can you believe it? The saying itself is about the most unpractical that was ever uttered."

"I am going to preach about it because I hope to prove the contrary," said Clare.

"Oh, yes—preaching and proving!" cried Godfrey, with a slight accent of scorn in his tones. "Anybody can preach and prove anything. The question is—Can it be done?"

"He did it."

"Who? Oh!—well, yes, I suppose He did; and we all know what came of it. Much the same thing would happen to anybody who followed His advice to-day."

"Well?" said Clare.

"Well?" repeated Godfrey, half-angrily. "The world can't afford to lose its heroes."

"I quite agree with you," answered the curate; "but the world never really has its heroes until it has crucified them."

Austen Godfrey did not answer, but he looked at his friend as a strong man may look at a delicate woman. Several times his lips parted as if about to speak, but he checked himself. He had a strangely tender affection for his old college friend, and it was seldom that he argued with him. Indeed, what good could come of opposing enthusiasm with logic? Just now it seemed as if it would be a little brutal. So Godfrey was silent.

He strolled to the window, and looked down into the vicarage garden.

"See here, Clare!" he cried. "While we are talking, the vicar is still airing his brain. And there is Miss Nelly among her flowers. If you properly appreciated your privileges, you would be down there with her. See! she is looking up here after you—the sunniest, brightest flower of them all."

The curate rose from his chair and approached the window. Over Godfrey's shoulder he caught sight of Nelly Chester's smiling face. She was still dressed in her riding habit, and, looking up from her flowers, she gaily waved her little gauntleted hand to the man in the racing jacket.

Godfrey made way for Clare, and the curate's black coat became visible at the window, side by side with the scarlet. Then Clare felt a great pain at his heart, as if it had been seized and suddenly compressed in a hand of iron; for, looking out of the window, he saw the light of gladness ebb from Nelly's face.

The two men turned and looked at each other, and each was troubled by what he saw. The curate saw an expression in Godfrey's eyes which he could not mistake, and Godfrey saw that his friend was pale with pain.

Godfrey's cheeks flamed scarlet as he met Clare's earnest gaze.

"I must be going, Sydney," he said, holding out his hand.

The curate took it in silence, and in silence he followed his friend down the stairs. A boy was leading a handsome hunter up and down before the door, and, as the two men appeared, he brought the animal to the steps.

Godfrey flung himself into the saddle, and, nodding to Clare, without another word rode away.

The curate watched him until his scarlet coat vanished like a flame of fire round the bend of the road; and then, with the same dull pain at his heart, he made his way round to the garden at the back of the vicarage.

CHAPTER II.

IN THE SUMMER-HOUSE.

THE Rev. Adolphus Chester was walking up and down his trimly kept garden-path with his hands clasped behind his back. The vicar's hair was white as frosted silver; but his cheeks were pink, his blue eyes were full and clear, and he did not look an old man. His figure was portly and his step firm; and, as he greeted his pale, narrow-chested curate, he looked the picture of good health and good humour.

"Ah, Clare, my boy!" he cried heartily. "So your conscience wouldn't let you come on the course this morning? If you'll take my word for it, that conscience of yours has been quarrelling with your liver, and it's out of temper. Give the liver a judicious course of dumb-bells, and I'll answer for the conscience being more reasonable. Why, bless my soul, boy! I made a better sermon in the saddle this morning than I ever made at my desk."

Clare smiled. In spite of their disagreements and their varying dispositions—perhaps because of them—he and the vicar were fast friends. But just now Clare did not feel inclined to continue the argument he had begun with Godfrey. The vicar saw him glance in Nelly's direction, and his blue eyes twinkled.

"Go and make your peace with the little girl," he said. "I can tell you she's mightily offended because you were not out to see her ride to-day. Young Austen said she was the best horsewoman on the course, and he wasn't far wrong. There, go away; you needn't mind me—I'm going in to dot down the heads of my sermon before I forget them."

Mr. Chester turned away, and when he had gone into the house Clare walked on down the path towards Nelly.

She came to meet him, and she held in her hand a single rose. It was a perfect bloom—a "Maiden's Blush"—exquisite in form and colouring, and she held it out for him to take; but she released her hold on the flower before his fingers had closed on it, and it fell. Clare snatched at it and caught it before it reached the ground; but he was too hasty, and he only grasped the stalk—the delicate petals fell in a fragrant shower upon the path at his feet.

"I'm so sorry!" he blurted out in his distress; and he swiftly concealed his hand behind his back.

He had torn it with the thorns upon the rose-stalk, and he feared Nelly might see that it was bleeding.

"How could you be so clumsy?" she cried petulantly.

"I don't know," he answered rather absently, and, looking into her face, which Austen had called "the sunniest and brightest" flower, he added, as if talking to himself, "It seems a pity to destroy anything so lovely."

"Of course, it does," answered Nelly. "What are you talking about, Sydney? Why do you look at me so strangely?"

"I want to talk to you, Nelly," he said. "Can you spare me a few minutes now?"

"I suppose so; but I hope you're not going to be dreadfully serious. It's not about the race, is it? I've had such a beautiful morning, and it will be very unkind of you if you spoil it all by telling me dreadful tales about gambling."

Nelly's face was flushed, and she spoke quickly.

"It isn't about the race," said Clare. "Let us go into the summer-house; it is rather hot out here."

Now for the first time Nelly looked up into his pale face, and what she saw there made her open her eyes wider and feel a little frightened.

dry tongue refused to obey his will. At the third trial the words came; but it seemed to him that his own voice sounded far away, hard and mechanical, as if it belonged to somebody else in whom he was not in the least interested.

"I want to tell you about a discovery I have made,

"The delicate petals fell in a fragrant shower."—p. 347.

"You are not ill, are you, Sydney?" she asked anxiously, laying her hand on his arm.

"Oh no, not at all; only a little troubled, Nelly. Will you come with me?"

Without another word she followed him down the pathway. When they reached the summer-house, he stood aside to let her pass in, and, motioning her to sit down on the little rustic seat, he took up his position against one of the door-posts.

She obeyed his sign, and her colour came and went painfully as she noticed the growing gravity of his expression.

Sydney Clare folded his arms tightly across his breast, trying to deaden the bitter pain at his heart. Twice he cleared his throat to speak, and twice his Nelly," he said. "It is something you may not know yet, but you will believe it when I tell you. If it has ever crossed your mind, you have put it away at once, because you have meant to be quite true and faithful to me. But it will not do, Nelly dear, to stifle the inner voices which try to tell what is going on within us. They can never be silenced for long, and if they speak too late their voices are very loud and full of terror."

"Sydney, tell me what you mean?" whispered Nelly, clasping her hands tightly and beginning to tremble.

"Nelly, we have both made a great, a terrible, mistake," said Clare; "we ought never to have promised to marry each other."

"Do you mean that you don't love me any longer?" she asked.

"No; I don't mean that. Think, Nelly, and you will know what I mean."

"You mean? Oh, Sydney! how can you think I don't love you? You are so good—so noble—so wise!"

"God forgive me, Nelly, for liking to know you believe what isn't true. I am neither good, nor noble, nor wise. Such things may well belong to a curate—or a brother, Nelly; but I am talking about a husband. There are husbands who are not noble and good, even very foolish men, and their wives have loved them better than you could ever love me, Nelly."

"Are you angry with me? Have I done anything to vex you?" she asked.

"No, dear; there is no room for anger. Don't you see it is all a miserable mistake? It is just like that beautiful rose. I did not mean to crush it, but I took hold of it wrongly and it was spoilt; and in the same way your fair, beautiful young life would be spoilt if I had it in my keeping—I see it all now. Try not to feel too sad about it. Let us resolve to put our mistake right before it is too late."

Nelly was weeping quietly to herself. Every word the curate spoke roused in her heart an echo of its truth. A sudden revelation broke upon her, and in its light she saw the meaning of the strange discontent which had lately oppressed her. In the midst of her genuine grief a great load seemed to be lifted from her heart, and she began to feel for Sydney Clare a love deeper and altogether different from anything she had ever felt for him before. Good, wise, noble!—yes, he was all that; but how glad she was that he would never be her husband; and yet how cruel and heartless it was to be glad when she was causing his true heart such pain. For something told Nelly that the mistake had been all on her side, and none of it on his. She knew that he would never cease to love her. The battle of conflicting feelings going on within her kept her from speaking. One instant the joy of her recovered liberty surged up in her heart, and it seemed that she was about to begin a new life full of sunshine and delight. Then she remembered the depth of the emotion she had caused in Sydney Clare on that day when she had promised to be his wife—an emotion she had never comprehended until now. She thought of the dull and lonely life he would live without her, and she was almost impelled to say the words which would bind her to him for ever.

But, before she could speak, Clare's voice broke the silence.

"Don't think me unkind, Nelly, if I say one thing more. It is on my heart, and I must say it."

He paused a moment, and then continued:

"Some day the right man will come to you—"

"Oh, Sydney! don't—please don't speak of such a thing!" cried Nelly, raising her head and looking at him with tearful eyes.

"I must say it—the right man will surely come—I don't think it will be very long."

The hot blood burned in Nelly's cheeks; she knew what he meant, and a second revelation flashed upon her, dazzling her with its brightness. The pressure at Clare's heart grew tighter; but he went on quite calmly—

"Don't let the remembrance of our mistake close your heart against the right man when he comes. He will be a good man, Nelly; listen to me, and remember my words as if they were the words of a brother who loves you. He will be a better son to your father than ever I could have been."

Nelly's burning face was buried in her hands, but she heard every word Clare said. When she looked up once more he was gone. She started to her feet to call him back, but checked herself when she caught the sound of his footsteps dying away down the garden path. She listened until she could hear them no more, and then she began to cry again—not bitter, passionate, or painful tears, but tears which flowed gently and comforted her heart, as warm summer showers refresh the thirsty earth.

CHAPTER III.

"THY CLOKE ALSO."

THE vicar ate his luncheon in solitary state that day. Nelly sent down word that she was resting in her own room, and she did not wish to be disturbed; and the servant who was sent in search of Clare returned with the report that he was nowhere to be found—that he had last been seen walking away from the vicarage in the direction of the common.

"Breezes!" whispered the Rev. Adolphus Chester to himself, as he half buried his smiling face in a foaming tankard. Then he carved himself a liberal supply of cold beef, propped the morning paper at a convenient angle against the cruet-stand, and began to read.

The vicar never allowed himself to be worried; it was bad for the digestion—and in this case there was no cause for worry. Breezes are good for the land—why not for lovers? Professionally, the vicar would have contented himself with the reflection that Abraham and Sarah had breezes. Practically, he would have remembered he and the late Mrs. Chester had had breezes, and were never the worse, as far as he knew. If Nelly and Clare were finding the atmosphere a little fresh just now, they must get acclimatised as their betters had done before them.

While the vicar read his paper and ate his lunch, his curate was walking swiftly away over the common. The day was hot, but the curate shivered; it seemed that he had stripped from his soul its warmest garment, and, as yet, he had not grown accustomed to the feeling of nakedness. Nay, just now, it seemed more than the chill of nakedness; the "lordly pleasure-house" which he had built for his soul's delight was in ruins, and, though his own hands had wrought the destruction, the sense of homelessness almost terrified him. Doubtless the Ark still sailed in safety somewhere upon the Flood; but there was a mist over the face of the waters, and he could not see it.

Sydney Clare walked on across the common, oblivious of the blinding glare of the sun, heedless of everything in his desire to get away. Nelly and the vicarage were soon left far behind; but, swiftly as he walked, he could not get away from him self. Like a man frantically endeavouring to jump off his own shadow, he again and again increased his pace; but with every fresh step he took, his mind was invaded by a new thought more bitter than the last. It is bracing to the nerves to watch the man of rock who stands squarely upon his feet, defying "the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune" to shake him from his solid base; but Clare, curate and religious enthusiast though he was, was of a very different nature. The capacity for a higher rapture always contains within itself the possibility of a deeper gloom. Well for him that at the sudden outburst of the unexpected storm, his heart had answered to the helm, and he had been able to play the part of a true man. Now, he was bearing the anguish of a weak one; but the mystical peace of the saint was not yet.

Leaving the common at length, the curate wandered along the bank of the stream which flowed through Squire Godfrey's meadows; and presently he entered the little belt of wood which divided the meadow-land from the park. It was when he reached the edge of this wood, and, looking across the stretch of velvety turf, caught the glimmer of the White House in the distance, that Clare at last paused. He leaned upon the park railings, and allowed his eyes to wander lingeringly over the green expanse, the swelling outline of foliage which marked the avenue, and upon the shining windows of the White House itself. It looked a lovely picture as it lay in the warm golden sunshine; the gilded vanes on the outbuildings twinkled brightly, the pigeons flew round and round in shining circles, and there was a cheery note in the stable clock as it chimed the hour.

This, then, was to be Nelly's home. Clare remembered the fancy-picture he had so often painted of the tiny vicarage where she was to reign as queen—a queen in a print dress, perhaps, but a queen crowned, sceptred, and enthroned by love. But it was not to be: the little vicarage would never know its queen. She was to be the proud mistress of the White House—Mrs. Austen Godfrey. Clare said the words audibly to himself, and, as he did so, his brain ceased to throb; his blood seemed drawn suddenly back into his heart and frozen there; and, with the eye of his mind turned inwards, Clare saw for a moment a darkness black as the mouth of the Pit. Then he withdrew from the open spaces and the sunshine, took one step backward into the wood, and, allowing the foliage to close like a screen around him, he fell upon his knees.

Not only for one brief moment did he kneel in the shadow; not only to utter a word or two of passionate ejaculation did his lips move in prayer. The voice of Science, preaching its sermon of inviolable law, was well known to him, and his mind appreciated its message; but there was something within him which still sent out a cry into the vast Unseen; and from the vast Unseen "a sound of gentle stillness" seemed to fall upon his spirit like the morning dew. In time, around the craters of extinct volcanoes the flowers bloom again; and slowly the fire died down in the curate's heart, and gave place to a holy calm, out of which new thoughts arose—the blossoming of heart's-ease. The stable clock chimed four quarters, and Sydney Clare still knelt and prayed.

When at last he was aroused, it was by the sound of a voice speaking close beside him. To fall suddenly, and without warning, from empyrean heights to the earth, is always a shock; but at the sound of that voice it seemed to Clare that he had not fallen upon the green earth of this little wood, but into the mud.

"Business is business, Mr. Austen Godfrey," said the voice; "and I don't mean to wait for my money much longer."

It was a hard and bitter voice, but the curate recognised it at once, although he had not heard it since his college days. Many a time had he pleaded against its hardness and bitterness for mercy to his friends; and he had always pleaded in vain. It was the voice of Mr. Isaacson, a rich Jew, who did much business at the universities. An hour ago the knowledge that Austen Godfrey was in Isaacson's clutches might have roused a demon in the heart of the curate; but now, the strength of old friendship had asserted itself, and the discovery came upon him with a shock of distress. Then came the thought, What should he do? The slightest movement would betray his presence to the speakers; he could not force his way through the thick undergrowth, and escape unseen into the wood; and if he stepped out into the pathway Austen must know that his secret had been overheard. While he was debating with himself what to do, young Godfrey spoke; and the curate remained in his concealment, with tingling cheeks, a shamefaced listener to the conversation.

"Why can't you wait till I come of age?" said Austen. "My uncle will increase my allowance, and I shall be able to settle up."

"It's rather too risky," returned Isaacson. "If there is any truth in reports, the old gentleman is thinking better of it, and means to bring a young wife to the White House."

"Nonsense!" cried Austen sharply. "My uncle hasn't the least thought of being married."

"Maybe no, maybe yes. Stranger things have happened, young sir; and I can't risk my money on the chances of Mr. Godfrey keeping single. If I go to him now, and tell him the whole story, he'll be feeling a bit soft about the disappointment he has in store for you. If I go later, when the deed's done, he'll be harder, and I may whistle for my money. It's my business to study character, and I don't want anybody to tell me when the iron's hot, or how soon it'll get cold. Of course, if you like to manage the business yourself, I'm willing to settle things comfortably. Bring me the thousand pounds in a month's time, or——"

"I tell you, I can't ask my uncle for fifty pounds, let alone a thousand," said Austen. "He made me a liberal allowance when I was at college, and if he finds I exceeded it, I may as well say good-bye to the White House. He has always vowed that he will never leave the place to a spendthrift; and I could never persuade him that I did not spend the money on my own pleasure."

"No, I desay not," returned Isaacson, with a sneer. "Men of the world find it hard to believe that youngsters help their unlucky friends to the tune of a thousand pounds, and go in debt for it, into the bargain. The yarn's too tall for a man of business, my boy."

"Keep a civil tongue unless you wish me to knock you down," said Austen quietly; and Clare could hear that his voice was shaking with passion. Then he added: "Get out of my sight before I am tempted to kick you. You shall have the money within a month."

"I thought I should teach you business, Mr. Austen. Be punctual, or——"

The hard, bitter voice of the money-lender ceased, and the sound of hasty footsteps fell upon Clare's ears. The curate peered cautiously over the bushes, just in time to see the fat figure of Mr. Isaacson in full flight down the pathway, and Austen Godfrey, shaking with laughter, following leisurely behind.

When they had both disappeared, Sydney Clare rose from his knees and returned to his old place at the park palings. The bright and sunny landscape remained unchanged; the restless rooks flapped their steady way across the blue, filling the air with their complaining cries; but the curate was blind and deaf to everything around him. His mind was troubled by what he had heard; and the more he thought about it, the more his anxiety increased. Squire Godfrey was old-fashioned; Austen was proud; Isaacson was merciless. The knowledge of these three facts oppressed the curate with a sense of impending trouble. He knew that it was impossible for Austen to raise a thousand pounds without applying to his uncle; and he knew that Austen was right in saying that such an application would mean "good-bye to the White House." The Squire would pay the debt for the sake of the family honour, and then, deaf to all explanations, he would point his nephew to the door.

"Give him thy cloke also!"

The curate started as if a voice had spoken close to his ear.

It was only a clause of the text he had chosen for to-morrow's sermon, which, by some freak of memory, had forced itself into a front place in his consciousness.

Such things happen every day to all of us; and we forthwith dismiss them, annoyed by their intrusion, and continue our interrupted lines of thought. Not so the mystic. Sydney Clare believed that a means of communication was open between him and the Unseen; and the voice he heard was authoritative. And not only were the words explicit, but their meaning—which might have been obscure to some men—was to him quite plain and unmistakable.

Instantly the whole man became transfigured. His face flushed, and his eyes brightened; his stooping shoulders grew straight; and, turning on his heel, the curate walked with a firm tread and a swinging pace through the wood and out into the high-road. Leaving the vicarage still behind him, he had not walked far before he was overtaken by a farmer in a light cart. The farmer drew rein.

"Are you going to Newborough, Mr. Clare?" he asked.

"Yes," answered the curate.

"Will you let me drive you in? It's hot walking in the sun."

In a moment Clare was sitting by the farmer's side, and the cart was bowling on its way; and half an hour later the curate, cheered and refreshed, was set down in the little market-town. The farmer had insisted upon taking him to the end of the journey; so Clare had told him his destination, and when he stepped out of the cart he found himself facing a little green door ornamented by a shining plate of "It was about Nelly I came to speak to you."—p. 354.

brass, bearing the name of "Jasper Greed, Solicitor."

In answer to Clare's ring, the door was opened by a grey-headed old gentleman with a firm mouth and a pair of kindly blue eyes.

"Ha, Sydney, my boy, I'm glad to see you! Another minute, and I should have been gone—we close early on Saturday. Come in, come in!"

Grasping the curate cordially by the hand, the old man drew him into a dusty little office, and pushed him into a seat.

"I won't keep you more than a few minutes, Mr. Greed," said Clare. "I have to get back to the vicarage as soon as possible, for I haven't finished to-morrow's sermon yet. I have come about a little matter of business."

The lawyer sat down in his own chair, and prepared himself to listen.

"You won't like what I am going to say," continued Clare; "so it will save time to tell you that I have quite made up my mind."

"You mean," said Mr. Greed, "that if I won't do your business for you, you will find somebody else who will?"

"Forgive me—yes," answered Clare. "It is important; and you must take my word for it that I have considered the matter well."

"Go on, sir; go on," said the lawyer in grim displeasure. "I suppose you wish to make over your money to a missionary society—pray don't think I'm surprised!—give your orders, Mr. Clare; and I will obey them."

Clare laughed uneasily.

"No," he said, "it's not that. I want to lend some money."

"May I ask if the securities are good—as a matter of curiosity, I mean?"

"Well, yes, they are good enough for me. They are moral securities."

The old lawyer sniffed.

"And the amount of the loan?" he asked.

"A thousand pounds."

"Just about the amount your shares will sell out at. You mean to depend entirely upon your curacy in future."

"Yes."

"And you are going to be married, I believe?"

"No, I am not," answered Clare quickly. "I want this money paid over to a Mr. Isaacson in the name of Mr. Austen Godfrey. Tell me, Mr. Greed, is it possible for you to arrange matters so that Austen does not know who has paid the money?"

The lawyer leant back in his chair, speechless. Seeing that some explanation was necessary before the legal mind would get into working order again, Clare gave the old man a brief account of the discovery he had made in the wood. While he listened, the lawyer's face became the scene of a curious battle. The firmness of his mouth fought desperately to overcome the kindly expression of his eyes; but by the time Clare had finished, the tight lips had relaxed, and the blue eyes were beaming mild victory.

"You have quite made up your mind, my boy?"

"Quite."

"Then I will settle the matter for you."

The old man's eyes glistened; but to cover their weakness, his mouth suddenly snapped like a steel trap.

"When you want to join the Mormons, or indulge in any other little freak of enthusiasm, I hope you will come to me," he said. "I assure you it's quite impossible for you to surprise me."

Clare rose laughing, and grasped the lawyer's hand.

The sun had sunk by the time the curate reached the vicarage; and, finding his way unnoticed up to his study, he sat late into the night writing his sermon.

CHAPTER IV.

THE SERMON—AND AFTER.

It was Sunday evening; the last notes of the hymn still echoed in the roof of the church, and the Rev. Sydney Clare stood in the pulpit facing his congregation. From the sea of heads beneath him, several faces seemed to start out into greater prominence than usual to-night as he glanced round. There was Nelly's face in the vicarage pew, pale and strained with an unnatural eagerness; and at a little distance the old Squire and Austen Godfrey sat side by side; while far down towards the back appeared the face of Jasper Greed, critical yet kindly. They were all actors—two of them unconscious actors—in the little drama of the Hidden Life, for which Clare's soul supplied the stage.

The curate read his text, and stretched out his hand towards the sermon-case which lay on the desk before him. Then a strange thing happened. A sudden and uncontrollable impulse made him push the sermon case aside unopened; and, for the first time in his life, he began to preach without his manuscript. A fire burned in his heart, and words, unsought, rushed to his unready lips. All hesitation, diffidence, and fear vanished from his mind; a Voice—the same Voice which had spoken to him yesterday—whispered in his ear, "Would that all the Lord's people were prophets," and, forthwith, a great calm fell upon his spirit.

"Whosoever smiteth thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also." Practical maxims fly farthest when they are winged with hyperbole." Clare began by showing that the essence of his text was a doctrine so well known and generally approved that it has become a neglected truism. Never retaliate; be generous, having a disposition to exceed the most exacting demands; kill evil with goodness; drive away darkness with light. Such simple maxims as these, which no moralist can safely gainsay, are mere restatements of the text—a text which, perhaps more than any other, has received condemnation as a piece of impossible enthusiasm. To-day, whether consciously or not, the Sermon on the Mount is being ratified by the signature of Science. Clare here gave a graphic description of the working of the Elmira Reformatory of New York. Here criminals, who have for years been borrowing from society, robbing society, and smiting the cheek of society, are receiving larger loans and the "cloke also" at the hands of society: society is turning the other cheek to the smiter; and the criminals, treated carefully as moral invalids, are becoming honest men. Then, having painted his picture upon the imaginations of his hearers, Clare left the object-lesson, and began to call the long muster-roll of the world's heroes, bidding them one by one stand forth and attest the truth of his text. "The true kings of the world march through all history in royal progress—a procession of heavy-laden men bearing their own crosses; and the Lord Christ walks at their Sydney Clare ceased; and he knew that he had preached his last sermon in Mr. Chester's church.

As the vicar sat in his cosy study, smoking his after-supper cigar that night, there came a knock at his door.

"Come in," said Mr. Chester rousing himself from his lazy contemplation of the smoke spirals which floated above his head; and Clare entered.

"At the sound of footsteps the dying man opened his eyes."—p. 355.

head. The throne of humanity is set for evermore in the Place of the Skull. Job clinging fast to his righteousness on his dung-heap, Prometheus defying tyranny from the iron crags of Caucasus, are but poetical foregleams of Calvary; and from the light of Calvary the beacon-fires of sacrifice have been flashing along the hill-tops of all succeeding time, giving notice that the high-embattled walls of Selfishness have fallen." With a few earnest words of personal application, hinting at the Gethsemane and the Calvary which await every true soul, and calling his hearers to accept at once the law of sacrifice under which, be it soon or late, all the children of men must bow,

"Sit down, Sydney, sit down!" cried the vicar heartily. "Why didn't you come in to supper? A bit knocked up after preaching, eh? I didn't know you were coming out as an orator; that was a remarkable sermon of yours, my boy—perhaps a trifle too exalted, if I may say so—most of us are commonplace people, dwelling in the flats, and we can't bear too much mountain-air, you know; but you can preach, Sydney, you can preach. I can tell you, I felt proud of you to-night, my boy; and Nelly was proud of you too—the excitement has quite upset her, poor child!"

Clare knew from experience that it was useless to interrupt the vicar, so he stood leaning against the chimney-piece, while the old man rambled on. At the first pause he said:—

"It was about Nelly I came to speak to you."

"You have been having a difference of opinion, I suppose?" broke in the vicar. "What of that? Differences! why, sir, Mrs. Chester and I always had differences of opinion, and they did us good, and prevented either of us from getting too conceited."

"This is a difference which cannot be easily settled," said Clare gravely; "and Nelly and I have decided that our engagement had better come to an end."

"Nonsense!" cried Mr. Chester, his rosy cheeks suddenly deepening into purple. "You will settle matters comfortably in a few days. I'm ashamed of you, Sydney, 'pon my word I am—a clergyman, fresh from preaching a sermon like that, how can you dare to indulge in such an unforgiving spirit? I daresay the little girl has been very foolish—it's the nature of little girls, and the sooner you find it out the better. She'll be sorry enough directly; and, if you're the man I take you for, you won't be hard on her."

"Hard on Nelly!" said Clare, with a sad smile. "Who could be hard on Nelly? But you mistake, sir: it is I who need forgiveness. Owing to my foolish haste and forgetfulness that she was so young, I allowed Nelly to engage herself to me before she properly knew her own mind. She knows it now, and she must be free to love where she can. Her choice will be a good one."

The curate bent down, and added something in a low voice.

The vicar started.

"Austen!" he exclaimed. "Are you sure of what you say, Sydney?"

"Quite; I could not be mistaken. You have only to wait a few months, and all will be well. No man could make Nelly a better husband; she will be very happy."

"And you, Sydney?"

"I have thought about the matter carefully; and I must go away. It will be better for us all. I shall be glad of your advice, for I do not wish to take another curacy. I have decided to go to Africa."

"As a missionary!"

"Yes," said Clare; "and I want your influence in the right quarter, so that I can go soon."

For once the talkative vicar was at a loss for words. It cannot be said that the prospect of Austen Godfrey for a son-in-law was an unpleasant one to him; and the thought of Nelly as the future mistress of the White House was, on the whole, most satisfactory; but Mr. Chester felt decidedly uncomfortable. The presence of this grave young curate, with the pale face and deep, bright eyes, was a rebuke to all his thoughts of worldly advantage. Several times during the evening sermon the vicar had shifted uneasily on his seat; but now he felt that the sermon had taken bodily form before him, and he could no longer laugh off its effect, or talk about rhetoric and youthful enthusiasm. This man was not only giving up his wife, but the snug living as well; for the living was in Mr. Chester's gift; and only a week ago he had told his curate to prepare for its acceptance on his wedding-day.

"Look here, Sydney!" he cried. "Why can't you make up your mind to stay here?—I mean to retire, and the living's yours if you'll take it. You mustn't let this mistake ruin your life."

"I won't!" said Clare. "Men are needed in Africa, and you will easily find somebody to take my place here—somebody to whom Nelly can listen without pain."

"Nothing that I can say will alter your resolve?" said Mr. Chester.

"No, I think not. That you will add to your past kindness by helping me to get away soon is all I ask."

"That's easily managed," returned the vicar gloomily. "They always want money as well as men; and, as I suppose you mean to embark your money in the scheme, they will naturally give you advantages. I daresay you may pretty well name your own locality and your time for starting."

"I think we must leave the money out of the question," said Clare.

The vicar glanced at him sharply, but did not question him.

After this the two men began to talk over the details of the arrangement; and an hour slipped away before Clare rose to go.

Mr. Chester followed him to the door, and grasped him warmly by the hand.

"My boy," he said, "you should have stayed with us longer. We shall not know what we have lost until you are gone."

To Clare the words were more than mere words of kindness; and he passed out with the warm glow of friendship in his heart.

And the vicar returned to his seat and mechanically took up his cigar; but he laid it aside again unlighted, and sat on in deep thought.

And as he thought his eyes rested upon the picture of the thorn-crowned Man of Sorrows which hung on the opposite wall—

"ECCE HOMO."

CHAPTER V.

"SUNSET AND EVENING STAR."

TEN years later.

It was evening in Africa—one of those bright and glorious evenings so common in the tropics, when it seems as if the great sun itself must have burst in the western sky, spilling its golden splendour all over the world. Sky and land were one blaze of gold; the palms stood motionless, plumes of gold in the stillness; and the river lay like a plate of pure gold, burnished to a dazzling brilliancy.

In the creek of the river a little steamer was moored, and on the shore, clustering down to the water's edge, were hundreds of native huts which looked like monster bee-hives of bright gold.

In the midst of the huts there stood a large, barn-like building, with a sloping roof, surmounted by a tiny bell-tower.

There was little movement to be seen in the village, and but for the flitting to and fro of a few dark-skinned figures on the river's bank, and the slow padding form of a man dressed in white on the steamer, it might have been a village of the dead.

But, stay! from out of the grove of palm-trees another figure stepped—the figure of a man hastening down the slope towards the creek—a magnificent-looking man, sunburnt and brown-bearded. He wore a white helmet and a shooting-coat, on his shoulder he carried a rifle, and his boots told the tale of a long and weary journey.

As he neared the river, the man on the steamer saw him, and, springing ashore, went to meet him.

A look of disappointment sprang into the traveller's blue eyes as he took the hand which was outstretched towards him.

The man in the white linen suit was young, and he scanned the stranger's face eagerly.

"Welcome, whoever you are!" he cried, and then added, with a sigh hastily checked, "It is good to see a white face."

"Thank you," returned the traveller, courteously; but there was an absent look in his eyes as he glanced swiftly in the direction of the village. "You are a missionary?"

"Yes."

"Then you can tell me if Sydney Clare is here? I was directed to this station."

A shadow fell upon the missionary's face.

"Are you a friend of Clare's?" he asked.

"Yes—is he here? Tell me—is anything wrong? You don't mean——"

"No, he is with us at present; but——"

"You mean that he is ill—dying?"

The missionary laid his hand on the stranger's arm.

"I will take you to him," he said; and then, as he led the way among the native huts, he continued: "Sir, your friend is a noble man. You will be proud of him when you know his story."

"I know—I know," answered the other. "Is it fever?"

"No," said the missionary—"it is murder! But here is the place—you would like to see him at once?"

As he spoke he lifted the mat which hung before the entrance of a large hut, and signed to his companion to enter.

The stranger obeyed, and by the light which poured in a golden stream through an opening in the roof, he saw another figure in white kneeling beside a mat couch, supporting on his arm the head of a dying man; and at a distance an old native woman sat upon the floor rocking herself backwards and forwards, moaning piteously.

At the sound of footsteps the dying man opened his eyes. He gave no start of surprise, but his bright eyes grew brighter still, and he cried—

"Austen!"

"Sydney!" exclaimed the stranger, and, pushing his rifle into his companion's hand, he swiftly crossed the floor of the hut, and fell upon his knees beside the couch.

"You will give him up to me, won't you?" he said to the kneeling missionary; and in another instant Clare's head was resting upon his shoulder.

"It was good of you to come, Austen; I am so glad you were in time."

"How could I stay away, Sydney? I started to come to you directly I knew the truth. Mr. Greed is dead, and before he died he sent for me and told me that it was you who helped me in my greatest need."

"It was nothing: I was only obeying orders: and you had brought yourself into the need by doing the same thing," said Sydney. "But don't let us talk about it now; there is no time, and I want to know about Nelly."

"She is well," said Godfrey; "and she sent her dear love to you. She would have come herself if it had not been——"

"Yes, yes," cried Clare eagerly; "you have children. Tell me about them, Austen."

"A son and a daughter," said Godfrey, with a touch of pride in his tones. "We have called our boy Sydney, and our girl is named Clare."

A deep flush of pleasure came into Clare's pale cheeks. He closed his eyes, and his lips moved; and Godfrey knew that he was praying for the children.

Presently Godfrey said, "The children hear a great deal about you, Sydney; and I came hoping that I might persuade you to come back with me. Oh, Sydney!" he cried passionately, "why have you sacrificed your life among these savages!"

"Hush!" said a deep voice beside them; and, looking up, Godfrey met the eyes of the missionary who had been kneeling beside Clare when he entered. They were eyes as bright with enthusiasm as Clare's own.

"Our friend has laid down his life that they may be savages no longer," he said; "and, by the grace of God, we believe that by his death he has opened the eyes which were too blind to see his life."

"God grant it," said Clare faintly, and Godfrey's voice was added to the solemn "Amen" of the two missionaries.

After this Clare did not speak much more. He sent his love to his friends in England, and then he lay still in Austen's arms; and, while the square of gold in the roof gradually paled, his life slowly ebbed away. When the sun sank he died.

Godfrey laid his body down upon the bed, and the three men knelt beside it, the elder missionary praying aloud. With a bitter cry the old negro woman left the hut; and a moment later the wailing of a hundred voices rang through the village.

"Hark!" said the elder of the missionaries. "It is well said 'The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the Church.' For nearly ten years Clare has been labouring to break the power of idolatry in this place, and by his life he only succeeded in making the people angry enough to kill him. Now he is dead they begin to know him."

Then Godfrey remembered some words of Sydney Clare's, spoken to him long ago—"The world never really has its heroes until it has crucified them." And the sudden twilight of the tropics fell upon them like the downrush of a purple curtain veiling the golden afterglow of the sunset; flashing hosts of worlds became visible in the deep spaces of the night, and the death of the day was forgotten in the glory which followed it.

MISTRESS CRUMPLEHORN'S OPINION.

A PARABLE FROM NATURE. BY ALFRED J. BAMFORD.

LD Mrs. Crumplehorn was about as wise a cow as one would find in a day's journey, with a faculty of observation keen enough to have done credit to a human scientist.

And she looked it. It is true she could not boast much beauty of feature or grace of form, and would not have taken a prize at a cattle show. Indeed, it would have been a task to decide in what class to have placed her. She was neither a Shorthorn nor a Hereford, nor a Sussex nor an Alderney, nor any other breed in particular, but a general mixture of them all. Still, if she lacked the special "points" that would be expected in a cow of any one of these special breeds, she had a robustness of constitution and sanity of mind, not to say an opinionated self-complacency, that were perhaps the results of the admixture of blood. She was good-tempered too, as long as no one crossed her purpose or contradicted her.

It was a beautiful summer day, and old Mistress Crumplehorn and a number of other cows were lying in a pleasant meadow, sheltered by a spreading oak from the heat of the sun. They were the very embodiment of contentment and comfort as they lay chewing the cud with their eyes half-closed, free from any suggestion of trouble beyond the intrusion of the flies, and these were far from being as numerous and irritating as sometimes.

Two men, on their way to their work after their mid-day hour's rest, passed through the field. Old Mistress Crumplehorn was dimly aware of their presence, rather by hearing their voices than by seeing them.

"Queer creatures, these men!"

The old cow did not address this remark to any one of the others, for converse—save of the laziest sort—does not seem fitting when cows are sleepily chewing the cud. She was rather thinking aloud than intending to initiate a conversation, thinking and speaking with herself. So she said, half-unconsciously, "Queer creatures, these men!"

But young Mistress Polehead, a sprightly and forward Norfolk heifer, promptly challenged the assertion with a "Why?" that was not so much uttered in a tone of inquiring interrogation as in that of critical scepticism.

"Why?" began Mistress Crumplehorn, repeating the question as though she meant to give a reason.

Then she hesitated at the feeling of indignation at any opinion of hers being called in question got the better of her, and, instead of explaining, she said, with a superior air of combined contempt and pity: "But a young cow without horns might as well be without brains."

Mistress Polehead was not to be so easily silenced. "If brains must correspond with horns," retorted she, "it might even be as well to go without them altogether as to have them made to match as crooked a pair as your ladyship's."

The other cows had opened their eyes by this time, and a quiet smile went round, for truly Mistress Crumplehorn most fully merited her name.

She affected not to notice the younger cow's reply, and not feeling sure that she was going to worst her in the threatened passage of wits, checked the conversation from proceeding further along that line by expressing, for the general benefit, the thoughts that, passing through her mind, had led to her exclamation.

"Think how they behave themselves! They hate good grass—the only thing worth living for. And, moreover, this is not their misfortune in never having seen it. One could understand their not appreciating the value of what they had never seen."

"But," said Mistress Mildeyes, a cow almost as old as Mistress Crumplehorn, "are you sure that they hate good grass? I admit I never saw one of them eat a mouthful in my life; but then, I feel we know so very little about them. We cannot tell what they do when they are out of our sight."

"Nonsense!" exclaimed Mistress Crumplehorn, a little ruffled at this question and remark, since Mistress Mildeyes never presumed on her practical equality in age, and usually deferred to her too fully to allow even a question. "Nonsense! Whatever can you mean by saying we know so little about them? Why! where have your eyes been all these years, if that be true? If you had used them you would have known a good deal about them by your time of life; as, I venture to assert, I do."

"But," interposed Mistress Mildeyes, "you know how we live day after day, either in this field or in Deep Cut Meadow, or else shut up in the shed. What chance have we of studying beings who are so much more out of our sight than in it?"

"What chance"? Why! the very things you have spoken of might supply an answer to your question. You do not need to be told that we never go from field to field, or from field to shed, except as one of these men goes with us. Here in these goings to and fro we have repeated chances of studying what men are like, surely."

"They are poor chances for me," replied Mistress Mildeyes. "Somehow, whenever we are being driven from one place to another, I am much too nervous and perplexed to think of the tastes of our driver. Besides, though I know that he is never at such times to be seen eating grass, what does that prove? We ourselves are not eating grass then, yet that fact certainly does not prove our dislike of it."

"Well, why cannot you study them in quiet opportunities, when your mind is calm and you are not being driven to and fro? For example, think what children run back into the path and most likely out of the field altogether, evidently assured, in spite of all evidence to the contrary, that the grass is most dangerous and hurtful. Moreover, while they are on the grass you can notice, if you care to, that it is not the good wholesome grass itself that they are

"Shouting at them to get off the grass" can be seen from my field here."

She had a way of speaking of anything that was for the common use of all as though it were specially hers, and all the enjoyment others might derive from its use was by her favour. "This field is covered with the most beautiful rich grass and herbage. We, knowing how good it is, remain contentedly in it. But do we see men in it? There, beyond that hedge, is a hard stony road, painful to walk on, most inconvenient, yet of those men who do come into the field scarcely any ever come off the dry, bare path.

"Yes, I acknowledge," said Mistress Mildeyes, "that I have noticed that men seldom come upon the grass, though many pass along the dusty road outside. But I have observed children come away from the path on to the grass."

"And if your observing had been a little more accurate," said Mistress Crumplehorn, taking the other up rather sharply, "you would have seen more. You would have seen the children on the grass where there was hope that their inherited feeling of objection to it would be corrected; and then you would have seen or heard one of the full-grown men shouting at them to get off the grass as excitedly as though they were in danger of being poisoned or injured in some way; and, forthwith, the interested in, but the useless daisies and the bitter buttercups. No, I repeat that men are queer creatures, who do not know, and will not learn, what is good. And I speak after a life of careful observation. I have seen that they dislike and fear the sweet fresh grass. Poor creatures, how I pity them!"

And old Mistress Crumplehorn, in blissful ignorance of laws of trespass, and notice-boards threatening prosecution, and other conveniences or arrangements belonging to human life and conduct, proceeded to chew the cud with an air of supreme self-satisfaction. She had proved her case, had pronounced a word that was final, admitting of no reply, requiring no comment. Like the rest of us, she did not know how much she did not know. Seeing some facts so clearly, and inferring others so immediately, she was apt to overlook the distinction between the two classes, and to assert as a fact of observation what was after all but an inference. And there was not a companion cow in the meadow who could put her right.

SOME DANGER-SIGNALS.

BY THE REV. J. HILES HITCHENS, D.D., AUTHOR OF "PERFECT THROUGH SUFFERING,"
"A MINISTERING ANGEL," ETC. ETC.

FROM the cradle to the grave there is not a moment when we are perfectly secure from peril. Physically, mentally, and spiritually, we are in jeopardy every hour. Step after step has to be taken with the utmost caution. No day dawns in which the pilgrim can, with immunity, cease his vigilance.

God has set up His warnings in the life-path. By the voice of nature, the voice of Providence, the voice of Revelation, and the voice of experience, He says to all, "Take heed!" And man has nobly followed in his Maker's steps in this respect. On all hands we find the word "Caution" largely writ. You cannot purchase a destructive medicine without considerable difficulty, and then the bottle is labelled "Poison." You cannot travel by the Metropolitan Railway without deciphering inside the carriage the words, "Wait till the train stops." You cannot enter an omnibus or a crowded hall without being told to "Beware of pickpockets." You see a tattered green flag rising out of the water as you sail down the Thames. On it is the word "Wreck." It is there to prevent any boats or barges being steered in that direction, to their injury. Here and there on all our railway lines are lamps or semaphore signals. They are constructed and cautiously worked, night and day, to preclude collisions. The mariner's chart, too, is minutely marked with indications where, in the wide ocean, are sunken rocks, sand-reefs, or dangerous currents; and no wise and careful captain will be indifferent to the warning.

I desire, in this paper, to put up danger-signals in our militant way—to point out where and what are the special perils to which every reader is exposed.

The first peril to which I refer is indolence. By it I mean the absence of any profitable pursuit in life: the spending of days and hours without attempting or achieving aught that can benefit self or be of permanent value to the race. A man may be without employment, so far as the profession or business in which he has been trained is concerned, and yet not be idle. Misfortune may remove him from the desk or the counter, where he has been accustomed to spend his days, and he may have to wait long before another kindred opening is procured, but all the while he may be usefully employed. On the other hand, a man may be constantly on the move, fussy and flurried from sunrise to sunset; he may travel much and talk more, and appear to others to be overwhelmed with engagements, and yet be in reality only an idler—leading a useless, profitless, objectless life.

A clergyman, not long since, stopped at the house of a rich man, and took the opportunity of conversing with the eldest son, who was destined to be an hereditary legislator. Asking as to the character of his studies, the youth replied: "Formerly I used to study beetles and butterflies, but now I give all my mind to beetles." What was such a life but one of indolence? A mind all given to beetles was a poor preparation for the beetling rocks of difficulty so numerous in life's journey.

You will find indolence face you in many forms. It will come in the form of slumber—a temptation to indulge in sloth—an inclination to turn in your bed when it is time to turn out. Hence, when you rise, the best and brightest portion of the day is gone, and little, if anything, of value can be achieved in the remaining hours. It will come in the form of gossip—a temptation to enter a neighbour's house or office, and discuss everyone's duty but your own. It will come in the shape of fashionable lounging—a temptation to parade the business streets, or saunter in the Park, or spend the day in a series of empty visits, and the night in attending some ball or opera. But in whatever form the temptation may come, I beseech you to avoid it: it will be detrimental to your progress in life; it will weaken your character; it will ruin your happiness. As naturally as "worms" are generated in a stagnant pool, so will evil thoughts be begotten by an unoccupied mind. An "idle brain is the devil's workshop." I do not believe that it is an absolute love of vice, an inherent criminality of disposition, that prompts men to evil, gluts our galls, and crowds our convict stations. It is a love of idleness and aversion to toil, a succumbing to sloth, that throws open the gates of Mansoul to the deadly foes—falsehood, dishonesty, fraud, and debauchery. If you would be happy, be active; and if you would be successful in any walk of life, avoid indolence.

There is another peril closely allied to this: namely, inconstancy—a temptation to change. No feather was ever so easily blown to and fro as some men are made to change in their opinions and pursuits. Converse with them to-day, and they fully endorse your views; take a very opposite line of thought to-morrow, and they equally approve.

A man who owned a parrot taught it to say, "There's no doubt about it." One day the owner resolved to sell his bird, and for this purpose he took it to the market-place. "Who will buy my bird? only two pounds," he said. A passer-by, pleased with the appearance of the parrot, said, "Poll, are you worth so much?" "There's no doubt about it," said Poll. Gratiſied by the little creature's apparent intelligence, the admirer paid the two pounds and took the bird home. Some days afterwards he was standing near the cage, talking to himself aloud, when he said, "What a fool I was to give two pounds for that bird!" "There's no doubt about it," cried Poll. In like manner there are men who agree with everything you say or do. Chameleon-like, their sentiments are all colours in a few hours. Hence, they are inconstant in their pursuits. For a season they will adopt one line of business; then, wearied of it, they will change for another. For a few months they will devote themselves to science, then they will feel a special calling toward art; ultimately they are convinced that a literary life is best adapted to their qualifications. Starting in the provinces, they become imbued with the idea that they shall do better in London. After a year or two of life in the metropolis, they conceive the fancy for emigration; and when they have crossed the ocean, you hear of them roving from one place to another.

I beg you to remember that such inconstancy is fatal to all success in life. No man has ever made his mark without determined perseverance. When Edison paid a recent visit to this country, he was interviewed as to his career, when he described the prolonged toil by which he succeeded in making his phonograph reproduce the silibant sound. He stated that from eighteen to twenty-four hours a day for over seven months he worked on one single word: "Specia." Said he: "I had said into the phonograph, 'Specia, specia, specia,' but the instrument responded, 'Pecia, pecia, pecia.' It was enough to drive me mad. But I held firm, and I have succeeded." That is the spirit that conquers difficulties, and wins the crown of reward. Do not be easily diverted from the noble purposes you have before you. Remember how, after the execution of Louis XVI., Marat exclaimed, "There is no going back now; we must either prevail or perish!" Remember how Mirabeau, when mounting the tribune for a crucial effort, said to a friend, "I must come hence either in triumph or else torn in fragments." Remember how a greater than either of these said, "None of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I may finish my course with joy." But especially remember how the Highest of the high, the Noblest of the noble, said, "I have a baptism to be baptised with, and how am I straitened till it is accomplished!" In that spirit of undaunted determination and all-conquering consecration go to your life-task—especially to your spiritual obligations and engagements—and you shall not fail.

Another peril in your course is intemperance. You, dear reader, have been tempted to undue indulgence, but you boast to-day that you have your appetites and passions under full control. But take heed. Self-reliance has failed thousands of times. Those who were once as decided in their denunciations of intemperance as you, have ultimately become the willing votaries of the vice. Space fails me to tell of the talented and famous men who have fallen by intemperance—men whose barques sailed safely and honourably over the solemn main of life till they struck this ruinous rock. When Dean Swift dined with Addison and Stuart, he says: "I left them half-fuddled." After Sheridan had electrified the House of Commons by one of his eloquent speeches, he was picked up in the streets in a disgraceful state of intoxication. Robert Fergusson, the Poet-Laureate of Edinburgh, lost his reason and found an early grave by excessive indulgence. Burns drank to such an extreme that he was discovered sleeping in the open air, and death ensued in a few months. Edgar Allan Poe, on the night before he should have been married was so intoxicated that he committed a breach of the peace, and fell into the hands of the police. And what a painful tale is the "Confession of a Drunkard," by Charles Lamb! Aye, and we are familiar with the names of men now living who might have risen to undying fame, exerted an influence for good far-reaching in duration, and amassed a competency for themselves and families, but for their intemperance. There has been a recent discovery by which a certain magnifying-glass enables the holder to see clearly the sunken vessels at the bottom of the quiet deep. I cannot by any such means show you the moral and physical wrecks in the ocean of life; but I can show you the cause of fully two-thirds of the wrecks. I would fain put the glass of observation in your hand, in order to keep another glass out of your grasp. And I say with Longfellow, who, lamenting the early death of that German author, Hoffman—another genius destroyed by drink—says: "From the lives of such men we learn that mere pleasant sensations are not happiness; that sensual pleasures are to be drunk sparingly, and, as it were, from the palm of the hand; and that those who bow down upon their knees to drink of these bright streams that water life are not chosen of God either to overthrow or to overcome!"

There are many other perils against which I would affectionately warn you, but I cannot omit one which is too seldom referred to: I mean insincerity. The origin of the word "sincerity" is profoundly interesting and suggestive. When Rome flourished, when her fame was spread the world over, when the Tiber was lined with noble palaces built of choicest marbles, men vied with each other in the construction of their habitations. Skilful sculptors were in request, and immense sums of money were paid for elaborate workmanship. The workmen, however, were then guilty of practising deceitful tricks. If, for example, they accidentally chipped the edges of the marble, or if they discovered some conspicuous flaw, they would fill up the chink and supply the deficiency by means of prepared wax. For some time the deception could not be discovered; but when the weather tested the buildings, the heat or damp would disclose the wax. At length, those who had determined on the erection of mansions introduced a binding clause into their contracts to the effect that the whole work from first to last was to be sine cerâ—that is, “without wax.” Thus we obtain our word sincerity. To be sincere is to be without any attempt on our part to mislead, misrepresent, deceive, or impose on another: to be, and appear to be, what we are: to say what we mean, and mean what we say.

Insincerity dogs the steps of every pilgrim in life in two forms: in the shape of truthlessness, lying, and exaggeration, and in the form of hypocrisy.

There are scores of ways in which men shamefully exaggerate or deliberately lie every day of the week. And such a habit grows by indulgence, till the liar finds ultimately that he is notorious for his falsehood, and cannot obtain credit even when he speaks the truth. How caustic were the few words with which Sir Henry Hawkins, the judge, dismissed a prisoner the other day. A fellow was arraigned on a charge of larceny. When he first appeared in the dock he pleaded “guilty.” Doubtless, he then told the truth. Presently, thinking in his low cunning that there might be a chance of getting acquitted, he withdrew the “guilty” and said he was “not guilty.” The case was tried, and the jury gave a verdict in the prisoner’s favour. Then Sir Henry Hawkins, in a clear, keen, scathing voice, said: “Prisoner, a few minutes ago you said you were a thief; now the jury say you are a liar. Consequently, you can depart!” How much better, by strict adherence to fact, by faithfully keeping one’s promises, and by manifest integrity, to win and preserve the confidence of friends and acquaintances. It is narrated of Petrarch, the famous Italian poet, that when once summoned as a witness in a court of justice, he prepared, according to the prevalent custom, to take the oath. But the judge, putting down the book, said: “As to you, Petrarch, your word is sufficient.” We want such men in these days—men whose word is sufficient: men who employ words to unfold, not conceal, their meaning: to enlighten, not to deceive.

And insincerity is encountered in the form of hypocrisy. The age is one of shams. It is fashionable to deal in make-ups. Reality is rare. Veneer, lacquer, tinsel abound. Things are not always what they seem. Men profess to be what they are not, and to possess and feel what they do not. Frith, in his “Reminiscences,” tells how the artist Creswick always carried his sketch-book about with him, and how he was once sketching on board a Rhine steamer when a gentleman came and overlooked him, and then sauntered away to the other end of the vessel. Creswick also just then removed his position, and was near the gentleman when he joined some ladies. Creswick overheard him begin by saying: “There’s a fellow over there on the other side of the vessel drawing, but he knows no more about drawing than a baby.” Creswick returned to his former position, and continued his sketching. Presently the same gentleman came to overlook for some time, and then broke the silence by saying: “Yours is a delightful art; it must be very pleasant to have your gift of making charming pictures.”—“How can you say so?” replied Creswick; “why, just now I heard you tell some ladies that I had no more idea of drawing than a baby.” Such is but one instance out of thousands in which men pose as friends when they are enemies, and impress onlookers with the idea that they are very past-masters of an art of which in reality they are veriest tyros. Yes, it is possible to act a lie as well as speak or write one. Reader, be thorough! Never attempt to deceive either by speech or conduct. Let your yea be yea, and your nay, nay. Thereby you will grow to be esteemed, respected, beloved, and relied upon.

THAT PEACEFUL TIME.

BY THE VERY REV. A. K. H. BOYD, D.D., LL.D., AUTHOR OF “THE RECREATIONS OF A COUNTRY PARSON.”

CHAPTER II.

GROWING OLD.

HE was a big man, of stately and formal manner; and he had by several years over-passed the three-score and ten. But he was well and cheery; and under that pleasant inspiration he of a sudden said to a cynical friend, who was commonly ill and depressed—

“I feel I am growing younger every day!”

“No doubt of it,” was the unpleasing answer; “you will soon be in your second childhood!”

Sour old soul! He disliked people and things in general; and he steadily depreciated all merit save his own. It was he who told me that the vilest preacher he ever heard was a man named Caird.

“After he had preached for five minutes, I should not have been surprised if he had cursed and sworn in the pulpit.”

Even such were the gracious man’s words. Even such was the pervading tone of all his criticism of every mortal but himself. When he had gone through life in this benign spirit, he died. A devoted friend preached a sermon on the occasion, and published it under the suitable title, "Heaven the Believer's Home," I spare all comment. Not dukes and princes alone have their toadies.

Twice before now has the present writer discoursed of Growing Old, each time with entire sincerity. But there are human beings who feel the approach of good deal of being Half-Way; and he did not understand things as he understands things now. Then, after thirteen years, he recurred to the subject: giving the result of lengthening experience. The first essay attained a remarkable popularity: possibly (as a kind friend suggested) because it did not deserve it.

"You will soon be in your second childhood."—p. 360.

winter too soon. The extremest case was that of John Foster, who, coming in from a walk, would say—

"I have seen a fearful sight to-day: I have seen a buttercup."

Premature, surely; as the awfully cautious man replied, when somebody congratulated him on being made a Bishop: he having the Prime Minister's letter in his pocket at the moment. Of course, that did not make the event absolutely certain. In precisely similar circumstances, I know one who wrote: "If all goes well, I shall be" such a thing. But when this writer produced his earliest chapter Concerning Growing Old (most of it was dictated, not written, because he could not write), he wanted a

The second found favour too, and brought many letters from unknown friends. Now twenty years more have passed over: and he takes this subject for the last time. I note that my old friend, the Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table, has rather wearied people by too frequent references to his advancing age; though (be sure) he never has said the hundredth part of what he has felt. And there are those to whom the rapid lapse of time is not a pleasant subject. The writer has a very accurate memory (for some things); and it has somehow been borne in upon him, of late, that when a young woman has remarked that it is long since we last met, and I have answered, "Yes, it was just this time thirty-four years"; a certain disapproval appeared on the pleasant face. For a good and kindly face will be pleasant to look upon for far more than thirty-four years.

We drop things we used to do : meaning that this shall be only for a little ; thinking that after a rest we shall begin again. Ah, no ! the pleasant old way, which seemed an essential part of our life, is gone for evermore. We begin to go to bed early, just till we get over this weariness. But we are not to get over this weariness here. It is indeed giving up ; but we fancy it is not, and so comfort ourselves. It is not as with the idle lad, who wrote home that he felt "a growing indisposition to every kind of exertion." It is not that : the will to work is here. We work all we can, and many times far beyond our strength. I do not want to be selfish : and I know well that it is a sore trial to any man when he begins to feel his work beyond his strength. But it appears to me that it is specially trying to the preacher when that comes to be. Things are so much the same ; you get into the robes, which possibly tend to be somewhat shabby. You ascend to the accustomed place easily enough ; it is not as when the good Dean Hook, who thought aloud, not knowing it at all, said in a loud voice as he went up the pulpit stairs in Chichester Cathedral—

"I shall never get up ; I know I shall never get up. I have got up, after all."

By many years of training, the congregation has been taught to look up eagerly ; there is the audible hush. But, sometimes, there is the terrible exhaustion within. Every word is an effort. It is a grievous thing to be giving your sermon, watching for sentences to leave out, because you really have not strength to say them. In such circumstances, the plan is to preach extempore : that is, if you can. Unless things be very bad indeed : unless you be what homely Scotch folk call "very far through" : this will tide you over : you will get through without that painful sinking, under which it sometimes seems as though you were to faint off wholly. But you will be very dead-beat when your work is over ; there will be that wretched nervous weariness and restlessness which some know. Let it here be said, that afternoon services are not for the preacher who has grown old. Indeed, afternoon services are now drying up, even in this Scotland where they used to be the great ones. One knows churches which are quite full in the morning, and nearly empty in the afternoon. Yet, through a stupid conservatism, people will not, in many places, have the second service in the evening. Even in Scotland, people are tending to come to church just once on Sunday : which means just once in the seven days which make the week : and it is not everywhere that the evening service will be well attended. Only in exceptional places will it be crowded. But the preacher who is nearer to seventy than to sixty, and who must preach twice on a Sunday, ought definitively to say that it must be morning and evening. This, with a sleep, if it may be, between. Morning and afternoon cannot be. When the morning service is at eleven and the afternoon at two, it is flatly impossible. It will shorten a life which is shortening fast enough already.

I know the reader is disposed to say, Why this bit of autobiography ? Why this talking of shop ? Because what is said is deeply felt : and the writer is thinking of very many besides himself. Each second Sunday it is his duty to minister in a very large church at two p.m., having just finished a morning service. He has done it for many years ; but he cannot do it much longer. Morning and evening services are still most enjoyable : more so than forty years ago. But the afternoon is painful penance : is all but impossible. There is reason why it should be kept up ; and it will be kept up. I am responsible for it ; and wish no other. But there will be another voice : more equal to the duty.

It is perfectly understood by me, and by many more, that there are folk who, if they get what they like, care not at all what it costs to somebody else. "He looked very weary on Sunday," I have known it said. But the answer was : "Yes, but the sermon was very touching." I will not signify of whom this was said : but it was said. I have known those whose enjoyment of a grand Highland pass was not in the least diminished, though the poor horse which pulled them along was plainly in miserable exhaustion, and sharp pain at every step. I have known mothers and daughters whose enjoyment of extravagant dress and entertainments was not in the least diminished by the sight of the weary anxious face of the poor struggling drudge of a man, who toiled to earn what they tossed about gaily. And I wondered with wonder quite beyond words how they had heart to do it.

Further, it is distinctly unwise, as well as wrong, for any mortal to kill himself by excessive overwork. You will get no thanks whatever. It will all be taken as a matter of course. And the announcement of your demise will be received with much composure. Just this day ten years since, the writer had the opportunity of reading a sketch of his life, in connection with a notice of his removal. This was in a paper of high character and great circulation ; not, indeed, published in the writer's native land. Confusion had arisen between his lowly self and a famous dignitary of the Anglican Communion. But what most impressed was the composure with which the story was told, ere passing to livelier topics. Not without a start was the legend perused by certain under this roof. And a humorous friend, in a paragraph in a local newspaper, set out that forasmuch as the journal of that day announced that I was to minister in the parish church here on the approaching Sunday, it appeared probable, and indeed might be taken for granted, that I still survived. Such a statement, when brought close to one, strikes. I never forget the latest words said to me by an old friend, who was also a great scholar. He looked at me intently, and said—

"I am still alive, and able to express myself. But very weak. Farewell."

Human beings differ greatly, and one is no rule for another. But I had made sure that as life drew to its close, there would be little care touching the stings which get at mortals through their vanity. Rather let us say through their sense of what is due to them. And, indeed, with many, through their having got to the end of their tether, through a keen sense that they have got far better than they deserved, through the transference of their interest in the prizes and blanks of life from themselves to their children; this is so. It startled me when I saw one of the best of men, a saintly scholar, who had seen four-score years, and for very long had held the highest level of the reverence of all who knew him, not a little discomposed when a very inferior man was put over his head to a very insignificant elevation. I had thought he would not have cared. But he did care. And singularly, all the more that he thought the thing was done to vex him. I knew the facts, and could hardly think there had been any such intention. But had it been as he fancied, it seemed reason for profound contempt for souls capable of such behaviour. And I have known a singular trouble, which can by possibility fall to very few of the race. But the few to whom it falls feel it. It is, with general approval, to reach one of the greatest places which can be held by man; to hold it nobly; yet now and then to say to a very near friend, "I'm not one of the great Exarchs of Melipotamus." Doubtless very extraordinary places have been held by very ordinary men. I sometimes walk about a little Surrey churchyard where this is impressed on one, deeply. And the most modest of men would not like to be a mere stop-gap. Yet a truly great man once said, "For want of a better, I am"—no matter what. Further, the incapables who have been set on high have generally been the very last to discern their own incapacity. Our great genius wished that we might "see ourselves as others see us." It is far better not. If some mortals had that vision, they would flee to the wilderness and be seen no more. And even ordinary decent folk, fairly well filling modest positions (such as the present writer), are not a little startled when someone, gifted with the perilous gift of mimicry, takes them off in gesture and voice. "Surely never so ridiculous as that!" has been the anguished cry. "That mass of awkwardness, and apparent self-conceit, was never me!" Grammar had to yield to the emotion of the moment. There is some consolation in the reflection that all imitations have to be somewhat caricatured. Yet the fact may have been bad enough.

There was a professor long ago, in a little city where homely supper-parties were the use. One evening late, in his own dwelling, a clever undergraduate was giving imitations of some of his colleagues in the Chairs of the University. They were perfectly rendered, and were received with peals of laughter. The good professor, in an evil moment, said—

"But you have not taken me off. What am I like?"

The youth had tact enough to say that the professor had no peculiarities, and so could not be represented in that special way.

The professor still insisted. The youth sunk into silence; but in a little while, when conversation had become general, a wild yell was heard, and the youth was seen violently scratching his head, and in extraordinary tones uttering some philosophical propositions.

"Who on earth is that?" said the bewildered instructor.

First silence; then a general roar. The professor discerned the state of matters, and said with great asperity—

"We have had quite enough of that kind of thing, young man."

The party soon broke up. And I fear the undergraduate had made an enemy.

It was a great Chief Justice, many years removed, who was listening with much approval to the story, told at his own table, how a scoffing young member of the Bar had been giving imitations of the manner of divers judges of renown. It was unwisely remarked—

"But even your lordship is not safe from the ribaldry of that graceless young man."

On the instant the Lord-President drew himself up to his very stateliest; and, with an awful accent, and a most extraordinary gesture, said—

"I was not aware that I had any peccoliarities of manner!"

The rest was silence. But people thought much though they said nothing.

Was it that professor, or was it another, who was kept in awful subjection by his wife? Whoever he was, he too had a party at supper, all men. At a late hour the masterful woman retired, and the professor was (for a space) free and open. He began to expatiate, like John Stuart Mill in his famous volume, on the subjection of women. He demonstrated their inferiority to men in all respects; and specially maintained that in every dwelling the wife must be made to know and keep her humble place.

"In fact," he summed up, "every man should be Julius Cæsar in his own house."

There was universal approval. But in that self-same moment, the door of the chamber was opened. An awful head appeared, arrayed in the fashion of that distant period. It was she who must be obeyed. And a terrible voice, which crushed the stoutest-hearted guest, exclaimed—

"Gentlemen, it is quite time that you were all away home.—And you, Mr. Julius Cæsar, walk away up to your bed!"

The beaten man arose, and without a word he slunk away. Long experience had taught him who was the stronger.

Looking back, as one looks back now, one feels very deeply how far the recorded history of a day comes short of giving the reality as that day went over. That is, to a mere reader. Yet if you wrote the history yourself, and if your memory be good, you have but to look at the lines on the faded page, after ever so many years: and the whole life of that time is brought back. The old time comes over you; and the little story is infinitely pathetic. Everyone knows what Wordsworth wrote about "A day like this which I have left full thirty years behind." Less than thirty years will suffice. Just to-day, the writer looks back upon this day forty-two years.

"After all these years you recognise yourself."—p. 365.

"What do you think of the old place, Lord C—?"

That was the question. He had come back, at the height of success and fame, an old man, to where he had been a little boy. He came to the dwelling of a very aged lady who had known him then: and having rested awhile, he went out alone, to revisit the scenes of childhood. Then he returned, and silently sat down with her.

"What do you think of the old place?"

He said nothing. But he put down his head upon his hands, and sobbed like a little child. I knew the man: and once at something I said, I saw the tide of remembrance come back; though this time he only smiled. But it was a very sad smile.

There are drawbacks about the faithfully kept diary, written regularly at morning and evening of every day. The great drawback is, that it brings back the past too faithfully. There is no mirage;

the beautiful haze is not allowed to gather. Not many people in these times read "Grongar Hill." Not many have ever heard of Dyer; but his lines suggest themselves: lines which possibly suggested far more famous lines which begin the "Pleasures of Hope." The distant summits which look so beautiful, "clad in colours of the air," are "barren, brown, and rough," when you come near them. "The present is still a cloudy day," and the diary makes the long-past present. One thought tenderly of the dear old time, pensive and hallowed; but you open the page, and though you had carefully left out all mention of what was painful, it is there between the lines; it comes back again, the jarring, the worry, the petty provocation, the shabby dodge, the lying mischief-maker, and, as Dyer put it, "still we tread the same coarse way." Yet, remembering all this, the gains are great. The path crumbles away behind you, if you have not told the story of it. And in these latter days, in which you forget things sadly, you do not feel that you have lived at all the time which is not recorded. It was but yesterday, under the shadow of Ben Wyvis, here farther north than I have ever been before, that a good man said to me, of a sudden—

"What's the good of keeping a diary?"

I said just one brief sentence. The speaker was a stranger, and one felt we were so hopelessly out of sympathy that one could not be troubled to say more. Now and then one meets a stranger who is disposed to argue. In almost every case, the thesis he maintains is that black is white, that two and two make twenty, and the like. I never on any account argue with him. A further word: the diary will keep you up to your duty. You must work hard and steadily indeed, if your work looks much when written down. Very much may be told in a word: the long wearing exertion looks so little. Think of Elihu Burritt's "Forged fourteen hours, then Hebrew Bible four hours." How could he do it? It is as Mr. Dickens' modest statement: "I thought of Mr. Pickwick and wrote the first chapter."

Two things are certain. One, that there is no wish whatever to be younger. Dickens was a youth when he wrote that we should all be young again if we could. Philip Sidney was young when he wrote of the shepherd boy, piping "as if he would never grow old." Lord Lytton, indeed, appeared to grow old unwillingly: so did my dear old Professor, Buchanan of Glasgow. But the healthy thing is to be glad and thankful one has got on so far, fairly well. There is deep interest, indeed, in the career of those who are to follow you. The second certainty is that you are well-pleased, and quietly grateful, when the day is peacefully through. It has brought many prosaic duties, the same daily, and though the work of some is exciting many times, yet things quietly attempted and done have generally earned repose. Then the evening rest is wonderfully grateful, when there is no worrying interruption: and to the ageing it must be as a law of the Medes—no work after the last meal of the day. Thus kindly sleep comes on most. And, as the great preacher of my youth, Henry Melvill (who never got his due, and is forgotten), once said in his eager way, "What can He give them better?" Though I fear, now, that is not the meaning of the famous text.

Finally, you have learnt not to give utterance to much you have come to think: you keep it to yourself. It might be met with vehement argumentation. It would find no sympathy. And after all these years, you recognise yourself. You, lined, and white, and sometimes shaky, are the identical being at whose round, rosy face, you looked in the glass when you were a little boy. It was of poor Prince Charley, in the degradation of the closing days, that the true genius, Louis Stevenson, sang in touching lines. They will not come true, unless there has been moral and spiritual degeneracy.

"Sing me a song of a lad that is gone!
Say, can that lad be I?"

GARTH GARRICKSON—WORKMAN.

THE STORY OF A LANCASHIRE LAD.

CHAPTER XVI.

MILDRED meanwhile lived on in Derbyshire, and gradually peace came back to her, and even a measure of quiet happiness. Then

"Time, so complained of,
Who to no one man Shows partiality."

brought to Roger also some relief of pain; and as the evenings closed in and the days became dank and chill, he left his lonely study now and then for the cheerier drawing-room. Mildred knew that her mere companionship was good for him, that in merely playing chess or singing, or listening while he read, as he had been wont to read to his wife, she was helping him. She could care for the boy, too, as a nurse could not; she was busy and content, and the weeks slipped away.

Then Mildred grew troubled; there came a look in Roger's eye, a touch in his hand, a passing word here and there, which warned her that she must go.

Margaret had spoken of this, for always she herself had felt that she would die.

"You used not to care for children," she had said, watching Mildred cooing and talking to the boy. "I always knew you would make a splendid mother, Mildred, in some senses, but not a very gentle—a very deeply loving one, I fancied. I beg your pardon now, dear. Mildred"—after a pause—"I wish you would stay here."

"And for a while I will, dearie."

"But I mean altogether; when I am not here."

"Not here? Oh, hush, Margaret! Of course you will be here—long years—when this wee fellow is a 'gentelman' grown."

"No, dear Millie, I don't think it would do. I could not look after him, could not cope with him; he would be left to servants, and go astray somewhere. Better make way for someone stronger, if only she loved him," looking wistfully, poor mother, at the wee unconscious bundle, just out of eternity, she just returning. "You would more than fill my place."

"No, no; oh, hush, Margaret!"

"Mildred, do try, if Roger—if it were ever proposed."

"It will not be."

"It might. Promise me, Millie."

"I cannot, Margaret, I cannot."

"Perhaps you will feel able some day. At least, remember I wished it, Millie."

And Mildred could only bid her hush and rest now. Oh, never, never could she live out her life so!

No, she could not; she must leave it all, and go. Somehow she contrived to let Roger understand, aided by her father, who wrote at last peremptorily: she had been away long enough. What had he done to be bereft of his daughter for the most part of a year—a complaint strange to Mildred; he had not been wont to require her.

But up-stairs were little hands that held her, eyes that recognised and looked for her, a downy head that nestled more lovingly on her shoulder than that of the neat hired nurse. How leave the boy? Then Roger Donaldson made a proposal. He came into the room one day, where she was, as usual, nursing his little son, and after noticing the child more generously than usual, she thought, proceeded to unfold the contents of a letter that he held in his hand.

It was from a brother minister in a busy Glasgow

"No, it would not do. Mrs. Garrickson is growing old, and the son is just about to marry——"

"Indeed! young Garrickson?"

Mildred wondered a little irritably why everyone should be surprised. Why should not Garth marry, like other young men?

"Yes, and very suitably."

"Doubtless; but somehow, he is hardly the man one fancies marrying young. Well, about this——"

"She could care for the boy, too, as a nurse could not."—p. 365.

parish, inquiring for a substitute; he was over-done, and imperatively ordered rest and country air for some months. Roger's plan was that they should change places; his friend come here, with a curate, if need be; himself go there. Change—above all, work—he needed; city work his wish always; city life impossible for Margaret. That impediment removed, sadly enough, now, but what of the child? Supposing she——

"Oh, Roger, let me have him; let me take him home! Indeed, I am sure I can care for him; and there is Mrs. Garrickson"—and she stopped. How naturally her thoughts flew there even yet.

"But your father—Mr. Caryl? My idea was to send him to Mrs. Garrickson, asking you to keep an eye——"

"It is the best thing possible, Roger. Our house is large; papa need never see him unless he please; and I—it would be such a joy to me! I could not find how to leave him; and I must go."

"He would be a great care—a hindrance. You have so many outdoor interests——"

"Because I had none at home. He would be just the thing for me. I am sure dear Margaret would approve, Roger."

"Well, if your father——"

"I will ask him; I will write at once."

"Just for the winter."

"Yes."

But both knew it was likely to be a much more permanent arrangement.

And when Mildred did at last return home, it was with tiny Roger and his nurse, and all the tone of her life was changed.

Changed too in more ways than this: the ways of the house were changed, and her father was altered strangely.

He was much more at home, more accessible, more companionable. Perhaps he had missed her, or discovered in her absence a want; perhaps Kildare had roused him; and as Kildare was not here now, he turned to her to supply his place. However it might be, he was later in going out, earlier in coming in; rarely, if ever, away; content in an easy fashion, in curious contrast with his old exactitude, to leave work to others: chiefly Garth, it seemed.

Garth was most altered of all: graver, sterner, more silent; harder about the mouth, less liquid and readable in the eyes; and what his position was now she could not learn.

"He's doing very well—Garth Garrickson," her father said once: "good aptitude, well trained, sensible habits. He could command a good price in the market now, if he chose. Why ever he stayed so long I can't see, unless it was that pretty little wench of his; and that's another puzzle. She's no mate for Garrickson: he might have looked higher, I should think. Well," as Mildred did not speak, "it is well for us he stayed. I should have sold out altogether."

"Are you thinking of retiring, father?"

"Well, partly, perhaps—before very long, I think; but your share will remain if Garth goes on as he is going, or you find a partner—I wish you would, my dear—a comfortable berth for any man, I may say."

Mildred flushed deeply. "Oh no, papa."

"Then you are no more inclined to Kildare?"

"No, indeed."

"Well, well, it will do as it is for the present. Remind me to write to Kildare to-morrow," taking up his paper, and seeming to fall asleep behind it, as he so often did now.

As the winter advanced, he stayed more and more indoors, Garth coming and going at all hours to consult and take orders, often staying to luncheon, at which they would talk business engrossingly, quite neglecting her—and how easily Garth did so, with what utter absence of embarrassment, she noticed.

How it had all come about, she had no idea: not even to his daughter would John Caryl speak of himself; the humiliation of a hitherto strong man in weakness would alone have kept him silent. "And there's no sense in telling her," he said to Garth, who, knowing Mildred as he did, thought she should be told. "No use keeping her on tenter-hooks; she'd be in a constant fidget. I am glad she has this child; she can exercise her anxiety and nursing penchant on him. He occupies her mind, too," he added, more gently.

He did: little Roger was an engrossing charge. He inherited some share of his mother's delicacy, it was red, and his new home was too much exposed to eastern and northern winds for him. He required constant care, and the very anxiety, the concentration of thought, was beneficial to Mildred. He kept her constantly busy; she had no time for brooding, no time for self: the very exercising of her powers, the calling-out of her affection, was Mildred's salvation. His nursery was her refuge.

To have Garth about so much was an unprepared-for test. To meet so constantly, and even at table, was a trial she could not have met but for this retreat. True, Garth's own self-possession was perfect; Mildred was of less stern stuff: not yet could she be indifferent, but she could come here, and soothe quivering nerves and conquer rebellious tears with kisses, and crows, and foolish baby games, or in more earnest-wise if her boy were ailing, as he frequently was.

And Garth worked on. Until March he was to go on thus managing, under his master's supervision, gaining knowledge, experience, and general insight, and the relief Mildred found in her nursery he found in his work.

If he became something of a martinet, and unpopular at the mill, it is a habit easily acquired, that of "mestering," and, the mastery gained, not easy of resignation. To no one did he speak of Mr. Caryl's proposals, to Minnie least of all was it probable he would; taciturnity increased: he was seldom at home, always engrossingly occupied.

"For men must work and women must weep."

And the path to success is always steep; and good-bye to the past and its dreaming.

CHAPTER XVII.

ONE day Mildred was preparing to go out. She stood in the hall buttoning her gloves, the carriage at the door, bent on an errand as distasteful as ever, and rarely undertaken now—paying calls.

But as she stood so, saying a few last words to Mrs. Williams, a message was brought. Old Elijah Pack particularly wished to see Miss Mildred if she could go to-day.

"What is it—do you know? Is he ill?"

"I don't know, ma'am; the boy is at the back door."

Mildred went to interrogate, feeling rebuked; she had neglected her old friend of late, and the winter was at hand. There did not seem much wrong, however. "He was not ill, though not to say well, neither—he stayed in his house all the while with the door shut, but it were cold; he seemed in trouble like."

"I will go at once. Will you please make me up a nice basket, Mrs. Williams, while I change my bonnet?—You may return on the box, my lad," decided Mildred, not sorry to postpone her calls; and as she drove along she wondered what the old man could want. It was a thing he had never done before, to send for her. Daddie was not wont to ask help of anyone, and of course she thought of every object but the right one.

Daddie was not ill, nor seemingly in any need; his cottage was tidier and cosier, himself better clothed than Mildred had ever seen. Minnie had made a connecting link with the Garricksons of which they had not been slow to avail themselves; the old man was better cared-for than he had ever been, and it was some time before she could discover what he wished.

"Well, Daddie, you sent for me. What is it?"

"I am very loth to trouble you, Miss Mildred, and for mysel' I wouldna."

"Not yourself? Who, then?"

"They started apart and looked up."—p. 372.

"Well, it's yon gell o' my sister's; it's Minnie, mem."

"Minnie! and what is the matter with Minnie?"

Mildred had not seen her lately. She had been kind, Minnie told Garth, very kind: but so cold, and not half so pleasant as she was at first—not so good to her as she thought she was going to be when she came. And she did not seem to want her back at the hall, though she did think she could nurse the baby. And Garth had listened gravely, and said she must not trouble Miss Caryl, who was in sorrow for her friend and busy with the baby, and of course she could not go to the Hall; she was not to be a servant now.

And Minnie also had her own small reasons, and kept away, to Mildred's relief.

Now, what of Minnie? Was she to help the girl with her wedding preparations? Mrs. Garrickson would do that.

"Well, mem, I don't rightly know what is the matter. Gells has fancies, but I thought Minnie was another soart o' gell. And then there's money in it, and Minnie's not fond o' money, neither; and if it was anyone but Garth—but bein' Garth, and I were very proud to think it were a very good thing for Minnie."

"But what is it? What is it all about?—what money?"

"Why, Minnie's money, mem."

Little by little Mildred made out that Minnie had been to him in great distress. Garth had been talking to her about being married, and about her money: trying to persuade her to be married soon, and live on with them; and she did not want to be married yet, or to live there: it was so lonely and desolate on the hill. And then he wanted her to let him have her money to invest, and said if she did it would be quite safe, and they would be richer; but she did not care about being rich, and she did not believe it would be safe, and she thought Garth only wanted to marry her for the sake of her money.

"Nonsense! nonsense!" cried Mildred. "Minnie must know better than that."

"Yes, I said so; I told her so. Garth would not do any such a thing. But she said she had never thought Garth had cared much; at first she liked him, but he was different now, and she was tired of it—tired of the lonely house; and her aunt had told her so plainly she must not let anyone have that money, especially if they promised to marry her and make her rich. She thought, and so did others too, that he wanted the money, and had never cared for her at all."

Mildred sat with strangely beating heart. Suppose it? She had blamed herself, her hasty departure; thought of Minnie's pretty face and manner: chiefly of Garth's pride she had thought at first. Lately a horrible fear had assailed her that throughout she had been mistaken; that, reading her secret, Garth had merely deferred to her, until Minnie had come to his rescue. A hundred small incidents occurred to her torturingly at all moments confirming the idea: incidents which, in reality, Garth had never noticed; and though the thought had helped her to preserve that queenly manner which was so screening, it had been more torture to Mildred than every other.

Now, suppose this were his reason?

"And what do you want me to do?" she asked presently.

"Well, mem, if you would just speak to Garth, I thought, maybe——"

"Oh no, no! Impossible!" with a cry. "That would not do at all," more gently, as she saw the old man's disappointment. "Garth would not bear it. He is very much changed—Minnie is right; and we are not all the friends we used to be," with filling eyes, which he did not see. "Daddie, I will speak to Minnie, and try to persuade her. I think she should trust Garth."

"Perhaps that would be good, Miss Mildred. It would be a bad job to have it broke off between them; but I do think Garth should have a word. He had ought to tell Minnie more about it—he wouldn't say what 't was for—and he had ought to have spoke to me. He's a good lad is Garth, but he's not done well in this," declared Daddie, divided between love of his favourite and a sense of wounded dignity.

"Perhaps if Minnie gave him a message, he might come and explain to you; he might think she could not understand."

"Happen so, Miss Mildred. I think, mem, Minnie is not well in health."

"I daresay not," with an inward pang: she had not looked after Minnie as she should have done. "No doubt the place is lonely and depressing for her; I will do all I can. Now I must go. Don't trouble; it will be all right;" and Mildred drove home by the country road. She must stop at Mrs. Garrickson's on her way.

And it did not occur to Mildred that there was anything heroic in going thus to persuade this girl to marry this man. But Minnie was not easy of persuasion. She sat there in the cosy parlour, sewing, looking as neat and sweet as ever; but when, Mrs. Garrickson having left the room, Mildred broached this subject, a fretful cloud rested on the pretty face, and she showed a petulance and peevishness surprising in one usually so gentle, and decidedly disenchanting to view. Minnie had been nursing her wrongs, and now they had found a voice, she discovered the inability of a weak nature to restrain it. "Garth had treated her very unfairly, very unkindly; he never had been kind: not even at first, when she liked him so much; she would always have liked him if he had been as nice to her as—as he ought to be. And now he was so disagreeable, and would talk of nothing but business. She did not like business: it made her head ache; she liked talking about places, and people, and music. He would never listen to her playing, either; he always went away if she touched the piano: it was a little out of tune, but not much; and he would not teach her to play on the harmonium at all."

"It is very tiring. I don't think you could, Minnie; you are not strong enough."

"Oh, I am; I could, I know. Someone told me one must take trouble if one is to do any good."

Mildred was puzzled. What good could a terrible uproar on the harmonium do anyone?

"And aunt said I mustn't give my money to anyone."

"But your aunt did not know Garth; and it is not giving. He would invest it in your name, I suppose?"

"No; he wants to put it with his own."

"Well, it would be safe. You would like to help Garth, would you not—help him to rise?"

"No, I don't care; he is high enough. If he got rich I should not be fit; I could never be a grand lady—never. If he wanted to be a gentleman he should have waited until he was one, and then marry a lady, instead of marrying a girl just to help him."

"Minnie, you do not really believe that——"

"Yes, I do, and so does—so do others."

"I am sure no one does; everyone respects Garth."

"Not now. Emma says they did, but not since Mr. O'Neil came. He showed them what he really was, and—and she says he was in love with a lady, or pretended to be, until he found out she had no money. It was all her father's, so he jilted her for me."

"Emma? Do you mean our housemaid?"

"Yes."

"Did she tell you this lady's name?"

"No, Miss Caryl."

Mildred sat silent for several moments.

"Well, Minnie," she said at last, "this is all the wildest gossip; she can only have said it to vex you. Are you going to give Garth up for a piece of spiteful gossip?"

"Well—no—I don't know. I think I will have him some day, but not now, and not give him the money. If he will be kind——"

"Can you not trust Garth? He must have loved you if he said so."

"But he does not say so, Miss Caryl," with filling eyes and trembling lips: "that's just it. He never says so, or kisses me, or talks nice, like—like some would."

"But, Minnie, men are so different. Garth was so quiet and grave always."

"Yes; and sulky."

Mildred's eyes flashed. She rose.

"You are wrong, Minnie; and if you think so, if you can so misunderstand him—if you cannot trust him—you had better say so at once, and have done with it. You are doing him no great honour in accepting him;" and she drove home through the dark in a storm.

Garth to be spoken of in that way! Garth of all men, and by this girl! As long as she had thought Minnie in any way worthy, she had acquiesced; but now, to allow this spoiled child—yet how to help it?

And as she fumed and fretted, Garth's own face flashed past the carriage window as he took his way home to tea.

It quieted Mildred—that dark, resolute face. How everything unreal always fell before Garth's face! And it occurred to her that she had probably done the very thing to bring Minnie to her senses. Had she coaxed the girl and used all soft persuasions, she would have left her where she found her; her indignation had doubtless impressed her and brought her to reason. One thing was very certain: the girl Emma should leave.

CHAPTER XVIII.

ARRIVING, she found her father at home.

"He came in soon after you had gone, ma'am, and has been lying down, I think. He is in the dining-room now."

Mildred hurried thither, and found him stretched on the sofa, which was drawn to the fire.

"At home, father? Are you not well?"

"Tired, my dear, tired; I should like a cup of tea and your company now."

"Certainly; the tea shall come here;" and when it came she sat down and made it, and waited on him in silence, struck by his appearance; he certainly looked weary and thin—terribly thin; she was startled. How was it she had never seen how much altered he was? Surely he was ill.

"Don't you think you would be better for a little rest and change?" she suggested presently. "You do not look well; why not go away somewhere for a few weeks?"

"I can't leave just now; by-and-bye, in the spring, if Garrickson marries and settles well. I was thinking of it."

"How does it depend on Garth?"

"Because I must leave him in charge."

"In charge! Garth?"

"Certainly—he is almost so now; and getting wed is an unsettling business; one naturally wishes him to get that over first, and—other reasons."

Mildred pondered, then looked up.

"Money reasons, father?"

"Partly."

"You mean, if he marries and invests his wife's money and his own in the business?"

"What do you know, Mildred?"

"Nothing; I have just guessed that; but I knew Garth was in need of Minnie's dot."

A few questions elicited the history of the afternoon. Mildred did not often talk confidentially with her father, but now it was a relief, and seemed the wisest plan.

"And so the girl refuses her scrap of money?"

"So far. I daresay she will give way: if he will tell her why he needs it."

"He will not do that: he would not take it now if she offered it and begged. She is a little idiot. What is he doing with such a girl, I wonder? Does he care for her, think you?"

Mildred did not answer; a burning blush overspread her face from chin to brow; her father looked and wondered.

"I shall advise him to give her up."

"Oh no, papa, don't; let it alone. Let Garth manage his own affairs—you would vex him—there are reasons."

"Well, well, my dear, there is plenty of time until the end of March; and then, if all's well, we will go away together for a few months. What do you say to Normandy from March to October or so? Taking your baby and some of the servants."

"Oh, capital! Splendid! Do you mean it seriously?"

"Certainly, if all's well here; we must see. Gently, Millie;" and he lay still awhile, with closed eyes. Yes, he was ill.

"I wish you would see a doctor, papa," when his eyes opened.

"I have."

"And what did he say?"

"Much humbug! Mildred, I had a letter from Kildare to-day. He has the opportunity of a private secretaryship in Glasgow—a much more gentlemanly thing than travelling for a manufacturer, I suppose; said manufacturer being John Caryl, at any rate; and as Roger Donaldson has comfortable diggings, he proposes to join him in them, and begs to tender his resignation."

"I am very glad."

"Honestly, Mildred?" with a searching look.

"Honestly, father."

"You will have to tell him so. He seems to think you would prefer a gentleman-secretary—and Glasgow—"

"I could not leave the old home."

"Why, you were delighted with Normandy just now."

"Oh—for a visit."

"Well, tell him; he will come at once to remove his things. I have given him a week—"

Mildred rose.

"Will you excuse me now? I must go to the nursery. Janet should go to tea, and the boy will miss me."

"Suppose you ring for him. I have not seen him lately."

"I will bring him."

Mildred went off much pleased (he had never asked for her pet before), and returned soon with baby Roger in her arms—tiny hands about her neck, soft pink cheek pressed against her own: a pretty sight. Her father thought so; he approved a woman thus, and he wished—

Mildred was waiting for her boy to be admired.

"Isn't he bonny, papa?"

"Very; he is growing well now. A great credit to you, Mildred."

"And to patent food. I've my thoughts about sending his photo to the papers by way of advertisement."

"Exactly. If we just get him through the winter, he'll do. Oh, we'll take him away, my dear: we'll take him away."

And he lay still and watched her pleasedly, as she sat in her low chair cooing and talking to the child.

"You used not to care for children, Millie," presently.

"Oh, I did!—in a fashion."

"Not in this fashion. You are changed—gentler, more womanly, more like your mother."

Mildred looked up; he so seldom referred ever so distantly to his dear dead wife—she knew it was the highest compliment he could have paid her.

"Thank you, father," she said softly. "That is worth everything."

"Everything? What everything?"

"Margaret's death—and—and other things. Nothing I can talk of; it is over now." There were tears in her voice.

"Very well, my child; but should it re-arise—well, you know I am your father, Mildred. By the way, my dear," in another tone by-and-bye, "you have prayer. I understand, now, as your mother had."

"Yes, papa."

"What suggested it to you—her example?"

"Partly."

"Not altogether?"

"No. Mrs. Garrickson—and Garth," turning round to turn baby's toes to the warmth.

"Garth? He is not a religious man."

"Yes, he is—he was——"

"I should not have thought it. I hear words now and then—I'm not very strictly religious myself, Mildred, but those words are strangers in my vocabulary."

"What kind of words?"

"Well, not exactly swearing, you know, but near it—such as you don't fancy a religious man using."

"I never heard anything of the sort."

"You? Of course not."

"I think I should have done. I have heard Kildare. You know by instinct somehow——"

"Yes; and it is a characteristic of Garth. He never shouts, you know, or raises his voice in the least—just stands still and says it; not because he can't help it, but because he chooses."

"He would not have chosen once."

"Perhaps not. Men change as they grow older. Perhaps Kildare's influence, or those German books—I don't approve of much German reading for young men, Mildred."

Mildred was silent. She knew Garth's soul, like Sordello's, demanded

. . . "Only outward influence,
A soul . . . . . above his soul.
Power to lift his power—such moon's control
Over such sea-depths—and their mass had swept Onward from the beginning, and still kept
Its course; but . . . . . the sky above
Held none, and so, untasked of any love,
His sensitiveness idled."

"There, run away with your baby, my dear. I'm tired; go!"—and until the door closed no sound came from between his clenched teeth.

CHAPTER XIX.

A FEW days later, old Elijah Pack was surprised by a visit from his old master. He was on business, he said, and straightway sat down and unfolded it.

"It is this affair of your niece and Garth Garrickson. My daughter spoke to me of it, and, seeing that Garrickson is my ex-ward, and that it is entirely at my suggestion that he has made these proposals, I feel at liberty to take it up. You are Miss Garner's guardian, I think."

"Well, no, sir—not so as I've aught to do wi' t' money. It's lodged in a bank in Hull, sir, and t' banker and her aunt's old minister is eggsekkitters."

"In Hull? Why in Hull?"

"Her aunt were i' service there, sir—a Mr. Astley."

"Astley—oh, I know Astley—dear me! so the boy saved this too," and Mr. Caryl sat silent a few moments.

"Well, so you have no control?"

"Not i' that, sir, but to Minnie herself! I'm soart o' adviser. She were to ack by me till she was married or one-and-twenty, and then these gentlemen would see about her money."

"I understand; and then she would have full control?"

"I dunno the rights on't, sir, but I think 't were tied up so as she couldn't do wi'out their consent till she were thirty or thirty-five."

"Very wise." And there was another pause.

"So Garth really wants it, sir?"

"Well, Pack, it would be a very good thing for him just now—secure a good rise—lay his fortune."

"Fortunes ain't everythin', sir."

"No, Pack, as you used to tell us at chapel; and I've made a fortune and you've made none, and you are the wiser man now, no doubt; but wisdom and fortune are not inevitably separated. Now about your niece; how do you think it is?"

"Well, sir, gells is queer kittle, and meks mistakes."

"Yes, but the mistake is usually on the other side," drily. "When a girl cares for a lad, she is generally willing to sacrifice anything and everything for him."

"Ay, sir—surely."

"And the inference is that where she will make no sacrifice she does not greatly care."

"Ay."

"Now, do you think a girl should marry a man she does not care for?"

Daddie looked troubled. Mr. Caryl observed him, and changed his ground.

"Were you surprised by the engagement?"

"I were that, sir—struck all on a heap, as 't were. Garth he cum in, and he says, 'Well, Daddie, good-even,' he ses, and stopped a bit queer like, and looked round as if he were lookin' fur suthin'. 'Good even, Garth,' I ses. 'I warn't expectin' o' you, fur he'd bin in the yester even, or leastways, he'd bin about a good deal letly, and I'd my doots, sir,' apologetically.

"Doubts? Why doubts? I thought you were surprised."

"Ay, sir. I'd bin thinkin'—lestways, a young lady, sir—abun 'im in station, ye ken, as her father mightn't——"

"I see; you thought there was someone else."

"Yes, sir—as he saw about here."

"Well, what did Garth say?"

"He ses—I'd said, 'I warn't expectin' o' you,' cool like—'No, Daddie,' he ses, 'but I've suthin' to ask you.'—'Well, sit down, Garth,' I ses; 'what is it?' So he sat him doon over yon, and sat still a bit. 'Well, don't you think I might get married, Daddie?' he ses at last. 'That's as may be, Garth,' I ses; 'if a lad goes to a gell's father and it's all straight and above-board like.' And he looked at me, and ses, 'Minnie has no father, so I had to come to you.'—'Minnie!' I ses, 'Minnie!' and you could 'a' knocked me doon wi' a straw, sir, I were that took. 'What 'as Minnie to do wi' it, Garth?'—'She's promised to be my wife, if you will allow. I've come to ask,' he ses, 'that road he has when he's a bit vexed. 'So it's Minnie you want, Garth?' I ses. 'Or I shouldn't 'ave arst,' he ses. 'Come, Daddie, 'ave you any objections?' Well, sir, what could I doo? Young men is sich, and teks fancies, and 't were a very good thing fur Minnie; and if she loved him—and Miss Millie didna, belike—it didna seem right, that road, to look at—and the right way to look at—is the Lord's way, happen."

His eyes bent on the fire; he did not see his master's face. Daddie did not notice his own slip of the tongue. There was a long pause.

"I see," Mr. Caryl said slowly, at last. "Well—yes—you were right—as far as you saw. Perhaps we have no right to interfere between them; but if, as the girl's guardian, you can advise her to let Garth have this money before March—giving my name as security, and telling her Mr. Astley knows Garth—it will be all right; then if she will just consent, it would be the making of a rich man of Garth."

"Well, now, I'm bound to state as Minnie made a sensible remark abun that same—as she could never be a lady and keep a grand house and servants, as Garth were too clever for her—there's a deal i' that, sir."

"Well, we must leave it to them to settle. Good-day, Pack. You should come nearer to us; this cottage is too far away—it's a journey. We are not so young as these young folks."

"Oh, it's whoam, sir. An old man likes his old whoam." Daddie returned to his cottage to ruminate, and John Caryl went thoughtfully to his "whoam." He went another way than any we have been yet, past the top of Jacob's Ladder, straight along the road. On his left the little beechwood rose, bare of leaves now—dank enough it would be until the blue-bells came next year; on the right, the wooded hillside descended steeply into the grassy valley, and further off Mildred's hills stretched far as the eye could see, banked one behind another, until beyond the sky-line they sank to the lower level of the West Yorkshire moors, the warm red-brick houses of Lancashire giving way, even here, to the cold stone of Yorkshire. Rounding the hill, the road ran through a cutting, made by the operatives during the cotton famine, and came out suddenly on the outskirts of a corner of the town. High above it perched the Hall; just across there, underneath, crouched the mill: he must call there, and then, instead of going round it and up the drive, would mount the steep land behind; which accordingly he did. His business concluded, he came out of the old gate on this side: it was a shorter route, but one seldom used now, for its steepness; up the narrow little street till the houses fell away; still up, till he came to that private door Garth had affected once—the steps, the narrow path, the stile, over the wall, into the drive, and here, his breath gone, he sat down to rest on the wall. There he sat, John Caryl, cotton-spinner, and viewed the world, his mind very full of his own affairs and Garth Garrickson—workman. Various thoughts took shape, and grew, and vanished, as he sat and looked through the smoke to where, in the purity beyond, a church stood, and a garden where men were laid.

Then he was disturbed; voices reached his ear: one a clear treble with an odd outlandish intonation, the other a low musical bass: two voices where voices were not apt to be.

"I did think I would do so; but if you think not best—"

"I do. I would not; Garrickson's not worth it."

Garrickson! Who was talking of Garrickson? He knew that voice, surely.

"But if it made us rich?"

"It won't, little Minnie; not it! Uncle Caryl wants cash, I guess. Yes, it's uncle laying his hands on all he can get, as usual. Besides, if it did, Garth could never be a gentleman."

"Nor I a lady."

"Oh yes—you—you are too good for him by half, Minnie. I wish—"

This would not do. Mr. Caryl slipped off his wall into the drive, and peeped over into the gully which dipped under it. There, leaning against the stone-work, stood Garth's little sweetheart, and bending over her, one hand resting on the wall above her head, one holding her elbow, Kildare O'Neil, who had arrived the evening before.

"I wish—"

"Kildare!"

They started apart and looked up, Kildare slightly pale, Minnie's face one blush.

"Come up here, sir!"

"I've no key."

"Here's mine," throwing it down.

Kildare moved sulkily to the door, came through it, and joined his uncle above, while Minnie sped down into the town. She had a basket.

"Now, what do you mean, sir?"

"Nothing at all. I came up this way, and having no key, and meeting the girl—"

"You did no such thing, sir. I have just come up, and must have seen you. You came from Mrs. Garrickson's—that way."

"Upon my word, Uncle—"

"Your word! What's your word, sir? I heard that last speech of yours. Look here, Kildare: those who have risen, as I have done, from an honest class, know the worth of an honest man. I could excuse a dunderhead in my business, for I could look after him; but this I won't excuse. I gave you leave to speak to my daughter; I invited you for a week. Now, if I can help it, you'll never set eyes on Mildred again. You'll come to the house with me; you'll pack your portmanteaux, and you'll go to—to the—to—" and he used a word Kildare had never heard him use before—a "stranger in his vocabulary."

He walked by his side in crestfallen silence; the elegant Kildare by his half-despised "uncle;" and by noon the carriage had bowled him to the station.

CHAPTER XX.

MILDRED had been right; her sudden flash of anger had struck Minnie, and with all the more effect because so unprecedented in her experience of Miss Caryl—so unusual in anyone here. No one here was ever angry with her—not even Garth, she was obliged to own.

After all, she had spoken strongly. Garth was not really unkind to her, only so grave and silent; and if that were his nature, and if everyone thought so much of him—well—she would never have a better husband, better looking or better off; and of course she was rather fond of him.

Minnie's spirits revived surprisingly under this vigorous treatment; for several days she had been quite bright and happy, and had Garth renewed his proposals, she might have met them now. But, as Mr. Caryl had foreseen, he did nothing of the sort; the whole matter was out of Garth's court. Minnie had been unwilling: there was an end. Then Minnie drooped again. She saw Kildare, she saw her old uncle, whose representations duly impressed her. But unhappily there were people behind, and so many of them, she was frightened. The idea had been dropped into her small mind, and taken firm lodging there, that what all these people wanted was her money. What her little hundreds would be to a moneyed man like Mr. Caryl she did not think of considering; he wanted them: that was all; and Garth was a dupe or an accomplice; Mr. Astley was another; and her uncle and Miss Caryl knew nothing about these things. Mrs. Garrickson never said one word, which was a suspicious circumstance.

She did not, of course, say this openly, but she brooded over it in secret, and was exceedingly uncertain in her moods: to-day sweet and pathetic, to-morrow low and peevish; often, as she had accused Garth of being, sulky; and a piteous letter was written and sent to Scotland.

Minnie felt romantic. She was the distressed heroine surrounded by foes; she looked in her glass for beauty and signs of woe, and went by a picturesque path to meet the postman: for in these days it is not impossible to elude enemies; there are posts and trains.

Mrs. Garrickson did not understand the girl; fancied she was not well, and tried various possets. Garth thought he did, and took no notice, accepting petulance, as if unconscious: as, indeed, he often was. He went about his business, did his business, and came back about his business, and his mind was very full of it; there were three months yet to the Ides of March.

But returning from work one day, he found his mother in dire distress. Minnie had run away.

She had asked leave to go to Manchester with Emma, who was leaving her place that day, and had gone in the morning, after a nice little lunch, looking as neat and nice as a girl could look in her warm dress and coat, and the pretty hat Miss Mildred had given her. But in the afternoon a note had come, posted in the box at the foot of the drive, on her way to the station. She was going away by the noon express from Manchester, and would not return—no, not till death—leaving it to be conjectured if then. And she had packed her box, and had the key; it could be sent to the station at Glasgow to be called for, and it was no use coming or trying to find her, for she would never come back, and she would never marry Garth;

"Back she went, growing more and more bewildered."—p. 375.

she was going to teach music at first.

"That naughty Emma! It is all her doing, Garth."

"I am not so sure, mother. Kildare O'Neil's in Glasgow."

"Oh no, Garth! No, no; not that! And he is with Mr. Donaldson, remember."

"Yes—well—I'll go and tell Mr. Caryl. There is poor old Pack, too; it will kill him. In any case, she will not come back here."

And Garth swallowed a cup of tea as he stood, and went out.

CHAPTER XXI.

Yes, it killed old Daddie : but not quite at once.

When Mildred drove over the hill next day—her father having gone in the morning to break the news—she found him almost placid.

"It's her father," he said sadly. "We furgot she were her father's gell, as well as her mother's ; all that happy laughing way were her father's : he never could stop i' one place ; we should ha' minded."

Yes, they should have "minded."

Mildred remembered her presentiments on that first morning, long ago forgotten, and blamed herself helplessly : her selfish preoccupation, her jealousy—yes, she had been jealous of Minnie : she, Mildred Caryl.

Yet, how were they to have known? Garth's wife was as Caesar's.

"I cannot believe she will come to any harm. She is a sensible girl in some things, after all ; and Mr. Donaldson is there, you know."

"Yes ; and the Lord's there, Miss Mildred, mem." She left him seemingly at calm on that sheet-anchor, and drove home.

But she was not at calm : she was conscious of an unconquerable restless distress, which culminated at last in impatience of the very confinement and inaction of being driven thus, comfortably ensconced in rugs, while the world went awry. The day was very cold and cloudy ; there was a sharp cutting wind ; it drew towards dusk ; but she would leave this and walk, she decided, with sudden energy, as the horses slowly ascended the steep lane. She would go and see blind Lucy. She pulled the check-string—to Payne's indignation—in a very rough place, and sprang out, telling him that she had another call to make ; he might go home.

Up the hill she went swiftly, sheltered by the high bank on her right, but when she turned the corner of the lane—the corner at which she and Garth had met on the day that began all this trouble—she encountered something more of the wind ; her progress was hindered.

So much gustier was it here, that she hesitated, stopped, and turned about, wondering if she had not better go back and get in again ; but as she stood considering, the carriage passed the end of the lane ; the top of the hill reached, Payne had whipped up his horses, and was speeding away down the road, anxious for home and tea. No use calling. Well, she had not seen Lucy for a long while ; she would not stay long, and she would take the short cut home across the fields by the shooting range. On she struggled against the wind, a stray snowflake torn out of the clouds tossing up and down, and whirling round and round, homeless, unless it settled and melted on her cloak. There was to be snow : the first snow of the winter ; in the morning the hills would be white. Mildred's spirits rose ; a battle with the elements suited her mood just now. On she struggled, and by-and-bye arrived at the little hamlet in which Lucy dwelt—a mere cluster of two or three cottages, from which she could see their own trees, not a quarter of a mile away, across the fields. She would not stay long, she thought again, as she knocked at the door of the pretty ivy-dressed cottage.

But Mildred was detained : she found the sisters just sitting down to tea, and nothing would satisfy them but Miss Caryl's joining them. "Ay, such a daay ! ye'll want a coop o' tay to warm ye," and she knew that in refusing she would greatly grieve her protégée. Perhaps if blind Lucy could have seen the day, and how it was shortening, she might have been less exacting ; but day and night were all alike to her ; and Mary thought little of weather.

So Mildred removed her cloak, and drank a cup of their bitter tea, ate a piece of their beautiful bread and butter, and talked, and listened to their talk, in the bright stone-floored kitchen ; and outside the day closed, the snow came swifter, the wind increased.

"It's a wild-like night for ye to be out, miss," Mary said, looking out of the tiny windows doubtfully, when she rose at last. "It's snowing, Lucy.—Will ye wait a bit while our Tom comes? he'd set ye a piece."

"Oh no, thanks, Mary. I am going the short way, and shall soon be there."

"By th' shootin' range? I wouldn't, miss. They're talkin' about us goin' through ther. It's Queen's land, ye know ; they say they'll tek us up."

"Oh, no one will take me up !—Good-night, Lucy. I will try and come again soon, and bring my boy for you to see."

Mildred always spoke of Lucy's "seeing" just as she herself did.

"Good-night, Mary ; good-night."

She went out into the dark cheerfully enough, but when she got out of the shelter of the hamlet she found things much worse. The wind had veered and strengthened, and came due north ; the snow increased moment by moment, and beat in her face blindingly ; she seemed to make no way. Her safer plan would have been to face about, run before the wind a while, and then turn down the more sheltered road ; but then she reflected she would have a far longer walk, and in the end, hardly less difficulty. The field-path would be nearly as much exposed, and the gate probably locked. No ; she would go on.

Then she paused. She had reached a gate which, standing slightly ajar, gave her an idea ; and without considering for a moment, Mildred did a most foolish thing—went through it, and struck out into the open field. She knew her way, she thought, through this meadow, and by a gate straight opposite into the next : this would take her to shelter much sooner, and evade the "Queen's land" : a narrow strip running through her father's, leading to and terminating in the volunteers' shooting range, which it might be well not to pass at this time of night—for it was night now, though certainly not six o'clock, she thought.

For a while it was better ; the wind was easier to battle against when the snow was not beating in her face, and the walking was less rough. She took off her hat, pulled the hood of her cloak over her head, and went on in all confidence. Then, to her surprise, she came upon broken ground. What was it doing there? She did not remember broken land in this field. It was in the next she had thought some natural sinkings of the ground, or beginnings of a quarry abandoned ere well begun. There were so many dangerous worked-out quarries about here ; she must be in the quarry field, and doubtless, in spite of her efforts, the wind had borne her unconsciously to the left.

The fact was that in her absence part of the field had been ploughed up, and between her and the gate she wanted was a long reach of frozen clods, as hard and rough as an ice-field. Far from having been borne to the left by the wind, she had, in struggling against it, veered to the right, and was coming against quite another hedge than that she steered for. Presently she reached it, and again was surprised, for here was a ditch, into which she had almost stumbled—there should be no ditch. Where could she be? She must go back.

And back she went, growing more and more bewildered in the darkness and buffeting—unable, of course, to trace her footprints, for the newly fallen snow covered them, and beating in her face again now, made vision impossible—back towards the point she had started from, and yet further and further away from the gate, which was on her left.

All at once she was startled by a sudden cracking and snapping beneath her feet: she was walking over thinly frozen water. With a frightened cry she started back, and in utter confusion sped away, completely losing all nerve and her bearings in her frantic terror. Up and down she wandered and stumbled, calling, crying, through the snow and dark, wholly unable to command herself or make any determined effort for extricating herself; and just beyond, behind the outhouses, the light was twinkling in Mary's little window.

At last she did get off the ploughed land, and then was a little easier; but strength oozed fast; soon she would fall in the snow, and be unable to rise. And in the morning all would be clear, and her pitiless hills would glitter in the sun.

(To be concluded.)

OUR LITTLE "HAPPY INDEED!"

FROM MODEL AND SHOE IN BRITISH MUSEUM.

SCENE I.—"Who is that pale-faced little girl?" we asked, as we looked round the ward of our native hospital in Shanghai.

"She was sent here by a Chinaman who had bought her as a slave," the matron replied. "Her feet had been bound, and in the very cold weather they became frost-bitten, and were in such a dreadful state from neglect that the doctors found the only way to save her life was to amputate both the legs, just below the knee."

I suppose almost all English children have heard of this cruel Chinese practice of binding the feet of little girls so tightly, and into so unnatural a shape, that they can never run about like the children of other lands, or even walk without a curious hobble. I have seen two of our girls, as they came along the path to their school-room, supporting each other so as to keep their balance.

In this foot-binding process many a Chinese child's life is sacrificed; and here, as we feared, was one of its victims.

But our little sufferer did not die. The medical skill and careful nursing bestowed on her resulted in her rallying quickly from the aforesaid terrible operation, and soon she became quite a pet patient among us.

Her name, we learned, was "Foh-yung," the meaning of which is "happy sound" (we thus entitle our Chinese version of the Gospel); and strangely unsuitable did such a name appear at first, in view of the dear child's suffering and loneliness and lifelong helplessness. But soon we changed our minds on this subject; she was such a bright little creature. Wonderfully soon she began to show pleasure in seeing us, and was delighted with little toys and picture cards. Of course the thought of her future was often in our minds; we could not bear the idea of her encountering the hardships of cripple-life in a loveless heathen home, or the worse misery of a Chinese refuge. Such an institution we had visited in the native city near by, and beheld a scene of squalor and general loathsomeness impossible to describe.

But soon after we had ascertained that her Chinese owner was willing to leave her in our hands—seeing that the sixty dollars he had paid for her must in any case be a loss to him—we were able to place her in the care of a kindly native Christian woman, in a room connected with our girls' day-school in the city; and this arrangement, made some weeks ago, seems quite successful.

Mrs. Wong, the woman in question, is teaching her to read, and the lady in charge of our schools finds little Foh-yung very quick in learning by heart Scripture passages and hymns. We have no doubt of her proving, like all Chinese girls, handy with her needle. I may mention, in proof of the help that may be given in our mission work by very small contributions, that five dollars (about fifteen shillings) a month covers the expense of Foh-yung's food and clothing, and of payment to Mrs. Wong, who earns a little in addition by embroidery.

SCENE II.—"Who is that pretty, bright-faced little girl?" asked a lady visitor. We were gathered in the church close to our home for a tea-party of native Christians; and there, sitting among them, was our dear little cripple. Kind Mrs. Wong had carried her through many a narrow, crowded street to the city gate, and thence brought her in one of the two-wheeled coolie-drawn carriages we call "rikshas" to our tea-meeting.

Eagerly she was watching for us to come and speak to her.

"Kah-weh vah?" ("Are you happy?") we asked her.

"Kah-weh koh!" ("Happy indeed!") she replied, with a beaming smile.

And so "happy indeed" was the little face that the friend just mentioned, when acquainted with her history, expressed a wish to photograph her, and a few days later took the picture now before you.

This very afternoon I have seen the dear child sitting contented and smiling by, while my husband was teaching and catechising the city scholars, ranged in a wide semicircle before him. When this was over, he went to the little pupil who could not come to him and heard her repeat, very nicely, the well-known hymn, "There is a happy land, far, far away," which in its Chinese form would sound strange to my readers. This is the beginning, as Foh-yung gave it:

"Yeo ee-kwá kah-weh dee, Yu, yu zā tee."

We feel that our little "Kah-weh-koh" is already a witness to the compassion and care of her Father in Heaven; and it is our hope and prayer that in days to come she may yet further testify of His all-sufficiency to give peace and gladness, even in the face of earthly privation, and prove a messenger to many a sad and suffering one of "the joyful sound" of His salvation, of the blessed inheritance of "no more death, neither sorrow nor sighing, neither any more pain."

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

MARCH 18TH, 1894. A BLESSING TO ALL NATIONS.

To read—Gen. xviii. 16—21. Golden Text—

St. Matt. xxviii. 19.

INTRODUCTION. At this time most Christians all over the world are thinking of Death and Resurrection of Jesus Christ. These events show the object of Christ's coming. By dying—to make atonement for sins of whole world; by rising—to conquer death and open heaven to man. Thus all nations blessed in Christ. To-day's lesson goes back in story of Abraham's life and tells of God's promise of this blessing to him.

I. GOD'S REVELATION. (16, 17.) When? After Abraham had entertained the three angels. He had given them food, rest, and water to wash. Now "speeds the parting guests"—brings them on their way—last act of hospitality.

All three angels are present at first. Then two proceed to Sodom for judgment. One talks with Abraham in mercy.

This One, called THE LORD, always regarded as the Lord Jesus, the Angel or Messenger of God.

How was the message given?

Probably by direct voice of God Himself.

Last part of chapter contains conversation.

Why given? Because Abraham was God's friend. God talked with Adam and Eve in the Garden. Christ revealed His will to His disciples. (St. John xv. 15.)

John saw Revelation; heard wonderful things.

LESSON. The secret of the Lord is with them that fear Him, and He will show them His covenant.

II. GOD'S BLESSING. (18, 19.) To Abraham and his family to all generations.

How was Abraham to be a blessing?

By his faith and obedience, an example to all.

Without faith it is impossible to please God.

By his training his family in the fear of God.

Thus preserving knowledge of God in midst of heathen world.

By being ancestor of Christ, Who brought salvation to all. (Golden text.)

See the importance of family religion.

Abraham taught Isaac implicit obedience. (xxii. 8.)

Taught also Ishmael to pray. (xxi. 17.)

Isaac brought up his sons to fear God. (xxviii. 1.)

Jacob blessed his twelve sons in God's name.

Job prayed for his family. (Job i. 5.)

David trained Solomon in God's ways.

St. Paul tells all parents to do same. (Eph. vi. 4.)

LESSON. Do justice, love mercy, walk humbly before God.

III. GOD'S JUDGMENT. (20, 21.) Whose cry?

That of the poor—working without fair wage.

That of the weak—oppressed by the strong.

That of the slave—deprived of rights of man.

Oppression called "crying sin." (Deut. xxiv. 15.)

Israelites cried and obtained help. (Ex. ii. 23, 24.)

But worst of all was the cry of Sodom's great sin.

God must judge and punish this, for He is holy.

LESSON. There is a God that judgeth the earth.

MARCH 25TH. THE RESURRECTION OF CHRIST.

To read—St. Mark xvi. 1-8. Golden Text—1 Cor. xv. 20.

INTRODUCTION. To-day, Easter-Day, all Christians rejoice. In old time used to greet each other with the words "The Lord is risen." St. Paul shows (1 Cor. xv. 17) how all our hopes for eternity depend on Christ's resurrection. Accounts of it in all four Gospels. To-day's lesson tells one part of the story.

I. VISIT OF WOMEN. (1-5.) Who were they?

Mary of Magdala mentioned in all four Gospels.

Mary mother of James and Joses. (Matt., Mark, Luke.)

Salome named by St. Mark; Joanna by St. Luke.

They had been last at the Cross, were first at Grave.

They had hastily embalmed Christ's body when taken from the Cross, and then two had kept watch for some time at the Tomb.

After sunset on the Sabbath, i.e., day after Crucifixion, they had bought more spices for further embalming.

Wanted to do all possible honour to Christ.

Then at early dawn on "the third day," all met at the tomb.

Had wondered, as they went, what they should do about the stone—"very great," and heavy—took several men to roll it into its place.

They came, looked, saw it was rolled away.

Aperture to tomb open—two angels there.

One angel they specially notice, and His clothes.

They are filled with fear and amazement.

Why should they be? Must have heard how—

Angels announced Christ's birth to the Shepherds,

Had ministered to Him in the wilderness,

Had strengthened Him in Gethsemane.

What more natural than that angels also should announce His resurrection?

II. MESSAGE OF THE ANGEL. (6-8.) It told of—Peace—No cause for fear.

Comfort—Christ is not here but risen.

Work—Go and tell others the glad news.

Forgiveness—to St. Peter—specially mentioned.

Christ's look after his denial had touched his heart.

He had wept, repented and returned to love.

Sight—Ye shall see Him in Galilee.

What was the result?

The women hurried away with the news.

They told no one in the City as they went.

But told the disciples with great joy. (St. Matt. xxviii. 8.)

LESSONS. 1. Christ's resurrection affects us—

In the present. It gives comfort. The Lord liveth. Death is at last vanquished.

It gives joy. We sorrow not as without hope.

In the future. Our bodies shall rise again.

We have an earnest of immortality.

2. Our duties. Seek those things which are above.

Live as heirs of eternal life. (Col. iii. 1.)

APRIL 1ST. JACOB'S PREVAILING PRAYER.

To read—Gen. xxxii. 9-12; 24-30. Golden Text—verse 26.

INTRODUCTION. Three weeks ago had lesson on Jacob's leaving home and seeing vision of angels at Bethel. Reached his Uncle Laban's house at Padan-aram safely—married his two cousins Leah and Rachel—stayed there twenty-one years, and then, at God's bidding (xxxii. 3-13), began his journey back to Canaan. But he heard that Esau his brother was coming to meet him with a band of four hundred men. He remembered the wrong he had done Esau, and was afraid of his vengeance. So he divided his party into two bands, and himself turned to prayer.

I. JACOB'S FIRST PRAYER. (9-12.) Notice—

The address—to the God of his fathers.

Abraham his grandfather was accepted by God.

Isaac his father had served God faithfully.

The plea—God had bidden him to return home.

He therefore trusts that God will keep him in safety.

The confession—unworthiness—less than the least.

He went out empty—has returned home full.

God's mercy and truth have never failed him.

The petition—to deliver him from Esau's violence.
To fulfil His promises of mercy to him.
What does this prayer teach about Jacob?
His simplicity—speaks like a child to a parent.
His gratitude—for all God's past mercies.
His trust—in God always.
LESSON. O Lord, in Thee have I trusted; let me not be confounded.

II. JACOB'S SECOND PRAYER. (24—30.)

After his first prayer Jacob took precautions.
Sent a present of many cattle to Esau.
Instructed his servants what to say to him.
Sent his wives and children over the brook.
Himself waited patiently for further prayer.
Then came a remarkable scene.
He seemed to be struggling with a man.
But this man is afterwards called God. (Ver. 28.)
Jacob struggled with Him till break of day.
At last prevailed against Him and overcame.
Asked for and obtained a special blessing.
His name to be no more "Jacob," or Supplanter.
But Israel—a Prince with God.
A name of victory, glory and power.
Hence his descendants all called Israelites.
Jacob asks the name of his antagonist.
His curiosity is checked, but he gains blessing.
He has seen God, so far as is given to man.
His life is safe; he shall meet Esau in peace.
LESSONS. 1. Effectual fervent prayer availeth.
2. Thou hast been my help; leave me not.

APRIL 8TH. DISCORD IN JACOB'S FAMILY.

To read—Gen. xxxvii. 1—11. Golden Text—xlv. 24.

INTRODUCTION. Forty years have passed since Jacob's wrestling with the angel and his reconciliation with Esau. Rachel, mother of Joseph and Benjamin, his youngest sons, has died. The families of both Esau and Jacob increased largely, and Esau removed to Edom (xxxvi. 8, 9). Little more is heard of him. The story turns to Joseph and his brethren.

I. JOSEPH'S BRETHREN. (1—4.) Notice—
Care of the flocks occupied all the brothers.

Joseph lived with the sons of Bilhah and Zilpah viz., Dan, Naphtali, Gad, and Asher.

Leah's six sons tended another flock elsewhere.
But the half-brothers did not live in peace.

What was the cause of their hating Joseph?
Partly because of Jacob's partiality for him.
Possibly a blind parental indulgence—or Possibly because he foresaw his excellence.
Joseph also incurred their ill-will himself.
He told his father of their wrong deeds.
How was Jacob's partiality shown?
He made him a coat of many pieces (or colours).
Perhaps a coat indicating a princely rank.
Or a sacred vestment worn by the priests.
Anyhow it caused envy, hatred, and malice.
So that there was enmity in the family.

II. JOSEPH'S DREAMS. (5—11.) The first—

A corn-field where each reaper made a sheaf.
His brother's sheaves bowed down to Joseph's.
In his simplicity he told his brothers the dream.
They saw the implied meaning at once.
Little thought how truly it would be fulfilled.
He stored up corn in Egypt—they came and bought.

He was "Lord of the land"—they made obeisance.
The second dream—giving greater certainty.
So Pharaoh had double dreams. (xli. 32.)
So Gideon had two signs. (Judges vi. 37—39.)
This time the sun, moon, and stars bowed to him.
His father rebuked him for supposed presumption, but also pondered over these signs.

His brethren envied and hated him.
But the dream was literally fulfilled.
His whole family bowed to him in Egypt.

III. JOSEPH A TYPE.

Honoured by his father—as Christ. (St. Matt. iii. 17.)
Clad in priestly robe as Christ in glory. (Rev. i. 13.)
Grew in wisdom and innocence. (St. Luke ii. 42.)
No sin recorded of him—so with Christ. (1 Pet. ii. 22.)

His glory and honour foretold. (Is. ix. 7.)
Envied by his brethren as Christ by the Priests.
(St. Matt. xxvii. 18.)

Hated, insulted, and persecuted for truth's sake.

LESSONS. 1. Copy Joseph's innocence.
2. Avoid envy, the beginning of strife.
3. Live peaceably with all men.

"THE EXPLORER."

IS real name was John Burleigh, but everybody called him "The Explorer." What he had explored nobody seemed to know; nor did he appear inclined to give information on the subject; but it was generally believed that his explorations had been conducted with a view to the discovery of the North Pole, and it was further supposed that the sufferings and privations he had undergone had been so appalling that he naturally shrank from recalling, and thus living over again in imagination, the horrors of the past. However this might be, his conversation was packed as full as it would hold with bergs, flocs, and hummocks of ice; and it was rendered deliciously awful to small boys by the roaring of polar bears, the lashing of the flukes of giant whales which were capable of reducing heavy boats to match-wood, and by the cracking timbers of stout ships which were "nipped" by icebergs like walnuts in the crack of a door. August was the only month in which it was possible to listen to The Explorer's yarns with comfort; those who were foolishly enough to spend a winter's evening in his company always said that the biggest fire failed to keep them warm while he talked, and some have even asserted that the extreme severity of his Arctic conversations has reduced their temperature to such a degree that only a liberal allowance of hot water and mustard has saved them from taking cold. But, as Herodotus would have said, I am not sure if this is true. The strange thing was that "The Explorer" never introduced any personal element into these stories; so that the impression left upon the minds of most of his hearers was that, as yet, he had never been as freezing as he could.

Not only in his conversation, but in his appearance, The Explorer quite bore out the testimony of rumour. Picture a tall, stout, well-set-up, burly man of sixty, with a face the colour of mahogany, and beard and hair of thickly grizzled red. Picture, moreover, this same stalwart figure clothed from head to foot in ample garments of thick blue cloth; even the soft peaked cap on his head was of blue cloth; notice the blue tattooing of anchors peeping out below the wrist-band of Oxford shirting, and the great telescope hugged against his side by his left arm; pay heed to his rolling gait; and then, what would you be likely to call him? A sailor, of course! what else could he be? most likely a retired skipper. But watch him more closely as he goes down the street, with his head flung back and his clear blue eyes sweeping the horizon or noting the clouds to windward, and the nickname "Explorer" does not seem out of place. Hark! true, the gallant Explorer's voice is hushed for ever now; but methinks I hear it still, hoarse but hearty, hailing across the street, "What cheer?" Where did he get such a voice, if it was not in contending with the united thunders of Neptune and Boreas?

At the time I knew him The Explorer lived alone. He rented a tiny white-faced cottage on the cliff, and did all his own work. It was a long time before I saw the inside of this cottage, but, judging from the spick-and-spanness of the exterior, I knew it was all ship-shape within. The knocker, the door-knob, and the bell-handle were of brass, and they all sparkled so brightly that it was impossible to look at them without winking. In front of the little cottage, and inside the green palings, there was a square of nicely kept turf, and in the middle of this a circular patch of asphalt, from which arose a tall white flag-staff, for the display of bunting on high days and holidays, or whenever The Explorer considered that the occasion demanded unusual honour and respect. Anniversaries, obscure to the general memory, were glorified in this manner at the white cottage. If questioned as to the reason of an extra adornment of the flag-staff, The Explorer would reply, with the greatest solemnity, "This is Sir Richard Grenville's birthday," or, "This is the date on which Master John Hawkins embarked in the Jesus;" and then he would beam mild pity upon the inquirer for being ignorant of such important facts. Had he chosen, I am sure he might have been a second Hakluyt, for the breadth and profundity of his seafaring lore were astounding. It is true that, as far as anybody could discover, he seemed to know very little else; but he was complete master of the one subject that interested him. Frobisher and Drake, Willoughby and Behring, Miles Phillips, Thomas Sanders, Hudson, and Captain Cook were among his most intimate friends; he knew every incident in their lives, could tell, without the slightest hesitation, the names of their ships, when they sailed, and what became of them. The mere mention of any one of them in his presence would make his eyes kindle with pleasure, and he would wax eloquent upon the subject of their gallant exploits whenever he could find anybody willing to listen to him. The most thrilling romance of the sea was dull compared with his talk, for The Explorer was something of an actor; and so completely was he mastered by his subject, that for the time being he seemed to lose his own identity, and become the great voyager whose story he happened to be telling. Little wonder was it that he was beloved of all the boys of Highcliffe, and he was seldom to be seen without a train of eager and devoted followers. He had a power in his eye, like that of the Ancient Mariner, and I never saw a small boy who could resist it. More than one enterprising Highcliffe youth gathered together all his personal belongings into a bundle and ran away to sea; and I regret to say that The Explorer never heard of such an occurrence without shaking his sides with suppressed laughter, and for days afterwards he would be subject to explosive chucklings of huge delight. The only time I ever saw him in low spirits was when one of these a dozen of our Highcliffe fishermen who, in the slack season, lounged about the jetty, and earned the title of "loafers." The Explorer was in his element among these men, and it made me like him all the better to find that his experience of blue water had not made him blind to the skill and bravery of the boatmen.

"He was beloved of all the boys."—p. 379.

runaway youngsters was pursued and brought back home, and afterwards soundly flogged until he submitted to be apprenticed to an uncongenial trade.

And now I must tell how it was that I first gained an entrance into The Explorer's little white cottage. The Highcliffe coast was considered to be a very dangerous one, and a winter never passed without its wrecks; but we boasted of a fine life-boat and as stout-hearted a set of fellows as ever gave the lie to the contempt which lurks behind the name of "long-shore-men." There never was a true blue "salt" with a heart readier for danger, or a hand quicker upon the oar when it was needed, than the hearts and hands of

Whenever the weather was "dirty," The Explorer would be found on the jetty, and the slightest gale was sufficient to blow him out of bed in the middle of the night. For my own part, I never pretended to take any interest in storms, and if ever I was awakened by the howling of the wind, I always drew the bed-clothes high up over my ears, and went to sleep again. But I well remember a storm which refused to be ignored in this fashion. The wind shrieked round all four corners of the house at once, and seemed to seize it and shake it as a terrier might a rat, making all the windows rattle, and tearing off a slate or a chimney-pot with every fresh gust. After several vain attempts to deafen myself to what was going on, I at last sat up in bed, and instantly the dull and heavy booming of a minute-gun fell upon my ears. This decided me. I got up, dressed myself in oil-skins, and made my way down to the jetty.

I was not surprised, when I arrived there, to hear the hoarse voice of The Explorer sounding above the fierce roaring of the gale. There was a crowd of excited men and women on the jetty, and I soon found out that the lifeboat was about to be launched. By the light of a flaring lantern I could see the crew in their scarlet caps and cork jackets, and foremost among them, clad like the rest, was The Explorer. The word was given, and they all leapt into their places; and then sat with uplifted oars as calmly as if they were about to practise on a still sea. The ropes were let go, and the boat swept swiftly down the inclined plane and plunged into the black and boisterous waves. In an instant it was swallowed up in the darkness; and after our first cheer of encouragement, we all stood with bated breath, waiting for what would happen next. Now and again the ghastly glare of a blue light would burst out in the midst of the blackness far away, showing us the position of the wreck; but we could catch no glimpse of the lifeboat. After a time no more lights were burned, and we knew that either the wreck had foundered or the lifeboat had done her work. Another weary time of waiting followed; and then above the lulling tempest we heard a hail. The lifeboat was safe. We all shouted a hearty welcome, and our cheers were faintly echoed from the sea. We crowded down to the edge of the foaming surf, and in a moment more we were helping the gallant crew to bring ashore the people who had been saved from the wreck. But where was the figure which should have been foremost in the work? Why was that hearty voice hushed which should have been shouting gruff triumph because the sea had been robbed of its prey? My heart sank within me, and a question was trembling on my lips, when two of the lifeboat's crew waded ashore, staggering under the weight of a heavy helpless form. I sprang forward, knowing what I should see; and I was not mistaken. The flaring lantern lit up a face that was as pale as death—the face of The Explorer.

A word or two from the men explained how he had been the first of the lifeboat's crew to set foot on the deck of the sinking ship, how he had worked harder than any of them, and how he had been suddenly stricken down by a falling spar. We laid him in a hammock, hastily improvised with a sail slung between a couple of oars, and then bore him gently home to his cottage. The doctor was quickly summoned, and from the half-dozen men who volunteered to help nurse the injured Explorer, I was chosen.

This is how it was that I became an inmate of the white cottage; but I was too troubled about the condition of its owner to pay much attention to the internal arrangements of the place, which, at any other time, would have been full of interest to me. The doctor gave no hopes of The Explorer's recovery, but he did not apprehend any immediate danger; so that when the patient's injuries had been attended to, and he had fallen into a heavy sleep, I was able to look about me a little. Never was ship's cabin trimmer or more snugly arranged than the tiny room in which The Explorer slept. Every available inch of space had been utilised, and there was no speck of dust or sign of disorder to be seen anywhere. Varnished mahogany, polished brass, and sparkling glass gave the place quite a bright and cheerful appearance; the floor was as white as the deck of a man-of-war; and at the head of the bunk there were several solid book-shelves, bending beneath the weight of the ponderous volumes which formed The Explorer's library—a library entirely composed of the records of famous voyagers. By way of ornament, there were a few brightly coloured prints of sea-pieces in maple frames, and a model of a fine vessel, which I afterwards learned was the work of The Explorer. Besides these things, there was a three-quarter figure of Neptune, resplendent in green and gold paint, some time the figurehead of a goodly ship; and this strange ornament almost covered the whole of one wall of the little room, the knees of the sea-king resting upon the floor, or deck, and the barbed points of his trident piercing the ceiling.

Here it was that The Explorer fought his grim fight with Death; and when at last he was able to leave his bunk and sit up for a few hours every day, I thought he had conquered. But it was not so; the doctor shook his head and told of internal injuries; and the patient himself never spoke of recovery. He told me quite calmly that he knew his voyaging was done, and the port was in sight. Then he asked the doctor if he would live long enough to reach Australia in a sailing vessel; and after some hesitation the doctor told him that it was very doubtful. Then a strange gleam came into The Explorer's eye, and he said he would go. I asked if he had friends in Australia, and he shook his head; but from that time, seeing that the doctor did not mean to forbid the journey, he began to make his preparations for departure. Most of these preparations concerned the disposition of his little property; and having made me his trustee, he talked to me quite freely about his plans. From these talks I learned that he had no relatives living; and his wish was that his little cottage should be turned into a sailors' reading-room and library, the nucleus of which already existed in his own collection of books; and the money he left behind was to be devoted to the maintenance of a disabled seaman who was to act as caretaker; the choice of a succession of deserving men to devolve upon a committee, annually elected upon conditions named in The Explorer's will.

It was in vain that I endeavoured to persuade The Explorer to give up his voyage; he listened with grave politeness to all my objections, but he never swerved from his purpose. He took his passage, sent forward a single chest of the things he might require, and promised me that if he lived to reach Australia he would come back again. The night before his departure I sat with him in his little cabin, and then it was that, in a few brief words, he told me the story of his life.

"You have been a true friend to me," he said, "and I somehow feel as if I ought not to keep the truth a secret from you. What would you say," he added, "if I told you that I am sailing under false colours?"

"The flaring lantern lit up a face that was as pale as death—the face of The Explorer."—p 381.

I have made up my mind to haul down the Union Jack and run up my true flag to the masthead. What do you think it is?"

I did not answer, and, making a wry face, he said—

"A yard of sarcenet ribbon! You think I'm a sailor, don't you?"

"Why, of course I do!" I answered. "Everybody knows you are!"

"Ah!" he said, "I thought so—I meant them to. Well, sir, everybody is quite wrong! I'm no more a sailor than you are—I'm a retired linen-draper!"

As he said this, he actually blushed, and shrank away from me, as if he had uttered something disgraceful; but when I took his hand in mine and pressed it warmly, he recovered himself and hastened to say—

"Don't mistake me, and think that I want to cast contempt upon a respectable trade: it isn't that; but somehow it goes against a sailor's grain to sell yards of ribbon and lace. It may be that the mind used to miles and miles of blue water and sky, finds it niggling work to measure by inches."

"Then you are a sailor, after all?" I said.

He laughed, rather sadly, I thought.

"Well, I am, and I'm not," he replied. "You shall hear my story in a few words. Did you ever hear of a man living two lives? Of course you did. We've all met people who make a show of being decent and respectable folk, who would be the veriest scamps if they had the chance: ay, who are the veriest scamps when they get out of the eyeshot and earshot of the people they wish to stand well with. That's one sort of double living; but there are other sorts. I was born to be a sailor; my father, grandfather, and great-grandfather were all sailors—I can't get far enough back in my family history to find a time when we weren't sailors. My mother's people, too, were mostly seafaring, and so, you see, the blue water was in my blood. Of course, I meant to be a sailor myself, and from the time I first talked I vowed that I would be nothing else; and the vow pleased my father, though my mother turned pale, and called me a foolish child.

"I won't waste your time by telling you all my boyish dreams of the sea; it is enough to say that, asleep or awake, I never dreamed of anything else. As I grew towards the age when I must go to sea, my longing became almost unbearable, till at last my father, who was a skipper, promised to take me with him on his next voyage; but my joy at the promise was dashed at the sight of my mother's tears. Boy-like, I soon forgot all about her grief, and waited impatiently for my father to return. We lived at Portsmouth, and every spare moment of my time was spent down by the harbour, watching for his ship. It never came. Far out at sea it went down, and my father and all his men were drowned; my mother was almost heart-broken, and when I tried to console her in her trouble she told me for the first time how she had lost her own father and a favourite brother at sea. 'The cruel sea robs me of all I love!' she said. 'Only you are left to me; and if you go to sea I shall be robbed of you too. Promise me that you will stay ashore with me.' It was a hard thing to do; even now I can feel the pain which struck the death-blow to all my hopes; but the thing had to be done: the most cowardly deserter from battle would have been brave compared with me if I had left my mother then, and I promised: I promised that while she lived and needed me I would never trust my life on the sea.

"I kept my promise; my mother apprenticed me to a linen-draper, and during her lifetime I never so much as set foot in a sailing-boat. She died ten years ago, so you see I could never be a sailor—that is, not in reality; but I did the next best thing: I became a sailor in imagination. You know what I said about leading a double life? Well, that's what I've been doing. I didn't shirk my own trade, because to do work half-heartedly only makes it hateful; I even got on and made money at it, so that my mother ended her days in ease and comfort, like a lady; and when she died I knew that it had been given me to make her life a happy and peaceful one. But I resolved that the sly and subtle temptations which lie in wait like poisonous serpents to seize upon a trader's soul should not coil round mine. Very soon after the bitter day of my apprenticeship, a volume of voyagers' tales came into my hands, and it was while I was reading them, with my heart hungering for news of the glorious sea, that I learned the grand secret that, in spite of the slavery of my body, my mind was free. From that moment I became a sailor in imagination; everything I read was about the sea, ships, and sailors. After shop-hours I dressed like a sailor, I mixed with sailors, and made friends with sailors; and, although my promise would not let me put off from the shore, I overran all the ships in the harbour, and climbed their rigging till I knew every rope and spar as well as I knew my master's stock of drapery. Then I wandered for hours, even at night-time, along the sea-shore, both in storm and calm; and in my hours of deepest longing I would fling myself passionately down upon the wet rocks, just within reach of the incoming tide, and shout with joy as the cold salt spray broke upon me in delicious showers."

The Explorer ceased, and then seeing that I looked unsatisfied, he said—

"That's the end of the story. When my good old mother died, ten years ago, I sold off my business, and ran away from everybody who had known me, because I wanted to forget about the drapery as much as possible. That is how it was that I came here and became a longshore-man."

There was little I could say to The Explorer when he had finished; I could only press his hand again; and tell him how proud I was to be his friend. After that, seeing that he was tired, I bade him good-night; and on the morrow I accompanied him on board ship, and saw the last of him before he sailed.

I never saw him again. He died in mid-ocean, and I received a message of farewell from him, enclosed in a letter from the captain of the ship, who wrote, at his request, to inform me of his death. Then the reason of this voyage dawned upon me. The last words of the farewell note were these: "I am dying, and I am glad I shall die at sea. Please God, I shall sleep under blue water, after all." And I, too, was glad to know that the last wish of the gallant, simple-hearted Explorer was granted to him; for never was there a sailor of them all who had more nobly earned a sailor's grave.

THE HUSH OF THE SOUL.

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A.

HIS subject, "The Hush of the Soul," is not one of prime necessity to a man's salvation: it is one which enters into the higher aspirations, and possibilities, and powers of the spiritual life.

It is, perhaps, not easy to bring exactly before the mind what is properly conveyed in the word "Hush"; and yet I cannot use any other word, for none other will express what I mean. "Silence," which approaches the nearest to it, is not it at all. Silence is necessary to it, but is not it. Silence may be purely negative—simply the absence of sound; it involves no consciousness, in it there need be no intensity, the heart-strings may be all unstrung; but when there is "Hush" there is intensity: it gathers up silence into itself, but in the spiritual life passes beyond it, far away.

What we describe by the word "Hush" is present after its worldly operation in some worldly circumstances. For example: there is the Hush of Awe, and the Hush of Expectation, and the Hush of Mystery.

I have known the first when expecting the ship to sink under my feet and death to be close at hand, when in a moment the creaking and groaning of the timbers ceased, and the mad flapping of the sails was still, and the thousand demons that seemed to scream through the cordage were silent, and down, deep in the trough of the sea, even the waves could make no sound—in the dead silence of that awful time for the man sitting alone in that little cabin there was a Hush—the Hush of Awe.

And there is the Hush of Expectation. I must go very low down for an example of this. You will see it best in the set of the head, and the look of the eye, and the half-opening of the mouth of a little child when its mother says "Hush!" "Hark!" and puts up her finger, and the child gathers itself up into such intensity as its nature is capable of—listening for the expected—it knows not what.

Or if you are too big for such an example as this, you may gather some idea of a "Hush," as distinguished from mere silence, if you mark what falls upon a crowded and excited court, when, in a case of murder, the foreman of the jury stands up to deliver the verdict; or when the judge puts on the black cap—that awful symbol of death—and when the prisoner is about to be doomed to die.

And you know, perhaps, what the Hush of Mystery is: when, how, or why, or whence, you cannot tell—a silence deeper than the silence that is around falls upon your soul, and you fail to interpret yourself to yourself, and you know not why. And, personally, if I had no other evidence of my having a soul, this feeling alone would make me think seriously of what I am.

These things of earth will help me to take in the idea, which is so hard to be defined or explained, but which is before me now—the Soul's "Hush"—happiest amongst those who read these lines is he who knows it oftenest and most.

The Soul's "Hush" is when our spirit, in its very inner essence, apart even from the disturbance of its own thoughts, draws near (I write it humbly, almost fearfully) to the presence of God's Spirit, and lies, as it were there, without word or thought, in the simple consciousness of the communion of spirit with Spirit.

The Hush of the Soul (so little known, and for such short times to us) is, perhaps, the highest attainment possible for us at this side heaven.

It is different from prayer, it is different from active thought (disturbances, as we know only too well, can make themselves heard in these); we are not asking anything, we are not even thinking about or wanting anything—we are simply and intensely realising that we are Christ's.

There is something above prayer, above contemplation, above ordinary communion: it is this—the communion of simple consciousness that our spirit is with God's Spirit, and that that swallows up all else—that that is enough.

Some of my readers have, I am sure, had spiritual yearnings and feelings which they could not understand; perhaps they might comprehend them a little better by what they have just now read.

There are degrees in the access to the Father which men attain to—all of which are by Christ, all through the Holy Spirit; that which I have mentioned now is perhaps the highest which it is possible to attain. It may be that while here below we can have it but seldom, but we may, by God's help, gather ourselves up into it at times. The scent of thousands upon thousands of flowers is gathered up into a single drop of true attar of roses; how much of our spiritual energies may be condensed into even a short laying of our spirit humbly close—very close (in the acceptance of Christ)—to the Being of God Himself!

We must not say that all this is transcendental: some fancy flight which goes, like the rocket, very high, and ends in a shower of coruscations, bright indeed, but barren—beautiful for a brief moment above, but productive of nothing below. It is not so. The drop of scent, and not the rocket, is the true image here. That one drop of scent can fill a room, can pervade a house—it will be true to its condensation: it can give out much, because in it there is much.

If in (so to speak) the very essence of our spirit we have been with God in the unearthliness of the Soul's "Hush," we shall be able to diffuse more of God and heaven upon earth. One moment of the Soul's Hush in the stillness of the innermost union with God will make us more holy than many efforts—aye, than many prayers.

And as to ourselves: who can tell the blessings which will flow to us out of even these transitory Hushes of the Soul? They will be a secret of amazing power and comfort in our spiritual life. Their secret will linger with us amid the down-draggings of our temporal and our spiritual life. They will be secret helpers. Even though we have not this communion at any particular moment, we shall remember that we had.

I know that there are tremendous hindrances to even a moment's very close communion with God. How can we expect the man full of the things of earth to have it—the over-busy, the man that scatters himself everywhere and concentrates himself nowhere, the one that is always in public and never in private, that is always on the run and never on his knees, whose life is written without stops, until it comes to the full stop, when time's tale is told, and, so far as earth is concerned, its book is shut for ever.

But there are others who have hindrances to realising the mighty power of the Soul's "Hush"; and those hindrances are no less hindrances because they come by a good road, and not a bad. A man's own religious activities, his bustle of religious work, his mental efforts after learning this and that about Divine things, may all cheat him of the power and blessing of the Soul's "Hush" with God; while he is running round and round the circumference, he is missing the centre.

We attain to many accesses to God, but not to the innermost possible of all. Guard against that; do not let your activities cheat you of your rest.

May God give us, amid all the activity which distracts us in both our temporal and spiritual life, to be able now and again to gather ourselves up from earthly things, and spiritual too, just to come, through Christ and by the Holy Spirit, in the Hush of the Soul, close up to God; and then, to come forth into life with the mighty power of having been there.

It may be that some of my readers may say: "All this is too high for us; we cannot attain unto it." Nor is it needful for salvation that we should. Thank God, it is not needful, else many an one must surely die. But does the master never sing a high note, which the pupil will find it hard to reach? does the painter never put in a touch which his scholar will take long to copy? does the builder never put on the steeple-top a gilded finial, without which indeed the steeple, and its tower, and the whole church is safe? Has not God put mountain-tops within reach of the sight and toilsome ascent of those, whose life has for the most part to be spent amid the valleys and the plains? We do not know to what we can attain until we try—how high we can climb until we breast the ascent. Like Jesus, we may have to come down soon from our mount—I had almost said of transfiguration—to see and mix with the petty miseries around—perhaps, in our case, the petty miseries of our own disciple life; but we shall bring down with us the power that comes of having been close with God.

This subject is no encouragement to dreamy mysticism; the one who takes it in ought to get food from it in his daily common life.

Some of my readers, I have little doubt, have been seeking God in duties and prayers, and readings and contemplations; to a certain extent—it may be to a considerable extent—you have found Him; but you have not found Him as you want to find Him; you seem never to have got to His very self. All these are good; God is in them all; but, in a way beyond them all, He is for the soul that even, as it were but for a moment or two, comes spirit to Spirit, without the intervention of any means at all.

And this will have a practical result. This will make us strive to be like God: this will make us abhor sin: this will make us seek more and more to live in the power of the cleansing blood: this will make and keep us humble, and yet will give us liftings above the earth—bindings which often tie us down so fast.

It may be that to some this seems like a venturing into the Holy of Holies, to do which was death.

But this is the very thing which we now may do. The veil of the Temple is rent. The High Priest has first gone in Himself alone; but for such of us as can receive it there is a beckoning also to come in. The only-begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, reveals Him. This is why I dare to write on such a subject as this: this is why it may be said to the greatest sinner who reads these lines: "This great thing is for you, because Christ is for you; there is access unto the Father through Him."

The Buddhist, when he has passed through many transmigrations, in which his sins or his sinfulness will be purged away, hopes to be absorbed in God; we, being purged in the blood of Christ, look to be forever our own very selves, but very near to God.

It is this that will be the portion of the saved forever, and it is of this that we may have a glimmer and a foretaste now. God give to my reader often in life, and God give him on his dying bed, while his spirit may be close to God's Spirit, with naught between—that he may have fruition of what we have been considering: "The Hush of the Soul."

THE BEAUTY OF GOODNESS.

THIS is a very hard world to some of us. We need all the beauty we can find to brighten up the darkness and ugliness of the dull life we make for ourselves. So many people go on from day to day, grumbling at their round of trivial duties, and the small hardships they are called upon to bear, and so making their life dreary, ugly, commonplace, when it might be one of the most beautiful things on the earth. To endure, to suffer for the right, to bear little discomforts and daily trials for the sake of duty; to show the beauty of goodness and simple obedience—the world has nothing to show greater or grander than this.

There are no greater heroes than those who have simply done their duty in the face of difficulties and opposition; and it does us good sometimes to look back to these men and women who laid down their lives, or—a still harder task sometimes—lived through them for the sake of others; those who found sacrifice to be nobler than happiness, and duty better than pleasure, but who would simply have said of themselves that they had done what they ought. There have been many beautiful lives known to the world, and many that have never been noticed by men, though their influence may move generation after generation. Some we find in our own times; some shine down to us from the darkness of the Middle Ages.

And among these last stands prominently the figure of Carlo Borromeo, Bishop of Milan. He died three hundred years ago, but his name lives still in the world for his boundless charity and self-sacrifice: for, while away from his beloved city, he heard that the plague had attacked Milan, and delayed not an instant in taking up his part. The plague! the scourge and dread of mediæval times; the pestilence that spared none! Up rose the great bishop, and cried to his clergy to make ready, that he might return at once to his stricken people. Terrified and cowardly, they besought him not to run into danger, but received the noble reply: "It is the duty of a bishop to give his life for his flock. He may not desert them in time of danger."

They hesitated and temporised. "That is indeed the higher course," said they, willing themselves to take the lower, if only so they could save their own lives.

"But it is a bishop's duty to take the higher course," said Borromeo, and, without delay, he set out with his unwilling train and journeyed to Milan. A beautiful city it must have looked, as it lay before him, but he knew well the horrors that awaited him there, when once he had left the purity and freshness of the country behind him, and had entered its infected air. There, for four months, he worked among the poor, plague-stricken people—the terrible, hopeless poor of the Middle Ages—in the midst of sights and surroundings of which we can have no idea. He thought no task derogatory, no labour too hard or loathsome for him to undertake, if he could only help his poor people; and his noble example must have touched the souls of his clergy, for they followed in his footsteps, working hard and tending the sick, rewarded by the thanks and blessings of all men.

And yet this man, who sacrificed himself for others, and gave nearly the whole of his enormous revenue in charity, was opposed and persecuted. His enemies called him a desecrator of the Sabbath, because he instituted Sunday-schools for the children of the poor; they carried their hatred so far as to attempt his murder, and fired at him while he was officiating in his church. The bullet missed him, and the bishop continued his prayers with a calm countenance. A brave and devoted man this; and there are others who have been as brave.

In our own times, we have seen doctors and nurses volunteering for posts of danger and endurance, thinking nothing of their own lives and comfort while they could minister to the sufferings of others stricken by cholera or fever. They have thought little of death; they have been content to give their lives without praise from men; but such lives and such deaths have made the world better, and have been beautiful in the eyes of those who come after them.

There are many kinds of heroism, many forms of duty; and surely that man is a hero worthy to be remembered, who clings to what is right when in the midst of cruel foes, and with no support of any kind to uphold him, except the determination to keep to his duty. Such heroes were the poor, rough English soldiers taken prisoners in the course of the Indian Mutiny. They were offered a choice between the recantation of their faith, and death by horrible tortures. They were all alone; they had no hope of rescue; they did not know that those at home in England would ever hear of their fate, yet not one of them failed in his duty to his religion.

They went cheerfully to death sooner than give up Christianity.

Not only among soldiers or men who are accustomed to face death do we find this high ideal of duty. There are some men who have passed their lives quietly and unobtrusively, doing their allotted work simply, until the moment came when the real nature of the soul was to be revealed. Goodness and love of what is right must be planted deeply in the life of a man who turns unswervingly to duty when the sudden temptation is placed before him. John Maynard's name stands high among those who have given their lives for others. No question of doctrine or patriotism moved him, but the simple fact that he had more than a hundred lives dependent upon him. He must die, if they were to live. He was steersman upon one of the American lake steamers. The cry of fire was raised, and the crowd of passengers and crew gave way to a panic of fear. John Maynard was at the wheel; he kept his place. The fire increased. The only chance of saving all those lives was to steer the steamer in to the shore, and this he set himself to do. He kept steady at his wheel while the torment of the flames drew nearer and nearer; he stood steadfast at his task when half-suffocated by the smoke, and singed and scorched by the fierce fire. He steered the others into safety before he fell dead, blackened and burned: he had done his duty.

There is a noble pair whose names have come down to us as sufferers for the right. Colonel Hutchinson was a Puritan; and on the accession of Charles II. was arrested among many others, and imprisoned in Sandown Castle. Here his wife Lucy came, longing to see him, and took a little lodging near by, to comfort him in his imprisonment. He was offered freedom and life if he would abjure his faith; but the stern Puritan was not to be tempted. He would promise to live quietly, to make no disturbance—so much would he do for the sake of his wife and children—but he would never disclaim his opinions, not even to gain his life. So he languished in prison, and from that prison has come down to us a scrap or two from his diary, showing the love he bore his wife and children, and the longing he had to be free with them once again. But duty could not be deserted, and in prison he lingered and died—perhaps in time to save himself from some worse end. And to Lucy, his brave wife, he had spoken brave words before he died—charging her, as she was so far above other women in goodness and constancy, so to be also far above them in bearing her sorrow. She was not to give way to grief for him, or mourn unrestrainedly; other duties lay before her, and she must learn to rule herself. There must have been sorrow enough in her heart, but she bore herself nobly under it, as his last words had willed. She had her children to educate and her husband's memory to honour, and she lived a long life of devotion to these aims. She wrote a life of her husband; and there is a very touching address to her children as preface to her book, in which she speaks of herself as—"I who am under a command not to grieve at the common rate of desolate women," and in which she tells them how she has tried to conquer her sorrow by writing; this life for their benefit. Lucy Hutchinson was never called upon to lay down her life for others; but it would have been an easier task for her to die with her husband, than to live her long life of devotion to her duty, and never to mourn for what she had lost.

Men have made other sacrifices than their own lives in the course of duty. Some have been called upon to give up those dearer to them than themselves. Witichis, King of the Goths in Italy, a man of simple goodness and integrity, gave up wife and family and all the joys of home at the request of his council, who proved to him that it was for the good of the Gothic nation, and his duty as their king. And from ancient Spain comes a story to us, how a noble count, besieged by the Moors in a castle which he held for the king, was called to his battlements in the early light of morning by the sound of trumpets, to behold his only little son bound in the hands of his enemies. "Here is our hostage!" cried they. "Surrender the castle at noon, or your son shall die!" He would not betray his trust; the hours passed on, and he still kept the castle for his king (with what agony of spirit one can guess), and his little son died.

"All men have their price," says the cynic.

It is not true; money, rank, and honour have no power over men of simple goodness. Lord Outram refused to touch the Scinde prize-money, amounting to £3,000, which fell to his share. He held it to be unrighteously gained, and had it all bestowed in charity. Chamillard, a French advocate, having lost a case for one of his clients, through having mislaid an important document that had been placed in his hands, and finding no appeal against the judgment was possible, gathered together all his fortune and gave it to his client, to make up the sum he would have gained had his cause been won. And Kepler, the great astronomer, while receiving a miserably small salary at Linz, refused a valuable professorship at Bologna, because he would not be allowed to speak what he knew to be truth. "I might increase my fortune," said he, "but I should have to give up my freedom of speech." He found it his duty to stay where he was, and to put up with hard and penurious living and daily deprivation, sooner than give up his right to speak the truth.

There is a noble utterance of an old New England gentleman, which sums up everything that can be said upon the subject.

In the early days of New England, an eclipse of the sun took place during the sitting of the Connecticut House of Legislature. Such things were not very well understood in those days, and the unusual darkness terrified the legislators. They thought the day of judgment had come upon them, and some of the members were anxious to break up the sitting at once. But Mr. Davenport, of Stamford, stood up in his place and spoke out like a brave and steadfast man from the gloom. "Gentlemen," said he, "if the day of judgment has come upon us, I, for one, should wish to be found in my right place and doing my duty. Gentlemen, I move that candles be brought, and that we proceed with our business."

THE WOMAN OF TO-DAY.

A TALK WITH MISS EMILY FAITHFULL

BY RAYMOND BLATHWATT.

HERE is a quiet part of Manchester, once very fashionable, but now unpretending enough, of which Plymouth Grove forms a large and imposing portion. A lengthy road it is, lined on either side with houses that are not unpicturesque, and whose very inequality of size and dissimilarity of appearance lend an air of pleasing variety to what would otherwise be of a dead and prosaic sameness. In one of these houses once lived Mrs. Gaskell; in one of these houses she wrote "Mary Barton;" and in No. 10 lives and works Miss Emily Faithfull to-day. It is a snug little dwelling, and most of its charm is owing to the taste and skill of Miss Charlotte Robinson, "Home Art Decorator to Her Majesty," who lives with Miss Faithfull, and is the friend who travelled with her through the United States before she commenced her own decorative mission. Two very remarkable women, you will say—and so indeed they are; for is not Emily Faithfull the pioneer in the woman's march through life? She has borne the burden—the burden and heat of the day; on her shoulders have rested many serious responsibilities, her busy brain has solved many grave problems. Beyond most women, she has exerted herself in the cause of her sex, and invaluable have been her services in promoting the industrial and educational interests of women. Others are reaping now where she has sown, and she—brave soul!—is well pleased that this should be so. And in herself, what is she like—she of whom we have heard and read so much, have respected and admired so thoroughly? As she slowly rises from her big arm-chair—for she is somewhat of an invalid—to greet me, I see a tall, fine-looking woman, with short hair that has hardly yet begun to turn grey; a singularly pleasant, rather florid, and very humorous face—for that, I may add, is one of her charms. Emily Faithfull is possessed of the keenest sense of humour, which has been her salvation. "So many of the so-called 'advanced' women," she once remarked to me, "are absolutely without humour; they cannot see the humorous side of things which would have prevented them from making themselves ridiculous, and so doing harm to the whole movement." The room in which we were seated was arranged and adorned by Miss Charlotte Robinson herself, and harmonised absolutely with the character of its occupant: that, indeed, is a speciality in Miss Robinson's mode of work; she holds that a room should reflect—should be an expression, as it were, of its occupant's habit of thought and character. Miss Faithfull, practical though she be, and no mere idle dreamer, yet lives in the world of books; therefore dark-hued, cleverly contrived shelves, filled their whole length with books, line her walls. No decoration so handsome for a room as books. In the little recess where Miss Faithfull writes hangs a portrait of the Queen, which her Majesty herself had signed and sent to Miss Faithfull. A sketch of her own mother comes next, and on one wall hang the portraits of a clerical grandfather and a very beautiful grandmother. There is an autographed portrait of Queen Elizabeth of Roumania (Carmen Sylva), whom Miss Faithfull met when she was in England a few years ago, and of her old friend and fellow-worker, Lord Shaftesbury. After a while we fell to talking.

"What to do with our girls?" said Miss Faithfull. "Ah! that's a problem I have been grappling with for many years. Suppose I tell you something of the story of my own life, and then perhaps you will understand better the work I have done. I was born at Headley Rectory, in Surrey, in 1835, and my life up to the time I was presented at Court was uneventful enough. In 1858, I threw myself heart and soul into the work which I have continued ever since. My efforts have been entirely on behalf of the indigent women of the middle and upper classes—the half-educated people, as they certainly were thirty years ago, who had neither sufficient accomplishments to fill the rôle of 'lady-companions,' nor enough accomplishments to make them competent governesses. Now, my endeavour was to find avenues of suitable employment for such people, and I am glad to say that now there are many thousands of women remuneratively employed in various businesses, and their outlook is on the whole infinitely brighter than it was."

"Well, how did you set about it?" I asked.

"I think," she replied, "that my first serious attempt was when I collected a band of women compositors in 1859, and started a regular typographical establishment, which obtained after a while the patronage of the Queen; and"—Miss Faithfull drew my attention to a framed paper—"there are my Letters Patent, appointing me Printer and Publisher to Her Majesty the Queen."

The warrant I noticed was dated June, 1862, and was signed by Lord Sydney.

"In 1863 I commenced the Victoria Magazine, in which my views were very specially advocated, and to which most of the best known writers of the day contributed for the eighteen years I kept it going. I think almost everyone who was anyone wrote for it: Horace Mann, Isa Craig, T. Adolphus Trollope, Hamilton Aidé, William Allingham, Theodore Martin, Harriet Martineau, Thackeray, Sir Henry Taylor, George MacDonald, Edwin Arnold, Leigh Hunt, Frederick Denison Maurice, and many others. There are thirty volumes of it in the bookcase at your side."

"Do you believe in the separation of the sexes as regards work, Miss Faithfull?" I asked.

"No, certainly not," she energetically replied. "I believe in union of work; the man supplements what the woman wants. Do you know," she humorously added, "that is why I rather disapprove of these women-writers' dinners for women only."

"And who came prominently forward to help you in those early days; for I suppose that thirty years ago you were as a voice crying in the wilderness?"

"Quite so; but many came forward. Her Majesty was graciously pleased to recognise my efforts very early in the movement; her example was speedily followed. Lord Shaftesbury, Adelaide Ann Procter, Froude, Dickens, Tennyson, George Eliot, Carlyle, Ruskin, and many others, wrote to encourage me. In those three books beside you," continued my hostess, "you will find innumerable autograph letters from every one of those people. I remember once, many years later, I got up a large meeting in order that I might obtain help for the sufferers in the Franco-German war, and Carlyle wrote me the letter which you may copy, Mr. Blathwayt, and which I value extremely, for I think it gives such a charming glimpse into the man's heart."

Here is the letter—

"DEAR MADAM,—I regret that I cannot get to hear your lecture, which would have been interesting and pleasant to me; but I send a little ear of corn to join with the charitable harvest you are reaping, which, I trust, will be abundant for the sake of those poor French women, whom with all my heart I pity, as you do. With many kind wishes, I remain, always yours sincerely,

"T. CARLYLE."

And Mr. Ruskin on the same occasion wrote—

"I most heartily sympathise with you in your purpose of defining woman's work and sphere. It is as refreshing as the dews and as defined as the moon's, but it is not the rain's nor the sun's."

"In connection with the Victoria Printing Press," she continued, was the Victoria Discussion Society, where women could speak in public, and where many spheres of women's labour were discussed. I remember once I suggested watch-making as a delicate and suitable employment, and Sir John Bennett was heartily in favour of it. In old numbers of the Victoria Magazine you will find many suggestions which are put forward to-day as new, brilliant, and original ideas. I suppose I may not disclaim your assertion that I am one of the pioneers of this movement, but I didn't know or even dream of the extent of the ground I was then breaking up. For instance, I never definitely suggested house-decoration as a profession, or landscape gardening, but these and other occupations are doubtless the outcome of those early efforts. I was the first to advocate the employment of ladies as heads of children's nurseries—that,

I think, is most important where it can be managed, both in the physical and mental interests of their charges."

I remarked on the unfortunate fact that in so many instances women who did step a little out of the ordinary appeared to lose something of their womanly charm.

"Ah!" cried Miss Faithfull, herself a woman to her finger-tips, "why can't woman's work be kept womanly? I always impress on any girls who come to me that if they have a home, that must be the first thing, but some won't realise it. I want women who have no home to be able to work for one, not that they should continue to exist without one. Above all, I want women to realise 'the dignity of work.' Take my friend Miss Charlotte Robinson, who has done a great work, not only for herself, but for many women. I knew her when she was a student at Queen's College, in Harley Street, and I have watched her career ever since she started shopkeeping in London. Do you know that she finds great difficulty sometimes in persuading ladies that they need not be ashamed of openly taking the money earned by honest work? Women who have to earn their own living must abandon all their silly social prejudices, and learn to despise that false pride which makes ladies anxious for paid work sub rosa."

"Don't you think, though, that quite as great an evil is that of women rushing into employment for which they are absolutely untrained?"

MISS FAITHFULL'S ROOM.

"That is one of my strongest arguments," emphatically replied Miss Faithfull, "for the proper and sensible education of women. Why should they not be educated, as their brothers are, for regular professions? Why should all this education be a question of sex? let it be one of fitness, rather. Why should the girl starve and the brother be in a good position? Girls must be trained for their after-life. As a rule, they have no practical training, and only begin to work when they need money, and have already reached the time of life when they ought to be reaping the fruits of past toil instead of beginning to build up a future. Some years ago, writing to the Daily News, I urged three points which must be insisted on with regard to the employment of our girls:—(1) Their need of definite training. (2) The best work, at fair market prices, must be given. Lasting benefit can only be reaped by thorough work and submission to the conditions which alone make it possible. For want of this, I have seen the careers of many women wrecked. (3) As I have just said, senseless social prejudices must be abandoned. We have overcome such prejudices in the case of men, and ladies must have the courage to go to business, and not seek help through 'Work Societies,' in which they are known by some number, and their real name concealed. But in all cases the worker must be trained; untrained work is only paid for as a charity, and the remuneration is sure to be low."

"Was it you, Miss Faithfull," I asked, "who secured the admission of girls to the Oxford and Cambridge examinations?"

"No, not exactly," was her reply; "but the first meetings upon the subject took place at my house, and so I may say I had something to do with it."

"And you believe in it all?"

"Certainly I do—in moderation; but there is a tendency, I think, to overdo it. I don't think the ordinary brain can bear the strain of some of these very stiff examinations; and I feel this in regard to men as well as women."

Comparatively young as Miss Faithfull is, yet she so early became famous that before she was eight-and-twenty years of age her name became known throughout the length and breadth of England. It is told how, in the early part of her career, she was consulted by the well-known lady writer of the early Victorian days—the Hon. Mrs. Norton—who sought her advice on some point, and who frankly told her, as she expressed her astonishment at her youthful appearance, that she had expected to meet an elderly lady in mob-cap and spectacles. The two ladies became fast friends from that hour.

"I am a very general reader," Miss Faithfull replied, when I asked her what best she liked to read. "I am not scientific, though; human things interest me most. Carlyle and Ruskin influenced me immensely in my young days, as did Lowell, most of whose works you will find upon my shelves. I read all the reviews, too: that is, when I have time. For I write many hours a day, and my correspondence alone would frighten many old-fashioned people into their graves. I have lectured too, as you may know, in almost every institute in England and America. I visited Salt Lake City, and very carefully studied the extraordinary people who lived there. I wrote a work on my American experiences, and in it I told of what is being done for women in the great Republic. In some ways they are in front of us; in other respects they are curiously behind us. I am quite in favour of their having the vote," she continued, in reply to my remark upon the extension of the franchise to women; "they pay taxes and they ought to be allowed to vote. Women always have had their fingers in the pie political, and they always will have, as everyone who has read the history of the world from the Garden of Eden to the present hour knows very well. But I am not one of those who say that the power to vote is the end and aim of all things. But," continued my hostess, "I hate fads and extremes, Mr. Blathwayt, and have no sympathy with the fancied grievances, either of women or of politicians. I am for moderation in all things. But to be a reformer and to be moderate at the same time is not easy. People want to go too fast nowadays."

HOW THE PICTURE WAS PAINTED.

IN ONE CHAPTER.

"PLEASE, I came to see you."

Simple words, but they startled a young man. He was lying in a lounge-chair, smoking and reading. When the voice roused him, he came to the conclusion that he must be dreaming. It was no dream—standing looking at him, trying to hold back the heavy curtain over the doorway, was a little child, a self-possessed though a small fair-haired maiden. He had certainly never seen her before. What could she want? He was not to remain long in ignorance.

"Won't you shake hands with me?"

Eric Leslie felt that he must rise to greet his visitor, and they shook hands gravely.

"Please may I sit down? and could I please talk to you?"

This was interesting; he had a novel kind of visitor. As the child settled herself in a chair much too big for her, she looked at him with half-beseeching eyes.

"I think, please, I will begin at the beginning. I am Nellie Carew, and I may not do any lessons, because I was ill. Dr. Sinclair told mother; she is away now, and it is very dull. Dr. Sinclair came to dinner, and daddy has me for dessert; they gived me lots of things. He is such a nice doctor! He said to me, what did I do all day? I told him I drew pictures. Then he speaked to daddy that you painted lovely pictures, and he speaked a great many words too big for me to hear.

Then he spoke to me again, and when nurse came to take me to bed, he said, 'Mr. Leslie paints lovely pictures; you ask him to help you.'

"Please," went on the little murmuring voice, "is it a long story? Thomson brought me here; he takes me when I go on my pony, so I comed. This is a real secret. Father is going to have a birthday. I maked him pen-wipers and lots of things, and I thought if I painted him a picture.—Father gives me six pennies a week. There is lots of things to do with just six pennies. When you gives people presents, they must not pay for them, must they?"

Mr. Leslie agreed gravely.

"Please," began Nellie again—but this time she managed, with some difficulty, to leave the big chair, and placed a tiny hand on his knee. "Please, if I bringed you all my six pennies, will you help me paint a picture?"

"How old are you?"

"I am very old—my clock will soon say eight. Please, is it old enough to paint a picture?"

Eric smiled, and turned his head to look at an easel supporting a large canvas; no good work had been done there for months.

"I am beginning to think, Nellie, that I cannot paint pictures."

This was very sad; the small forehead puckered.

"Dr. Sinclair said you maked lovely ones."

Then a pair of arms went round his neck, a soft mouth kissed him, while the child whispered—

"When I do this to father, he always says 'Yes.'"

The man's grave face brightened, and lighted up wonderfully.

"I will help you, Nellie, if father will let you come here; and I shall not want any pennies."

"Oh, but——"

"No, not any pennies; but you shall give me a kiss like this for every lesson, and you may come as often as you like."

"May I? When nurse is cross and I don't know what to do? Oh, I love you!"

Nellie kept her place on his knee, resting her small head on his shoulder, while she looked round at the big comfortably furnished room. It was a room to delight an artist's soul. The light was perfect; everything that a painter could want lay close at hand. It was full of charming things. Nellie caught sight of a bear's skin, and slipped from Mr. Leslie's knee to examine it, returning with dainty grace, to say—

"Please, may I?"

Hand in hand they made the tour of the room, and then, very reluctantly, the little one said—

"Good-bye, dear Mr. Leslie."

She trotted down the passage, holding his hand; a groom and a diminutive pony awaited her. Nellie was seized with an inspiration.

"Please come with me, and see daddy. He is at home now; he is very busy, because he has to help the Queen. She has so many peoples to take care of, and my daddy helps her."

In a few minutes they had reached Nellie's home, and Mr. Leslie was conducted straight to the room in which, as the child said—

"Daddy worked so hard to help the Queen."

Nellie paused outside the door, looked straight up into the strong face, and then gravely squeezed his finger with her small dainty hands, while the earnest eyes watched him narrowly.

"Your face said you could keep secrets, and now I know you can."

Then he was promptly shown into the presence of "daddy," a shrewd, kindly faced man, whose adoration for his little daughter was unmistakable.

"Father, this is Mr. Leslie."

For a few minutes Lord Carew had no notion of his visitor's identity, but Nellie was equal to the occasion.

"He paints lovely things, and I am going to paint pictures too."

Then he knew. The great artist whose pictures the world had raved about was here in his study with Nellie! His work had been talked about as a thing of the past, and he himself as a brilliant star that had flashed into notice, and had been as suddenly lost. Nellie's father noticed that the sad face, with its keenly observant eyes, was almost bright, as he courteously asked for the pleasure of Nellie's companionship.

Lord Carew demurred in vain. What could he do in the presence of three feet of obstinacy and a pair of little clinging arms? He wondered, as he faced Eric Leslie, what the trouble was that had traced the lines round his mouth, and had given the hard look to his eyes.

"You will be doing me a real kindness; she is such a charming child, and we are going to paint a picture together."

The memory of some old half-forgotten words came to Nellie's father: words about the "leading of a little child." They were true, he knew; the touch of a small hand, the remembrance of clinging fingers, had done more for Lord Carew than anything else.

Mr. Leslie's request was granted, and the two men laughed over Nellie's independent little ways, but her father's voice softened and altered as he spoke of the loving heart. The child herself was deep in conversation with a huge St. Bernard; she felt sure her request would be granted. "Father always said 'Yes.'" She parted reluctantly with her new-found friend, but a story told while she sat on daddy's knee was an exceptional treat, and bed-time came all too soon. She went to sleep with a happy smile on her face, and her father carried with him into the gay world the remembrance of her good-night kiss and the sweet picture of her face.

It was a sad time for him. He was obliged to be in London, while his wife spent the winter in Italy; and she, with wonderful unselfishness, realised what their only little one was to her father, and left her with him.

Somebody else was thinking of Nellie. Eric Leslie paced his studio with long uneasy strides. Two or three times he paused before his easel, then his fingers touched the canvas. He was afraid to think of the times he had attempted to work—the times he had turned away in misery and disgust. A year ago he had been seriously ill, and the illness, combined with the fact that he had lost some illusions, had made good work an impossibility.

Eric Leslie had come to a blank wall—a wall that shut out completely anything of beauty that lay beyond. He had no courage to surmount it; he had no faith to see beyond. He was an orphan, but the world had been good to him; hard work had brought lost its look of interest, the nervous restless hands—hands that had interpreted the beauty he believed in, so exquisitely—lost their power. His voice grew cynical and hard. The ship that had made such a its reward. He had accepted his brilliant success as an artist thankfully, but quietly. The pinnacle of fame did not feel an uneasy post to him. The world fêted and caressed him; it was good to be alive.

"He only held the tiny hand in his."—p. 393.

His fellow-artists laughed at Leslie's cranks and illusions, chaffed him unmercifully, and in their hearts envied him—envied his eager interest, his passionate faith. Some of the elder ones sighed as they thought of the awakening. When it came, the reality was worse than the anticipation. His sensitive eager face splendid start on the sea of life had grown unmanageable; a pilot was wanted to steer it over the treacherous shoals and quicksands into the calm beyond.

Influenza, the doctors said, had attacked the brain. He knew that there were hours of acute agony, when the room seemed full of the mocking voices of these dead illusions, when his life was more than he could bear—hours when his head throbbed, and his heart ached. He had lost his bearings; was there no hand strong enough to give him back his faith?

The next morning he was hardly ready for Nellie before she was there. The dainty child in her pretty fur coat and hat, with curls that had played Hide and Seek with the wind, made a picture indeed. The big St. Bernard followed her into the studio.

"Please I comed, and I bringed Hero. He is father's dog, and I thinked I could paint him in a picture."

Mr. Leslie looked at them both without speaking.

"The only thing is I tried him, and so did father; but he has four legs, you see, and a tail, and it makes it hard. Two legs I drawed, the other two wouldn't be drawed, and, you see, he has four."

In a short time Nellie was hard at work, Hero solemnly surveying the scene.

"Would you, if you drawed a dog, draw him straight up or sitting down? His back legs is so funny then. Shall I draw him first all by myself, and you see if it will do for father's birthday?"

Nellie was busy indeed, and Hero evidently understood that some important function was taking place. Eric Leslie watched in earnest; his fingers longed to put that exquisite little picture on the canvas. A child had given him the longing to press once more to the front.

"What do you do with your pictures when they are done?"

"They hang them up, Nellie, and people go and look at them."

"I have pictures on my nursery wall, but I don't think there is one you did."

"I expect not, Nellie. Would you like one?"

"Please, if you would come and hang it up for me—over my bed, I think. Where do they keep your pictures?"

"In great big places, Nellie."

"Could I go?"

"Go? yes, if you like. Shall we send Hero's picture next year? and you shall come and lunch with me."

"I only have dinner, Mr. Leslie."

"Well, you shall have what you like."

"Is it only big people that go?"

"Generally, Nellie."

Then came an awestruck little whisper.

"They don't wear pinafores, do they? and nurse says if I don't, I spoil my dresses," she added, in a still more mysterious tone. "It is soup what is the worst."

The child's face was so grave that her companion kept his amusement to himself.

"I do so wish he hadn't four legs!"

Suddenly a strong hand held Nellie's fingers, and guided them carefully. The result was so wonderful that Nellie cried out with delight. And so it came to pass that he began work again, hand in hand with a little child.

At last she left her place to show Hero his picture; she had worked so hard, that gradually she slipped down beside him, and soon was fast asleep, with her curly head on the dog's coat. She was carefully covered up, and then Eric Leslie worked busily, eagerly, as he had never even in his best days done before. The big canvas was put out of the way before Nellie awoke.

The days went by, and Nellie told her father that she "drewed beautifully." They were happy days to the artist and to the child. It was a source of infinite content to him that the child loved him.

One day Nellie came in a state of great excitement. She was going to a party—a party that began at four, and did not end till eight. How she talked about it! her interest and pleasure were charming to the weary man. She would drive round on the day of the party to show him her dress.

On a rapidly darkening afternoon a gay little figure danced into the studio, to find Mr. Leslie lying back in his chair, with a very white face, and eyes that did not seem to see her. He hardly looked at her dress; he only held the tiny hand in his hot and burning ones. Surely with her hand in his the mocking ghosts of the past might leave him in peace?

It was dark in the studio, and Nellie was afraid. Mr. Leslie was so funny; and oh! how she hated the darkness! She kissed him with trembling lips, and ran out in the passage. He was conscious in the midst of all his pain that even Nellie's love was very slight.

She, poor little maiden, was fighting a battle, with eyes squeezed tight, to keep the tears from coming. Her party, her beautiful party! but her Mr. Leslie, her dear Mr. Leslie was sad. Nelson, the old butler, was waiting for her; no one else should take his dear little Miss Nellie to her party; and now he was wrapping her up carefully, ready to carry her to the carriage. Suddenly Nellie shook herself free, and whispered softly into his ear—whispered something that brought the tears into the old man's eyes. He did not attempt to dissuade her; he watched her go back into the studio, rubbed the suspicious moisture from his eyes, sent away the carriage, and prepared to wait himself.

Mr. Leslie's housekeeper tried to induce him to sit in her room. "Her master would have no one near him," she declared; but Nelson decided to wait in the passage, as close to Nellie as possible.

Into the dark studio she crept, and with real courage nestled into Eric Leslie's arms. He was moaning with pain, and she was terribly afraid. The little heart grew brave with its burden of love, her cool face pressed against the man's burning one, the pure childish lips kissed him tenderly. Ah! what had happened? The mocking ghosts had vanished! The soft little murmuring voice, the touch of the gentle hands, had done him the greatest possible good. He slept.

Nellie was frightened; it was very lonely. She did not know that Nelson waited patiently in the hall; only the clock ticked solemnly, and every now and then an ember dropped into the grate; strange shadows grew in every corner. She nestled closer to the sleeping man, until the time passing on, the silence grew more than she could bear. She would speak to God: not in a whisper; for, as she had said to her father, "He was so very far off, He might not hear." In a voice that struggled hard to be brave, she said: "Please, dear God, let the angels come close!"

Those were the words that Eric Leslie heard as he awoke to new life: "Please, dear God, let the angels come close!"

He could not speak for the sob in his throat. The pain had left him tired and weak, but the clasp of a child's hand and the music of a child's faith had done what nothing else could.

The fashionable world, in its gay and gala dress, with its would-be bright words and ceaseless smiles, streamed into the Academy on "Private View Day."

One man walked through the rooms with a proud and happy face—a man who was continually stopped and spoken to, but each time he turned with undisguised eagerness to his companion. The two excited comment, for it was the great artist Eric Leslie and a child.

He scarcely noticed anyone, or the people that made way for them, as she stood with him in front of his great picture—"Faith." In the foreground was a child's figure; she was treading a rocky and steep path. Dark clouds, with a gloomy lurid light, had closed in overhead; behind the child, just visible against the dark background, was an angel's form, but the child's face with its brightness made the picture.

Nellie did not understand it; she liked his two other pictures—"The Painting Lesson" and "Asleep"—better. Hero looked lovely.

How Nellie laughed and chattered, how she enjoyed her dinner—a dinner that she had ordered, without any soup.

When the time came to take her home, and as they made their way to the door-way, Nellie suddenly in a quieter corner lifted up her face to be kissed. It amused not a few of the bystanders, but the smiles died away as they heard the sweet little voice say "Mr. Leslie, I do love you."

The faces were grave, even sympathetic, as he bent his head and kissed her, saying reverently: "Thank God!"

NOTES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND WORK IN ALL FIELDS.

LOOKING UP.

HE Psalmist said, "I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh my help." The great tendency of man when he is in trouble is not to look up, but to look round, to see, if possible, what will guide him in circumstances—perhaps in the advice of friends; but, only too often, his last thought is to look up to God.

A lady travelling through a dense forest in one of the Southern States of America was benighted, and soon her coloured driver found that he had lost his way. The man dismounted from the vehicle, and started amongst the trees to find it. The lady noticed with surprise that as he went amongst the trees, he kept looking upwards towards the sky. She asked him why he kept looking upwards to the sky, when he was trying to find the road beneath. The man continued gazing up to the heavens, and said, "If I can find the path in the sky, I can find the road on the ground." He knew in that dense forest the only place where he could see the blue sky above was where the road had been cut through amongst the trees: where there was a clear sky overhead, there was a plain path under-foot.

There may be a good road for us to travel on, and yet we may not have power to discern it, unless it be revealed to us from above. To look up must be our great resource in the time of perplexity and doubt; when we cannot be guided by what we see around, we can be by what we see above. The right path will have Heaven and its revelations above it.

THE MINOR MODE: A PARABLE.

The notes of a musical scale disagreed once about the positions they occupied in the gamut. The chief dissentients were the third and the seventh. They both said that they ought to be more than a semitone below the notes above them. The third was very obstinate, and shifted down so as to put a whole tone betwixt himself and his neighbour, the fourth, forgetting that by so doing he was but half a tone above the second. No arguments could prevail to make him budge. The seventh compromised matters. He consented to remain in the ascending scale where he was, but shifted down a semitone for the descent, and in this bad example he was followed by the sixth. The result was, instead of the major mode expressive of joy and gladness, there arose the minor mode, which ever since has been employed to describe in sound the feelings of pain and sorrow. Moral.—Strife and grief are twin sisters.

AN OLD FRIEND OF "THE QUIVER."

On January 13th last there died at Highbury the Rev. Gordon Calthrop, who had been for so many years associated with THE QUIVER as a welcome contributor. As a faithful pastor and teacher he had long laboured in North London, where his loss will be keenly felt by his devoted people. We are glad to be able to give our readers the latest portrait of our dear friend, whose place in their estimation it will be very hard to fill.

THE HAND THAT GIVES.

Our judgment of beauty is regulated by the seen, but there is another judgment which proceeds on different grounds. The judgment of the seen will pass away, the judgment of the unseen will abide. I have read of a number of beautiful women who were one day discussing what constitutes beauty in the hand. They differed greatly in opinion. A gentleman friend made his appearance, and with one consent they agreed to leave the settlement of the question to him. It was a most delicate matter. He thought of the fabled difficulty of Paris in deciding which of the three beauties was most worthy of the golden apple. Glancing from one to another of the white hands presented for his examination, he replied at last: "I will give it up—the question is too hard for me; but ask the poor, and they will tell you the most beautiful hand in the world is the hand that gives." In God's sight no doubt it is so: the hand that in any form is stretched out to help is the beautiful hand, the mouth that speaks the word of love is the beautiful mouth, the eye that gives the kindly look is the most beautiful eye. The judge of true beauty seeth not as man seeth, judgeth not as man judgeth. Oh, may we have the beauty which will be precious in His sight!

THE MONTH'S NEW BOOKS.

We gather from the preface to Principal Fairbairn's new book, "Religion in History and in Modern Life" (Hodder and Stoughton) that the bulk of it has seen the light before, though the very timely essay on "The Church and the Working Classes" is new. The lectures which form the older portion of the book were originally delivered to working men at Bradford, and as a handbook for all Christian teachers having relations with what is broadly known as "the democracy" the volume is most seasonable and helpful.—To Messrs. Sampson Low and Co.'s "Preachers of the Age" series the Rev. Charles Moinet, of Kensington, contributes a volume which he calls "The 'Good-cheer' of Jesus Christ," the title being that of the first sermon. Earnest, eloquent, and well thought out, these sermons should prove of great service in this handy volume.—Messrs. Nisbet send us a new collection of extracts from the writings of William Law, the Non-juror, under the title of "Wholly for God." The selection is made, and the introduction written, by the Rev. Andrew Murray. A good deal of Law's writing has "fallen out of fashion" of late; but its high hortatory value must not be overlooked, and we welcome this excellent presentation of a good selection from it. Sound teaching can never be out of date.—Canon Howell has written for Messrs. Nisbet's "Scripture Handbooks" an admirable little manual on "The Church Catechism," which should prove very helpful to both teachers and students in the preparation for examinations.—Two more of the late Richard Proctor's books have been added to the Silver Library published by Messrs. Longmans. They are "The Orbs Around Us" and "The Expanse of Heaven," both popular books on astronomy, bringing a knowledge of the heavenly bodies within reach of the simplest mind. Such works should find a place on the shelves of every library open to young readers.

PARABLE OF THE SEALING-WAX.

"How fearfully hot it is!" cried a stick of sealing-wax. "It's positively exhausting. I can't stand much more of this"; and thereupon the poor thing began to bend and twist under the heat. But it grew hotter and hotter still, as a cruel hand kept it remorselessly in the flame of a candle. Then the wax began to melt, and portions dropped off on to a sheet of paper placed to catch them. And these were moulded into shape under pressure of a signet. "Really," said the sealing-wax, "I didn't know that I could look so splendid. Just see this crest!" Moral.—The fire of adversity discovers our worth.

DEATH-BED TRUTH.

Mere theology will be able to do little for a man upon his dying bed. He will not want much of it. Many a question about which men contend almost fiercely now will be of no moment to them then. It has been truly said by great theologians that but a few simple truths are wanted on the dying bed. Some half-dozen passages of Scripture will be all that the soul requires. Thank God that the needed Scriptures that 'll do; there's much there for me," and peacefully expired. May you, good reader, find that enough for you upon your dying bed!

"THE QUIVER" LIFEBOAT.

We give this month a recent photograph of THE QUIVER lifeboat at Margate, with her crew and Mr. Jephson, the Honorary Secretary of the Margate Branch of the Royal National Lifeboat Institution.

"THE QUIVER" LIFEBOAT AND HER CREW.

(From a Photograph by Goodman & Schmidt, Margate.)

are so plain that they are within reach of very humble intelligence indeed! There was a man lying in St. George's Hospital with an arm broken. He had been only a year married; his first child had just been born, and there he lay separated from all he loved. The arm was amputated, and shortly after a brother came up from Scotland to see the poor man. The patient asked him to read to him the eighth chapter of Romans. He read, "There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus. . . . Nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." And, as the brother read this last verse, the man said, "There,

The boat has been called out more than once in the course of the past winter. During the exceptionally severe gale experienced in November last, a sharp look-out was kept by the crew of THE QUIVER lifeboat for any vessel in need of help. At 10.40 on the night of Saturday, the 18th, flares were observed in the roadstead, and the lifeboat was launched in a very heavy sea, the wind then blowing a whole gale from the N.N.E.; the weather was cold and thick, and rain and sleet were falling. On entering the bay, fearful seas were encountered; the boat was repeatedly driven back by them, and was eventually forced to return to the harbour. At midnight another attempt was made, but this also proved unsuccessful.

At one o'clock the gallant lifeboatmen again went out, but it was then nearly low water; the heavy seas drove the boat over the Nayland rock, and, as it was impossible to get away, she was compelled to anchor in a swashway, with the rock showing up on both sides of her. At two o'clock she fired a signal to denote her position to those on the shore. It was feared that she had stranded on a rock, and therefore a skiff belonging to the yacht Moss Rose was taken to the front of the Royal Infirmary and launched, after repeated attempts, in a strong tide and sea, the launchers going up to their necks in the water to keep her head to the sea. On reaching the lifeboat it was found that she was in comparative safety, and would be able to hold on until the tide enabled her to enter the harbour. At 5.30 the lifeboat reached the harbour. At six o'clock another crew was got together, several of those who had been out before volunteering to go again, and another attempt was about to be made when the Ramsgate lifeboat was seen approaching in tow of a steam-tug. They, however, were unable to render any assistance. The vessel, which was the brig Druid, of Cardiff, bound from Cherbourg for Margate with stone, had by that time dragged her anchor and drifted up to the edge of the rocks. A consultation was then held, and it was decided that the best course would be to wait until the tide had run down, and then send a small boat over the rocks to her assistance. At about half-ebb the skiff of the Moss Rose, manned by six men, was put off, and brought ashore the vessel's crew of five men. And again on January 20th of this present year the boat was called out, but was really not needed.

A CHEAP TONIC.

A woman who had gone through much sorrow said to a friend once, "Whenever I feel especially sad, or lonely, I just go and do something I particularly dislike to do—some duty I shrink from. The effort to do it I find is the best tonic the nerves can have." The speaker's heart, we knew, was broken to all earthly pleasure, but she still keeps up a cheerful front to the world, and goes on trying to do her earthly task right and left, always longing, as she says, for the gates to open that she may join her beloved. But her recipe for nerves is one that many might use with advantage. Instead of indulging in vain regrets or selfish sorrow, go and help others. Do something you find difficult and unattractive. It will brace you up. Work is God's tonic. We need consult no doctor, only bend in prayer to our ever-present and loving Father to guide us right. His grace will help us, His arm steady us along the thorny road. His voice says, "Be strong, be faithful, and I shall lead you Home."

OUR REAL WORTH.

How many are there who are valuing themselves by what they have, and not by what they are! What they have may be talent, or money, or position: it matters not what, but it is not their very selves.

True worth cannot be separated from a man's real self. Money, position, even intellect, may go; but the sterling, i.e., the moral, worth will remain. A Sultan of Morocco is said to have discovered that one of his Viziers was becoming too powerful. He therefore summoned him to tea, and complimented him on his great wealth. The Vizier, becoming vain, boasted of the number of his houses, horses, wives, and slaves, and the Sultan rebuked him, saying he was too rich. To show the man exactly what he was worth, his Majesty had him taken by soldiers to the slave-market, where he was put up for sale, and received only one bid of eightpence. All his property was also taken from him. The price which we put upon ourselves, and which our fellow-men put upon us, are two very different things.

PRIVATE PRAYER.

The divine life is fed by private prayer. Private prayer is essential to it. It will soon ebb, soon lose its power, if it is not nourished and sustained. Out of it comes the power to give public testimony. Daniel, when called upon suddenly to appear before the king, with the certainty of being immediately cast into the lions' den was prepared to give unflinching testimony at once, because he came straight to his ordeal from his knees. There is a story of a Scotch soldier who was arrested for supposed treasonable practices. His comrades accused him of going outside the camp every evening to hold communication with the enemy. He denied it, and said he went to pray; but this seemed so improbable that they only ridiculed it. When brought before his superior officer, the man gave the same explanation of his absence. "You say you go to pray; you can pray then?"—"Yes, sir."—"Well, you never needed to pray in your life more than you do now," was the reply; "so get down on your knees, and let us hear you pray." The soldier knelt, and poured out his heart to God in such fervent supplication that the officer was convinced he was no traitor, and allowed him to depart in peace. There was a young man who was converted to God, and was called upon to take part in prayer at religious meetings. This he used to do with great power. His former irreligious companions were astonished, and went to the meeting to hear him. At last an idea struck one of them. "I know," he said, "how it is that — prays so well: he practises in private." It is for want of private practice that there is often so much meagreness in public performance. He will do most for God in public who is most with God in private.

BIBLE-CLASSES FOR MEN.

We were interested in hearing from a correspondent that the Vicar of St. Helens, Lancashire, has a Men's Bible Class, the members of which number no fewer than 880. Is this number phenomenal, or can our readers tell us of any other similar classes with an equal or larger attendance-roll?

THE FIREMAN'S ROLL OF HONOUR.

At the head-quarters of the London Fire Brigade there has recently been erected a handsome board, of which we give a photograph above. On it are recorded upon brass plates the names of all those officers of the Brigade who have fallen in the execution of their duty. No more honourable "Roll" could be imagined than this of these "heroes of peace" who have laid down their lives to protect the persons and property of their fellow citizens.

THE TELESCOPE.

"Ho, ho," said a lad, throwing down a telescope through which he had been looking, "I didn't expect this of you. I was told that you annihilated distance, and made the far-off seem near: that you brought the stars within reach and the moon within touch. I thought it possible to discern through you the features of a playmate a mile away as plainly as though he were within hail. You do nothing of the sort. I can see only a narrow circle in which objects seem a thousandfold smaller and more distant than they really are."—"That is your fault," replied the telescope, "you were looking through me the wrong way. I can do all you say if only you use me properly." Moral.—A man's view of the world depends entirely upon the manner in which he regards it.

MISJUDGING MOTIVES.

How often we misjudge people's motives; and that, sometimes, because we see at the moment but a part of what they are about. If we knew the whole of a matter, our opinions would often be greatly changed. Amongst the lots put up at an auction was one, "A pretty pair of crutches." In the crowd was a poor cripple boy, and the crutches were just the thing for him. He was the first to bid for them. An elderly, well-dressed man bid against him. There were cries of "Shame, shame!" in the crowd. The boy bid again; and so did the old gentleman. The boy bid all he had, but the old gentleman out-bid him once more, and the poor little lad turned away with tears in his eyes. The crutches were knocked down to the elderly man, who, to the great surprise of all, took them to the poor little cripple, and made him a present of them. The crowd were now as enthusiastic in their praise as they had just been with their abuse, but the old gentleman heard nothing of it; he had disappeared even before the little boy could thank him. To judge by a part is often to misjudge the whole.

MAKING SURE OF IT.

We take wonderful pains in making sure of this and that; and, the more valuable the object is, the more anxious are we to make sure of it as ours. In many cases, uncertainty is absolute torment. Now of all important matters, the most important is the salvation of a soul—the most important to us, the salvation of our own soul. And yet there is nothing about which people tolerate so much uncertainty. A lady got into conversation with a workman, and finding he was a happy Christian, asked him how long he had been thus rejoicing. "Six months ago," he said, "we heard an address from the words 'Whosoever believeth hath everlasting life.' I could not take it to myself then," he said; "but when I went home that night I dreamt that 'whosoever' meant me. I got out of bed, and got the Bible to see the words, and there was 'whosoever.'—"But you knew it was in the Bible, didn't you?"—"Yes, but I wanted to see it with my own eyes, and I've been resting on it ever since." That word "whosoever" is a long one; it is a big one—big enough for the greatest sinner to get inside, and sit down and rest. And not only for one great sinner, but for all sinners. The word is a blessed one as it stands, but never more blessed than when a poor, heavy-laden sinner says that big word "whosoever" means the little word "me."

THE "BISHOP" OF NORTHFIELD.

MR. MOODY IN HIS NATIVE AIR.

BY GEORGE E. MORGAN, M.A.

MR. MOODY'S HOUSE.

(From a Photograph by Howe and Sons, Brattleboro, Vermont.)

NORTHFIELD? Where is it? What is it noted for? These are queries which may rise to the lips of some of my readers to whose ears the name may have an unfamiliar sound. Perhaps, therefore, I had better at the outset allay the curiosity that prompts them. Briefly, Northfield is a little town beautifully situated in the State of Massachusetts, U.S.A., and here is the birthplace and home of Mr. D. L. Moody, the American Evangelist, where also he has established the invaluable institutions this article purports to describe.

Close at hand the broad and silent Connecticut River pursues its ceaseless course, tortuously dividing the wooded meadows which, backed by lofty hills, flank its sides; and stretching away into the distance, interlacing themselves with graceful symmetry, rise tier after tier of the Blue Mountains, which reflect upon their roundly moulded peaks the azure of heaven from which they derive their name. Silent the river ever is, except for the occasional halloo of the log-rollers, who collect from bank or shoal the stranded logs and trunks of trees, which, dismantled of all the beauty with which Nature ever endowed them, are drifted thus to saw-mills miles below. Afloat once more, they wind their way sluggishly to their destined goal, where many another with which they started equal has arrived long days before. An interesting yet sorry scene, typical of many a misspent career, and of the way in which D. L. Moody lives and labours for his fellow-creatures entangled and impeded in the race of life, training hundreds of young men and women in his seminaries, year by year, to do the same blessed work of starting them afresh.

A long street, with houses on either side—what a prosaic vision of a city suburb do such words recall, but how different is the picture they are intended to represent! A majestic avenue of maples, some two miles in extent, lines the one street along which Northfield is built; and the houses consist, for the most part, of detached verandahed villas, picturesquely and substantially built of wood, but designed externally with adequate regard for their natural environment. Scarcely ever does a fence divide the forecourt from the road; and in luxurious shade family groups repose in hammock and rocking-chair, with refreshing indifference to all who pass by, as they pleasantly suggest to a stranger's mind the picture of the Oriental resting "under his vine and fig-tree."

Formerly a straggling hamlet, Northfield is now the chosen resort of hundreds of visitors who attend the annual conferences in the summer months, and enjoy, many of them, a longer or shorter stay beyond. Thus the little town has become invested with more than its native importance, and can boast, from end to end, of two postal-telegraph offices, two hotels, and four or five shops of more or less heterogeneous contents.

Amid scenes of rare beauty the childhood of Mr.

Moody dawned, and inspired by them he looked from Nature to her God, to Whom his life-work is to point his fellow-men. His personality is impressed like a seal upon all the country-side, which is the more remarkable in view of the large proportion of his time that he has to spend elsewhere. But everybody knows him, and, like a "father of his people," he is welcomed by them all.

In his brief intervals of rest he enjoys the quiet and peaceful change, wisely electing to derive all the benefit he can from the pure country breezes after his prolonged endurances of crowded meeting-halls. Accordingly, he may be seen at any hour after early morn driving round in his capacious buggy, receiving salutations from everyone he meets, though not without an occasional rebuke from one and another that he does not "come inside" when passing their door. "Ah well!" he replies cheerily, "I only go indoors when I'm obliged to, for meals and sleep. This fresh air is so good, I take in all I can." Yet he breaks this rule sometimes, for he has only to hear of sickness or trouble casting a cloud over any household, and he is there to solace or to help. He is a man greatly beloved, and no wonder, with so large and generous a heart; and the fervour of his religion pervades the whole atmosphere of the town. Climb the hillside, wander through meadow or wood, take a seat by the side of a passing teamster, or pause to purchase a trifle at the village store, and not a word but of appreciation will you hear; while "Then shall my heart keep singing," or "This is my story, this is my song," comes floating o'er the newly mown hay which husbandman and labourer are gathering in.

During the summer vacation the college buildings described below are utilised to accommodate the visitors who attend the various conventions held in July and August. These are three in number, of which two are for University men and women.

First of all come together the lady students of various colleges and seminaries; then, a few days later, the "boys" meet in like fashion; and again, after a fortnight's interval, the little town is once more astir with the general Christian conference.

There is a great advantage in the independent assembling of students of either sex for intercourse on matters of Christian life and growth. Their intellectual training frequently presents a serious barrier to their acceptance of spiritual truth in its simplicity; indeed, one knows too well how difficult it is to attract them within a league of a "Christian conference" at all. Like the sons of the prophets in the time of Elisha, they "stand to view afar off"—if, indeed, they come even so near as that.

But here they meet with those of like passions with themselves, men and women of their own age and calibre, in the full force of physical and mental vigour. From them they learn that the priceless talents lent of God are not to be used as weapons against Him; that such euphemisms as "greatness of intellect," "excess of conscientiousness," when they actuate men "in departing from the living God," are, if probed deep enough, traceable to what the Holy Spirit, with more candour, terms "an evil heart of unbelief"; that the faculties of reason and common sense are never so fully developed as when sanctified to the use of Him who endowed them; and that in the matter of practical daily living there is no moral force so resistless, no incentive so strong, as that which the power of God supplies—and especially to those who, like Nicodemus or Saul of Tarsus, surrender that they may overcome, and conquer because they have bowed the knee; in a word, to quote St. Augustine, that “the end of learning is to know God, and out of that knowledge to love Him.”

A great field of service is opening up to women, but the world of college life is always full of danger in its very intensity—danger of exalting the intellectual and dwarfing the spiritual; of purchasing popularity at the price of time and self-respect; of using the higher powers for less than the highest good. The purpose of their conference is, therefore, to bring leading students from representative colleges together, to consider questions of special value to their own spiritual lives, and how to attain greater power for usefulness. The invitation is also extended to young women interested in Christian work in cities, to consider principles and methods by which their sisters of all occupations may be won to Christ. Two lines of Bible study are arranged, meeting for an hour each morning, with the dual object of training them to be successful workers and leaders, intelligent, skilled, and armed for the warfare against sin, and to study the method and life of the Saviour in dealing with men and women; so as to use the searching truths of God's Word to the anxious, the doubter, or the careless.

Then there are sessions devoted to such subjects as these—Character Building during College Years, Organised Work Necessary to Christian Development, Principles Necessary to Best Result in Christian Work, Work for New Students, Systematic Giving among College Women, The Relation of College Women to Missions, and The College Young Women's Christian Association; and in each of these is emphasised the responsibility and duty of every delegate, in view of her privileges, toward her fellow-students, her country, and the world beyond.

Practically similar in design, if not in detail, is the gathering of the men, the topics chosen being suited to their especial need and circumstance. This “Summer School” is the annual rendezvous of the Inter-collegiate Movement of the Y.M.C.A. While in English Universities an unhappy feeling of caste has relegated the Y.M.C.A. to a position of “town” rather than “gown,” in America it feels the pulse of religious life in nearly every college in the land. Consequently, it has an inter-collegiate phase to which we are practically strangers.

“Early to bed, and early to rise,” is a maxim upon which the routine of each day is based. I am not sure that it was carried out in its entirety, but I can vouch for the prevalence of the latter portion. How else, indeed, could so many sessions have been crowded in without in a measure impairing the health of body and mind? Here is a specimen of the daily round:—7 a.m., Breakfast; 8, Missionary Institute and Bible Training Classes, held simultaneously; 9, College Association Conference; 10, Bible Studies and Central Training Class; 11, Platform Meeting; 12.30 to 6, Dinner and Recreation; 6, Supper; 7, Outdoor Meetings on various topics; 8, Platform Meetings; 9.30 to 10, College Delegations. For a holiday programme this is pretty liberal! Yet, with full knowledge of what it is to be, succeeding generations of college men spend nearly two weeks of their vacation, year by year, to learn more deeply the things of God, and how to carry them out in effective service. Nor must it be supposed that these are occasions for the glib utterance of mere platitudes that fall easily upon the ear. In most cases they involve close application of the mind and genuine study, not only at the moment when pen and pencil are busy at the work of "taking down," but for many an hour in after-days, when the contents of the note-books have to be evolved and developed.

There are now about 450 branches of this inter-collegiate movement, embracing 3,500 representative students, and sundry conventions are held in different States during the course of the year. Verily, it is an inspiring sight, and one fraught with glorious possibilities for Christianity, to find the rising generation thus seeking after the things of God in their desire for the righteousness which exalteth a nation.

It will be noticed that some hours daily are given to recreation. This Mr. Moody considers of supreme importance. "No mind can stand a perpetual strain," he declares; "it must unbend at times, or it will break;" and this principle he applies with equal emphasis to Christian work, believing that a continual pondering over of the "cases" met with, and other phases of service, must tend to a morbidity under which in time the worker will break down. Proper relaxation is an integral part of his religion, and to this, under God, may, no doubt, be traceable the robust health which the evangelist has so long enjoyed.

Of the third conference at Northfield, little need here be said, in view of its likeness to those which English readers are accustomed to attend. One distinctive point, however, calls for special mention—a portion of each day is strictly reserved for private study, social intercourse, and recreation. This is very largely lacking in our British gatherings. "From early morn to dewy eve"—and almost on to early morn again, sometimes—do earnest souls tax their receptive faculties beyond their power and their note-books, to an extent that renders the profitable dissecting of their contents in after-days a hopeless task. Ever and anon they listen to an address in which the conference is likened to the "solitary place" to which the Master bade His followers "Come apart and rest awhile"; yet does their inner consciousness compare it rather to those antecedent days in which the disciples "had no leisure so much as to eat."

Here are some of the benefits of the better way adopted at Northfield. (a) Time is found to digest what has been heard ere more is received. (b) Rough notes, hurriedly taken, can be sufficiently revised by memory's aid to render them intelligible and helpful for subsequent use. (c) Mental and physical energies are so far recuperated between the sessions as to render each one the more enjoyable. Thus it does not become necessary for the jaded auditor to "stay at home this evening," at the risk of seeming in a measure to be wanting in sympathy or enthusiasm; or, even worse, of finding that the meeting thus missed has been "a particularly good one," or, perhaps, "the best of the whole convention," as is not infrequently the case. (d) These leisure hours in the afternoon are attractive to young people, whose attendance is secured in large numbers, when they would fight shy of gatherings which occupy the entire day. And this very feature (e) affords both leisure and opportunity for personal work among them and others regarding the things that pertain unto eternal life.

The arrival of Mr. Moody from Chicago to attend the conference was celebrated by one of those genial little incidents which are common to Northfield, and which add so much to its enjoyment. Between twenty and thirty of the young people procured a hay-waggon, drawn by a superb team of oxen, and, having elegantly decorated the "turn-out" and amply covered the floor of the waggon with straw, created no small stir and amusement by proceeding to meet the train by which Mr. Moody was to arrive, some three miles away. Their exuberant spirits showed that a long series of meetings in no wise had a depressing effect upon them, but that the religion of Jesus Christ inspires pleasures second to none that the worldling enjoys. As the train drew up, a song of welcome burst forth which caused many a passenger to open eyes and windows to see whence it came. The train men are evidently familiar with such little tokens of the esteem in which the evangelist is held by those who know him and his work. These "straw-rides," and "corn-roasts," "picnics," etc., form a pleasant feature of the recreation hours.

A splendid view of the seminary buildings is obtained from the railway, as they stand on the opposite hill-slope among the trees, with the Connecticut River flowing between. These are at present six in number, adorning the height which surveys the beautiful valley, and consist of three dormitory buildings, recitation hall, library, and sanatorium, each combining the solid and the picturesque, and forming a pleasing feature of the country-side, seen for many miles around.

Before next summer another addition will be made in the shape of a capacious auditorium. Hitherto the conferences have been held in the "recitation hall," which, with adjoining class-rooms, is the seat of learning of the young women who are completing their education there. But for a meeting-place it is not well adapted, and accordingly a suitable and substantial edifice will be erected before the conventions meet again.

Across, and lower down the river, lies Mount Hermon, likewise beautiful for situation, where the "boys" dwell together in unity. This is four miles away, but "quite near enough, you'd better believe"—so Mr. Moody good-humouredly observes. Equally substantial, and no less ornamental, is a group of buildings there, admirably provided with all domestic appliances, in the use of which the boys are thoroughly expert. Out of doors there is land to be cultivated, cattle to be tended, and, in short, the management of all is in their hands. In vacation time, those who so desire may spend their time in field-labour, the remuneration for which goes toward their education during the other months of the year. They come mostly from humble walks in life, but their training in practical and educational matters makes them the equal of many of their "betters," and their Christian courtesy endears them to all.

Like that of their sisters, their curriculum is one which, in addition to other subjects, gives a leading place to the study of the Bible, so that they may be equipped and thoroughly furnished unto good works. In the surrounding farms and hamlets their labours

Here is solved, in principle, the problem of how to reach the masses—by going to them; and many a hard-worked pastor to-day thanks God and takes courage at having such helpers as these at his right hand.

Not only in educational and religious channels are their thoughts directed. Domestic duties form no small part of each day's routine, with the result that men and women alike become adepts in practical household matters—a knowledge which proves of great in the Gospel are greatly needed, and the scattered population affords an interesting sphere for personal work. Thus they are kept busy on Sunday and weekday, but with that variety of work which itself constitutes repose alike to body and to mind.

The seminary is now in its fourteenth year of operation, Mount Hermon being two years its junior. "Small means, but high aims," may be said to be the qualifications for admission of the students of either sex, and the results that have been attained have more than justified the highest expectations. The teachers are efficient and godly men and women, who see in their pupils such great possibilities of future usefulness as to nerve their highest endeavour to "show themselves workmen approved of God" in the training that they impart. Thus year by year there go forth numbers of these young people whose hearts the Lord has touched, to take the Gospel wherever an opening occurs, in slum or church, in mission or foreign field.

service in the homes of the poor in later days, as paving the way for the application of religious ministrations. There are no restrictions as to nationality. The fact that all nations need the Gospel is in itself reason sufficient for admitting any suitable candidate, that he may learn to declare in his own tongue the wonderful works of God.

A hundred dollars (£20) per annum suffice to cover all expenses of each student, the course of study occupying three years—truly a noble work to accomplish with so small a sum.

This is but an imperfect sketch of a work as remarkable in conception as it is effective in operation. Its ulterior object is "to reach those who do not want to be reached," as Mr. Moody puts it. Says he: "It is easy enough to take the Gospel to those who want it. But we need trained men and women to take it to those who do not desire it." It is just this work that these training institutes qualify them to perform.

GARTH GARRICKSON—WORKMAN.

THE STORY OF A LANCASHIRE LAD.

CHAPTER XXII.

MEANWHILE the carriage had arrived at the Hall, and driven round to the front door to unload the rugs; and it happened that Mr. Caryl was at home and heard it.

"Mildred!" he called.

Thomas came. "Miss Caryl has not returned, sir."

"Not returned?"

"Payne says she got out on the hill to go and see someone."

"It is very cold."

"Yes, sir—snowing."

"Snowing?" turning to the window and regarding the outer world. "Delay dinner; and tell Miss Caryl I wish to see her when she comes," and he returned to his fire and book.

He read on; the fire burnt down; Thomas replenished it and reported dinner spoiling; still Mildred did not come; he grew restless, and looked often at the window. At last a ring came at the door.

"Ah, there she is!"

But it was not Mildred; it was Garth, with some papers.

"Oh, that will do; I will look them over this evening. Call on your way down in the morning; I may not be out," Garth looked at him, but said nothing; John Caryl would not brook health inquiries. "And, Garrickson—if Miss Mildred is with your mother, send her home at once: she is a naughty girl to be out a night like this. She has been with Old Pack; I made her take the carriage, and she dismissed it." He might scold. Garth knew he was secretly proud of his girl's timbre.

"Very well, sir." He went up the avenue with a slightly beating heart. Was he to find Missie in the parlour as of old? He did not think so—already. No, she was not there. Mrs. Garrickson was in consternation at the idea.

"Out?—is Mildred out to-night? She's no business—she'll be lost! it's snowing! it's not fit for a dog."

"Nevertheless the dog must come.—Laddie! Laddie! come along.—You'd better get a little ready, mother; she'll be cold and wet; I might find her in a fix. Where's the lantern? Now, don't be frightened; I may meet her on the road."

"Just get your gaiters and grey muffler, and the cape of your ulster."

Garth got them, and a warm tam-o'-shanter, which Mildred had made for him years ago, when they were fashionable, and, unknown to his mother, the brandy-flask; and with the lantern and Laddie, set off. But neither in the field nor in the road did he meet Miss Mildred.

It was a wild night; even Laddie was half-cowed, and trotted along in evident disgust, starting and pricking his ears occasionally, as if uneasy as his master.

At the top of the road Garth paused; he did not know where Miss Caryl had left the carriage—for all he knew, she was still with Daddie. He knocked at one of the cottage doors.

"Is Miss Caryl here, Mrs. Bardsley?"

"Miss Caryl? Nay! Aye, my certy! be Miss Caryl out to-night?"

"I am afraid so."

"Aye, she be, mother, I see her mysel'," observed one of the listening youngsters.

"Where, my lad?"

"Just hereby."

"And which way did she go?"

"Thatten," with a jerk towards the lane.

"It'll be to blind Lucy belike, Mester Garrickson," from the mother.

"To blind Lucy! no doubt; I'll go and see. Thank you, my lad," and Garth went on.

But Mildred was not there.

"Aye no! she went, it's nigh upon two hours; she'll be whoam long, sin'," Mary assured him. "Coom in an' rest ye." Garth was distinguished company, here.

"No, thanks. Is Tom in?"

"No, he isna; so it's a good job she didna waate; I wanted her. 'Twere gotten dark; he'd ha' set her a piece 'speslly as she were goin' t' short road."

"Which way? Back by the road?"

"No; by t' range—t' Queen's land—aye! What if she's taken oop?"

Garth did not think that likely; he said good-night. On he went, pondering perplexedly. How could it be? She must have got home long since had she gone this short way. On, until he came to the range—a high stone wall with markers' huts on either hand, where the local volunteers practised—and it occurred to him that possibly she was sheltering here. He mounted the stile behind the range, passed round it, and called; no answer, all was still and deserted, the huts fastened, the wall screening off the wind and snow. No, it could not be; she could not have reached this. There the Queen's land lay—a broad level road leading straight down to their own gate—and from the windward side the snow had drifted, leaving a dark track the whole way along under the sheltering wall. Had she come here, she had got safely home. No, she had not come here. He looked to the left, where in daylight he would have seen the wide meadows—and—how was it? To the end of life he never could explain it: a conviction seized him that she was there—between here and the hamlet.

"We'll go back, lad," he announced with decision. Laddie did not like it, but followed obediently, and back they went—on and on, the wind behind, the snow a little less, he thought.

At length he came to the open gate—open! why

"Hands stretched out mutely to him."—p. 410.

had he not seen that? Of course she would not know the ground had been turned up, and had taken the old short cut. Garth strode through and shouted.

"Bark, lad! bark! bark!" and the welkin rang, so that Mary and Lucy heard in their snug little cottage. "Now, hush—bark! listen," and they listened. No answer: all was still but the wind and the driving snow.

"Find her, Laddie! What is it, man?" Laddie was running about excitedly, his nose on the ground, or snuffing the air, and barking in sharp little yaps. "Come along," striking out into the field; and Laddie ran before, rushing this way and that—he understood his work now. They almost traversed the field, shouting, barking, and pausing to listen; and Garth was beginning to feel an icy chill about his heart. Two hours! and the cold—and the pond! when it occurred to him that she might hear his voice but fail to recognise it—he was so hoarse now—and fear to reply, and he broke into a sudden shrill whistle as he had not whistled for many a day.

What a whistle! It seemed to cut through the mist like a fife, and before he was through the familiar little air a second time, a faint call came back to him at last.

Laddie went wild, gave vent to a roaring volley of barks, and rushed off out of sight. Garth followed fast, guided by his voice, and when he overtook the dog he found him dancing round and fawning upon Mildred, who stood there in the snow, her hat gone, the hood of her cloak pulled over her head, all wet and dishevelled, her face white, tearful, hands stretched out mutely to him, and for a moment Garth lost self-control.

And then he took her home, after the first mad minute, quiet enough, but clinging to him like a weary, frightened child, the deep cape of his ulster sheltering her like a wing. At the gate she fainted; he took her up and carried her—shocked to find how light her weight was now—round the house and into it, and laid her down on the parlour sofa.

"Better stay here all night, than be lost in the snow."

At first Mrs. Garrickson was alarmed.

"You must go for her father, Garth."

"No, mother, there's no need; don't let anyone come," going to the door to prevent Janie's entrance. "She walked to the gate; she will soon be round. I will tell him she has got wet and will stay here to-night, and he must not be told of this."

"But, Garth, do you think—"

"No, I don't—I know. See, she is reviving," as Mildred stirred. "Get her to bed; I'll bring all necessities," and before the closed eyes opened he was gone.

Mildred did not see him again—he kept away—and on the next afternoon she was able to return home.

CHAPTER XXIII.

BUT Mildred was ill all through the Christ-tide; which, indeed, was a convenience. She had no desire for the ordinary gaieties, nor, it seemed, had her father.

He declined the usual public invitations, and they spent the season quietly—how quietly! The outer world the more distant, its sound the fainter, for the actual barrier of snow, and sleet, and frost between their isolated home and the town, and day by day Mildred and her father drew nearer.

For Garth peace and goodwill towards men were not so evident. The report of Minnie's departure spread, of course, and public comment was rife. Garth was sufficiently well known to make the affair interesting; and Minnie's pretty looks, manners, and speeches, had made her many friends. She had been generally popular, while Garth's sudden rise into favour with his master had excited jealousies which his behaviour had not tended to soothe; and here and there an enemy had dropped tare seeds in his field of action, which he had not cared to stoop and root out. Popular sympathy was therefore on the girl's side; and the populace of Lancashire is outspoken in its sympathies. Garth carried his head a little higher, his shoulders a little more stiffly set. His speech was a little more curt in the next few days; but what he felt did not appear, and to no one did he give the news of Minnie which would have turned public opinion in his direction.

Minnie's lesson had been sharp. She had gone straight to Kildare O'Neil, never doubting that he would shelter and help her; but he, annoyed by the consequences of his "innocent amusement," alarmed for himself, and shocked at the girl's want of taste, had refused to countenance her presence in the house for an hour, and, but for Mr. Donaldson's intervention, Minnie would have been turned out into the city alone at night.

Kildare wrote indignantly repudiating all responsibility, railing at the girl and his uncle and Garth, and declaring that the senseless thing had been so harshly treated that no doubt she had lost half her small amount of reason, and come to him as the only one who had been in the least kind to her; he did at least know how to behave to women. To a certain point—yes—but beyond it? Garth remembered the little girl he had rescued of old. Squirring distressed damsels was not Kildare's rôle.

Fortunately for Minnie, Roger Donaldson was at hand; he procured her a temporary lodging, and succeeded in convincing her that music-teaching was impossible, and in persuading her to return to her aunt's friends in her old village home, where she might prove a competent milliner.

"The best possible place for her," said Mr. Caryl. "I'll start her business for her, if she'll stay there. I'm sorrier than I can say for the whole affair, Garth. But it's anything but an unmixed evil she jilted you, for that you really cared about the pretty little minx is out of all question. She was no business of yours; you should have let her alone," with a force of conviction Garth would have allowed from no one else. "Now, forgive me, my lad, and take my advice: wait till this is blown over; live it down, and next time you make love to a woman—well—all I can say is, let it be to a woman you love. As for the rest, it must take its chance. I shall take Mildred away for a year; she has a look of her mother I don't like," and John Caryl turned away with careful avoidance of the eyes of his confidential man.

That evening Garth went to take Daddie the news of Minnie's safe arrival in her old home.

It was the last night of the year. Snow clothed the land, and the air was biting cold; but above, the stars were brilliant; and beneath, the ground was crisp. Garth had not been here for a long while; his spirit had been out of harmony with Daddie's; he had not cared to meet the keen old eyes, the keener tongue, or the memories that crowded about the place; his preference had been for the mill and the mechanics' institute of late.

But he knew he must, as a man, see the girl's guardian. He could not be at ease until he had done so. He was the right one to take the news; and to-night of all nights Daddie would be grieving.

He found the old man in the bed under the window of his little kitchen, and very feeble. It was the cold he said, but both knew it was the shock and the wearing grief. Daddie was too old for such a sorrow. He was pleased to see Garth.

"Ye've been a while gone. Ye shud ha' coom afore, lad. And now ye've coom to watch t' old year out. 'T were kindly thought on, Garth."

"Well, no, I had not intended, but I'll stay if you care."

"Aye, stay, lad. It's lonesome fur an old man. I'm verra down to-night; I shanna sleep till t' old year's out." And Garth stayed.

And Daddie did not seem much moved by the news, Perhaps he was too feeble.

"I knew she were safe sin' the Lord sent Mester Donaldson yonder. I trusted, and He hanna failed; and if there were sin, there's mercy above; aye, there's mercy above."

Now, Garth had prepared himself for a very different greeting; he had steeled himself to meet reproaches, even anger. He had known he might possibly have to leave the cottage, and close its door behind him never to reopen it; to mount the hill never to be re-crossed. Daddie's words and the manner of them touched and reproached him as nothing else could have done.

"Then you are not angry with me, Daddie?"

"Angry? Why for shud I be angry? Ye munna fret, lad—ye werenae sae wrong; 't were a nat'ral-like mistake to make. 'T were I as was wrong, Garth. I shud ha' seen; aye, and I did see whiles. That werenae 'Minnie,' as ye cut on yon bridge. Ye needna mind, lad," for Garth had started and flushed to the hair; his eyes burnt. "I heerd tell; Mrs. Wainsley, she axed, Was yon 'Minnie,' 'arter all, then? so I clam down one wet day w'en no one were like to be by. I'd ado to get oop t' steps agen—they was slippy; but I gat down, and I gat oop agen, and it were cut oot and done wi'."

"But I out it out," with head aloft.

"Nay, lad, not so as no one cud see as looked close; and though but few goes by, some does as 'as tongues," and Garth remembered Emma and her admirer—Mildred's falling eyes.

Daddie talked on—

"I shudna ha' 'lowed it. I soart o' felt whiles it werenae right, but 't were sa good fur Minnie. Whiles it looked t' right way, but things looks differ'nt when one gets here. I shud ha' minded what isna right all round isna right fur any int' long run. There was a talk I had wi' Missie one evenin'—that evenin' ye furgat Minnie, Garth."

Garth remembered only too well, and a sudden idea flashed into his mind. Mildred had come here and found Minnie waiting, for him. Had she misunderstood? fancied her eyes had been mistaken on the bridge? His sudden departure would bear that out. This would account for her manner that other evening; this would explain all. Little by little, as the old man rambled on, Garth saw as never before his mistake and the wrong of it—the widespread influence of it in relation to others, and his spirit bowed in utter repentance and sorrow.

Late into the night they talked, until Daddie became drowsy, and dozed in snatches, and Garth felt strangely disinclined to leave him; he was evidently very weak. He would stay until morning, he decided, and tomorrow someone must come; Janie, perhaps, or blind Lucy's sister Mary: the old man must not be left alone. But Garth's plans were unnecessary; for, as he sat there watching the fire burning low, the dip candle shedding but a dim light, the curtain drawn back from the little window (for Daddie had wished to see the starlight on the snow: the year was "dying in the night," and Garth's gaze had wandered out there dreamily), he was recalled by a deep sigh—a slight stir—a great stillness—and Daddie had gone Home.

And Garth knelt down by all that remained of him and prayed.

When at last he left the little cottage in the neighbours' care, and stood outside in the starlit snow, the sound of bells came faintly on the frosty air. The old year was dead. Garth raised his head and listened with a smile on his face. By the Christ's help should those peals

"Ring in the valiant man and free,
The larger heart, the kindlier hand;
Ring out the darkness of the land—" and with firm step he turned homeward.

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE Caryl's went away; for three years the Hall was silent, deserted, and the business "took its chance," with Garth practically at the head; John Caryl still nominally the supreme power, but in the actual capacity of "Jorkins."

Three wholesome years for Garth; years of patience, years of growth, "stuff to try the soul's strength on, educe the man"; the former things passed into eternity; men thought of them no more. At first all went with smooth monotony; the business did not increase, but neither did it decline; its owner stayed in sunny Normandy in all security and content. Then there came an interruption; an uneasy stir in the cotton world, a mutter of distant storm drawing nearer: so slight a stir, so low a mutter as at first to be unheeded.

Such a little thing as a manager in a morning, temper, a foreman ditto; complaint, recrimination; a division of work-people on one side and the other; the expulsion of one half, the interference of a trade union—all in a mill of far less size than Caryl and Garrickson's, and yet until this little matter is adjusted all the mills in the district must close; people face starvation: masters, ruin.

Mildred and her father sat at breakfast in the sunny morning-room of their pretty villa on the coast of Normandy. Outside, sky and sea were blue, the waves frisked and glistened in the sun, the trees rustled and shimmered; and in the garden, flowers lifted bright faces; while round the path Roger trotted, like an animate mushroom of some size, in his wide hat and straight coat of holland; a lively bonne followed, whose shrill French cries came, softened by distance, through the open window. The air here is not as the air of England in April. Mildred watched amusedly over the coffee-pot; her father was reading his letters.

"My dear," he observed slowly, without looking up, "this is from Garrickson."

Mildred had seen; she knew the envelope—Garth's free running hand.

"Is it, father?" indifferently.

He looked up; his face was grave.

"Have you a spare bed, Mildred?"

"Yes; that is, I could arrange—"

"Then you will do so, please, my dear. He is coming to-day, perhaps : speaks of the hotel, but of course he must come here."

"Daddie had gone Home."—p. 411.

Mildred said, "Of course," and went on with her breakfast.

But, quiet as she might seem, Mildred's day was full of expectation. No doubt he would come to-day, do business with her father in the library, and go to-morrow ; but it would be pleasant to see Garth even at meals ; and if they could have no conversation, she would at least see how he was now. She had known nothing all these months, beyond a stray word now and then from her father.

And he might come any moment. They did not know when to expect him—he had not even given his route, and the ways and hours of arrival were several.

The day went by, and he did not come. They had given him up for the night when he appeared at last. Mildred was putting her boy to bed. He had been brought, as usual, in his night-dress to say good-night and be taken by herself to his cot ; she had held him to her father to be kissed, and turned to leave the room, when she found someone standing in the doorway.

Garth !—Was it ?

This tall, bearded man, in the good-looking brown overcoat, one gloved hand holding his hat—the other— Mildred had always rather admired Garth's strong firm hand, and she recognised it instantly ; for of all personal points, the hands change least ; and yet that too was altered—to a certain fineness, cleanness. What was it ?

She put her own into it ; it closed with just the old clasp—the same hand after all !

"Mr. Garrickson !"

Usually it is the dropping of the more formal title that marks a point gained ; in this case it was not so.

A sunny smile broke out and rippled over the dark face ; the brown eyes showered sparks. "Missie !" and there was a minute's pause as they stood so grasping hands.

By the bright little evening fire sat John Caryl, observant with a keenness of second sight which kept him still—and the silence might have become awkward, but Roger came to the rescue.

His usual reception of strangers was to turn away, hide his face and wriggle ; but, either attracted to Garth, or mistaking him for his own father, who came sometimes, he chose to squeal with delight, and give a spring for which Mildred was so totally unprepared that she dropped him ; there had been a dire fall, had not Garth cleverly caught him.

"Why, my man—you're an acrobat !"

Mildred scolded. Roger held on to the brown beard and jumped and shouted, till all laughed in sympathy; and when Garth sat down it was in homely fashion, with the boy on his knee.

And in harmony with this beginning all Garth's visit progressed. He stayed more than a day or two. His master kept him in spite of protest.

"Far better stay here out of it all. Your absence gives excuse for neutrality. They needn't know you knew anything about it; and in the meantime we shall see how it goes. We'll wait and watch, and descend on them if need."

"But, sir—"

"Tut, tut! You're fagged, Garrickson—fagged—that's it. Get your spirits up, and see what difference that makes in the outlook."

So Garth stayed, loitering about the land, and the shore, and the garden all the sunny day; often with Roger, who adored him, on his shoulder, to the admiration of the bonne: playing with him on the grass or sand, while Mildred sat and worked; talking, reading, driving with her, and sometimes her father, with a scattered pretence of "business" here and there; and so a fortnight full of "undimmed hours" slipped away.

One evening, the two gentlemen were strolling round the garden, talking desultorily in the dusk that shrouded their faces. Mr. Caryl had been praising the place. The air here had saved Mildred's life, he thought; she was like another woman—and he had paused.

"She is like her mother," presently, "and yet unlike. Did you ever hear that my wife proposed to me?"

"No, sir."

"She did, my boy. She was obliged, poor thing, or die, I do believe. I never could have done it; for though I raised my position, I did not raise myself. I failed there, and knew it. But she did not know; she knew I loved her with all my soul, and she spoke out one day; it killed her, I always think. . . . Mildred would not do that," after a long pause; "she would die first."

"Yes; and she would not die—"

"And if she did do it, you'd turn and leave her, so it's just as well."

"I—I—and if I did, sir—what would—should you care?"

"I should care, Garth—for you as much as the girl."

"Then you—you—"

"I know. Clear grit is transparent stuff. Just wait till all this is over in the North, and we'll see where we are."

And when they returned to the house, Mildred thanked French air and sunshine for the light in Garth's eyes.

Next morning came grave news. Garth's views had not all been due to fagged nerves. He had, indeed, been sanguine. They must return at once.

And the three returned together, for Mildred would not be left behind.

"I must go and see that you are comfortable, father," she said; "and I am sure I can help, especially with the women. The people know me. We can have meetings; or, at least, I can visit the homes. Roger will be perfectly safe with Elise."

"Well, go along, Goodie, and pack your fat-de-lals," said her father; and by noon they were off.

CHAPTER XXV.

No warm sun, blue sky and sea, soft breezes and green country here in the North; but grey clouds, east wind and rain; squalid streets, bleak hills, and, for rambles, books, and chats—railways, close offices, anxious consultations, and ledgers.

At last, John Caryl had made a business blunder. The lords of commercial creation are fallible as other men; perhaps he had rusted in his seclusion, fallen out of step with the world.

And the world had gone on, trades unions had gained daily in strength and activity, till even in his own exclusive corner under the hill, which he had thought so safe, on the very outer boundary of Cotton Kingdom just here, their power had been felt. His own influence and Mildred's had been wanting, and, at the critical moment, Garth's. Mischief was brewing all around them. Caryl and Garrickson must take a full share of the storm; their vessel was large enough to lend much obstruction—the more difficult of management for delay in getting the gear in order; but as yet the storm had not burst.

True, the townspeople were excited. In the one mill the struggle was at its height, and the world looked on. The looms were worked by non-unionists, to the indignation of unionists in general, and the expelled hands in particular. Night and morning, one half the town was amused, the other exasperated, by the spectacle of a procession of police-protected vans and 'buses, plying between the affected mill and the railway station; big men, on bigger horses, guarding certain streets and corners, riding into all groups of a dozen or so sightseers, dispersing idlers; and many stories of their exploits were in circulation. The coffee taverns drove a brisk trade, in food supplied to the mill in work-hours secretly as to a besieged city, and much breath was spent in laughter and invective. But the big men meant business, the military were held in readiness, and the working world saw fit to go about its affairs in outer peacefulness, while the more cautious masters elected delegates, received deputations, and deliberated.

As soon as he returned, Garth was elected one of those delegates, and, of the people, with the people, though a master, he accepted.

John Caryl would none of any arbitration: to him these people were naughty children who should be punished. Of course, if the masters over-spent their capital, and then turned about and requested "loans" of the wage they paid, they must expect this sort of thing; but the people had their wages and dividends too; they only had the mills to get; things were not managed so in his young days.

"It's all these limited companies. Let them fight it out among them. The clash will come, and those who come between will get the worst of it."

"But if by coming between we lessen the clash?" Garth spoke to his partner; but his glance sought Mildred. She looked up; for a brief instant their eyes met.

"Save the weakest—yes!"

"You won't; you'll increase the pressure and go yourself."

"I don't think so; few of our men are affected. If anything touched us it would be a prolonged struggle. I do wish, sir," entreatingly, "you would allow me to increase our own men. It would have all the more effect because—"

"I shan't, Garrickson! Do as you like yourself, but see you pledge me to nothing. I shall look out first, and unlock last. My capital's my own."

And so a chillness crept in between himself and the master he had learnt to love; and though, as he did "as he liked"—sat on committees, met deputations, addressed meetings or wrote in his room—those blue eyes seemed always before him, and the soft voice in his ear—"Save the weakest—yes"—he actually saw or heard seldom, and inwardly Garth hungered. At first, Mildred had been active, visiting the mill and homes, even holding one or two meetings, but now her father obliged her to desist.

"You are doing harm. I will not have it. If Garrickson will, he must; he is young, and has a lesson or two to learn. Let him learn, by all means, but keep you out of it—you'll be poorer by many thousands at the best, Mildred."

Mildred thought she could bear that, but said nothing, and of course followed his wishes.

Then the clash came. On a given day almost all the mills were closed.

And still a stranger would have discovered nothing unusual—a few more men at the street-corners and round the public-houses; more lad-loiterers, more women in bonnets and boots going out to tea, fewer in shawls and clogs; fewer luries, closed mill-gates, that was all; chimneys smoked, and machinery whirled on, for the empty looms must be kept in motion to prevent rusting. But in banks and offices were grave faces; in back streets women white with despair; elderly men met and spoke together with shaking heads, and still half the masters held out sternly, half met deputations and deliberated, and all were losing thousands.

One day, certain rent-collectors were refused rent, the refusers were forcibly evicted in spite of tumultuous resistance; half the town rose and defied the police, and a riot ensued—free fighting, window-breaking, and uproar, while shops were barricaded, and decent people cowered indoors or got out of the town.

For hours Garth had been keeping the watchman company in the mill, walking up and down the narrow alleys, between the tall buildings, and through the long, silent rooms in which the still machines cast ghostly skeleton shadows; now two policemen had relieved him, and he might go—he must go—to the Hall and tell the owner of all this property a thing before he slept. John Caryl was a poor man once more.

He came out of the side gate, locked it, and went up the steep little street and the bank beyond till he reached the private door; fitting his key to the key-hole, he found to his surprise that the lock was gone. Garth pushed the door open and looked cautiously about him; on the wall above, two or three men were sitting, their backs towards him; mounting the steps noiselessly, he found more in the drive—a large group of men talking busily. Garth crept back into the gully close under the wall and listened. Whose the voices were he could not discover, nor much that was said; but so much he gathered—that for some reason they were bound for the Hall, were awaiting comrades.

Two or three strides, and Garth was down the hill, knocking sharply at a cottage door. Not waiting for an answer, he opened it and called, "Jack!"

A lad of fourteen came, a shock-headed, long lad, with keen, intelligent face. "Ay, sir!"

"Come outside. I want you!"

Jack came out, and in few words Garth told him what he had seen.

"Now, say nothing to a soul, and be as sharp as you can. Go across to the drill-shed yonder and see if any soldiers are there. Bring them. This note will do it." He had been scribbling as he talked. "If none are there, you'll have to go to the Town Hall."

I can get round by Princess Street and the market easy. 'T' row be i' Bridge Street and down yon."

"Yes—good job you're not in it, Jack. But see: you'll have to come round to the other side of the house, or they'll be all over the country. If you have to come round by my mother's, come to that side, leaving some men about here, and catch them as they come down."

"All right, sir." Jack was off like a shot, Garth's note in his fingers.

Up the hill again went Garth, coat buttoned up, hands in pockets, an easy swinging gait, and shrill, lively whistle; up the hill and under the gully, up the steps and the narrow lane beyond, without a turn of the head or a sign of feeling the watching eyes in the drive; at the top, where was a clear, open space, he came upon half a dozen men standing.

"Who's there?"

"Garth Garrickson. Good-night, lads. Glad you're out of the row down yonder," turning his head towards the town, away from the field where he had seen, without seeming to see, more men, and listening, it seemed, to the faint murmur which was all of the war below that came up here.

"Ay! Good-night, sir."

"Good-night," and he passed on, leaving them to shrug shoulders, grin, and draw relieved breath. "Gone home to say 'Twinkle, twinkle, little star,' to his mother before he goes to bed." But Garth had not gone home—he strode along till out of sight, then began closely to scrutinise the wall on his left. Soon he came to where two or three jutting stones gave footing; in a moment he was over in the field, but still he must skirt round, for just above was a quarry; in the dark this bit of land was dangerous. Garth knew his ground, however; safely reached the higher wall, and mounting it with more difficulty—for it was smooth and high—sprang down into the avenue.

CHAPTER XXVI.

MILDRED and her father were sitting in their drawing-room, far from the madding crowd and all sound of it.

They were very quiet—John Caryl feeling ill, and anxious to conceal it from his daughter; Mildred very uneasy, and anxious to conceal it from her father; both heartily tired of Lancashire and longing for Normandy. Both were glad when the door opened and Garth entered.

But instantly they saw something was wrong. His face was pale and set. He was evidently under strong excitement; and Garth was so seldom excited.

In few words he told them the state of the town.

"Some of the men are coming up to speak with you, sir.—Miss Mildred, I think you would be better with my mother. If you will be quick, I will take you."

Mildred paused; then the truth flashed upon her. The disaffected men, tired of arbitration, had taken matters into their own hands; and, bent on frightening the masters into acceding to their demands, had fixed upon the most resolute of them, the largest, richest, loneliest of their houses as their prey, while the police and military were engaged in the town.

She rose and looked at him—a very queen in her long silken robes and stately carriage.

"No, Garth, I shall not. I shall remain."

"Miss Millie! for heaven's sake—"

"Let her alone, Garth. She is as safe here as anywhere—I'll settle them!"

Garth raised his hand and listened. "No time," he said, and moving swiftly to the windows, closed and barred the shutters, and then he and his master went over the house, securing it. The shutters and doors were strong, bars massive, and the latter had no fear. "Oh, they won't get in; the police will soon be here," But Garth knew of an enemy bolts and bars could not keep out—fire.

The police, too, were fully occupied; such an outrage as this had not been dreamt of. Who could guarantee the safety of his messenger, alone and unarmed, in such streets? and already the mob gathering on the grass outside.

Then there came a modest knock at the back door. Garth, who was keeping guard in the back hall, answered it. "Who's there?"

There was a pause. They had expected admission in all unsuspecting by one of the maids. They knew Garth's voice—not saying hymns to his mother, after all. After a whispered consultation, one said in a feigned tone—

"We want to speak to the master."

"He will be at the mill in the morning at nine o'clock prompt."

"But we want him here and now."

"Who is 'we'? and how many?"

"Never you mind."

"Oh, very well," and Garth stepped, noisily enough to be heard, away from his side the door.

Then there was a loud knocking, a natural-toned call.

"I say, Garth—Garth Garrickson!"

"Well?"

"Just let us in, do! We only want to speak to 'im. We won't hurt 'im, or anything, and you can go: just let us in!"

"How many?"

"Ten."

"I shan't."

"You'd best; we can get in all the same."

"Try."

The next instant there was a report. The lock of the door flew into the passage, shot off; a shower of heavy blows followed, and there was a scream in the front hall where the servants were gathered, but the stoutly barred door was safe as ever.

Then there was another pause, a longer one. The men had gone round to their companions in front.

They were talking there in excitement, some suggesting one thing, some another, when, to their astonishment, the front door opened wide, and John Caryl appeared, followed by Garth. He stood there on the steps facing them as fearlessly as at his counter on pay-day, his house-door wide open behind him, throwing out a flood of light, and just in his rear Garth, fearless too, but pale and determined—something in his hands.

"Well, my men, what is it?" The master's voice rang out sharp and clear on the silence. No answer.

"What do you want, I say, at this time of night? Come, Williamson, I see you: speak up!"

There was a confused murmur, swelling to a low roar. Then a shout was caught, "We want our rights."

"Your rights at ten o'clock at night? What can I do for you here and now? You'll get no rights by doing me wrong, that I tell you." This was not conciliatory; John Caryl was angry with the anger of a man who feels himself insulted, and despised the men he faced as those who might have risen, as he himself, and had not.

"You do us no wrong and we'll do you none."

"Wrong! when have I come blowing off your locks last thing at night? You'd best go home, every man of you, or you'll find a lock you won't like turned on you ere morning." This was not the highest wisdom; to-morrow he would know it: just now he was too angry to think anything about it. Garth, watching, saw the sullen resentment in the dark faces change to excitement. A fresh murmur rose—of unmistakable wrath.

"Look 'ere, mester—t' perlice is busy enough down yon; you'd best do as we want, er it'll be t' worse for ye; we've pals down t' road, and we've but ter hang out a light and yer mill 'll fire i' no time. You just make us a promise, and we'll go home easy."

"And what am I to promise? The same old thing, I suppose—less work and more pay? Now, see here, my lads: when I was young I worked harder, longer hours, and earned less than any of you, and you see what I've come to—"

"Ay, and now ye turn on them as was yer mates!" and there was a shout, "Stop his mouth!" "Pull him down!" "Get on, lads, th' door's open!" An ugly surge forward. John Caryl stood his ground, though he did not see, as the foremost men saw, that Garth was covering him from the step behind, a pistol in each hand.

"Stand back! You touch me or my house and you'll repent it!" For answer there was a crash overhead, a sound of falling glass, and a call, "We're not your men!" The master's eyes blazed, his hands clenched; then a sudden pallor overspread his face—a spasm crossed it. Garth tossed his pistols away, seized him, pushed him into the house, and closing the door with a bang, stood before them all—alone and unarmed.

"I know it," he said. "Mr. Caryl has no men—I doubt if he ever will again; you've nearly ruined him, you strikers."

There was an instant's silence, then "Bosh!" was heard.

"It's no bosh, you'll find. My lads, hadn't you better mind what you do?"

"You shut up, Garth Garrickson; you're one o' t' mesters."—"Ay, he's a turn-coat; he went over to th' mesters when he got a bit o' money."

"He's a fine genelman nowadays, he is."

"Indeed, I am sorry you think so. I've worked hard and done my best for you; Hervey, Williamson, you know that; you heard me yesterday——"

"Ay, I did, lads; he spake up to th' mesters—he did so."

"He works, too, does Garrickson," said one of his own men.

"I should be ashamed of myself if I didn't. Lads, I know in much you're right, and I hope you'll succeed; but this isn't the right way about it; you'll only lose all you've earned—your very work you'll lose——"

"They can't do wi'out us, th' mesters."

"They can do without you for longer than you can do without them if they join; and this is just the way to make them do it—yes, months longer. The union has not half the money it's supposed to have—I've seen the accounts, and know." Garth had caught their ear now, and talked on: reasoning, pleading with them, hardly knowing what he said or how, only conscious that he held them, and must hold until help came—and oh, how long it was in coming!

The men listened, their anger died, their reason began to return, but still they would not give way. Garth was all very well; with him they had no quarrel; but with Mr. Caryl they had, and the masters represented by him; it was Mr. Caryl they wanted, they began to remember, and Mr. Caryl they must have, some of them declared. They began to consult, dispute among themselves, confused murmurs re-arose. Garth was despairing, when the door behind him opened, and Mildred was at his side, her fair face and hair glowing in the light of the hall lamp; where she had been all this while he had been too busy to wonder.

"My men," her voice rang out above the hubbub, "my men, I would not have believed this of you: had I been told I would not have believed it. Williamson, Hervey, Brierley, Hyde—why, I know most of you! We were friends once; how could you do it?" and her voice vibrated with pathos. They looked at her suddenly abashed, more by her manner than speech, for as her eyes travelled from one to another they had filled with tears; her lips were trembling, her face one tender sorrow.

"Well, my men, what is it?"—p. 415.

"We didn't know you was 'ere, miss," someone said awkwardly.

"You knew my father was here."

"We didn't mean to 'urt 'im; we on'y meant——"

"To frighten him—and he is very ill; you might have killed him. Suppose I had been here alone?"

"We wouldn't 'ave 'urt you."

"You have hurt me, more than I can bear—you, my Lancashire lads, whom I have been so proud of——"

As she talked and they stood listening, growing moment by moment more ashamed of themselves, Garth saw that the police had come—a strong cordon of powerful horses blocking up the drive at the narrow bend, red coats gleaming on the bank above. Now the crowd saw them too, and turned to fly. Mildred sprang forward.

"Stop! stop! there are more down the drive. No one shall be touched; stop!" They paused. "No one will be touched if you will promise me faithfully to go home quietly and leave it all with Garth," laying her hand on his arm; and he who had faced all that rabble fearless, started and trembled at her touch. "If anyone can do anything, he can: now promise me." The men looked at her and at the police hemming them in on the drive and the bank above. "They shall not touch you. All who promise hold up their hands."

They paused again, then by one impulse every hand was raised.

"That's right! that will do; Garth will do his best, be sure—all will end well yet. Now all must have a drink; no doubt you are thirsty." She stepped back and beckoned: and pail after pail of strong hot coffee was carried forward by the maids. Soon mugs, jugs, and basins were passing from hand to hand; in an incredibly short time every strong, sweet drop had vanished, and they were passed back with awkward, shamefaced thanks. A few last words, hand-shakes, and cap-pullings, and the men departed.

Garth and Mildred stood on the steps and watched them disappear—the police bringing up the rear and saluting as they passed—stood till the last had vanished round the corner; then they turned, and somehow they were hand in hand. Mildred was a poor woman now, Garth knew.

"Come and find your father;" and they went to the dining-room—holding each other still.

In his red velvet chair sat John Caryl, his hands clasped on his knee, his head bent, his chin resting on his breast. . . .

An instant they stood.

Then Mildred lifted her face.

"Oh, Garth—I am alone—all alone! What shall I do—oh, what shall I do?"

And Garth took her into his arms at last.

"I am here, Missie."

THE END.

THE LOVE OF CHRIST IN JUDGMENT.

BY THE RIGHT REV. THE LORD BISHOP OF WINCHESTER.

"Herein is our love made perfect, that we may have boldness in the day of judgment; because as He is, so are we in this world."—1 JOHN iv. 17.

MORE exactly rendered, the opening sentence will run, "In this hath love been perfected between us"; i.e., in the fellowship of God with man, and of man with God. In other words, this is the sublime triumph which love, believed, absorbed, and returned, shall achieve in its complete manifestation at the day of judgment. In that day, of which the Apostle here and elsewhere has taught us so much and with such detail, and which will manifest to the human conscience the consummation of its moral history, the revelation of its self-made condition, and its supreme destiny in the inevitable righteousness of God, he who has yielded to love, walked in it, brought others into it, increasingly learned its infinite and ineffable blessedness, shall, without the effrontery of hardness, or the callousness of an ignorance born of sin, but in a perfect peace, the very gift of God Himself, meet and behold the Judge without anguish or terror. This is a great mystery, but the Apostle's statement is as clear as words can make it, and we cannot doubt what he means. It is a promise, also, which we shall do well to examine, for who is there whom it does not concern? There are always some who say to themselves, "Peace, peace, when there is no peace," and it is a kindness to undeceive them. There are also some who forget that the laws of the spiritual world are no less inflexible and inviolable than those of the material world; that conduct is everything; and that the faith which saves, and which, working by love, makes conduct, is something much deeper and more substantial than the muttering of an unfelt creed, or than the melancholy presumption that to think ourselves saved is by itself a passport into the everlasting habitations.

There is the judgment and the confidence and the secret.

I. The Judgment. Holy Scripture, while expressing figuratively the Divine mind in the judgment and purpose, and even the surroundings of it, that we may be helped to comprehend all that is meant to be comprehended, also enunciates beneath figure and symbol some distinct and elementary principles of unspeakable value which lie at the root of it all.

First. Who are the judged? This question is not so gratuitous as might be supposed. There are those who, just out of a sense of the completeness of the Divine mercy, and of the inviolableness of the Divine covenant, and of the perfectness of the Divine salvation, hold, and strongly hold, that the saved, or the righteous, or, in a sentence, the Church, will not be judged at all, but will simply be spectators and assessors of the judgment on others. To put it in another way: where Christ says (St. John v. 24), "He that heareth My word and believeth on Him that sent Me hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death unto life," by "condemnation" He means "judgment"; in fact, that such a one will not be judged at all. This view, however, seems inconsistent with other and fuller scriptures; also with the revelation of the glory of God and of the moral necessities of man. St. Paul tells us distinctly (Romans ii. 5-16) that in the day when God shall judge the secrets of men, He will render to "them who, by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for glory and honour and immortality, eternal life"; and again (2 Cor. v.), that "we must all appear (or be manifested) before the judgment seat of Christ, that every-one may receive the things done in his body according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad." St. John, at the close of the Revelation xx. 12, tells us of his awful vision. "I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God; and the books were opened, and another book was opened, which is the book of life, and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works, and whosoever was not written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire." But if the righteous, the saved, the living Church mean those whose names are in the Book of Life, the fact that their names are found there is, practically, the result of judgment, expressed in another way.

In the passage before us the one point is that they are to be in judgment, and yet not to be in terror at it. But if they were to escape judgment altogether, where the need of assuring them of the confidence that will then possess them, but which they would not be in a condition to require? Besides it is not the usual way of inspiration to console us against an ordeal that never can be ours. We shall all be judged—nay, we must all be judged. We shall all be judged, that God may be glorified in those who have believed on Him, as well as glorified on those who have consciously and persistently rejected Him; this will be for the final vindication of the eternal righteousness. We must all be judged, for how in the moral constitution of things can it be otherwise?

Our personal lives as shaping and completing our moral character will then be manifested in a suitable body that shall be prepared for them, and the manifestation will be at once the verdict and the sentence. "The righteous shall shine forth as the sun in the Kingdom of their Father." The "unprofitable" shall be cast into the outer darkness, where is "weeping and gnashing of teeth." The justice of this is as apparent as are the wisdom and inevitableness of the mode in which it will operate. The Great White Throne, on which the Judge will be seated, will, it may reverently be gathered from the words of the prophet Daniel (cap. vii. 9), be of living fire, which will penetrate and illuminate, and purify and consume. To some a baptism of the Holy Ghost and of fire, to others an instrument of self-revelation and despair, it will be the symbol and the vehicle of infinite holiness and truth to the great concourse of all the children of Adam. St. John only here, and alone of the inspired writers (except St. Peter), refers to that day as the Day of Judgment. Elsewhere it is called "that day," "the last day," "a day," "a great and terrible day." Let us confess that the mind reels and staggers under any attempt to construct, even imagine, the methods or features of this stupendous assize which our Lord and His Apostles have so impressively and solemnly and emphatically and distinctly announced to us as the final winding up and ending of the history of our race on the earth. It is enough to know that we may regard it as more absolutely certain than that the sun will rise to-morrow; that it has been delayed in mercy, that for a while mercy may rejoice against judgment; but that the hour will come when the true mercy will be to pronounce judgment and to dismiss the judged to their supreme reward. It will all be supernatural, for the present laws of time and space and motion and vision, the only laws we know of by experience, will have been superseded by new conditions, of which we know nothing except that they will be ordained of God. It fills the spirit with awe, and, but for the blood which cleanseth from all sin, might paralyse even the believer with terror. The great criminals of the world and the great saints, writers who have polluted generations after them, and writers who have inspired them with lofty and generous ideals, preachers who have turned many to righteousness, and tyrants who have filled hell with their victims, will meet their Judge and know their doom, and the secret utterance of all will be, "Thou art righteous, Lord, because Thou hast judged thus."

II. But the Apostle tells of the confidence: a word which not unfrequently occurs elsewhere in the New Testament, and has for its first meaning "freedom of speech." St. John, of course, is here referring to the believer in Christ. The expression suggests the idea that the Apostle is recalling the figure in the parable of the final judgment of the heathen world, to which he must once have listened, and which he was not likely ever to forget, in which the Lord, the Righteous Judge, condescends to hold converse with those whom He has to welcome or to banish, and promises to those who shall be found in Him living partakers of His eternal life that boldness or freedom of speech which at once assures acceptance and utters praise. It could have hardly even occurred to the Apostle, with this assurance of their joy, that they could for one moment desire to be kept outside it. Terror will be impossible. Not a ripple of alarm will ruffle the perfect tranquillity of those who see in that supreme moment Him on whom they have believed. They will instantly and joyfully recognise in Him the Saviour on whom, it may be, long ago they cast the burden of their sins, and He cast it behind His back; the Master whose voice gave them their orders, whose wisdom directed their footsteps, whose Presence cheered their loneliness, and whose mercy crowned their labours; the Spouse to whom they had betrothed themselves in the ineffable blessedness of a mystical but actual life; the Friend to whom they could take every secret, confide every trouble, whisper every trial, trust in every temptation—whose love, little as they knew of it, passed knowledge, and put them to shame because they had not learnt it more. To be afraid of Him, to be ashamed of Him, to hide from Him, to distrust Him in that wonderful moment for which the Church has been waiting and the Holy Spirit moving, and the Eternal Father counselling, and each individual believes in his best and purest moments, secretly, almost impatiently longing, with a desire not to be put into words, should not only be felt unworthy and pusillanimous, derogatory to the faithfulness of God, wounding and dishonouring to the cross and victory of Christ, but simply impossible for anyone who has really found Christ and lived in the light of His love.

III. This will be made even plainer from the explanation St. John gives of his amazing paradox, "Because as He is, so are we in this world." The literal meaning of this must be, "Because as He (Christ) is eternally, and now in His character as it is known to us, are we even now in this world, out of which indeed He has passed, but in which we still live and serve." It is clear, of course, that the secret of this confidence may have two explanations, each of which is perfectly consistent with the other, each of which represents the one side or half of a most essential whole. One of these explanations may not inexactly be described as what St. Paul might have given—the objective side of the truth. The other is what I think St. John intended, which is the subjective side. Who, for instance, would care or even dare to deny that the true and immovable and evangelical ground of the sinner's peace is his spiritual union with Christ, that union which the Sacraments at once represent and, when duly received, convey, of which faith takes living and joyful and tenacious hold, which means in the eyes of God a personal and moral identity with Christ?—who is our wisdom and righteousness and sanctification and redemption; on whom we have cast our sins, and who has given us in exchange His own perfect righteousness; in whom even now, by virtue of our personal and spiritual union with Him, we "stand perfect and complete in all the will of God." It is, in fact, the substance of St. Paul's own aspiration about himself: "and be found in Him, not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith; that I may know Him and the power of His resurrection." It is also the precise doctrine which he laid down in his Epistle to the Romans: "Being justified by faith, let us have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ." This is the faith of the Gospel, and perhaps the central truth of it; and this freedom with which Christ makes us free we must never let go for an hour. But the context makes it clear that this was not the truth the apostle of love had in his mind when he penned these wonderful words. He was thinking of Christ's character, not of His satisfaction; and of the one quality which at once comprehends, illuminates, and beatifies it—Love. All through the chapter he has been expounding and impressing love. In the verse immediately before the text he had written, "We have known and believed the love that God hath to (in) us; God is love, and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him." Then the thought expands, and moves into a higher region and more distant future. Love, he seems to say, and then even judgment itself shall have no terror for you. Perfect love casts out fear. He that feareth is not made perfect in love. But in that day you will be made perfect in love. For even now love is your nature, your effort, your desire; and as your Head is in the perfect love of Heaven, so are you now, by His grace and benediction, like Him even on earth. In the day of judgment no earthly ties will distract you, no human activities dissipate you, no idolatries divide your affections, no roots of sin paralyse your will. The character of your Lord shall then finally and supremely be your character. Faith, which has hitherto worked by love, and manifested its truthness therein, shall be rewarded by it. "We love Him because He first loved us" shall be the new song of the redeemed.

There is another reason yet (have I not kept the best for the last?) for the victory of love in that tremendous day. Let me give it in the Apostle's own words: "Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that, when He shall appear, we shall be like Him; for we shall see Him as He is." This idea was familiar to St. Paul, and in his Second Epistle to the Corinthians he presses the wonderful truth that even now the contemplation of Christ shall produce resemblance to Him, though we behold that glory as in a glass darkly, with the imperfections and interruptions incidental to our life here. But in the great and awful day when the sign of the Son of Man appears in Heaven, and He comes with clouds to judgment, there will be no veil between His unclouded brightness and the emancipated spirits of His elect. The vision of the Judge will mean the transfiguration of His people; to see Him face to face in His eternal and yet redeeming glory will be to love as He loves, and to welcome as He welcomes.

We cannot, indeed, presume to anticipate the bliss of that moment, but if perfect love is to cast out fear, the sense of past sin and unworthiness shall be swallowed up for ever in the heavenly city whose walls are salvation and its gates praise. Now our humble petition too often has to be, "Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me." Then what a burst of song will break forth from the millions and millions of the redeemed in the House of their Father: "Unto Him which loved us, and washed us from our sins in His own blood, and hath made us kings and priests, unto God and the Father be glory and dominion both now and forever. Amen."

In conclusion St. John, in the preceding chapter (iii. 3), speaks of "this hope in (on) Him"; and St. Paul has the same thought when, in his letter to Titus (chap. ii. 13), he describes the attitude of the Church as "looking for that blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ"; and once more he writes to the Colossians (i. 27): "which is Christ in you, the hope of glory." This hope must be cherished and fed if it is to be to us all that it is meant to be, in helping us to rightly anticipate that day of judgment before it comes, tranquilly to meet it when it does come. Is there any conceivable way more natural or more helpful than that of entertaining Him in our hearts, of being ready and even eager, in the moments when He comes to visit us, to hold living fellowship with Him, to unburden our cares to Him in the effort of a true devotion, sometimes to sit and think of Him (which is the heart's secret worship) as the end and promise and reward and consummation of all? Occasionally Christians complain that they seldom see His face or enjoy His Presence. The question occurs, Whose fault is that? There is a passage in the Canticles that carries a deserved rebuke to some who should be in a greater haste to condemn themselves than to complain of their Lord. "I sleep, but my heart waketh. It is the voice of my beloved that knocketh, saying, 'Open to me, my sister, my love, my undefiled! I have put off my coat, how shall I put it on? I have washed my feet, how shall I defile them? I opened to my beloved, but my beloved had withdrawn himself, and was gone.' I sought him, but I could not find him; I called him, but he gave me no answer" (Canticles v. 2—6).

There are also those to whom the thought of meeting their Lord has neither rapture nor consolation in it; not that they are impenitent or insincere, but that they are content to remain on a low level of spiritual vitality. The life within them stagnates rather than grows; they will be saved, but there cannot be for them an abundant entrance into the everlasting Kingdom. When Christ promised to those who loved Him and kept His word "My Father shall love him, and we will come unto him and make our abode with him," by the coming He meant something that was to be recognised and felt; by the abiding, the ineffable fruition of a Divine Fellowship. Sometimes it seems to one that the greatest peril and disgrace of real Christians is laziness. It is laziness that makes short prayers, a neglected Bible, works that are dead, love that is tepid, interrupted fellowship, and growth stunted, from lack of living water at the roots. The question of questions is, "Now, Lord, what is my hope? Surely my hope is even in Thee?" The reply of replies must be: "When wilt thou come unto Me? I will walk in My house with a perfect heart."

What we most wish for is a test of our real character that cannot be explained away. To how many of us is the coming of Christ our secret hope and stay?

St. John, however, is very careful not to suffer us to imagine that this hope is a mere barren sentiment, without motive or effort or result. What is to come out of it if it is the right sort of hope, and not merely a selfish desire to be rid of the troubles of life, is a continuous struggle after the image of His Holiness. "Every man that hath this hope in (on) Him purifieth himself even as He is pure." Here is at once the measure of our struggle and the instrument of it. Christ's perfection is to be our model; self-purification—what is elsewhere described as "working out our own salvation"—is to be the continuous and unwearied way to it. Among the evil dispositions from which we are to purify ourselves are, surely, first and foremost, those that wound and chill and vitiate love. Every root of bitterness, every habit of unkind, or uncharitable, or sarcastic speech; haste to think, and even more to pronounce, evil; all proneness to place or leave a stumbling-block in our brother's way;—are absolutely fatal to the cherishing of this hope, which means the being admitted into the Father's House, where all the children of one blessed family love and are loved, without soil, or taint, or reserve, or grudging; where He who is love will give to His children fully to partake of His own nature; where selfishness will have ceased to be possible; and where to walk in love, as Christ has loved us, will be at once the rule and freedom of our lives.

Not that this love means a feeble complacency with evil, or a condoning of what we know to be wrong for peace' sake, or silence when we ought to rebuke sin, or indifference when it is our duty to prevent it. Christ is always our example, and sometimes even He reproved those whom He loved best at the moment when they thought to be serving Him. God who is Love is also a consuming fire, and the love which has nothing of burning in it is not the love of God. Once more, there is the Vision of Love. "We shall see Him as He is," says St. John. In the Revelation we have an account of what the Apostle had then seen; but it is all type and figure, so that it does not help us much to know what we shall see when the "King in His beauty" is before our eyes. But the emblem of fire, with which His eyes will gaze and His feet move and His face beam on us, indicates the penetrating, irresistible, consuming holiness which He will come at once to demand and represent and bestow.

He will be different from everyone in that great course, and every soul as it gazes on Him will have its own conception and amazement, its own untold gladness or its own self-reproaching anguish. His love—and He will be the very embodiment and ideal of love to those who have received and desired and imitated it—will be a revelation of wonderful and delightful beauty; to those who have disbelieved or despised or rejected it, it will bring at once a vindication of the righteousness which simply pronounces on them their self-chosen banishment and a discovery of their tremendous loss of a treasure so priceless and so dear. To see Christ and know Him for our own Kinsman, and plead Him for our salvation, and to welcome Him as our Master, and to crown Him as our Lord, with hearts that can perfectly love and wills that can instantly obey, and minds that can grasp Him, and consciences that can taste the full healing of His precious blood, will indeed be the beginning of a new creation, when He that sitteth upon the Throne saith, "Behold, I make all things new." To those who find out that they have lost, remember that they have lost it, not through ignorance, but through unbelief, the sense of their loss and their sin will surely be woe enough without adding other sorrow to it! One glimpse of His beauty to help them to understand what it is that they have been rejected; and then, with the last recollection of Him as one in whose face was the look of an infinite pity but an inflexible justice, to go away into the darkness to see His face no more.

"I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come; nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

CLEAR AND COOL.

BY C. DI FERRARA.

"THE AFTER-MATH IS BEING CUT."

WE have punted the old sea-going boat straight into the giant reed-forests, and there she lies, not at anchor, neither warped on to anything, but held fast by the lily-stems round her keel. It is strange for her to be here in the quiet backwater, with the misty bars of sunlight slanting down on to her through the alders, and the black-alder catkins dropping on to her thwarts, after her rough sea-passage thither. For in the grey of one August morning, when the swallows first began to chatter under the eaves, and the noise of the tide running out sounded warningly and sadly in the silence, she hoisted tanned sails and went down Channel, and after rolling in a heavy swell for seven hours off the headland, with the wind blowing dead against her entrance into the haven, she came up the creek at last, and up the river, after darkness had long set in, and waiting hearts grew anxious in the empty night.

Every now and again the wind comes along, and sweeps the reeds over towards us in purple-headed myriads, and

"The voice of its returning Sounds like an old sweet song."

In the hot sunlight they are bowing, and curtsying, and dipping in thousands between the thrush-egg-blue and grey cloud above and the dark brown and indigo-grey of the tide below. The watery smell of river-weeds swaying in the golden-red river-bed comes up with the hushful sigh of the reeds and the lifting of the lily-leaves, and is as much a part of the happy first sweet freshness of the morning as the loosestrife, and the arrow-heads, and yellow ragworts, and the occasional abrupt chuckling cry of the moor-hen in the sorrel-rusted river marshes, and the far-off song of the sea beyond the headland.

Warren Head, the country folks call it. Its heather-covered back lies against the reedy, lonesome wastes, where the curlews call, and its face looks out on the rosy-white cliffs of Alum Bay, across ten miles of the deepest borage-blue sea; and its feet are always encircled by the cruel, crawling foam.

Now the afternoon sunlight slides into the alder-pool.

The water is so wondrous clear by these "laughing shallows and dreamy pools," that one can see, in looking over the gunwale, the shoals of minnows showing silver sides as they glide over the pebbly sand, with the roaches and trout; and at this moment a perch with beautiful red-brown transverse bars on his back has emerged from his home under the mossy alder-roots, and is idly swimming round and round the boat, moving his red tail, and gazing up at us with mournful lack-lustre eyes, as though he might be an enchanted prince in a fairy legend. Look, there he dives under the water-crowfoot and cresses. Swish! flop! he rises under the alder-shade further down stream, and a fairy circlet spreads over the ebbing waters, in which blue forget-me-not blossoms are floating down, down, evermore down to the sea. What a long way they will have to go, poor little simple-eyed ones! and one wonders will they feel lonely, and sad, and frightened, like the "water-baby," when they find themselves drifting far away from their home in the damson-scented river grasses (green now as in June, for the after-math is being cut in yonder long garden of meadow-sweet, and the hay-breath floats through the alders), and the rose-cups of the great hairy willow-herb, and the water-stitchwort, where they were born? When they find themselves rounding the bend of the river and in sight of the sand-hills, and hear the seven whistlers wailing over the wide sea-reaches, and see the shells lying below them in the salt water, and meet the salt sea-breeze coming up against the roll of the tide, and the great white herring-gulls swooping and gliding over the shallows, and pass the tarry-black sides of the fishing-boats at anchor in the haven; as they hurry along to the "Golden sands and leaping bar,

And the taintless tide that awaits them far?"

Ay, "undefiled for the undefiled!" Let them go out with the tide, to lose themselves at last in the infinite main; and let us think of the sky that burns now with the evening light between the dark branches of the crooked alder that bends over our stream: for the whole West lies like a medley of pale honeysuckle, corn marigolds, and rose champions to-night; and countless hosts of swallows begin their circling overhead, with incessant and innumerable swallow-twitterings like the noise of the water in the mill-race, preparing for their nightly rest in the reed-beds. And the reeds and rushes begin to take a red glow in the duskfall, and the brown owl flies out and away up stream; and the minster-bells ripple out across harbour, field, and ferry:—

"O the bells, bells, bells!
O the tumbling and the clashing of the bells!"

ELIZABETH ANN'S BANK HOLIDAY.

BY ETHEL F. HEDDLE, AUTHOR OF "STAUNCH," ETC.

CHAPTER I.

IN THE ABBEY.

"I REALLY don't see why we should not. It is almost your last day in town."

"Aunt Fanny would be horrified!"

"I live in a perpetual atmosphere of Aunt Fanny's horror," Lillias said calmly; "so I am acclimatised. Here is our 'bus. She who hesitates is lost!"

And the end of the matter was that the two girls climbed into the 'bus.

It was Bank Holiday in London, and they had sallied forth from South Kensington, presumably for a short walk round the square; and then Lillias, in an evil moment, had proposed the Abbey service: just time to go, and be back for late afternoon tea.

Amabel was a country cousin, and the Abbey was her delight—the one sight which in all "roaring London" had more than surpassed those halcyon dreams of the great city which delight our mental vision before we see it. Day after day she and Lillias had gone to afternoon service, or sat dreaming in the Poets' Corner, watching the people troop by and pause before those two great names carved—last of all her poets—in England's Temple of Honour: Alfred Tennyson; Robert Browning. The girls read the words, each time with the same half-awed voices. To Amabel it seemed impossible that all mortal of these two great men rested under her feet.

They drew breath in a bewildered way now, when they got just within the Abbey doors. They had not expected that the crowd would come here—that the East-end, everywhere en évidence to-day—careed at all for its Abbey. And the mighty temple was crowded to suffocation. It belonged, for the nonce, to people who rarely worshipped in any temple, who knew so little of beauty, or prayer and praise, that they seemed to sit here half-bewildered now. Amabel drew her cousin aside, and they crept between the monuments and the pews to two seats left vacant just under the inscrutable marble face of Benjamin Disraeli, Lord Beaconsfield. All around there were tired faces, hot faces, strange faces; women gaudily attired in terrible Paisley shawls and straw bonnets; babies, who sucked sticky fingers, and were kept quiet by much whispered admonition—men, boys, and little girls. It was a shabby crowd. Amabel watched and looked, and presently she touched her cousin's arm.

"Look at that child!"

A little girl, whose thin pinched face was nodding in utter fatigue, was just before them, a large, old-fashioned prayer-book propped up before her, and her straw hat, which had a fearful and wonderful bunch of cherries, was tilted over her forehead. Every now and then the tired head nodded, and she would be brought back to remembrance by the vicious dig of the woman beside her.

"Look 'ere, Elizabeth Ann," the woman whispered, "you're asleep. Stop it!"

A violent jerk, another nod and push, and Elizabeth Ann's lips quivered piteously.

"Oh, I'm so tired!" she whispered. "I can't 'elp it!"

"I think in my life," Amabel whispered, "I never saw anyone look so tired!"

And then there was a little hush. The anthem was given out; the mighty crowd arose silently: "As wants the hart!"

And it was as if a veil fell from before each face; the very babies stopped their tired murmur; Elizabeth Ann forgot her utter weariness; she stood, too, leaning against the pew, her blue eyes wandering up to the glorious rays of amethyst and gold which fell athwart the soft grey stone from the rose window. What did each man, woman, and child hear in that silvery, pealing voice? What is music, and music such as this, to every human soul? Wings to carry one up and up, and beyond earth's care and fret, and the weary, restless struggle, to another realm! The voices of earth are gone, and the heat and the turmoil melt away. They no longer remember the wolf at the door, the "daily bread" for which they forget to pray: it seems so impossible a miracle to find; and for one brief moment all they have known of beauty, and of prayer and praise, and that dim realm called heaven, is crystallised in that heavenly voice, in this sweet high song.

And now it is over.

The crowd listened sleepily and heavily to the prayers; many slept through the Dean's sermon; many would not hear if they could; many had never listened to a sermon in their lives, and the words only dropped like rain upon them. And then it was finished, too, and they rose to walk round the tombs. Amabel leant over suddenly and touched Elizabeth Ann.

"Did you walk all the way?" she asked. "Are you very tired?"

Elizabeth Ann gazed a moment before she answered. The pretty, girlish face, under its white-plumed hat, was rather strange to her.

"I'm mostly tired," she said wearily, with a little shrug. "Lor! that bain't anything."

"What do you do?"

"I'm in a fried-fish shop. D'ye like fried fish?"

Amabel did not smile.

"And do they keep you very busy?"

"Lor bless you! I do the cooking," Elizabeth Ann said, as if the question was superfluous; and then she jerked herself on, and passed out of the pew.

"What an extraordinary child! I never saw any-one so thin. Had we not better go, Amabel?"

Amabel roused from a dream.

"She does the cooking! Picture it, Lillias, that child! She looked forty—and she looked twelve! And she has forgotten her prayer-book."

She bent and took it, the crowd sweeping slowly past them.

"Elizabeth Ann Graybrook! An educated hand too; and then—this is her writing—'4, Rose Vale, Chelsea.' See if we can find her."

But they could not, and Amabel finally left the book with a policeman at the Abbey door, giving him a shilling, and asking him to look out for "a funny little girl—very thin—quite the thinnest child he had ever seen, with cherries in her hat."

And then the two went home, where Lady Frances Marjoribanks said that never—no never—in her life had she heard of such idiocy and folly. And after tea and sundry blood-curdling prophecies of all the horrible diseases they might have, and probably had, caught, they were allowed to go and dress.

CHAPTER II.

FRIED FISH AD NAUSEAM.

"We shocked Aunt Fanny horribly, Mrs. Lee! We went to the Abbey to service."

The stately white-haired housekeeper, who had more dignity and "presence" than Lady Frances herself, smiled indulgently.

"Did you, Miss Amabel? There would be a crowd!"

"Such a crowd: an East-end crowd! We saw one poor little girl—I sat and watched her—with the most heartbreaking face I ever saw in my life! She kept falling asleep, and was wakened up by a horrid red-faced woman. She told me she cooked in a fried-fish shop!"

Mrs. Lee put down her book of recipes, and she looked up at the young lady with a sudden look of intentness.

"A little girl! What age, Miss Amabel, dear?"

"Well, forty in expression, twelve in size!"

"Oh, my child! Oh, my poor, tired little girl!"—p. 425.

"Twelve in size! What was she like?"

"She had very blue eyes—vivid blue eyes—with black lashes; the rest of the face was so thin it was pitiful to see."

The housekeeper echoed her sigh. She did not look at Amabel as she said then, in a curiously restrained voice, and with a deep shadow on her fine pale face—

"I've an odd fancy always to hear of children that age. Long ago, Miss Amabel, I drove my only daughter out of my home with hard and cruel words because she married a common soldier, and I wanted her to marry my Lady's steward! I said far more than I meant, and Elizabeth Ann never came back, and never wrote. It's been like a weight of lead on my heart for twenty years. I could never find her. For twenty years I've scarcely slept a night, but I've seen her looking at me, with her white sad face. I did not fancy him, and I thought he drank; and ever since I've come to London with my Lady, do you know, Miss Amabel, I take a walk every night, and I peer into every woman and child's face. I've asked God to let me even hear of her. They say most poor folks drift up to London. One hears such terrible stories that we in the country can scarcely believe."

"Mrs. Lee, that child's name was Elizabeth Ann Graybrook!"

The housekeeper got to her feet. She stood staring wildly at Amabel. "Elizabeth Ann Graybrook!"

"And the address was 4, Rose Vale, Chelsea. It was written in the prayer-book!"

It took very little time for the housekeeper to put on her silk cloak and bonnet, but her hands trembled so that she could scarcely tie the strings. She said there was just time for her to go out before dinner, and Amabel saw her leave in much excitement.

* * * * *

Hot! Mercy! how hot it was in the kitchen!

"Elizabeth Ann, where h'ever is that dish?" Elizabeth Ann, bain't that fish ready?"

Call! Call! Call!

Her tired feet ached, her head throbbed—it always throbbed—but it throbbed worse than ever to-day; her eyes saw nothing but the red coals, her nostrils smelt fried fish even in her dreams. She cooked in her dreams, she answered her mistress in her dreams; life was one vast kitchen, one ceaseless, never-ending round of frying!

Would the long day never end?

"Bank 'olidays don't suit you!" her mistress had said sarcastically. "You'll stop at 'ome next year!"

The threat scarcely moved Elizabeth Ann. She was too tired, yet the words set her dreaming again of that wonderful place—that wonderful voice. She washed the dishes and dried them in a dream. In heaven, she supposed, dully, the windows were all like that, and little boys in white sang all day. Would Mrs. Jaikes be in heaven too, to jog her elbow when she went to sleep, and to call her in the morning?

Elizabeth Ann bore Mrs. Jaikes no ill-will at all, but she did hope that in all heaven there might be two places found—one where she could sleep in peace, out of sound of Mrs. Jaikes' voice. Would they let one sleep in heaven till one was quite rested? Fancy being not tired!

"Bain't you ready yet, Elizabeth Ann?"

The dull pain in her head was very bad that day. She only heard Mrs. Jaikes in a dream. A kind of mist was in the kitchen and before her eyes, and it seemed as if great weights were tied to her feet. And oh! how her back ached! And Mrs. Jaikes was always calling—always calling—and that dreadful jangling bell maddened her.

Elizabeth Ann sat down desperately at last, and her head fell back. Mrs. Jaikes, calling in vain, found her in a dead faint, and she carried her wrathfully up-stairs, put her on the mattress in the corner, dashed a jug of water on the deathly face, and ran to answer the bell herself.

And it was a lady—a magnificent lady, it seemed to her—asking for Elizabeth Ann.

The mistress of the fried-fish shop told the story briefly, the lady listening with a bright spot of colour on her face.

The child's mother had died, and Mrs. Jaikes had kept the orphan on as maid-of-all-work. Oh yes, the lady might go and see her. She had not been well. Drat that bell!

Up the dirty staircase, with its sickening smell of frying—up, up, and a low attic door was before her. Mrs. Lee pushed it open, and at first saw nothing. And then she made out, in the corner, a dirty mattress, and thrown back on it—ah me!—such a little white, pinched face. "Forty in look, and yet twelve in size." She stood and gazed with an agony of grief in her heart, and then the blue eyes opened slowly—her daughter's very eyes—and Elizabeth Ann rose on her elbow.

"I'm coming, ma'am," she said. "Is it five o'clock already?"

Mrs. Lee advanced; the child was wavering unsteadily from side to side, and she put out her hands and drew her down on her lap, Elizabeth Ann still too faint to resist, and yet recoiling weakly.

"I'll dirty your dress, ma'am," she said, with an attempt at a smile. "Bless you! I'm not cleaned yet—and—bain't there some mistake?"

"You are my little girl—my very own little girl. Your mother was my daughter, and I've looked for her and you for years and years. Will you come away with me, Elizabeth Ann? We'll take a cottage in the country—with roses climbing over the porch, and you shall have a little white bed. Oh, my child! Oh, my poor, tired little girl!

She was sobbing then—the grief and the remorse of years finding vent at last. Lady Frances would not have known her calm, self-contained housekeeper; and Elizabeth Ann put up a thin hand confidently, after an amazed and wondering look. It was such a dirty little hand, too, but her grandmother pressed it to her lips. "Will you come?"

"Folks'll be coming for their suppers," the child said; "but if you set sich a 'eap on it, I'll come. That cottage 'ud be lovely! Would they be red roses and a white bed? Do folks rise early in the country? And who air you, ma'am?"

"You shall sleep all day, if you like. I am your own mother's mother!"

She held the child close then, and she kissed her softly.

"Is it true?" And then Elizabeth Ann looked up in the rapturous, bent face. "You bain't an angel? and I'm not dead? Eh?"

"What do you mean, my child?"

"Because that's what I prayed for after the little chap 'e sang in the Abbey. Folks all prayed, and I prayed—all I knew 'ow. I said, 'Please God gi'e me a good long sleep in a white bed till I'm real rested!' I didn't think o' the red roses. I'm awful tired! I'm nigh beat these last few days. And God—E'es

'eard me. I prayed in the Abbey on Bank 'oliday. I was there! And there was a big window, all shining, and that lovely, like a flower, and a little chap!—my! 'ow 'e did sing. I thought maybe you vos God's angel when you kissed me, ma'am, and that it would all come true."

And by-and-bye, in a rose-covered cottage, with clover fields around them, and on a little white bed, snow-white and lavender-scented, Elizabeth Ann slept till she was rested. Smiling faintly up in Mrs. Lee's loving face, she said He must be a very kind God to hear her prayer amongst all the others on Bank Holiday. It had been a memorable Bank Holiday for her!

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

APRIL 15TH. JOSEPH SOLD INTO EGYPT.

To read—Gen. xxxvii. 23—36. Golden

Text—Gen. i. 20.

INTRODUCTION. Joseph, after telling his dreams, was hated by his brethren. They went as far as Shechem with their flocks. Jacob sent Joseph to inquire after their welfare. They saw him at a distance, and plotted against him. The others wanted to kill him, but Reuben, the eldest, planned to deliver him (ver. 21). To-day's lesson begins with his coming up to the camp.

I. JOSEPH STRIPPED. (23—25.) Picture the scene:

Joseph, unsuspecting, comes up to his brothers. They standing about, with crooks in their hands. The sheep and cattle are quietly grazing around. He tells his message of love from their father. They listen with angry looks and evil thoughts. He is roughly seized and handled by them.

His coat of many colours is roughly torn from him.

His cries for mercy (xlii. 21) are disregarded. He is lowered into the pit, or empty cistern. His brothers calmly sit down to their meal.

THE TYPE. See in this Joseph a type of Christ. He came to His own, but they received Him not. Told message of love from His and their Father.

Was stripped of His purple robe, and watched with indifference by His enemies. (St. Matt. xxvii. 31—36.)

LESSON. Patience under undeserved sufferings. (1 Pet. ii. 20.)

II. JOSEPH SOLD. (25—30.) A new scene. Caravan of Ishmaelites and Midianites appears. They are on their way to Egypt from Gilead. Balm (or balsam): i.e., gum from mastic-tree.

Myrrh from the rock-rose, and other spices.

All used in Egypt for embalming the dead.

Judah takes the lead; Reuben being away (ver. 29).

He suggests how quietly to get rid of Joseph.

No need to murder or leave him to starve.

They can sell him as a slave to these strangers.

He is their own flesh and blood, after all.

So they bargain and sell him for twenty pieces (or shekels) of silver—worth £2 13s. 4d., at 2s. 8d. each.

There was no one present to pity or to save.

Reuben, however, was not present. He had been a coward before, and was so now. He joined in concocting a tale to tell their father.

THE TYPE. Christ was plotted against by Jews. Was sold by Judas (Judah) to the Council.

Joseph of Arimathæa did not consent. (St. Luke xxiii. 51.)

III. JOSEPH MOURNED. (31—36.) Notice:

The brothers' fraud—deceived their father.

Their cruelty—in sending the coat—his gift.

Their fear—for twenty-two years lived in remorse. (xlii. 21.)

Jacob's sufferings. He pictured the worst.

Joseph must have died a terrible death.

So his father mourned and refused comfort.

LESSONS. 1. Retributive justice.

Jacob deceived by his sons—as he deceived Isaac.

2. God's orderings.

Joseph, sent to Egypt, saved his family. (Golden Text.)

"All things work together for good to them that fear God."

APRIL 22ND. JOSEPH RULER OF EGYPT.

To read—Gen. xli. 38—48. Golden Text—1 Sam.

ii. 30 (last part).

INTRODUCTION. Pass over twenty years. Joseph in Egypt, sold to Potiphar—rose by good behaviour to be his steward—unjustly accused by Potiphar's wife—cast into prison—interpreted dreams of Pharaoh's butler and baker—came under the king's notice, interpreted his dreams, foretelling seven years of plenty, to be followed by seven of famine. He advises storing corn during the prosperous years.

I. JOSEPH MADE RULER. (38—44.)

What a wonderful change in his position !

The foreign slave made chief ruler of the land.

The captive raised from prison to a throne.

These points may be noticed :

The cause. Because of the Spirit of God in him.

The Spirit of wisdom and understanding. (Is. xi. 2.)

This needed for governing such a great nation.

His dignity. Set over the whole land of Egypt.

Only second to the king in honour.

Receives a signet-ring from the king's hand.

Is vested by him with fine linen. (Ezek. xvi.

10.)

A gold chain of office is put on his neck.

He rides in the king's own second chariot.

Runners go before him to proclaim his rank.

All are required to bow the knee before him.

All power in the land is given to him.

THE TYPE. Even so Christ was exalted.

He sits at God's right hand. (Acts ii. 33.)

All power is given Him. (St. Matt. xxviii. 18.)

At His Name every knee shall bow. (Phil. ii.

10.)

II. JOSEPH'S NAME AND RULE. (45—48.)

A new name given to mark his honour.

Egyptian meaning, "Food of the living."

Hebrew—"Revealer of secrets."

Greek version—"Saviour of the world."

In all three respects a type of Christ.

Christ gave food, mercy, and pity to men.

He taught the mysteries of God.

He is the Saviour of all who believe.

Also was of same age as Joseph when He began

His public ministry. (St. Luke iii. 23.)

Joseph now began his rule. What did he do ?

Went all over Egypt, to see for himself.

Stored up corn everywhere for future use.

Was active, provident, and wise.

LESSONS. 1. Faithfulness in service low or high.

2. Diligence in business, serving the Lord.

3. Doing all to the glory of God.

APRIL 29TH. JOSEPH FORGIVING HIS BRETHREN.

To read—Gen. xlv. 1—15. Golden Text—St. Luke xvii. 3.

INTRODUCTION. The seven years of plenty over, the seven years' famine followed, and extended to the adjacent countries—even to Canaan. Jacob sent his ten elder sons to buy corn in Egypt. At once recognised by Joseph, he bade them bring Benjamin on their next visit. They did so, with great reluctance on Jacob's part ; but Judah undertook to be surety for his safety. Joseph tests their sincerity by accusing Benjamin of theft. He then makes himself known to them.

I. JOSEPH MADE KNOWN. (1—8.) Notice :

Joseph wanted to see his brothers' minds.

Had they repented of their former sins ?

Were they changed men, or not ?

Therefore tested them through Benjamin.

Would they leave him to prison and slavery, and think only of their own safety ?

Not one deserts him—all return with him.

Judah, who sold Joseph, pleads for Benjamin.

Joseph is satisfied, and receives them to favour.

Try and picture out the scene.

The council-chamber of the palace.

Egyptians commanded to leave the room.

Joseph alone with the eleven Hebrews, his brothers.

He at once bursts into loud weeping.

Tells who he is—asks after his father.

His brothers are terrified at his presence.

They think of all they did to him.

And he is the ruler, prince, judge !

What will not their sentence and fate be ?

But he bids them come near—he speaks kindly.

He tells them how God had sent him to Egypt.

They must not be angry or reproach each other.

God has made him a saviour to Egypt, a father to Pharaoh, and also their deliverer.

All has indeed worked together for good.

II JOSEPH'S FORGIVENESS. (9—15.) A message of love to all.

To his father. He must come and see him.

Joseph will nourish the whole family in Egypt.

His father must come and witness his honour.

To his brothers. They can all see who he is.

He is their long-lost brother Joseph.

His words are those of peace and forgiveness.

So he embraces them all with tears.

Notice about this forgiveness :

It was full—complete and entire.

No mention more made of the wrong done.

It was free—not by merit, but of love.

It was tender—no word of harshness or reproach.

Kind in words—loving in embraces.

Thoughtful for his father—tender to Benjamin.

THE TYPE. Forgiveness of sins.

Is obtained by God's mercy, not our merit.

Is full and free, upon confession of sin.

Is gracious and loving, calling out love in return.

LESSON. "Go and do likewise."

MAY 6TH. JOSEPH'S LAST DAYS.

To read—Gen. l. 14—21. Golden Text—Prov. iv. 18.

INTRODUCTION. Joseph, having forgiven his brothers, sent them to Canaan to fetch his father Jacob to Egypt. Jacob arrived with his whole family (seventy persons in all), and was settled in the fertile land of Goshen. There he died in a good old age, after blessing his twelve sons and foretelling their future destiny. He was taken to his family burial-place in Canaan, receiving a grand funeral. Joseph and his brothers returned to Egypt.

I. JOSEPH REASSURES HIS BROTHERS. (14—21.)

Picture the funeral party's return home.
Joseph is very sad at losing his father.
There had been unbroken love between them.
His brothers have most gloomy forebodings.
They think his kindness was for Jacob's sake.
Now he is dead, Joseph will turn against them.

Remorse for the past makes them suspicious.
So they send a messenger to plead for them.
They confess frankly all the wrong done.
They humble themselves as slaves before him.
They plead their father's desire that they should be forgiven.

They acknowledge his past goodness to them.
They pray that it may be continued.

How did Joseph receive their petition?

He listened kindly and patiently.
Did not thrust them away harshly.
He wept, showing sympathy and love.
He granted their prayer; they need not fear.
He assured them how all was God's ordering.
He promised nourishment for them all.

LESSONS. See in Joseph's brothers a type of true prayer. There must be—

Confession of past sin.

Humbling the soul before God.

Prayer, earnest and believing, for forgiveness.

Then a broken and contrite heart God will not despise.

II. JOSEPH'S LAST DAYS. (22—25.) In Egypt.

A long life—lived to be 110 years old.

Eighty years since he first stood before Pharaoh.

A family life—lived to see great-grandchildren.

Ephraim, as foretold (xlvi. 19), coming first.

A godly life. Strong in faith and hope.

Foretold that God would fulfil His Word.

They should return to the promised land.

They should bury him with his father in Canaan.

LESSONS. Can sum up Joseph's character.

An obedient and loving son.

A kind and forgiving brother.

A faithful and honest servant.

A good and just ruler. (Golden text.)

MAY 13TH. ISRAEL'S BONDAGE IN EGYPT

To read—Exod. i. 1—14. Golden Text—Ps. cxxiv. 8.

INTRODUCTION. Begin the second book of the Bible. Exodus—a Greek word—means “going out.” It tells of departure of Israelites from Egypt, as foretold by Joseph—first describing their bondage and misery.

I. ISRAEL IN PROSPERITY. (1—7.) How seen? By their great increase in numbers.

Rose from 70 to 600,000 men in 210 years (xii. 37).

This was result of God's special blessing.

They were a nation born in a day. (Deut. i. 10.)

In a special sense the offspring of God. (Deut. xxxii. 18.)

This increase fulfilled first promise to Abraham.

1. His seed was to become a great people.

2. They were to possess the land of Canaan.

3. They were to be a blessing to all nations.

Were also living in fertile part of Egypt.

Enjoying ease—plenty of food, etc. (Exod. xvi. 3.)

But were beginning to forsake God. (Ezek. xx. 5—8.)

Some of them lapsed into idolatry. (Josh. xxiv. 14.)

Just as their descendants after Joshua. (Judges ii. 10.)

LESSONS. 1. God's word is sure—never fails.

2. God's goodness is to children's children.

II. ISRAEL IN ADVERSITY. (8—14.) The cause.

Kingdom passed to another dynasty.

Joseph's benefits forgotten by next generation.

Israel an alien race becoming mighty.

God's blessing made them stronger than their foes.

The result. The king's heart turned against them.

Thus fulfilling the prediction to Abraham in the dream of horror and darkness. (Gen. xv. 13, 14.)

Pharaoh dealt in a crafty manner. (Ps. cv. 24.)

He wanted to check their increase and to keep them in the land as slaves.

The means. He made them serve with rigour.

Set them to brick-making, building cities, etc.

Quite at variance with their old shepherd-life.

Also set cruel task-masters over them.

The effect. Israelites increased the more in number.

Out of evil again came good.

Because more desirous to seek rest in Canaan.

LESSONS. 1. “Whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth.”

2. “Behold, we count them happy which endure.”

THAT PEACEFUL TIME.

CHAPTER III.

THE SUNDAYS THERE.

HEY were curious : very unlike Sundays at home. But many things here are unlike things at home. To arise in a great hotel, very handsome and pleasant indeed, yet where the guests number a hundred and twenty : to have one's breakfast in a large apartment, as one of that considerable company, amid the inevitable stir and bustle, not to say clatter and hubbub : to discern many signs that the men who abide under this roof are quite emancipated from Scottish ideas as to the observance of the Lord's Day : these things are strange. Then to walk away by a path through fragrant clover, which makes all the air delightful to the sense : to enter into a pretty church, fitted to the place (for its west front reproduces that of Fortrose Cathedral), where one has the pleasant sense of freedom from responsibility which can never be in a church of one's own : to find there a large congregation, very many of which have plainly never been in a Scottish kirk before : who know not what is meant by a paraphrase, and are in some cases surprised to find that there is any praise at all : who introduce innovations into the worship which startle the natives, as frequent and hearty responses of Amen, and prompt arising in sympathy with the ascription which concludes the sermon, turning in so doing towards the altar : those things are pleasing indeed, but some of them are unfamiliar. As for the cheering attention and the perfect hush with which the exhortation is listened to : these things happily never fail. After the first few sentences, one feels at home. And never anywhere did brighter or more sympathetic faces give heart to any preacher.

The church is new ; and it had to be built wholly by voluntary liberality. Wisely, instead of producing, complete, a structure of inferior character, the builders have made the first outline of a really fine church. The chancel is temporarily furnished in the very plainest way, and there is no stained glass at all. For years to come, there will be scope for devout wealth to bring its offering here. But when the church is furnished as it is made to be, it will be (for Scotland) a beautiful one. All will come in time : let us hope, in our time.

Little things surprise good folk who have never wandered beyond that lovely strath. A good girl of possibly twenty years, coming out of church, said to a companion, in a bewildered fashion, but with the soft pleasant Celtic voice : " It's the queerest service I ever saw. He read every word of his sermon." Doubtless the discourses she is in use to hear are in Gaelic, and Gaelic is the language of poetry and oratory ; every Gaelic preacher holds forth quite extempore ; sometimes, too, with an unsimulated fervour which sweeps away even such as do not understand a word that is said. Yet in this place, where the " kist of whistles " might have been deemed unknown, a good harmonium accompanied the singing ; the organ is a luxury, and can wait. And in the little choir which was got together for those Sundays, there was one charming voice of such wonderful power, sweetness, and expression, that it was not surprising that its possessor is well known over that region (which is a wide one) as " the Patti of the North." Furthermore, for every good and charitable purpose that voice is lifted up as freely as beautifully.

Scottish folk, young and old, quite readily ask for information. I had touching little instances of an unsophisticated curiosity. Yet none come back more vividly than one near at hand, and not a week old. I was coming out from a certain grand churchyard, having fulfilled a brief sad duty there ; and under the western gable of a cathedral which was once magnificent, was putting off my gown. Four little individuals approached : two boys, two girls, the eldest not six years old. They were in no degree in awe of me : which is my desire. One boy, speaking for the rest, said to me with an anxious look, " Were ye preachin' ? " — " No, my little folk, " was the reply ; " I was burying a poor young woman. " A pause ; then, solemnly, and with a latent thought of self, came the question, " Was she big ? " Big means grown-up, in these parts. " Yes, she was seventeen : much bigger than you, and a very good girl. But even little people like you may have to be brought here. Are you good children ? that's the great thing. " The four voices answered together, firmly, " Yes. " Then a word of blessing, and we part. They were not in the least afraid of the solemn but cheerful burying-place ; there is nothing here about a funeral to cause the old heathenish horror I remember long ago. Yet there was a personal concern : implied, though not expressed.

One recalled the old man in Ayrshire, who after a burial said to the minister, " Div ye ken what I aye think at a funeral ? " The minister expected some devout reflection ; and made inquiry what it was the old man thought so regularly. " I aye think " ; he paused, awe stricken : " I aye think, I'm desperate glad it's no' me ! "

The minister was disappointed. Yet it must be admitted that a famous verse in the famous Elegy conveys, in more graceful language, a not unsimilar sentiment as to the fashion in which poor humanity quits " the warm precincts of the cheerful clay. " It depends, doubtless, greatly on the present mood, how we shall think of the great change. There was absolute sincerity when the greatest Scotsman (and surely all but the best), hearing of an old friend's death, wrote with a failing hand, " I could have wished it had been Sir Walter. "

Does Sunday begin with Saturday evening ? I used to be taught so, long ago. Not at all in the sense that the evening and the morning are the day : or that the sacred day ended when Sunday's sun went down. It was rather because a certain quietude of spirit was becoming, in preparation for the holy hours which were drawing near. It was thought that one could not pass very swiftly from worldly worries or amusements to elevated devotion of heart. But where I abide, we have changed all that ; and though any scene of special gaiety would still be commonly regarded as unbecoming the evening of Saturday, a little quietly cheerful society is deemed a very good preparation for the special duties of the Lord's Day ; even for such as are to minister in its public worship. The mind passes with a helpful rebound from the gay to the graver : when health and heart are as could be wished. It was in a specially bigoted region that a lugubrious Pharisee once said to a brisk bright friend of mine, departed : said, in a dolorous whine, " Whawt's the best preparation for a weel-spent Sabbath ? " My friend told me that he saw the question was not put in good faith, but with a view of estimating his condition : " trying his speerit " ; and accordingly he replied, in the most matter-of-fact tone, and with a cheerful intonation quite removed from " the Bible twang " — " Well, I should say, a good night's sleep. " But the Pharisee, looking upon him as from an immense elevation, and conveying clearly that he was in benighted ease, made reply, " Naw, a gude warsle wi' Sawtan ! " Then departed, casting an unfriendly look upon my good friend. It was not as when one, known to me, was extremely pleasant in his talk with those who did not belong to his Communion ; but somewhat spoiled the effect by stating that he felt it his duty to be civil to heretics in this life, forasmuch as he had no hope of ever seeing them in any other.

It indicates a great breaking away from old fetters, to look round this Saturday evening. For this is in Scotland, and very far North. Yet cheery dancing is going forward in this great chamber, to the music of a very decent band set upon a dais at one end of it. It is no longer regarded as a duty to be "unhappy on Sunday," or unhappy because the blessed day is drawing near. Innocent amusement is judged a very fit and right thing, by all whose opinion is of the smallest value. Dancing is esteemed a very pleasant and innocent amusement. And the Kirk has advanced several thousands of miles since the day when it condemned "promiscuous dancing." There is no doubt at all what that meant. Once, in the house of my revered old Professor of Divinity (just as devout and good a Christian as I ever knew), I was present (being a youth of twenty) at a great dance. And, having conveyed his charming daughter to her seat, I said humbly to my admirable instructor (who rose just as high as is possible in the Kirk), "What exactly is meant by that 'promiscuous dancing' which is so severely condemned?" With a benignant yet extremely dignified smile (no one not a fool would presume upon him), he answered, "Of course it meant that men and women should not dance together. There was no harm in men dancing with men, and women with women. But," he went on, casting a kindly eye upon the gay groups round, "that way of thinking has quite fallen into desuetude." And indeed it appeared to me that it had.

If a thing be done at all, it is right that it should be well done. And the dancing here was remarkably good. It was pleasant to behold the graceful activity of various pretty young women; for the dances were by no means walked through. But it was a singularly touching and impressive spectacle to witness divers huge men, of eighteen, twenty, and twenty-two stone, flying about wildly in Highland reels, and uttering the frequent yell. I know how Lord Eldon, long Lord Chancellor (thinking only of himself, and not at all of a suffering community), said, "Never give up"; but I really think that when a man's head is bald, and his hair (if any) white, he had better give up dancing. For dancing, he looks like a fool; and one pities the poor girls who must dance with him. But the stout men were only in middle age, and their activity was pleasing and pathetic. It brought back to me a picture of not many years ago. The stately Bishop Wordsworth of St. Andrews was not merely one of the greatest scholars of his time, but one of its chief athletes. A dear friend of mine who is a great preacher, but a very little man, was with me here; and we were walking with the Bishop about his pretty garden. We came to a fine tennis court, provided when the house was a College Hall; and in an evil moment the Presbyterian challenged the Prélate to a game. The Prélate was fourscore; but the wonted fires were awakened. And how Presbytery went down before Prelacy! I see, clearly, the grand old man of six feet four flying about like a boy. The Presbyterian did his best; I can say no more. It was a humbling sight. The action of his legs haunts me still. And he generally missed the ball.

Though belonging to the Kirk, I did not mind; I rather liked to see my Brother smashed. I am free from sectarian prejudice. It did not use to be so in this country. But we are emancipated. Let us relate a significant fact, bearing upon this statement.

It was a winter afternoon, darkening fast to night. There was intense frost, and on a country road the snow lay six inches deep. It was in Scotland. I will say even more: it was in Aberdeenshire. A good man, the Head of a Roman Catholic College, was walking home in the failing light, when he beheld in the middle of the road a dark object in the snow. Drawing near, he found a little cobbler from the neighbouring hamlet, lying unconsciously drunk. The Jesuit could not leave him to perish. So with difficulty he raised him from the ground, and with great difficulty he managed to steer the helpless fellow-mortal to his house, half a mile off. Though unconscious at starting, he had partly regained his senses when he reached his own door; and he uttered some words of thanks. The good-natured priest said—

"Maybe ye wad not be so ceevil, if ye kened who I am."

But the answer was ready. Not without dignity, the half-articulate cobbler replied—

"Ou ay, I ken ye fine. Ye're a Cawthlic Priest. But I'm a man aboon a' prejudice!"

The incident was essentially Scottish. Taking all the circumstances into view, one may say it could not have occurred in England. And why should not a poor man, who works faithfully with his hands, be free from prejudice: just as free as though he were a Prince or a Peer?

When I was a small boy, aged twelve, I was sent to school, and each Sunday was compelled to go twice to church. I remember well, how I thought to myself, continually (I durst not say it out), that if preachers were anxious to be as tiresome as possible, making their sermons absolutely incapable of being listened to by young or old, they could do no more than they did. The daughter of a great Chief-Justice told me that sixty years since she and her sisters, clever girls, were marched regularly to a church I have seen, hideous outside and abhorrent inside, when they suffered tortures through an awful tediousness unknown elsewhere. "The very idea of ever feeling the least interest in anything said in church never entered our heads!" Those were the days of what was called "High-handed Patronage," in which a man was stuck-in to a place in the Kirk not because he was fit for it, but because he had influential friends. And possibly the idea in the Patron's mind was as that in the mind of George II., who declared that his experience as a King had led him to the belief, that any man in Britain was fit to hold any place he could get. Vividly I recall how at that early age, I used to look round on the congregation, and think it strange to see the preacher going on in a solemn voice, and not a soul listening to one word he said. I used to wonder how he could do it. But gradually, as I grew up, I found that one of these dismal orators would have thought there was something wrong, had he (just for once) found a whole congregation intently listening to him. And the suspicion, and hatred, in which these awful souls held any preacher who habitually held the congregation in that rapt attention in which the proverbial pin could be heard to fall (there were a few such even then), were quite beyond words. The contempt and loathing, with which I heard, as a boy, a dignified person speak of the early appearances of a senseless creature whom he called Tom Chalmers, I never can which was not tiresome was to be held in great suspicion. The probability was that something was far wrong.

I was not a boy, but a young Doctor of Divinity, when, thirty years since, I heard a good man, the dreariest preacher of his day, loudly maintaining the sinfulness of fine churches and bright services. The more dismal and disagreeable anything was, the likelier to be the right thing. Good and hearty music was to be feared. A twelve-hundred-pound organ was an awful agency for the misleading of souls. If you had no earthly inducement to go to church, you were possibly drawn by higher forget. Tom preached a sermon in the parish church of St. Andrews (which I was one day to know well) on drunkenness. For the first half of the sermon he showed how pleasant a thing it was to get drunk: "he spoke of the wine reaming in the cup"; and then in the second half he gave an awful per contra. That was his first manner. But it was plain that the damnatory fact, not to be got over, was that people held their breath as the youth went on, who by-and-bye was to be recognised as the greatest pulpit orator of the century.

"Are you happy?"—p. 433.

I am quite sure the disgusted old gentleman had never heard of Sydney Smith's axiom, Every style is good, except the tiresome. But a boy could see that with him, and people like him, any discourse considerations. Of course there is a measure of truth here. But I said to this good man, that very interesting and impressive preaching was just as really a worldly inducement as magnificent praise or a stately church, while I never had heard those maintain that preaching must not be too good who were eager that music must not be too good. "I agree with you, cordially," said my departed friend, "and if I thought people were coming to church for the pleasure of hearing me preach, I would take pains to make my sermons less interesting." These ears heard the words. Somewhat inconsiderately, I hastened to assure him that there was no need at all for his doing that. For, indeed, his power of emptying any church in which he ministered was proverbial. And the wildest imagination had never pictured any mortal as going to church for the pleasure of listening to him. But I grieve to say that, though I spoke in simplicity and affection, as one eager to save a good man from needless self-reproach, the good man cast upon me just as evil a glance as could come from so good a man; and speedily brought our conversation to a close.

I sometimes wonder, in these latter days, what impression the ordinary good preacher expects to produce upon the congregation by each sermon preached. Surely it is true, as was said by good Archbishop Trench long ago, that when we begin we expect great things.

"High thoughts at first, and visions high,
Are ours of easy victory."

I knew a lad, more than forty years since, who having preached, with absolute conviction and great vehemence, in a very crowded church on a dark winter afternoon, a sermon showing how foolish it is to be bad (which truth he had only found out a few days before), was filled with absolute wonder that his sermon produced no apparent effect at all, beyond causing an awful hush and many startled faces. He knew three very bad fellows who were in church and listened intently: and he made perfectly sure that each would at once turn over a new leaf. It was not so. One very bad fellow did indeed remark, "He evidently believed what he said;" but no amendment of life followed. Another bad fellow, who had been at college with the preacher, observed, "Surely he has become very serious." I knew a youth who was incumbent of a pretty country parish, where he found that various respectable persons got drunk on the market-day. One Sunday, almost with tears, he denounced this sorrowful inconsistency in eager words. A benign old farmer, old enough to have been his grandfather, listened with great approval: he not merely shook his head sympathetically, but he waved his right hand to and fro, as though saying, "Such are my sentiments." Yet the next day the young parson met the aged man being driven home from market very drunk indeed. Which things are discouraging. But gradually that youth found that men in his own vocation, after preaching on Sunday on the duty of meekness, fairness, and kindness, as though they had been angels, went on Wednesday to the Presbytery. There, in the matters of spitefulness, dishonest misrepresentation, and vicious irritability as of a bulldog on whose tail the wayfarer has inadvertently trodden, these good men, so far from being angels, appeared as exactly the reverse. Surely we are dealing with warped and odd material, dealing with poor human nature. We should not mind so much if it were thus only with our neighbours. But think: How is it with ourselves? If I might venture to speak from what I know, I should say that even an earnest preacher, who believes his message fully, and not just about half, hopes mainly to comfort the sorrowful

Christian, and some little to lift up those who are devout souls already, rather than to arouse the indifferent, and bring back those who have gone astray. But I will not believe but that to the very end, even closing a little week-day meditation of a quarter of an hour's duration, the preacher whom I call a preacher hopes, and even clings to the belief, that some poor soul has been helped and comforted. Sometimes, in hours of deep discouragement, the message comes from somebody quite unknown, somebody far away, who has been helped and comforted. Very big and strong men may possibly receive such messages continually: I do not know. But to some at a far lower level the lines of cheer come, sometimes, just when they need help as much as any: just when near to the breaking-down.

It needs much wisdom, and much grace, to deal with human souls. And the best may many times meet singular discouragements. He was a saint, and a lyric poet, who at a meeting of a kind of which I have no experience, of a kind of which I like not what I hear, approached a middle-aged lady of good descent and blameless life; and said, in an insinuating manner, "Are you happy?" The good lady considered for a little space; and then made answer in a very matter-of-fact tone, and in a single word. The word was, Middlin'. Somehow it shut the lyric poet up.

There are national differences. And there is a difference between country and town. In Scotland, as a rule, few desire to speak with the preacher after service. And the few are always in large towns. But if a stranger preach in a London church to a crowded congregation, it may be held as certain that six or eight or ten, mostly young men, will desire a word with him. And very touching indeed is commonly what they desire to say. I know not whether this would cease were any man ministering regularly to a large London congregation. Crying aloud to a multitude, all absolute strangers, is an experience by itself. But to deliver the message, ever so sincerely, to a thousand (or two thousand) souls, mainly the same souls Sunday by Sunday, is quite a different thing.

One has known individual beings who, on receiving testimony that they have been enabled to do some little good, are in use to suddenly get up from where they are sitting, to drop down upon their knees, and offer humble thanks in the Quarter whence everything comes which is worth having. This, of course, when quite alone.

Thirty years since, a good man, unknown to the present writer, made a severe attack upon him (in print) for what was described as Sham Reverence: in that the writer, in an entirely secular magazine, had made some such reference to God Almighty. The good man was writing in a religious publication. And the special accusation he brought against me was that I did not mean what I said. How could the good man know? Of course I never noticed his observations in any way: that is, until now.

But, being condemned for Sham Reverence, I remembered, very vividly, how, when a youth, a very eminent man stated in my hearing that he once went to a little place of worship where a homely preacher was holding forth with great earnestness and sincerity. And sincere earnestness is always to be respected: even where its manifestations are odd. Yet it sounded strange when the orator exclaimed: "Don't you remember the grand testimony which was borne to Him by St. John the Baptist? Don't you remember how the Baptist said, That is the Party which taketh away the sins of the world?"

It was well meant, but very awkwardly expressed. But I am perfectly sure that in the Highest Quarter things are taken as they are meant. Which is a great comfort.

Alexander the Great was a shabby little creature, to look at. One day, when the great king was surrounded by abject courtiers, a poor woman came in to plead for a precious life. One very abject courtier was of stately mien: so she cast herself on the earth before him and poured out her poor heart. When she ended, the king drew near, and said—

"I know who it was you meant to speak to. You shall have what you ask."

Even so, much more confidently than I believe that two and two make four, I believe that every earnest prayer ever offered in this world came straight to the only Hearer of prayer. The stricken mortal, with awful earnestness, prayed to the only god he knew or ever had the chance to know. It was no god at all. But the supplication made its way to the right place: and was mercifully considered There.*

BOSOM FRIENDS.

NCE, in the golden dawn of youth,
I knew the meaning and the truth—
Now faint, or wholly passed away—
These sweet and simple words convey;
A loving heart once beat for me
With true and tender sympathy;
With hopes that sought the selfsame ends,
We walked and talked as bosom friends.

Again I see the garden fair,
And feel the fresh and fragrant air
Salute my cheek, and turn to hear
The gentle accents, soft and clear,
Of that bright presence by my side—
My joy, my blessing, and my pride—
Whose loss a mournful beauty lends
To days when we were bosom friends!

Sometimes upon a rustic seat,
Screened by thick branches from the heat,
We sat, while mingled sun and shade
A network on the pathway made;
With fond arms round each other thrown,
We saw the light of life alone,
Nor dreamed of grief whose shadow blend
With joy, when we were bosom friends!

The future seemed all blithe and gay—
Thrice-happy hours, that would not stay,
What bliss, more sweet than poet sings,
Was borne upon your rapid wings!
O vanished years, for ever gone,
What faith in pure perfection shone
To meet my own with rich amends,
Long since, when we were bosom friends!

VIPERS—AND PUBLIC OPINION.

BY THE REV. MICHAEL EASTWOOD.

"And he shook off the beast into the fire, and felt no harm."—ACTS xxviii. 5.

It is an ill wind that blows nobody any good. And this contrary wind from August to November brought benefits to St. Paul; to ourselves who can read the story; to Malta, its governor and people; and, as some say, to the very island itself, ridding it evermore of those vipers that must have been a pest and a scourge, judging by the sample in the narrative and the impression it made on the inhabitants of the time.

These multiplied benefits, be it remembered, meant a fourth shipwreck for St. Paul. Some two years before, he had written to the Corinthians: "Thrice I suffered shipwreck" (2 Cor. xi. 25), and now the experience is repeated amidst November chill and gloom. Thus do our benefits often involve suffering on the part of those from whom we derive them. We must not, therefore, forget the dreary voyage, the concentrated wretchedness of the last fortnight, the two years' imprisonment at Cæsarea, and the delicate health of the Apostle.

But over all these hindrances God's grace was "sufficient" to enable the frail but heroic Apostle to triumph. He is chaplain on board, right genial and winsome, tender as a nurse to those two hundred and seventy-six affrighted children as he sets before them meat for the body as well as for the soul.

And once on land, he fulfils the command of Christ: greatest of all, shows his greatness by humble and ready service—gathering sticks for a fire; cheerfully toiling as servant of all. Student of Gamaliel's college, a Hebrew of the Hebrews, a Roman citizen, and by nature as proud as the haughtiest of them: a man whose writings are destined to fill the greater part of the New Testament, and in whose name our own metropolitan temple will rise and point the millions heavenward—see him at his lowly task, and learn a lesson of useful service and of condescension without seeming to condescend—simple, natural, and rare as it is charming. It was, moreover, the best thing he could have done, showing his "common sense," as well as his spirit of self-sacrifice and obedience to Christ's command. The exercise would animate his half-frozen limbs. What a lesson for Church workers, too: keep the fire burning for the sake of yourself, your comrades, and posterity.

No harm can happen to such a man. "Only conduct yourself aright, keep out of wrong, and you will not get into trouble": so many people say, forgetting Joseph and the pit, Job and Satan, David and the hill-caves, Daniel and the lions. Could man have behaved in more exemplary fashion than St. Paul? Yet disaster meets him at every stage, and all his progress is made through successive hindrances. Once ashore, after all he had passed through, surely no more trouble awaits him.

Lo! a viper fastens upon his hand. In the sticks he had gathered, warmed from its torpidity by the fire he had helped to make, the viper follows the wreck, and St. Paul might perhaps ask himself, "What next?"

What next? The verdict of public opinion, all the worse to bear because often felt, as on this occasion, in one's inner consciousness rather than openly avowed; for the people said amongst themselves: "No doubt this man is a murderer, whom, though he hath escaped the sea, yet vengeance suffereth not to live."

Thus is true piety rewarded and true philanthropy estimated.

Public opinion was mistaken. Here was no judgment, and this was no real disaster. "Who is he that shall harm you if ye be followers [imitators, like St. Paul was on the occasion] of Him that is good?" And this reptile is but used to single out the Apostle for attention; and the mark it left, if any, was but a mark of honour, and doubtless one of those stigmata in which the Apostle rejoiced.

But in such a crisis action must be prompt; and never was it more strikingly exhibited than in the vivid picture painted for us by an eye-witness, the evangelist St. Luke: "But he [quietly] shook off the beast into the fire, and felt no harm."

Well does the marginal reference point us back to the words of Christ: "I beheld Satan as lightning fall." So fell the viper. "I have given you power to tread on serpents." "They shall lay their hands on the sick," as St. Paul did soon after.

It was doubtless in the name of Jesus that the Apostle threw off the viper into the fire calmly and believably. He would not expostulate with the "barbarians," and dispute the validity of their opinions; he would not mourn the hardness of his lot, he would make no protest against "his fate;" but instantly threw off the reptile into the fire. With every temptation is "a way of escape;" the name of Jesus is potent still; the fire is at hand into which we may fling the offence, and stand up before God and man the better for the mischief, and unharmed by the pest.

"Howbeit, they looked when he should have swollen, or fallen down dead suddenly." (In some countries they knock a man down on such occasions if he does not fall when they deem he should; at least, they try. But God's servants are immortal till their work is done, and He Himself lays them to rest.) "But after they had looked a great while, and saw no harm come to him, they changed their minds, and said that he was a god."

Thus do they still, and the deification stage is more dangerous than the other. There is more harm in adulation than in viper's fang or critic's tooth. It was then that the Apostle might have "swollen" with vanity or "fallen down" with the change of fortune. But in keeping with those words of the Saviour already quoted, he quietly went away, and laid his uninjured hand upon the sick. That was "divine," as we say, and that was the best escape from mistaken plaudits.

What contrasts are suggested by the story, and what associations!

Eve toyed with the serpent—and we are suffering yet. Paul threw off a viper—and we are receiving the benefit to this very day. And I doubt not that the leaf—the printed page on which the story lingers—is so sweetened and fragrant with hope that many a viper has been warded off thereby. Vipers are said to flee from paper made of certain bark.

The story, too, reminds one of the serpent-bitten Israelites and the brazen symbol flashing in the sun—emblem of the cross to-day—looking at which, they were healed. Yes, we cannot save ourselves; it is "Jesus only." "None but Jesus can do helpless sinners good." "Luke, the beloved physician," and Aristarchus, the "fellow-prisoner" and faithful friend, could not have saved Paul from death.

Through force of contrast it makes one think of that tragedy by the sea, the story of Laocöon, whose sculptured representation always gives one such a sense of pain, agony, and helplessness. The sinuous folds of the serpent round his neck, round his hands, round his limbs, round his heart—serpent everywhere—as he writhes in vain to save himself and his boys. Not so the believer in Christ. One ejaculation, nay, one thought of prayer, one look of faith, and we are free; the serpent falls, and we are saved.

Yet sometimes the poison remains, as it were, in the system after the serpent has fallen, and this venom has to be eliminated by exercise. Thus in some countries I suppose you will sometimes meet three persons arm-in-arm, the middle one being briskly walked about by the other two. The serpent has gone, but the poison must be eliminated, and the patient must not sleep. Had this been so in St. Paul's case, we can easily picture St. Luke on the one side of him, and the faithful Aristarchus on the other, as they paced the strand together, lovingly, anxiously, hopefully.

Christian society, Christian endeavour, Christian work: this is the method; and it recalls the words of St. Paul's address to those who had been delivered from the old serpent: "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling." Theologians distinguish between the "transcendent" and the "immanent" power of the Holy Ghost: by which they mean special and ordinary. Thus, whether there is in our case a transcendent gift or not (a special intervention, transcending ordinary experience), we may rely upon the "immanent," the steady abiding influence of the Holy Ghost working through human exertion, and by which we may accomplish wonders, undoing mischief that seems irreparable, and attaining to purity, piety, and philanthropy that seemed impossible. Christianity may be looked upon as an art—a fine art, indeed. It wants practice; exercise eliminates all that is ugly, brings us on towards perfection and the beauty of holiness.

Yet I return to the picture of instantaneous deliverance from the power of Satan. I would enforce it again, since every miracle is also a parable, setting forth more than a wonder, and proving a prophecy of spiritual blessings. And when I grow weary and sad, and seek Christian evidences, I remember a case that always makes me glad. Many years ago, when my father was preaching one summer evening, there came into the room a drunken man in his shirt-sleeves, a short pipe in his mouth. But the Gospel message arrested him, he fell upon his knees, and rose a sober and a changed man, nevermore yielding to the old enemy, but shaking it off with all his sins in the name of Jesus, and living ever after a most beautiful and exemplary Christian life, till he passed away to his everlasting Home. What happened then may happen now; indeed, it does. And one case only is enough to justify our efforts and inspire our message.

Reader, whatever your besetting sin, whatever the viper fastening upon your right hand, marring your peace, and impairing your usefulness, Christ can make you free, and "our God is a consuming fire" to destroy your sin.

Your right hand: meant to give so nobly, to succour so tenderly, to clasp so sympathetically, to scale the mountain of God higher and higher: that right hand may be saved this moment. The serpent may fall, and you may be free.

MISS GAYLE OF LESCOUGH.

BY E. S. CURRY.

CHAPTER IV.

AMYOT'S SCHEME.

"Her lips are sweet as love;
They are parting! Do they move?
Are they dumb? Her eyes are blue, and beseechingly, and seem To say: 'Come.'"

R. GAYLE had let the Abbey on a long lease after his wife's death, which happened a few days after Rowan's birth. The lease falling in about the time when Rowan was leaving school, and a difficulty about re-letting occurring, Mr. Gayle had decided to inhabit his house himself. Rowan's delight when she first saw her old-world picturesque home had been so great, and had so delighted her father, that this rather dreaded home-coming to a house of shadows, tenanted with painful memories, had turned out very differently from his expectations.

If his daughter had been like many girls, she would have been dissatisfied and miserable in this circum-scribed existence. There were few gentry near—no young people of her own age—nothing that could be called society. Lescough was a small old-fashioned market-town in an agricultural, thinly populated district. But Rowan, rather weary of her wandering foreign life, riding along the white roads by her father's side, saw beauty in every feature of the wide landscape.

She soon made plenty of interests. There were plenty of neighbours, she said, living in the old houses standing back from the picturesque High Street, up the middle of which the little tidal river ebbed and flowed. Her foreign education had not instilled into her the policy of aristocratic isolation, which girls of her position, under the tuition of mothers and governesses in England, would have learnt. These people, with their funny ways and funny accents, and friendly readiness to accept her own friendly overtures, were her neighbours, and she meant to be neighbourly. But with all her friendliness, she followed her own ways, not feeling it necessary to be bound by the meagre etiquettes she found existing in the little town; and withal, she was so pleasant and courteous that she gave no offence. She broke down impassable barriers, and asked people who met each other in the streets every day, but who did not "visit," to have tea with her in the beautiful old garden at the Abbey. And her talk was so bright and merry, she had travelled so much and knew so many, that though at first made a little uneasy, and regarding each other with furtively questioning glances, her guests soon became comfortable together; and, what was more, they remained so. In a year, Rowan considered that she had made up six friendships.

She took the keenest interest in everything around her. It was all new, presenting quite different aspects of life from anything she had hitherto known. But though she was sweet-mannered and cordial to all, there was also a reserve, an aloofness, about her, which barred familiarity, though never friendliness. She had a way of turning conversation from gossip to greater interests—to new books, new pictures, new music. Even the most frivolous of the girls she gradually came to know were drawn under her influence, and raised a little higher. But the influence was unconscious; she did not pose as a reformer. At the same time, they were not companions in the best sense of the word. Sometimes she longed for more inspiring and sympathetic companionship.

One afternoon in early June, her tea-table had been carried on to the lawn, under a lime-tree, where the bees were busy with the fragrant flowers. Several callers had come in, and were sitting round talking. Presently her attention was arrested by a conversation going on between two ladies, snatches of which reached her ears as she was ministering to their wants.

"My husband said that Mr. Hardy defied them all."

"Yes; but isn't he right? Mr. Johnson has evidently not understood his business. My husband agrees with Mr. Hardy. He says that this drainage wants special training, and that Mr. Hardy knows what he's talking about."

"Yes; but he needn't be violent, nor need he take the bread out of Johnson's mouth."

"Well, I don't know. It takes violence to drive anything fresh into the commissioners' heads; and if Johnson isn't doing the work he's paid for, he'd better go."

The words drifted by Rowan's ears almost unheeded. Then followed more, and she unconsciously listened.

"Yes; but my husband says he's aiming at the post himself. He could work it to his own ends well. And it stands to sense he'd be the largest gainer by these works. Except lower down the river and in the town here, they would not benefit anybody but himself and Mr. Gayle."

"Well, he has shown what he can do, my husband says, by what he has done already at his own expense. It seems hard he shouldn't be backed up to make it worth while."

"Johnson says it is impossible. It may be all right now, but a high tide might undo all the work."

"And will do, probably, as it rests now, and more besides Mr. Hardy will suffer. They are to have a meeting to-night. My husband says there will be a fight."

"But who will fight? It won't be like the old days. Mr. Gayle is chairman, and it's to his interest now to back up Mr. Hardy; and nobody's likely to go against him."

"Oh! but there will be some," said the other

"'Why should you not be a welcome guest?'"—p. 438.

meaningly. "And it's not so sure that Mr. Gayle will back up Mr. Hardy when it comes to spending money. He has not much to lose. And there is the old hatred; and I believe that poor woman is still living somewhere down there." And then the lady saw the light of interest on Rowan's face, and came unctuously to a dismayed pause.

"Who is that you are talking of?" Rowan asked.

She asked because she saw that they were aware she had heard their conversation, and were uncomfortable; and it seemed the most straightforward thing to do.

They looked at each other, and then one said unctuously—

"We were alluding to an old story—and I'm afraid we forgot where we were, Miss Gayle. But, indeed, Mr. Hardy is making people talk now a good deal." And she felicitated herself in having turned an awkward corner well.

"What is he doing?" asked Rowan.

"Some very clever engineering, my husband thinks," put in Mr. Hardy's advocate, rather warmly. "But of course the old stories are remembered, now he has come so much to the front, by people who aren't friendly to what he wants to do. I think bygones ought to be bygones, myself; and he's not responsible for his family any more than other people."

Rowan was a woman, and after a brief battle, her curiosity impelled her to say—

"What is the old story that his un-friends are raking up? Nothing against himself, I am sure," she said, smiling. "I like old family histories—especially about smugglers."

The two ladies again looked at each other, and Rowan saw that a "No" was framed on the lips of one of them.

"They have been a wild lot," the other, said, in a casual finish-the-subject sort of manner, and her friend helped her by adding—

"But he seems a very well-intentioned sort of young man—if rather masterful."

Something in this speech had the effect of irritating Rowan's usually sweet temper. So, disregarding their uneasiness, she began again.

"But what is the story? And what has the poor woman down there to do with it?"

The ladies exchanged glances, and Rowan, studying their expressive orbs, was only impelled the more to satisfy her curiosity. She was just going to ask rather impatiently whether it was worth making a mystery of, when she saw a light of evident relief come across their faces. Turning her head, she became aware that her father was crossing the lawn towards them. He was not alone. Amyot Hardy was walking beside him, and the two were in earnest and apparently intimate conversation.

Rowan felt her face flush with annoyance as she remembered a phrase or two in the conversation she had overheard, and realised how this intimacy would look to the speakers. She felt vexed—she could scarcely tell why—that any countenance should seem to be given to the gossip about her father and his affairs, by this visit.

Possibly her feeling manifested itself slightly in the rather formal greeting which she gave to Amyot.

She noticed that he did not seem to know her other guests, but she did not feel inclined, under the circumstances, to give any formal introduction. The gossip had made her feel uncomfortable, and her manner was so distant as to cause Amyot a momentary surprise and wonder.

Her father, however, frustrated the coldness of her behaviour—as men have a terrible way of doing—by saying pleasantly—

"My dear, I forgot the meeting this evening until I met Mr. Hardy. Do you think it is too late now to ask cook to hurry dinner on half an hour?—And Mr. Hardy will, I hope, dine with us," he added courteously to that gentleman.

Unconsciously, before answering, Amyot turned to look at Rowan. He had described her on that April night as "sweet and gentle;" but as now amazingly he saw her attitude, he wondered if he had been mistaken. She looked cold and proud. How was he to know that she was shrinking under a sense of observant eyes, and gossiping tongues busy with matters in which her father and Amyot were interested, but in which she had somewhat hastily gathered they ought not honestly to be of one mind. And yet, here was her father asking him to dinner just before this meeting, at which some difficulty was to be settled.

Rowan felt unaccountably vexed—vexed with herself, first, that she had listened to any talk at all; and secondly, that there seemed to be some grounds for talk which she, not knowing the story, could not understand. And, woman-like, she localised her vexation on the person who probably least of all deserved to feel it.

But it was a very momentary cloud and hesitation. Almost as soon as Amyot had noticed it, it was over. She had risen, saying pleasantly—

"We can manage to hurry it, I'm sure. I'll tell her at once." She looked round at her guests with a plea to be excused, and turned towards the gate in the wall which would lead her to the kitchen regions.

When Amyot saw the direction her footsteps were taking, he hurried after her to open it, and as they reached it, he said: "Miss Gayle, don't let me stay to be a bother if you would rather not. I should not have come in this afternoon if your father had not pressed it. I quite understand that I may not be a welcome guest." He spoke deprecatingly.

Rowan lifted her eyes to his. His hand was on the latch, and she paused. As she met the keen glance of his very vivid eyes, she felt a sudden impulse to truth. He looked honest and honourable. So she said, "Why should you not be a welcome guest, Mr. Hardy?"

"I gathered that something was vexing you," he said simply, admiring the slight flush on her delicate face and the luminous clearness of the grey eyes.

She thought a moment. "It was. You have quick eyes." And she smiled. "It was some chatter I overheard, between the two ladies you saw me talking to, about the meeting this evening."

"Oh!" and he looked relieved. "Then it was nothing to do with me? I had not vexed you?"

"Yes, and no," she answered. "You had not vexed me, But it was about you,"

"I never heed chatter," he said quietly, understanding immediately that the interest she evinced had been called up only incidentally in connection with him. "I daresay there is always plenty. But if we don't let it trouble us, it is harmless."

"Yes," she said thoughtfully, her eyes seeking his doubtfully. "But motives get misunderstood?"

"I think they are, generally. But we know if our own motives are upright," he said quickly.

He had opened the gate, and together they passed through and walked up the paved path under the wall, side by side.

"And you think it does not injure work and influence to have false motives imputed to them?"

"Not permanently," he said, pausing to wonder to what she could be referring.

"But temporarily might become permanent," she persisted—"as to results. We are talking riddles. I shall not be a minute," she added pleasantly. "Will you not go and tell them to put up your horse? I see he is there."

"But my dress?" he objected.

"Ah! that can't be helped on meeting-nights," she laughed.

Mr. Hardy felt a pleasurable sensation as her eyes rested for a minute on his becoming riding-dress. He lifted his hat, and went off to give directions about his horse, and then took advantage of her implied permission to wait for her at the gate.

She came quickly towards him, with the eager swinging step of youth; and yet, as he could not but admiringly notice, with an educated and reticent gait which suited her gentle dignity, and which told of unprovincial training.

As they passed through, her father was accompanying her departing guests across the lawn; and after farewells were exchanged, Amyot, to his delight, again found himself, for a few minutes, alone with her under the lime-trees. There was a little cloud of abstraction on her face as she sat down and looked over the exquisite green of the lawn, against which the tenderer green of the lime-trees in the sunlight made a perfect summer harmony. He was quickly learning to note the changes on this girl's face, which, each time he saw her, was becoming more to him a fascination and a delight.

He said gently, "I see I have not laid your vexation. Can't you tell it me?"

She looked at him absently, as if some other thought than the one he had suggested was filling her mind. He was surprised at the answer which presently came.

"Will it make a great deal of difference to you if this meeting to-night goes against you?"

"You think your father will not back me?" he asked quickly. "And you are vexed with me for opposing him? Yes; I frankly own I shall be very sorry. I am certain there are great possibilities along the coast beyond Lessdyke. If we don't grasp them now, others will."

"But they can't take your land."

"No; but they could initiate works further down, which we should have to adopt, perhaps, at a disadvantage, unless we are first in the field. When I see the capabilities and possibilities of all that fen, I am fairly amazed that it has not been laid hold of before by someone."

His rapid eager speech reached Mr. Gayle, returning across the lawn.

"There's a great deal to be said against it," he objected. "It is overturning all our notions."

"I can't afford to waste my pastures" said Amyot, smiling, "to protect notions. But I don't want anything unreasonable till I have proved that it can be done. I have sufficiently protected my own land against ordinary chances; but supposing things go as I wish, if I am able to reap my corn there, I should like to see several hundred men at work, the whole seaboard for several miles drained and dyked; and I would guarantee that in five years' time we could have a flourishing village, a new and remunerative agriculture, a safe harbour and cheap sea-carriage to Newcastle and London."

Amyot's face grew eager. He had never revealed so much of his ambitions to anyone before.

Mr. Gayle shook his head.

"Too visionary," he said. "What surety have you for all this result?"

"No surety; but a reasonable probability. I have seen it done in Holland and in America."

"But people can't live and thrive on a swamp. All your people would have ague."

"How long is it since you have visited that fen?" asked Amyot, in return. "There is no swamp now, and I have never even heard of ague, except as a fable."

"Well, let me see. I don't think I have been there for seventeen or eighteen years—more, perhaps."

"Then come," Amyot entreated. He turned to Rowan. "Persuade your father to ride over with you. Come to Deepfen to lunch, and I will take you on, and show you all I should like to do and see done."

And then he stopped suddenly, remembering the lady at Lessdyke, who since that April night had been obstinately invisible. A cloud came over his face.

"But I have never seen her since," he thought.

"And it is ten chances to one against our seeing her. We need not go near there."

Mr. Gayle wondered at his sudden quiet, and looked at him curiously. Rowan thought that it was caused by fear of embarrassing her father's action at the meeting, and gave him a glance of gratitude.

"It sounds very interesting," she said. "I should like to see it all, father. Could we ride over, as Mr. Hardy proposes?"

"There is nothing to see, my dear, but a flat silty level. You can see that anywhere."

"Oh, but the sea!" she objected. "I thought there was the sea."

"Yes," said Amyot. "And on a fine day, when the tide's high, it is just as real to look at as if you were at Brighton."

"And when the tide is low?" Mr. Gayle asked, smiling.

"Well, then there is a good deal of mud;" and Amyot laughed. "But I will ensure a tide if you will come."

The dressing-bell put an end to the conversation. But Amyot chose to consider it settled that they would ride over to Deepfen for lunch on some day in the near future.

Rowan's questions next morning at breakfast elicited from her father what the result of the meeting had been. Amyot had made a good speech in launching a portion of his scheme, which some of the commissioners, who had been partly prepared for it, approved; but so much money would be required for the initial proceedings that consideration of the scheme itself had almost been swamped in preliminary financial discussion. A sub-commission to view and report on the distant and lonely fen had been formed as an immediate preliminary, of which Mr. Gayle, as being one of the most interested in the proposal, was a member.

"And I promised Mr. Hardy to ride over some day soon, my dear," he finished, looking at his daughter's interested face. "I could not well refuse. But it will rake up unpleasant memories, which I would rather let sleep. I will tell you about them some time."

That afternoon Mr. Gayle sauntered down the picturesque High Street under the huge elm-trees which fringed the river's bank, and as he noticed the inflowing tide swirling along the sloping silted bed, he pondered Amyot's scheme.

It was a most picturesque scene. The beautiful old houses, shut into their enclosing grounds by high-buttressed walls, toned a perfect colour with age and lichen, side by side with the smaller houses of less important residences, formed one side of the street. Up the centre, with its fringe of tall elm-trees here and there, giving welcome shade, the river ebbed and flowed. The other side was formed of smaller houses and shops, and a boat-yard or two, where the bright boats shone in the afternoon sun. An old stone-buttressed, three-arched bridge united the two sides of the street, which, as in a foreign town, was paved with cobble-stones.

Mr. Gayle, to whom its picturesqueness was familiar, saw it all with half-seeing eyes; the other half of his observation was turned inwards. He was pondering in what words to ask his lawyer about the long-ago exiled sister. He was not even certain whether she yet lived, or where. And at thought of his daughter perhaps coming suddenly and unwittingly upon her unlooked-for and undesired presence, Mr. Gayle winced. Still, he had been only a boy when she left home, and her leaving was entirely her own wilful doing. But he felt uncomfortable.

It was a queer, quaint old house, standing back from the street, which was used for the lawyer's offices. Mr. Gayle had to wait for some minutes to see the partner for whom he enquired; and what he was told disquieted him. That his sister should be living alone, without even a maid, in a cottage on the sea bank at Lessdyke, only some few miles' distance away up the river, was, at first hearing, shocking to his sensibilities.

"What does she do? Is she well? How does she live?" were his somewhat agitated questions.

And he was not much consoled by the answers.

"She refuses to see any of us. I have called several times. A woman from the village usually answers the door. I send her money every quarter, but she cannot use it all, living as she does. The cheque is always cashed by a farmer there. He tells me she walks a great deal, specially in the evening or at night. She has parcels frequently from London. She buys very little in the neighbourhood—nothing here."

This was the substance of what Mr. Gayle could learn, and he went home thoughtful and oppressed. He could scarcely make up his mind to tell Rowan this pitiful story. He shrank from the expression of her surprise and concern. As he walked homewards, he almost made up his mind to go away again from this undesirable neighbourhood, and take Rowan to her more conventional aunt in town for the remainder of the season.

As he crossed the lawn to his daughter's side, he was the picture of a perplexed and undecided man.

CHAPTER V.

AN AFTERNOON RIDE.

"A human heart should beat for two,
Despite the taunt of single scorers;
And all the hearths I ever knew
Had got a pair of chimney corners."

MR. GAYLE found his daughter in her riding-habit, with tea ready beside her. She looked up brightly as he joined her.

"It is so lovely, I ordered the horses half an hour earlier, and dinner half an hour later, father. Let us have a good long ride."

Here was his opportunity. His indecision vanished.

"We will ride to Lessdyke, if you like, my dear, and look at this wonderful scheme. And I will tell you a story by the way."

It required some courage to say this; for Mr. Gayle was one of those men who see no use in talking about his own affairs which were unpleasant. He would have buried in eternal silence all uncomfortable subjects.

But he felt uneasily that this would come to the front some day if he remained in the neighbourhood, and he preferred that Rowan should hear the facts from himself. It was, therefore, to the quiet accompaniment of the tread of their horses' footsteps on the soft turf edging the roads and lanes that Rowan first heard the history of her unhappy aunt.

She was greatly shocked and startled—not so much at the story itself as at the continued exile of the unfortunate woman.

"My dear," cautioned her father, in response to an agitated remark, "you must remember that she rests under grave suspicion of having caused her husband's death. You must not look upon her wholly as a victim. Perhaps it was the kindest fate that could befall her to let her be forgotten."

"Will you go and see her to-day?" asked Rowan. "I don't think I can enjoy anything again, father, till we have tried to make up for it."

"You shall do as you like, my dear," Mr. Gayle said, glad that the responsibility of doing anything should be shifted from his shoulders; "but if I remember rightly, it was she who refused all advances after my father's death, and declined to have anything to do with any of us."

"I should do just the same," Rowan answered quietly, "if I had been treated like her."

"My dear, she left a good home, and those who loved her and tried to save her from what befell. They knew best, as her after-history showed."

don't like changes. Nor do we want the scum from the town overrunning the land, and the peace and quietness spoilt by roads, and cottages, and trains. The very idea makes me shudder."

"But it is better than desolation, to make use of it

"You did not tell me it was so pretty."

"Yes; but if you have made an awful mistake of your life, you don't expect those you love best to punish you. You look to them for deliverance. But how did she come to know this man she married, if he was so wild and dreadful?"

"That was always a mystery. I don't remember to have heard any true details. He had been cast adrift by his father, but he managed to make her acquaintance; and she was wilful and wrong-headed. I can't pretend any affection for a sister I have scarcely seen, my dear, though to say so may shock you."

Rowan looked with interest across the wide landscape as they drew gradually nearer the coast. Her father pointed out to her in the distance to the left the grove of tall elm-trees, making a landmark in the level country, which marked the whereabouts of Deepfen.

"We are stealing a march on Mr. Hardy," she observed thoughtfully, letting her eyes rest on the patch of shadow. "But you will know better exactly how the land lies, father, when you come as a commissioner. It certainly is not thickly populated now," she added, turning to get a wide sweep of the country. "Mr. Hardy will change all this if he gets his way. I liked the idea of acres of flowers, father."

"Yes, he is a clever man. But these fens have always been considered the best pastures; and I all," she suggested. "And I suppose, if it succeeded, we should be rich?"

"Hardy would be rich," said her father. "Our land hereabouts is very little compared with his. All this to the right is his, and has been for some distance. Ours is still further to the right beyond his, but not extending so far. The rest is Lord Lescough's, but I believe Hardy is his tenant hereabouts as well."

The wide sweep of green was a very restful sight, giving the idea of almost illimitable distance. The sun gleamed brightly on the intersecting "drains," with their quivering fringes of rushes and grass; and the whole impression was of a vast, well-cultivated, fertile country. And when, as they advanced through soft silty lanes, towards the high-road leading to Lessdyke, the thin thread of silver sea came in sight, looking like a shining border to a veritable plain of verdure, Rowan's delight was great.

"You did not tell me it was so pretty, father," she observed. "I was prepared for a plain of mud."

"We are fortunate. The tide is in, and the day is lovely. Perhaps in winter, with a north-east wind and the tide out, you might change your opinion, Rowan."

As he spoke, they stopped their horses on the little bridge of Lessdyke.

"How nice and fresh it feels," Rowan said; her face was turned seawards, and her hat was lifted to let the cool breeze play over her forehead. "If we could get through this gate, I should like to ride on over there."

She pointed as she spoke to the wide dyke skirting the debouching river, the summit of which made a firm and grassy carriage-way apparently for some distance.

"Oh, yes! it is rideable for some way; it used to be in my time," Mr. Gayle answered, looking round. "And Hardy has continued it. But we shall be trespassing."

Rowan made no answer. To a woman, trespassing sounds a small offence. She had turned, and her eyes were searching the hamlet behind them with what Mr. Gayle divined was an uneasy observation. He followed the direction of their gaze till it rested on the solitary cottage on the river's bank.

It looked still and deserted. The blinds, indeed, were drawn up carefully, leaving not even a softening head-line of white against the dark panes; but every window and the door were closed, and it presented an unreadable front to the sunshiny world around it.

Rowan gazed at it fascinated, her delicate face growing whiter and her eyes luminous with the pity with which her heart was full. What tragic life did it enclose?

"Suppose we ride a little way along the bank, father?" she said presently, turning again, "and then I will come back alone, whilst you go on and look at what you want to see. I think that is the house, and I should like to go there alone first, so as not to startle her," she said softly.

They rode on to the soft turf of the dyke, and presently were moving between the inflowing sea on one side and the softly waving corn, some feet below them, on the other.

Mr. Gayle was much interested in this new departure in local agriculture. He noticed the careful drainage, the evidences everywhere of high and scientific farming, and the old farmer-interest awoke within him.

"I have left all these matters too long," he observed to Rowan. "Smith may be a good bailiff, but he's old-fashioned and ignorant. All this looks in beautiful order."

"Yes," said Rowan dubiously; "the drains are very straight, certainly, and there isn't a blade of wheat out of its place—but isn't it rather monotonous?"

Her father was waxing enthusiastic.

"It is splendid! This is all new to me. It was a marsh twenty years ago. Ah!"—and his keen eyes gazed ahead—"now you can see the men at work: those little white figures in the distance. What a change!" he added admiringly, gazing round.

"Then you go on, father," Rowan said, "and I will go back and dismount at the gate, and Green can wait for me there."

She watched her father ride on till he became an indistinct figure in the distance—unconsciously lingering, afraid of the difficult task before her. Then she rode slowly back to the gate, perplexedly revolving in her mind the story she had heard; wondering how best to open communications after these long years of silence. Her mind misgave her that perhaps she would only be snubbed for her intrusion; but surely her aunt must be longing for reconciliation if she ever cared for her family at all. Rowan's heart was filled with pity.

As she walked from the bridge along the bank to the house, she examined its appearance carefully. She thought it expressed a tale of loneliness and pride, withdrawn as it was, without apparent reason, from the cottages of the hamlet beyond. Was it built on purpose, she wondered, for this self-exiled woman?

It was a little white square house, with a window or two on each side of the door, closely veiled from outside observation by old-fashioned white muslin curtains. The door itself had been painted dark green, but the paint looked old and weather-beaten. There was no knocker, but a little brass knob, brightly polished, promised the means of communication within. The white doorstep was spotless, looking as if no foot of man ever crossed it. There was a slender railing enclosing the front of the house, and under the windows were a few flowers in a narrow bed—wall-flowers and old-fashioned white pinks blooming and scenting the air.

Rowan's heart beat quickly as she listened to the little bell tinkling inside the house, and she almost held her breath in her acute listening for the footsteps she hoped, yet feared, to hear. But the tinkling died away, and there was no further sound; so after a spell of waiting, she rang again.

But again she was disappointed. Not the faintest sound broke the stillness within. What should she do? she wondered. She had no card-case, no pocket-book even, nothing with her to write a line on, to show that she had been here.

She walked round the house, and saw that there was another door at the back, reached by a little red-flagged pathway from a wicket in the high privet hedge surrounding the garden. Not stopping to think, she passed through the gate, and found herself in the untenanted garden, where more pinks and more wall-flowers were blooming in a little border which ran along under the hedge all round the lawn which formed the centre of the garden. The red-flagged path stopped at the wall of the house, which extended into a square bay window opening on to the little lawn. The back door to the right stood ajar, revealing a neat little scullery, with glimpses of a kitchen beyond. Everything was quite still, and Rowan again woke the echoes inside by tapping lightly on the door with her riding-whip. Still no sound. The place to all appearance was deserted, and she began to feel that she had made her attempt for nothing.

A strong feeling of disappointment took possession of her. Unconsciously she moved a step nearer, then a step inside, and almost before she realised what she was doing, she found herself through the scullery, and in the kitchen beyond. She looked round with the keenest interest. From the window she could see along the bank, over the bridge, and some distance along the dyke beyond. A narrow passage, into which the front door evidently opened, was beyond the kitchen, and an opposite door, also open, led into a sitting-room. The kitchen was neat and spotless. The fire, which looked as if it had been made up by a careful hand early in the afternoon, was scarcely hot enough to make the little kettle standing by it sing. With a housewife's careful feeling, Rowan instinctively poked up its undisturbed blackness, and moved the kettle nearer. She was sure it had been placed ready for tea, and ought to be wanted. Then she turned and pursued her investigations.

"I did ring, and I did knock," she excused herself to herself; "and I must find something to leave a message on."

So she crossed the passage and entered the parlour. This, she found, extended the depth of the house, and had one window looking over the river, another opposite, leading into the little enclosed garden, and a third giving a full view over the wide plain seawards. It was a very pretty room. In almost startled admiration she observed its unexpected old-world daintiness.

The upper walls and ceiling were panelled and painted white. The high dresser shelf which ran round the room was a pale blue, as was also the panelling beneath it. Upon it rested quaint china, of various kinds and forms; whilst below it, in curious oval frames of very delicate workmanship, ran a series of beautiful engravings, with borders of finely drawn lace-like tracery. Each of the fifty or more, as Rowan speedily noticed, was different; and china, engravings, and frames were such as to make a connoisseur's mouth water. The floor was painted white, and some Indian rugs, old, harmoniously coloured in faded tints of blue, with patches of red here and there, lay conveniently for the small amount of furniture the room contained.

The furniture consisted of an inlaid bureau, with drawers and heavy brass handles, a low wide couch covered in some soft blue embroidered silk, two or three quaint chairs with wide bulging brocaded seats and spindly arms, a shining inlaid sofa-table, on which were many modern books and magazines, and an old winged chair, whose magnificent brocade bore signs of much and constant use. A harp uncovered stood near the garden window, and the books and magazines scattered about bore Mudie's labels. The high chimney-piece, with its delicate low-relief work of leaves and flowers and graceful spirals, was painted white, and it, like the windows and doors, was surmounted by the engravings and china, which, like a string-course, travelled round the room in an unbroken line. The whole aspect of the gem-like room was so unexpected that Rowan fairly gasped in amazed appreciation. And as she looked, somehow it all seemed familiar. Where had she seen it all before? How was this possible?

And then suddenly she remembered. It was at home, at Lescough, that a little room, of which this was evidently a copy, had attracted her when she first went over the house. But it was not in use, and she had forgotten all about it. Now she determined to examine it more carefully when she went home.

Her thoughts went on. What must this woman be like who had chosen to dwell in this solitary fen for forty years alone, cut off from her kind, having intercourse with none, and yet, to judge from her surroundings, refined and cultured? And what, was the next thought, must such a woman have suffered, under the cruelties of a brutal husband and this suspicion attending his death?

An unreasoning pity for her, subduing all other feelings, filled Rowan's heart.

At last she went to the window, conscious of the lapse of time, and looked out over the bridge. She could see the horses standing, whisking their tails in the warm sunshine, their gleaming coats making a point of russet colour in the cool green landscape. But her father was not in sight. With a little sigh of relief, she turned away to continue her contemplation of the room.

And then she gave a little start, and uttered a low exclamation, for she saw that she was no longer alone.

A tall slender woman, with beautiful soft grey hair and the saddest eyes Rowan, in her sheltered life, had ever seen, stood just within the doorway, gazing at her. She was dressed in a soft grey clinging dress, made in some old-world way, which was in perfect harmony both with her and her surroundings.

Rowan made a step or two forward.

"Pardon me," she said, hesitatingly; "I rang, and no one came, so I came in to try and leave a message for you." And then she broke off.

The woman's unfathomable eyes were gazing—gazing at her with a hungry look, as if they would wring out the thoughts of her very soul. But she stood motionless—without a movement of welcome—not speaking a word.

Was she dumb? Rowan faintly wondered; or what was the meaning of that arresting gaze? A cold thrill of feeling—was it fear or only pity?—crept into Rowan's heart, and impelled her next words.

"I only heard to-day—I only knew to-day that you lived here. We came at once."

A quiver of feeling changed the dull aspect of the face she was looking at, and her lips parted.

"We? Who?"

The questions came in a quick soft whisper. Even in that moment of emotion, Rowan noticed the purity of the intonation.

"My father and I. He is not here," she added quickly, as a flash of fire lighted up her hearer's eyes. "He sent me first to see whether you would receive us. We were not sure."

The light of interest died out of Mrs. Hardy's face as Rowan spoke. Through the long years of isolation and brooding it had become almost like a mask. Nothing in her life all these years had called for the play of expression, and the muscles had forgotten their use. Only the eyes, with sadness as it were branded upon them, revealed the emotions within. Rowan, watching her, wondered at the lifeless aspect of the face, in which no answering smile responded to her own. Had she forgotten how to smile?

She went on: "It was my fault. I thought it would startle you, perhaps, if we both came unexpectedly. He wanted to see what Mr. Hardy is doing out there, so he has ridden along the dyke. I shall see when he is returning, from this window, and I will fetch him."

Mrs. Hardy drew near to Rowan.

"He is gone there?" she asked, indicating the dyke with her hand: "he? on Mr. Hardy's land!"

There was wrath both in her voice and eyes, and Rowan replied only by a gesture. Not understanding its cause, she did not trust herself to answer.

"So, he can forget! I should have thought that a Gayle and a Hardy could not breathe the same air."

Bitter hatred and scorn sounded in her voice, and Rowan's spirit rose before them.

"This Hardy has done no wrong. Why should my father and he be enemies?" she asked quickly.

"Why? Because no time—nothing—could atone for the injuries done. If you were a Gayle, you would understand without telling that there could be no friendship with the Hardys."

"My father does not feel so," said Rowan unthinkingly.

"He doesn't? Then I do not wish to see him—nor you!" she added quickly, her blazing eyes contradicting the immobility of her face. "Go, go!"

Rowan, taken utterly by surprise, and lamenting her unthinking words, made a hesitating step towards the door. Then she recovered her presence of mind, and said with dignity—

"I came to see you full of pity. I think you have been cruelly treated. Won't you try and forget that terrible time, and let us comfort you?"

"I shall not forget. There is no comfort."

The passion was already past; she turned, and went swiftly out of the room.

Rowan waited for a minute or two, but no further sounds were audible. Feeling very disturbed and crestfallen at the failure of her attempt, she left the house, and walked slowly towards the bridge.

Some impulse moved her when she had mounted, not to ride on to the dyke; she felt the subtle influence surrounding her which breathed in Mrs. Hardy's every word. And though the blank dark windows betrayed no evidence of life behind them, she could not shake off the feeling that she was being watched by those melancholy eyes. So she guided her horse to the soft turf on the turnpike beyond the bridge, and let the reins hang loosely on his neck, whilst she waited for her father.

CHAPTER VI.

DEEPFEN.

Let me be cared about, kept out of harm
And schemed for, safe in love as with a charm."

MEANWHILE, Mr. Gayle rode on along the dyke. He understood now the trodden pathway on its summit, probably serving as it did as a roadway for the navvies working in the marsh. Here and there, at regular intervals over his head, stretched the black lines of drainage-pipes for discharging the pumped-up waters into the sea.

A mile or two onward the land rose slightly, forming a line of sand-banks, on which the sheds for the men's accommodation had been erected.

The day's labour seemed now at an end. But Mr.

Gayle was able to admire the scientific judgment with which the works had evidently been planned and carried on, whilst he wondered whence Amyot had procured the necessary money.

As he was gazing round, taking in all the points on which the commission would afterwards base its decision, a big black horse was detached from the line of sheds, and ridden hastily towards him. He had time to admire the fine seat and easy figure of the rider, before he decided that it was Amyot himself.

He rode up, muddily to his knees, in huge riding-boots, which looked as if designed for the bush. The soft brown velvet or corduroy which he wore, with his wide Australian hat, were most becoming to his bronzed face and dark eyes.

After some scientific talk and explanations, Amyot carefully pointing out the reasons for his present works, and the ambitions he entertained for the future, the two turned and rode slowly back to Less-dyke. No word had been said about Rowan, and it was with unmixed surprise and almost incredulous delight that Amyot, shading his eyes with his brown hand from the setting sun which faced them as they neared the bridge, recognised her slim figure in the equestrian under the trees.

"Miss Gayle here!" he exclaimed. And not even the blindest of fathers could have misread the gladness of the young man's tones and the flushing of the blood into his face.

"She rode over with me, and went to see——" Mr. Gayle stopped. It was difficult to open up this wound to anybody.

"I understand," said Amyot quickly. "I saw her too a short time ago. I think by-gones should be by-gones now, and those ridiculous old feuds forgotten. But it will be difficult with her."

"My daughter is an inexperienced girl," said Mr. Gayle, somewhat coldly, "and you—forgive me—are an inexperienced man. The old are intensely conservative of customs and traditions, and it is often best to let sleeping dogs lie. A rankling sore need not be irritated."

"It ought not to become a rankling sore," said Amyot quickly. "I think it should be cured."

Oh, hasty youth! impatient of all wrongs that it cannot mend. Again Amyot was conscious of something cold and constrained in Rowan's greeting, though he noticed that the blood had mounted into her face when she first turned round at the sound of their horses' feet in the lane. He noticed also her quick discomposed glance towards the cottage on the bank, whose dark windows looked like so many eyes observing their meeting. She looked very sweet, he thought, as he noticed the rather sad curve of the mouth and the wistful glance of the soft grey eyes, as she shook her head at her father's interrogation.

"How did you succeed, my dear?"

"I did not succeed, father; I only angered her," she said simply. And they fell into place and rode on abreast.

A sudden inspiration came into Amyot's head as they neared the turning to the lane which led to Deepfen. He turned to Mr. Gayle,

"Can't I persuade you to come home and dine with me?" entreatingly. "You are so near, and it is seven o'clock. It would be a great kindness to a lonely man."

Mr. Gayle glanced at his daughter. He himself, like all men, was inclined, in the first moment of surprise at the invitation, to suggest insuperable objections. But Rowan's quiet face had flushed into interest, and she astonished him by saying gently—

"I should like to go, father." And then she added quickly, as if after consideration with herself, "I want to tell you both what I did this afternoon."

Amyot's heart gave a jump of delight. It was very pleasant to be recognised as one interested, and included, and having an acknowledged part in Rowan's doings. As for Mr. Gayle, having been surprised into a consent, he seemed to be trying to excuse his weakness to himself by being especially courteous and pleasant to Amyot. The talk all the way was of farming and engineering, and as Rowan listened, she felt glad at the unusual interest her father was displaying. She knew that money was not too plentiful with them; sometimes her housekeeping was a difficulty. These schemes of Amyot's would in the end mean a great deal of money; but he seemed to have no doubt that they were feasible, and would prove successful. And if they should be successful, she understood that they would materially aid her father's banking account.

She grew very much interested in Amyot's account of the small farming which would grow up as an industry, supposing his village watering-place came to pass, and she laughingly planned out with him many acres of daffodils and lilies in the fields on either side of their route. They finished their ride with a canter across the huge meadow—the sixty-acre—soft-turfed, and in the spring golden-carpeted with cowslips; and so they reached Deepfen.

With the groom and Peter at the door stood also Nurse, framed in the doorway, her apple-blossom face beaming a kindly welcome.

"How did she know?" wondered Amyot, well pleased with her readiness.

"This is Miss Gayle, Nurse," Amyot said, as, springing off his horse, he dismounted Rowan at the foot of the steps. "Will you take her to the white room?"

His eyes followed Rowan's slight figure lingeringly as she followed her guide across the hall. How nice it was to see a woman—a gentle, softly nurtured woman—treading those unaccustomed stairs! He wondered he had never before realised how empty the house looked without one.

Rowan's own home was too beautiful for her to be struck, as other visitors sometimes were, with the gone-by daintiness and precision of Deepfen. Furniture lasts for generations in these old out-of-the-way houses; and carpets, brocades, and tapestries, well cared for, tell no tales of wear or hard usage. As she ascended the wide staircase, she was conscious only of a well-preservedness and harmony in all its appointments, from the quaint engravings and pictures on the walls to the soft neutral-tinted carpets under her feet.

"The place to all appearance was deserted."—p. 442.

Nurse opened a door on a wide landing scented with honeysuckle, and drew forth an easy-chair to the large bay window in the room they entered.

"I will fetch some water, ma'am, and towels;" and taking Rowan's gloves and riding-whip, Nurse placed them on a table and withdrew.

Left to herself, Rowan sat for a moment gazing round as she removed her hat. The room was white throughout; its walls white-panelled, its heavy richly carved bed hung with soft muslin and lace, its windows framed in dainty soft white-frilled cashmere hangings; only the carpet and furniture coverings were pink—a soft, old-fashioned pink, dotted about with columbines and honeysuckle. Against the white walls the beautiful carved furniture and heavily framed mirrors looked unique and picturesque, and the arrangements and decoration altogether fascinated Rowan's artistic taste. As her eyes roamed the room, the portrait of a girl on the wall, sweet, rosy, laughing, smiled into her arrested eyes. She got up to look nearer, and thus Nurse found her, her head thrown back, her hands clasped behind her, studying intently the beautiful face—as attractive as her own.

"How pretty!" she said involuntarily. "Is it——?" and she paused.

"Mrs. Amyot Hardy—Mr. Hardy's mother—taken after her marriage," Nurse answered. "She was beautiful and good, and brought sunshine into a house where it was sadly needed. She was a great loss. Mr. Amyot has had no mother-love, no woman to care for him, since he was about fifteen. It is hard for a boy to lose his mother," the wise old woman added tenderly.

"And this was her room?" Rowan asked, looking round. She was touched more than she cared to show, as she remembered that Amyot had directed her to be brought here; she was touched also at the thought of the motherless boy which Nurse had presented, and at the evident care and devotion with which his young mother's memory was surrounded.

"Yes, ma'am, this was her room; and it has been kept just as she liked it, all white and dainty."

Nurse, as she spoke, was opening a drawer in the big carved wardrobe, and from folds of lavender-scented wrappings she drew out a white dress of some soft Indian embroidery.

"Mr. Hardy said I was to ask you if you would like to change your dress, ma'am; he thought your habit would be uncomfortable. This"—and she unfolded the soft fabric—"is a wrapper, as we used to call them. I think you call them tea-gowns now."

And so Rowan, luxuriating in toilet appointments as dainty as her own, dressing in this unlooked-for manner for dinner, pondered, as she dressed, the circumstances of her own connection with this household. If only the sad eyes of the poor woman at Lessdyke had not haunted her, she would have felt quite happy.

When she descended to the drawing-room, Amyot gazed in delight, her father in wonder, at the fascinating figure she presented. The soft, clinging wrapper, with its beautiful embroidery and laces, fell in artistic folds from throat to feet; the wide hanging sleeves fell away from her round arms, and the unusual flush on her face heightened its refined beauty.

"Why, Rowan!" her father exclaimed, startled at the metamorphosis, and at a certain shy veiling of the liquid eyes as they were turned gratefully to Amyot. "How on earth——?"

"Mr. Hardy was kind enough to think that my habit was hot and dusty, father," she said, enjoying his surprise.

"And I have taken the liberty," put in Amyot hastily, turning to Mr. Gayle, "of sending your horses home, and of ordering the brougham for you later, so Miss Gayle will have no trouble of dressing again."

That evening began a new life for Amyot; the delight of it made up for many lonely hours, and for ever transfigured his waking dreams. Never again were his lonely rooms released from the spell of Rowan's presence. The soft radiance of the lamp-light, the glitter of silver and crystal, the dark portraits on the walls, were meet accessories to the dainty white figure which moved amongst them. After this, Amyot had but to close his eyes a moment, and almost at will the beautiful eyes were looking into his, amidst the familiar surroundings of his home. Best of all, the dream he had conjured up on that first evening he had seen her become a reality.

After dinner Mr. Gayle had sunk down in an easy-chair in Amyot's room, with a cigar and the newspapers at his hand; and seeing him well provided for, Amyot made a slight excuse, and departed. His dark face was glowing and eager as he sought Rowan in the drawing-room.

"How good this is," he said simply, dropping into a chair near hers. "I never realised before how lonely it was alone here." And he laughed at his Irish speech.

"I should have thought you were too busy ever to feel lonely," she answered, lifting her head, her fingers pausing in their occupation of turning over a book of photographs. "Will you tell me if any of these people are my aunt? Nurse, your delightful nurse, gave me this to look at."

Amyot bent over the book.

"Your aunt will not be here," he said; "in fact, there is no portrait of either her or her husband that I know of; my grandfather was too bitter against both. This is my father," he added, pointing to a portrait in regimentals, which might have represented himself, so great was the likeness. "And I imagine his brother was like him, for your aunt recognised me at once."

"You have seen her?" Rowan asked.

"Yes; Nurse had been telling me——" he stopped. He could not repeat the dastardly story to this girl. He began again. "I wanted to try if something could be done; I pitied her——" He found it a difficult story, as he considered that Rowan's family had been at least as much to blame for Mrs. Hardy's continued exile as his own—more so, in fact; for the cottage at Lessdyke was his. He was at least giving her shelter.

"She is possessed with the old tradition of a feud between the families," he went on presently, "and I believe never calls herself by her married name. I told her about you—I thought she was desirous of hearing something. I do not think she had even heard of your existence."

"But she seems to resent the least communication with you," Rowan answered. And then she described to him her interview in the afternoon.

"The days have gone by for those absurd quarrels," he said a little uneasily, when she had ended. "I hope you will not let her influence you. She was cruelly treated by both sides, I think," he said frankly; "and both sides together—together," he repeated, his dark eyes gleaming with a sudden emotion, "must try and atone to her."

Rowan sat silent. Unconsciously, she was trying to withdraw herself outside the imperious influence of those gleaming eyes.

"I can't bear to think of her in that lonely cottage," she said presently: "cast off by everybody."

"It must have been a martyrdom," he answered absently.

He was gazing at the delicate profile beside him, framed against the summer darkness outside the open window. Her face looked pale now, and pained, he thought, under the faint light of the candles in the room, and there was a childlike abandon and fragility in her whole attitude. What is the nature of the peculiar charm that a woman possesses for a man? Is it her goodness? Is it her weakness? This man felt a strong, sudden, overmastering emotion—a desire to take Rowan in his arms, and shield and comfort her for ever against even a disquieting thought. He leant towards her quickly.

"You are troubled?" he said tenderly, his voice deep with feeling.

She turned round, and for a moment her startled eyes, startled as the eyes of a child confronted by something new and strange, gazed into his. Then the blood rushed, a rosy flood, into her pale cheeks, as, before that compelling gaze, her sweet eyes dropped. She breathed a little involuntary sigh—a sigh as of a child acquiescing in quiet assurance of care and love—and again turned her head away, and sat motionless.

The room was intensely still. Through the open windows came the faint evening country sounds, the rustling of leaves, the occasional twitter of some disturbed or restless bird, the slow moving of an animal in the pasture before the house.

Rowan's face, the delicate ear, and the soft curves of mouth and chin, looking like a flower above the nestling laces at her throat, sharply defined against the clear darkness outside, burnt itself into Amyot's vision. He was on fire—afraid to speak or move lest his passion should frighten her. Every fibre was thrilling, as he leant, silent and enthralled, swaying towards her.

So love—beautiful, entrancing, ever new, ever young—was born; on Rowan's side, perhaps, partly of the pity which Nurse's talk of him had put into her mind.

Presently she stirred, and lifted her eyes to his uneasily, shyly.

"How beautiful out there!" she said softly, her eyes returning to their entranced gaze at the dark starry sky.

"Everywhere!" he answered fervently, after a moment's beatific silence.

Peter, entering with the tea-tray, reminded him of the other visitor, and when he rose and went away, Rowan sat on, thinking her own confused thoughts. The two men entered the drawing-room together, and a good deal of talk followed as to the commissioners' meeting, fixed for that day week, the opposition likely to occur, and the necessary financial considerations.

Rowan listened, interested in the statistics which Amyot seemed to have at his fingers' ends, and to his description of similar works in Holland.

And then came the crunching of carriage-wheels on the gravel, the tramp of horses' feet, and the barking of chained-up dogs. Nurse appeared at the drawing-room door with a soft wrap for Rowan, and, as Amyot drew its folds round her, he laid her hand upon his arm to take her to the carriage. On the steps he paused a moment, in vivid remembrance of his dream three months before. Then, his senses had drunk in the scents and influences of spring, then he was a lonely man, standing—save for the pervading presence of the vision he had conjured up—silent amid silences, on the threshold of his home. Now, the scent of pinks and wallflowers from the window-beds filled the night air with sweetness—the stars studded the great dome of sky with points of vivid light—the restless tossings of the harness, the clanking of bits, disturbed the stillness—the gleam of lamplight shone through the open door on the sleek coats of the horses—and, enfolded by the summer night, he, Amyot, stood there, not as before, but as he had wished and dreamt, with

"And this was her room?" Rowan asked.—p. 446.

Rowan by his side. As he felt the soft touch of her fingers on his arm, insensibly he pressed them closer to his side. She was real, living, a warm bodily presence. His heart was filled with a wordless prayer that this gift he so desired might come to him.

And when he had put her into the carriage he lingered—glancing over his shoulder to see that Peter was still busy with Mr. Gayle—and said softly—

"I shall never forget to-night, and your goodness in coming. It has been a great delight. You will come again? Promise me that you will come again?" he insisted, bending towards her.

She could not see his burning eyes seeking hers in the darkness, but his voice, and perhaps the nearness of his passionate presence, thrilled her.

"I will come," she whispered, swaying towards him, her fingers gently pushing aside the enveloping wrap.

And then his hand encountered hers, and closed round the yielding fingers. For a moment, which seemed to both—so full it was of emotion—an eternity, the clasp endured. Then his dark head bowed, and Rowan's fingers returned to her own possession, quivering with the imprint of his kiss upon them. He heard the little sigh with which she sank back into her corner as he moved away. Her father came down the steps.

"To-day week you dine with us. And you had better stay the night," Mr. Gayle said pleasantly. "And we will hope for good luck on our schemes, and no opposition."

Amyot, as he stood—a black silhouette in the door—way, against the light of the hall—listening to the carriage drive away, accepted the words as a good omen for far more engrossing schemes than any he had yet planned.

He went back into the drawing-room, where Peter was bustling about with an alert air, that somehow expressed the satisfaction with which his mind was full. Amyot stood for a moment gazing round. His whole being was dazed with the quick leapings of passion. It was not difficult to conjure up the sweet vision of Rowan's presence. His face was so glorified, that Peter's hasty glance towards him was as hastily turned away. Peter, too, had a sweetheart not far away; and he knew what the smiling, abstracted glance directed to him by his master meant. He smiled to himself as Amyot turned away.

And then there was a little encounter in the hall.

Nurse was moving about softly, pretending to put away rugs and wraps. She glanced at her master, coming towards her with an unmistakable swing of elation and triumph in his gait.

"She is a pretty creature, Mr. Amyot," Nurse said, as he paused near her. "Please God, it won't be the last time she comes here, sir."

Amyot brought back his scattered wits, and his dark eyes laughed with his lips.

"Please God, Nurse, she will come some day——"

He strode off, the sudden delight of putting his hopes into words overmastering him; and the sentence was never finished.

But Nurse understood.

TWO NOTABLE CHILDREN'S SERVICES.

SUNDAY VISITS TO THE ORPHAN WORKING SCHOOL AND THE FOUNDLING HOSPITAL.

BY F. M. HOLMES.

"YOU have a large family here, Mr. Smith."

"Yes, a goodly number, indeed."

"About four hundred, I suppose?"

"Aye, more than that; sometimes four hundred and fifty."

"And they all come here to service?"

"Yes, except on Sunday morning, when some attend the nearest Congregational chapel."

So that the problem the managers of the institution have to face is the constant holding of a service suitable for a large congregation of little folks of varied ages, and coming from all parts of the kingdom. But they are all alike in this—that their young lives have been already darkly shadowed by the heavy cloud of orphanhood; for the institution in question is the well-known Orphan Working School at Haverstock Hill, in the north-west of London.

And how have the managers solved their problem?

Let us chat with Mr. William Smith, who for over thirty years has been head-master of the establishment, and then we may witness the service itself. As a rule, however, the public are rigidly excluded, for unless enlarged, the chapel would not be sufficiently spacious.

"Well," said Mr. Smith, "my conviction is that a man cannot preach equally well at the same time to both children and adults."

Fidgety Tom thinks so too. His stiff white Sunday collar cuts his neck like a rasp; his active, healthy limbs are all agog to be out in the lovely sunshine; his fingers will play with three or four marbles which have somehow strayed into his Sunday pockets; and, worst of all, he cannot for the life of him understand what that good man, the parson, is talking about.

What if you had two hundred and fifty fidgety Toms to preach to, and no parents to keep them in order, and two hundred fidgety Marys in addition?

"No preacher can preach equally well to children and adults at the same time," reiterated Mr. Smith. Evidently, then, the alternative is a children's service. The Orphan School, he goes on to say, was founded by Nonconformists; and in the foundation deed it was expressly provided that the children should attend the nearest Congregational church, in order that the orphanage should be maintained as purely unsectarian.

AFTER SERVICE AT THE ORPHAN WORKING SCHOOL.

"That provision is loyally kept. Some of our children," he says, "attend the church in question; and as for the rota of preachers provided by the secretary for the children's chapel, they are of various denominations, but no one would know, from what they say here, what denomination they belong to."

The growth of the institution was also, we judge, another consideration. The presence of 450 children would form a serious tax on the sitting accommodation of many a church; and so, altogether, it was decided to build a chapel for the children alone in the grounds of the orphanage.

It is a very suitable structure, with pretty stained windows, representing child-subjects from the Bible. The girls are all massed in the centre seats, the tallest in the middle of each seat, and the others sloping down in height on either side; the boys are grouped on the two flanks, and mounted on a rising gallery at the end.

And the service? It has evidently been arranged with great care, and the principle running through it is, as Mr. Smith admits—

That the children are to take part in everything, except the short sermon and one or two extempore prayers.

Still further we notice another principle, which, on being suggested to Mr. Smith, is agreed to by him: that the service is a remarkable blending of the liturgical and extempore methods; some portions of the Church of England Prayer-book being incorporated with hymns from the New Congregational Hymn-book, passages of Scripture to be chosen by the minister for the day, and extempore prayers. There are printed prayers also, including one for the Queen and royal family, and one, written by the head-master, for the governors of the institution.

It is a somewhat pathetic sight we see from the platform, these serried ranks of orphans stretching away seat after seat; but all seem bright and interested enough. A member of the house committee is present on the platform, and reads part of the Suffrages; and the preacher for the day, who on this occasion is a member of the general committee, is in the pulpit. The head-master is also on the platform, and the three gentlemen between them take part in the service. Nay, there is a fourth; one of the boys is called to the reading-desk, and in a clear voice and natural manner reads one of the chapters from Scripture—that is, he reads the alternate verses, the congregation of children reading aloud the others.

"And is it a reward to be a reading boy?" we ask Mr. Smith afterwards.

"Oh yes. We have several reading boys; and if they have been doing well, I sometimes give them permission for a stroll on Hampstead Heath, telling them to bring me back any natural history specimens of any kind that they can find. One of the boys generally reads the lesson at prayers every day, which we conduct in the chapel."

It would seem almost impossible for the children to take a greater part in any service than they do at Haverstock Hill. After the announcement of the psalm and chant, a short extract from the Prayer-book is taken, commencing, "O Lord, open Thou our lips," the children uttering the responses and ending with the passage, "The Lord's name be praised."

Then follows the chant, and the head-master reads the first lesson, the children reading the alternate verses.

And remarkably well they are read too, the hundreds of children's voices uniting almost as one in a clear volume of intelligible sound, and forming no Babel of voices.

Indeed, that, to an ordinary observer, is a remarkable feature of the service: the excellent manner in which all the children read aloud together.

The anthem follows—fresh and beautiful, sung by so many child-voices—and then the second lesson, read by one of the boys, the juvenile congregation reading, as before, the alternate verses. Then comes another brief excerpt from the Prayer-book, commencing, "The Lord be with you," and closing with the response by the congregation, "And take not Thy Holy Spirit from us."

The minister now offers a short extempore prayer, and adds the prayers for the Queen and for the governors of the institution, concluding this part of the service with the Lord's Prayer. Even in this the children are made to take a part, for they recite the alternate phrases aloud. Thus the minister commences—

"Our Father, who art in heaven."

And the children respond, as with one mighty voice—"Hallowed be Thy name."

"Thy Kingdom come," says the minister, clear and strong from the desk.

And again rises the beautiful volume of fresh, sweet sound in the words—"Thy will be done on earth."

"As it is in heaven," adds the minister.

"Give us this day our daily bread," ask the children; and so on; the prayer being said by minister and congregation in alternate phrases to the close. The children do not bow at prayer. They sit upright, with closed eyes: a position perhaps more conducive to order in so large a number.

After a hymn has been sung, the preacher announces his text. The subject is "Courage," and the verses, if not the exact text, are found in the chapter recording the bravery of David with the lion and the bear, and with Goliath. The preacher to-night is Mr. George Pearce, and he illustrates his points with several incidents from modern life. He lives at Highwood Hill, near Hendon, and he will have nine miles to drive before reaching home.

The service, which began at a quarter before seven, is now nearing its close, at about ten minutes or a quarter-past eight. A hymn follows the sermon, and then prayer and benediction.

There is no hurry or disturbance in leaving. Quietly, at a sign from the head-master, the girls begin to file out two and two. They leave two pews at a time, one taking the right file, and the other the left file, of the procession; so there is absolutely no bustling or jostling whatever, not even such as might occur from alteration of places in forming up into a procession of two from one pew only.

Though the girls come arrayed in their neat dark hats, yet there is a covered way from the chapel to the main building of the school, obviating the use of many umbrellas on occasion.

The girls all gone, the boys follow, and a glance at the schoolroom afterwards shows that they are drawn up there in line, to take their slices of bread before retiring for the night; for they have had their supper before the evening service.

"And how are the children occupied in the afternoon?" we ask Mr. Smith.

"We have a short service in the chapel, but I take the opportunity to chat with them about anything which may have transpired during the week—any faults that may have to be corrected, and so on."

Further he tells us that Bishop Hill*—the new Bishop of the Niger, in succession to Bishop Crowther—was a boy in the school.

"Indeed! Why, what did he do when he left the orphanage?"

"First, I believe, he engaged in some manual trade at Southampton; then I remember him at the Church little black jackets, white collars, and red waistcoats—all, we suppose, in the fashion of one hundred and fifty years ago, when the institution was founded—forms an interesting and picturesque sight.

They begin with a metrical Litany, sung on bended knee, the children's fresh, sweet, thrilling voices uniting in the opening verse, and then the boys and girls

At The Foundling

Missionary Society's College, and now you see he is Bishop of the Niger."

I told this little incident on the following Sunday to a bright boy at the Foundling, and it made him open his eyes. If his face afforded any indication, it might be taken to imply that he also was determining to make his way in life.

There is another children's service worthy of note at this well-known and old-established institution. Like the managers of the Orphan Working School, the chaplain of the Foundling has to face the problem of a congregation of children—not in the morning, when a large number of adults are present, and the service is quite one of the notable "functions" of London; but in the afternoon, when children from the neighbourhood attend as well as the inmates.

These are all massed in the deep gallery around the beautiful old organ which was given to the Foundling by Handel, and hearty and brilliant singing by the children forms a great part of the service. The numerous rows of girls in their white linen mob-caps, white linen tippets and aprons, and the boys in their singing alternately the other verses until the close, then all again unite.

The Litany is from the Children's Hymn-book, of which the Bishop of Wakefield is one of the editors; and then follows the Apostles' Creed and the Lord's Prayer, monotoned by the children, accompanied by the organ.

Three or four Collects come next—generally four—including that for Holy Innocents' Day and that for the evening commencing "Lighten our darkness." A hymn follows, and then a lesson from Scripture—one for the day—and then another hymn, so that, as the chaplain, the Rev. Corrie Jackson, tells us afterwards, there is plenty of music. In fact, music and singing form the dominant "note" of the notable children's service at the Foundling.

Another marked feature may perhaps surprise some people. It is the reading of a continued story to the children, with, as the chaplain said, "distinctly religious teaching." He does not always give an address. Sometimes he does so, sometimes he catechises the children on various subjects, and sometimes he reads a story, one chapter to the afternoon.

In this the juvenile congregation seem wonderfully interested.

"What do you think will happen to so-and-so?" they say to the choir-master during the week, mentioning different characters in the story.

"Well, we must wait until next Sunday afternoon to see," is the reply.

And when the time comes, they sit as still as mice, while in a clear voice, and with distinct articulation, the chaplain, turning his face from the public to the children—for it is their service—reads aloud another chapter.

Are there not some pleasant homes in the land where, on a Sunday afternoon, the mother or the father, or it may be a governess, gathers the children around her, and reads aloud from some interesting book? And so we may imagine in something of the same manner the chaplain gathers his flock around him; for, indeed, the Foundling is to these children in place of father and mother, and the governors and instructors are the only parents they are likely to know.

After the reading, another hymn is sung, and then follows the benediction, and the service concludes with a vesper hymn, "Guard us waking, guard us sleeping," beautifully sung as before.

The children, indeed, are regularly trained in singing and music, the organist and choir-master being Mr. H. Davan Wetton, Mus.B., who is also assistant organist at Westminster Abbey. The boys can muster a full military band, and many of them on leaving the Foundling enter regimental bands. The last Sunday before leaving, the children ask for their favourite hymns to be sung at the children's services in the afternoon.

"Well, Tommy," we say to one of the bright boys in the organ-loft, "and how do you like being here?"

"Oh, very much."

And the happy expression on his chubby features spoke more than words.

"Why, what do you do all day?"

"Oh, play and go to school."

The school, of course, is in the institution, but the play-rooms for the elder children are separate, and the grounds, with their fine old trees, are spacious. So there are ample places for play.

"I play the baritone," says another little fellow—a baritone being, we may remark in passing, a small saxhorn in the key of C or B flat.

Presently we hear how some of the boys can play. The lads sing their "grace before meat," led by some of the brass band, and fresh and clear, and with thrilling sweetness, their voices rise in a lovely melody.

"Thank you, boys! thank you!"

The lads seem as pleased as possible at being called to sing and play before the stranger, and receiving thanks. There seems no shrinking timidity about these children: they are quite at home, though it is such a large place; indeed, it is the only home they will know until they make one of their own.

Then out into the grounds we go, where in the open, and under the fine old trees, knots of the boys are standing about.

Once upon a time this was one of the fashionable walks of London; and country cousins would be surprised to find such a spot in the middle of the metropolis.

FELICIA JOSCELYNE'S LETTER.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ANN PRESCOTT'S FORTUNE," "COUSIN WALTER," ETC.

IN TWO PARTS.—PART I.

CHAPTER I.

FELICIA JOSCELYNE sat at her window in the moonlight, thinking deeply. She was twenty-two that day, and, as she had always been taught was her bounden duty on birth-days, she was taking a retrospect of her life, which seemed to have lasted—oh, such a long time! In the dim perspective of years she saw the bright, pretty mother, so early, alas! taken from her; then the kind, anxious aunt, who had married at last, and gone far away; then the school, where she had been such a favourite. Was she the same merry Felicia who had said good-bye to her school-fellows little more than three years ago, her father coming home from India, and she to be promoted to all the dignity of his housekeeper? Ah! that home was never more than a dream. Colonel Joscelyne died a week after his return, and poor forlorn Felicia was carried off by the widow of an old comrade of his, to whom the terrified girl had sent her father's urgent message. Mrs. Gordon had nursed him devotedly, putting Felicia aside as young and inexperienced, and having long consultations whenever his strength allowed, from which his daughter, so hungry for affection and confidence, was excluded. Perhaps they were making plans for her good—what did it matter, when there were but those few precious hours that should have belonged only to her? Felicia acknowledged to herself that she had felt a bitter jealousy and dislike to the energetic, kind-hearted woman who had taken her to her own home, and told her she must be to her as a daughter. The days went by for her there in a dreary, monotonous procession; for Mrs. Gordon they were never long enough, so busy was she with her poultry, garden, and the large circle of friends and neighbours constantly coming to her for advice and help. She had really been very patient with the restless, discontented girl who, in this haven of peace, was always secretly longing for change and action. Mrs. Gordon had plenty of subjects for conversation; she had travelled in her youth, and was a shrewd, clever woman. Felicia would listen to her stories of the old days when she followed Captain Gordon and his regiment to India, or was stationed in some garrison town at home, when they were so poor and so happy; but how was it that these tales should invariably end in an account of Arthur Gordon's sayings and doings?—her son Arthur, who would never go into the army, but who was such a prodigy of learning, and could certainly—in time—have been Prime Minister, if he had not instead preferred to become one of the masters in a large school, where—his mother hastened to add—"all the boys, my dear, fairly worship him!" There never had been such a son—cutting his teeth so early, and carrying off all the prizes: an Adonis for beauty—so tall; he stooped a little, certainly, but that was because he was short-sighted, and always searching about for out-of-the-way grubs and worms; the long scar on his cheek was the result of a dreadful fall he had when a rotten branch gave way under him as he was looking into a rook's nest. Mrs. Gordon took no notice of Felicia's half-stifled yawns.

They were sitting together one dreary December evening—how well she remembered it! The holidays were to begin next day, and Mrs. Gordon was to meet Arthur in London, and return with him in the afternoon; his room had been made ready, the house turned upside down with preparations, and Felicia hated the very sound of his name. She had vainly tried not to listen, and significantly turned the pages of a volume of the French Revolution, and when a pause did at last occur, proposed reading aloud.

"Thank you, Felicia; I had rather talk. I don't like the French, either, though they certainly have one very sensible custom—very good, that is, for young people who cannot—" and then she stopped, a little embarrassed.

"What is that?" Felicia had asked.

"Their custom of arranging marriages for their sons and daughters!" Mrs. Gordon said, turning rather red.

"Surely sensible, affectionate parents, with a knowledge of the world and the disposition of their children, must be far better judges of who would be likely to make them really happy than the young, inexperienced creatures themselves. Felicia, I think I ought to prepare you: it was your father's last expressed wish that you should be entrusted to my dear Arthur's care—that you were to be his wife!"

"Never, never, while I have strength to say 'No!'" cried the already angry, impatient Felicia, throwing down her book, and rushing to her room in a tempest of sobs and tears. Her father: to give her away to a man she had never seen, whom she could never love, years older than herself, stooping, short-sighted, always peering about for grubs and worms! Never, never! Then that was why she was brought here—entrapped; but she would break through the snare—she would show them that she had a will, a heart, of her own!

"Felicia, are you asleep? Good-night," said Mrs. Gordon, outside the locked door. There was no answer, though Felicia did not go to sleep until dawn; and when she awoke, it was to hear that Mrs. Gordon had already started on her journey. Then the fates were not utterly cruel, she thought; and hastily swallowing some breakfast, she packed her boxes, quietly asked for the pony-carriage, and was driven to the station, leaving a few lines to be given to Mrs. Gordon on her return. She had composed them before she went to sleep.

"When you receive this letter I shall be far away and in safety. Starvation and imprisonment even could never induce me to consent to your cruel plan—my heart, at least, is my own.

"FELICIA JOSCELYNE.

"I am going back to Miss Saville, who will, I know, find me a situation as a governess."

"And I never remembered," thought the now penitent Felicia, "that Mrs. Gordon was giving ungrateful me the greatest treasure she had in the world. And how could I tell her so afterwards without seeming to ask for—for a husband!" and she put her burning cheek to the cool window-pane, and took up the thread of her life-story.

Mrs. Gordon, evidently very much hurt and distressed, wrote directly, reminding her that if ever she were ill or in any trouble, she could apply to her father's old friend. Arthur had sent a letter, too—she knew it by heart, every word—the odd, clever handwriting—each turn and twist of the signature.

"MY DEAR MISS JOSCELYNE," it ran, "I extremely regret to have been the unfortunate and unconscious cause for your leaving my mother's house. Can you be induced to return to it when I assure you that I never have aspired to, and can certainly promise never to ask for, the honour of your hand?—Yours faithfully,

"ARTHUR GORDON."

Felicia longed intensely for change and stir, and Miss Saville, who had always taken a deep interest in her, spared no pains to gratify her wish; and at last, an American family applying to her for a governess to travel with them on the Continent for two years, taking charge of their one little girl, she recommended Felicia. And so she saw mountains and cities to her heart's content, and at the end of these years of wandering thought she should enjoy the quiet of an English home, and resisting Mrs. Vermont's pressing invitation to return with her to America, she again appealed to her old friend.

"And now, for the past twelve months," she gratefully thought, "I have been in a home at last."

Mrs. Wilson could not be formal and ceremonious if she had tried, and those sad weeks when Felicia had watched by her little Amy's bedside, and nursed her with such untiring devotion, had endeared her to the mother's heart—she had her own place in the household: was Felicia no longer, but Ruth, called so by Amy in her delirium; and the name had been adopted by the entire family. Ought she not to have written to Mrs. Gordon to tell her how happy she was? It was clearly a duty, and one of the good birthday resolutions to be carried out to-morrow.

But the letter was not written, after all.

"That lazy D. V. ! she doesn't deserve to have these two letters; I shall put them here till after breakfast," remarked Jack Wilson, slipping the envelopes under a plate.

"D. V. ! whom do you mean !" asked his mother.

"Distinguished Visitor or Dora Violet : it doesn't matter which," returned Jack. "Here she comes at last."

"I shouldn't have been late, mother, if Simpkins had sounded the gong," said Dora, putting her cheek for a kiss.

"But you know, dear, we always have breakfast at eight, and Martha is rather busy."

"It wouldn't have taken her a moment, mother," said Dora discontentedly. "But nothing is done properly, it seems to me; that table is loaded as if we had had no food for a month ! I told Simpkins yesterday to put the bread-trencher and a cold dish on the dinner-waggon, but of course she has not done it. I shall be ashamed for Ethel to come and stay with us ; everything is perfect in her home, and they only keep two servants, like us."

"Well, dear, we'll try and have everything nice when your friend comes," said her mother.

"I begin to hope that she will not accept the invitation," remarked Dora drearily : "at least, not during the holidays.—Jack, your nails are awful !"

"They're only in slight mourning," remarked Jack, making a grimace at his elder sister—it was a new one, and very hideous—the parrot face, Amy had called it ; he saw its reflection in the mirror with great satisfaction.

"Now, Jack, here is your pork pasty ; get on with your breakfast," interposed Felicia. "Give me your plate.—He—are your letters, Dora," snatching them up before Jack had time to re-capture them.

"I owe you one for that," said Jack. "Amy, look at that enormous caterpillar on the top of your head !"

"There isn't any such thing," said Lucy indignantly, as poor Amy began to scream.

"First of April !" chuckled Jack, with his mouth full.

"Jack, you are hopelessly vulgar !" groaned Dora.

"Come, children, no quarrelling," called out Mr. Wilson from the end of the table. "I have a letter here, my dear, from Professor Smythe ; he says he is sorry he cannot fulfil his engagement to give the lecture at our new institute : whatever must we do ? The bills are all out advertising the lecture for Friday, and this is Monday. When a man has made a promise, he should stick to it !"

"What a beastly nuisance !" said Jack sympathetically.

"That hateful word !" cried Dora.

"Well, isn't the lecture on Animal Life ? and aren't animals beasts ?" inquired her brother, with triumph.

"But whom can we ask ?" continued Mr. Wilson. "There's Taylor, but he is as flat as ditch-water : I went to sleep myself the last time I heard him ; and Symonds is away for a month ; besides, a stranger would take better."

"I know just the man !" shouted Jack, banging his fist on the table and upsetting the mustard-pot. "Old Grubs is the very fellow ! Catch anybody going to sleep when he's giving us a lesson !"

"And who is Old Grubs ?" asked his father, laughing.

"Oh, the master for natural science and modern languages who came to our school last year, father. Mr. Gordon his name is, really, but we never call him anything but Old Grubs: he's always pottering about for worms and things, you know."

"Ruth, dear, a clean knife would get the mustard the ink-pot and then crawled over the paper, Briggs always says. Here it is."

"What is the initial, Jack? I can make out the rest, but you have left a crumb of toffee over that."

"A., father—Arthur Gordon; of course he hasn't put the letters after his name there, but you might string a lot of them together for the bills—M.R.C.V.S."

"That means Member of the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons, Jack," put in Lucy.

"Kids are not expected to speak till they're spoken to," said Jack severely. "Amy, you may have that piece of toffee—you know how to behave."

"Well, Jack, I shall go and mention it to the rest off the tablecloth better, wouldn't it? Your spoon is spreading it rather," suggested Mrs. Wilson.

"He's an awful swell, and has got no end of letters after his name," continued Jack. "Do ask him down, father; I've often thought how jolly it would be to have him here. I have his home address, because he asked me to send him some of our river-mud, and gave me a little box, and stamps for the postage, you know. He often asks the fellows to send him specimens from different places, and when he gets hold of something fresh he's as pleased as if he had a fortune left him. —If he comes you'd better not begin screaming at caterpillars, Miss Amy, or he will think you are a noodle." Jack was meanwhile emptying his pockets, and a very heterogeneous mass was being piled on the table. "Oh, here it is; I wrapped a piece of toffee up in it—I remember. I'll tear off the crest for you, Lucy. The paper is rather sticky, father, though I think you can make it out; he writes a funny squiggly sort of hand, as if a spider had tumbled in of the committee, and then I'll write off to Mr. Gordon, and ask him to telegraph his reply. He is evidently just the man we want," said Mr. Wilson, leaving the table.

"We never call him anything but Old Grubs."

"And if he can come, you'll ask him to stay a few days, won't you, mother?"

"You seem to think you can entertain a clever man like Mr. Gordon as easily as if he were Briggs or Foster!" said Dora scornfully.

"Fifty times easier to entertain, as you call it, than that muff Foster!" returned Jack. "I know you'd like him, mother. Give him some bread and cheese and he'll start off grub-hunting, and you'll see nothing of him again till dark: that is how he spends his half-holidays. He puts on an old suit of clothes he keeps on purpose, with pockets everywhere; he comes back half-covered with mud, and as jolly as a sand-boy. He's awfully short-sighted, and gets so excited that he plunges up to his neck nearly in ditches, and gets his face scratched with brambles. You'd think he was a tramp, I daresay, Dora. Poor Old Grubs!"

"You mustn't call him that if he comes to stay," remarked Lucy.

"As if I should be such a ninny!" returned Jack. "But if I did let it slip out, he'd only laugh—he knows it's his name as well as I do."

"I shouldn't call him much of a master if he lets you go on like that!" said Lucy, a very inconvenient and irrepressible child.

"Much you know about it, Miss Conceited!" replied Jack hotly. "He's the best master in the school, I can tell you; down on you like a bundle of bricks if you try on any shirking! He caught that brute Foster bullying a little chap, and didn't he have a time of it, that's all!" concluded Jack, nodding with awful mystery.

"Well, Jack, Mr. Gordon seems a very kind-hearted, nice man," said Mrs. Wilson; "and if your father has no objection, I'm sure I should like him to stay."

"As it is holiday-time, we could keep the bottles with specimens and things in the schoolroom, Ruth; come and let's see where we could put his microscope."

"I'm rather busy, Jack," said Felicia, "and we needn't arrange anything until we know if Mr. Gordon can come."

"Oh, he'll come!" said Jack confidently, dragging her off to the schoolroom. "I'll clear all the books out of this closet—the very place for Old Grubs' specimens. You won't mind a muddle, Ruth; if it was the D. V. there would be no end of a row."

"Jack, if you talk about Dora like that, I'll lock the cupboard, and hide up the key! How can you tease her so? I should have thought you would have been proud to have a sister so clever and pretty!"

"She shouldn't be stuck-up and interfering, then!" retorted Jack. "There's mother calling you. I'll pile the books on that shelf, and tidy up the room beautifully. If you're going in the kitchen, ask cook to put out some empty marmalade bottles and things. Never mind, though: I'll come and look in the store-room myself; it's no use trying to explain what you want to girls."

CHAPTER II.

JACK's prophecy proved to be correct, and Mr. Gordon at once accepted the invitation. His name (without the "letters," alas! Mr. Wilson thinking Jack's memory rather too hazy to be relied on) appeared in bold type on the bills so liberally distributed over the little town. As soon as they were printed Jack had secured a large bundle; and he and Briggs, who lived in the place, took them to the neighbouring villages, leaving them at out-of-the-way farm-houses, and stopping waggoners and labourers, explaining that the lecture was, if missed, a thing to be regretted all their lives. The talking was chiefly left to Briggs, who had a natural talent that way, Jack clinching his remarks by an emphatic sentence thrown in here and there. "If we don't have a crowded house to hear Old Grubs, I'll know the reason why!" he would say. "He's going to bring all those jolly new diagrams down." Briggs was anxious that Old Grubs should appear in dress clothes—"for then, you know, Jack, he looks stunning!" Jack's answer was so scornful that a fearful quarrel seemed imminent, but certainly that happened at least half a dozen times a day, and they were just as good friends as ever.

"It's nice to see the dear boy so busy and happy," said his mother.

"And out of mischief," added Mr. Wilson.

"Richard sends word he can come home on Friday, dear," said Mrs. Wilson.

"He will enjoy meeting Mr. Gordon."

"I don't think a man of Mr. Gordon's intellectual culture would have much in common with Richard, mother," said Dora.

"I wish you and your brothers understood each other better, Dora."

"You know, mother, Richard wouldn't care if I were at—at Coventry, if only he could talk to Ruth!"

"Human nature, my dear, human nature!" said Mr. Wilson, with his easy laugh. "But I remember my sister Eliza being just as jealous of your mother."

"As if I were jealous!" muttered Dora.

Fortunately for Felicia, there was very little time for sentimental musing in the Wilson family, but whenever there was a leisure moment came the insistent thought—"Ought I to tell Mrs. Wilson that I know Arthur Gordon?" and then the same answer: "But I don't; I never saw him in my life! And what right have I to describe Mrs. Gordon's matrimonial plans and our mutual refusal? Besides, Mrs. Wilson of course would tell her husband, and he would certainly make sly allusions and jokes—it would be unbearable. No, I will say nothing, whether it is deceitful of me or not: keep out of the way, efface myself, if possible. Joscelyne has the sound of the very ordinary Joslin, and Felicia is lost in Ruth. I will trust to accident; if he does find out, he certainly will not proclaim his discovery on the house-tops, and I can explain it all quietly, and give a kind message to his mother."

Dora did not keep her anxieties to herself.

"Ruth," she said, joining the little group at Lucy's rabbit-hutch on Thursday afternoon, "Ruth, I can't persuade mother to have late dinner when Mr. Gordon arrives. You know some people are invited to meet him; he could have afternoon tea directly he comes, and then a nice light dinner at half-past six; I suppose we couldn't have it later, because of the lecture. I would undertake to make the entrées, from 'Tasty Dishes.' But it's no good; they've set their hearts on a heavy meat-tea, with cold fowls, and a great ham, pigeon-pie, and all the rest of it! The children will crowd up the table, and upset their cups, and Mr. Gordon will think us the regular Philistines we are."

"Philistines, Dora?" said Amy. "I thought David killed them all?"

"Of course he didn't; they were alive all through Kings and Chronicles," corrected Lucy.

"Juno thought that lovely sprig of parsley was for her, and now that greedy Lord Fontleroy has snatched it away, Amy," said Felicia, laughing. "As to late dinner, Dora, from what Jack said of Mr. Gordon," flushing a little, "I should think, so long as he had something substantial to eat, he wouldn't mind whether it was called dinner or tea. And then Martha Simpkins does not wait quite perfectly yet, and might feel flustered, as she says."

"Oh, don't talk of it! Why will mother take such incompetent housemaids? Honesty and cleanliness are not all the virtues. But I feel inclined to give it all up in despair, and to relapse into hugger-mugger."

"It will fill up the table if we are all there," said Felicia. "If your mother does not mind, I could take Lucy and Amy to have tea with Mrs. Mans; she has asked them several times, you know."

"How lovely, you dear, darling Ruth!" cried Lucy, in ecstasies.

"It really is good of you," said Dora gratefully.

"We must be back in time for the lecture, though," said Lucy. "Mother promised me I might go."

"Oh yes, we will be back in time," replied Felicia, quite as pleased as the children.

Mrs. Wilson consented at once, when she saw their delight, so they started the next afternoon in high spirits; there was a very short railway journey, and then a two-mile walk, to the village. Jack, amiability itself, walked with them to the station.

"They haven't got a notice of the lecture in here!" he exclaimed, coming to a stand before a little shop in the picturesque old street. The tiny window was almost taken up with boxes of small potatoes; a card with an inscription in large text hand, arrested Jack's attention. "Schoolmasters for Setts," he read.

"It's the name of some potatoes; they are for planting," said Lucy, who had a great fund of general information.

"There is room for Briggs, as you won't be at tea, Ruth. Mother has let me invite him," remarked Jack, as the train was starting.

"Then you are glad I shall be away!" laughed Felicia. "Good-bye."

Mrs. Mans brought the weekly supply of poultry, butter, and eggs to the Wilson family, and the annual custom of "drinking tea" with her during the Easter holidays was an ancient institution which Dora now felt she had outgrown. The little farmhouse was of red brick, with two gables fronting the village green; a narrow box-bordered path led up to the front door, the little garden already bright with ribes, blue forget-me-not, and polyanthus; it was a warm, early season. How much there was to see and admire!—broods of chickens, with important clucking mothers, soft yellow goslings, calves, and frisky little pigs. Amy's pale cheeks were rosy with happiness. Mrs. Mans, as a parting gift, put some roots of auricula and hen-and-chicken daisies, neatly tied up in cabbage-leaves, into her basket, Lucy, strictly utilitarian, preferring plants of sage and lemon-thyme for her garden.

"It has been the nicest day in all my life," said Amy, as she went up-stairs to bed.

"We are just starting, Ruth," cried Dora. "Would you mind undressing Amy, and settling her off, and then coming with Lucy? Richard will wait for you;

he knows where our seats are. Mr. Gordon is charming!" she continued confidentially. "We have had the most delightful talk! Everybody admired the way I had decorated the table. You wouldn't have known Jack and Briggs, they were subdued to that extent. You really are very sweet and unselfish, Ruth!" concluded Dora, with a parting kiss.

It took some time to put sleepy Amy to bed, and to induce Lucy to make herself presentable. When they had started, too, Richard had a great deal to say, and proposed going the longest way round, but Lucy of course negated that. Mr. Wilson, who was mayor, was just concluding a genial opening speech, which was received with much applause; but the stamping and clapping that greeted the lecturer were deafening. The hall was packed, and Jack and Briggs were beaming.

"Everything is going off beautifully, dear," whispered Mrs. Wilson, as she made room for Felicia by her side. "Was Amy over-tired?"

And then Felicia could at last look at Arthur Gordon. He was perfectly easy and natural, with his chalk, black-board, and diagrams; not troubling his audience with many scientific terms, but managing to raise a thorough interest in his subject; giving some short anecdotes, amusing and very much to the point, and bringing his lecture to an end punctually and to the moment. Everybody was in high good-humour, and the vote of thanks ended with an urgent request to the lecturer to repeat his visit.

"How delighted Mrs. Gordon would be! She would tell me again that he began to talk when he was only eleven months old," thought Felicia to herself. Several members of the committee joined their party, and Dora being the only person certain to introduce her formally, Felicia contrived to enter the drawing-room in her absence, and escaped notice, as she hoped.

"Then, as your mother is nursing her sister, and away from home, you will stay here until she returns, Mr. Gordon," Mrs. Wilson was saying, when Felicia came to the breakfast-table next morning.

"You are very kind; I shall be glad to stay a few days," he replied, "if I am really not trespassing on your kindness. From what Mr. Taylor was telling me last night, this is a most interesting neighbourhood."

"Then, when you have written your letters, we'll go exploring," said Jack.—"You'll pack a lunch-basket for us, mother! May I ask Briggs to come too, sir?"

"Of course," said Mr. Gordon. "And you have been at work in your gardens already; I saw you and your sister from my window," he continued, turning to the little girls.

"Dora out before breakfast? Wonders will never cease!" remarked Jack.

"It was Ruth; she isn't our sister—she's the governess," explained Lucy. "Miss Joscelyne, her name is. We don't call her Miss anything, because we like her so.—Mother, I can sell you sage and lemon-thyme when you want any. Mrs. Mans gave me some lovely roots—a much better kind than what we have in the kitchen garden. Amy's auriculas look very droopy; I told her to water them well, and then put pots over them. It's silly to cry about things."

"I thought the poor flowers had died," said Amy, with quivering lips.

"You must show me your gardens," said Mr. Gordon. "I could send you some seeds for them when I go home. My mother is a great gardener."

"I have Jack's piece now," said Lucy; "I pay rent for it in radishes and mustard-and-cress. I send them to his school in a nice tin box. You see, keeping rabbits and silkworms, I want a great deal of parsley and lettuce-leaves. Aren't silkworms dreadfully hungry things? Did you ever keep them, Mr. Gordon?"

"Indeed I did, Lucy," said Mr. Gordon, laughing. "When I was a boy, I had three rooms in the attics to keep my treasures in, and it was a very funny collection."

"I've cleared the school-room for our things, sir," interrupted Jack, as Mr. Gordon was giving an account of the alarming mischief wrought by a certain wood-eating caterpillar, "and put bottles, and jars, and tins in the book cupboard."

"I hope," said Mr. Gordon, turning politely to Felicia, "that you forgive such an invasion of your territory, Miss——"

"Miss Joscelyne," put in Dora.

"I am so stupid in remembering names," apologised Mr. Gordon. "I only know of one other Miss Joscelyne, though, but she had not a pretty homely name, like Miss Ruth—a very romantic and flighty young person, with a suitable name—Evelina, Pamela—I forget what!"

"But——" began Lucy.

"Our first post goes out in fifteen minutes," interrupted her father. "You will just have time for your letters, Mr. Gordon;" and everyone left the breakfast-table.

"Oh, how I wish Lucy had told him I was Felicia! There would have been an end of it. And he only thinks of me as 'a very romantic, flighty young person—Evelina or Pamela.' How silly of me to make so much ado about nothing!" thought Felicia to herself.

"Mother asks me to tell you that Richard is just starting, Ruth," said Dora, rather crossly.

"Oh, I thought he had gone," returned Felicia, with a carelessness which at once piqued and pleased his sister.

"'Splendid, Jack! you have thought of everything.'"—p. 460.

"Can't I do anything for you in town? Do give me some commission!" entreated Mr. Richard Wilson, appearing at that moment.

"No, thank you; I am in the happy state of not wanting anything."

"I wish I were," put in Dora. "But Ruth isn't like other people!"

"I quite agree with you, Dora," said her brother. "Good-bye; I shall be home again on Thursday," to Felicia. "Do remember these are the holidays, and give yourself some rest from those tiresome children."

"Richard never thinks whether I want any rest or not," said Dora, watching her brother's retreating figure as she stood at the window.

"You will be going to Ethel's soon; that will be a pleasant change for you, dear."

"No; Ethel says in this letter they have engagements up till October, so I must vegetate here, I suppose. They seem to think I want luxury, but it's quite a mistake; plain living and high thinking is all one needs—the simplest things, prettily served. What a contrast it must seem to you after that delightful Continental style!"

"I am fifty times happier here," interrupted Ruth. "Kind hearts are more than coronets," you know."

"As if I wanted coronets, or their equivalent!" was the scornful answer.

"But you have no aspirations after anything higher, I begin to think. Books are our best friends, after all; they never irritate, and rub one the wrong way. If only I had time for study! But I shall soon begin to fancy I am 'wasting my time over a book,' as people think it here, when they see me reading one. The other girls were in such a hurry to leave school—I wasn't, I know; I ought not to grumble so—I don't—to anyone but you, Ruth."

The lines in the pretty, troubled forehead relaxed a little under Felicia's kisses.

"Patience, Dora, and 'make the most of the sunshine when it comes,' as my dear sensible aunt used to tell me."

"Between the prison bars, Ruth," added Dora.

"Well, Mr. Gordon's visit is a ray, certainly; his very accent is soothing. He is very kind; one of those letters is to order some books he was talking to me about."

Lucy just then put her head inside the door, shouting—

"Ruth, Jack wants you in the schoolroom directly; he is in such a fury!"

Of course Felicia ran off at once.

"Where is it, now? Give it me this moment; you'll spoil all our morning. I never thought you could be so mean—that key, Ruth!"

"I haven't taken it, really—not seen it, even!" declared Ruth.

"What is the matter, Jack?" asked Mr. Gordon, coming in with his letters.

"The key of this cupboard, sir. Ruth, did you hide it? On your honour, now."

"On my honour, I didn't," said Felicia, laughing. "Let go my hands, Jack, and I'll look on the top. Very likely you put it there yourself, out of the way of the children. Here it is, hanging on a nail!"

"Oh, I remember: Lucy pries and peeps about so," grumbled Jack.

"You oughtn't to have it till you make a proper apology," insisted Felicia, still perched on a chair, as she opened the cupboard door.

"Splendid, Jack! you have thought of everything," cried Mr. Gordon enthusiastically, glancing at the collection of bottles and tin boxes. "It is a pity you cannot all come too," he continued, addressing Felicia; "but perhaps the children would be rather tired; we go straight across country. Miss Wilson is very interested in the subject."

"Dora!" exclaimed her brother incredulously.

"Yes, she is very interested," put in Felicia. "And when you make a shorter excursion, I know she would enjoy it thoroughly. She is so quick and observant; she would make a good naturalist."

"You always stand up for the D.V.," muttered Jack, "We don't want any girls!—Here comes Briggs, sir. Mother has packed the lunch-basket. Isn't it a jolly morning, Briggs?"

"Then we'll start at once, boys," said Mr. Gordon.

"Your letters and spectacles," said Felicia, smiling, and handing them to him.

"Thank you, Miss Johns. I should certainly have gone without them," was the grateful answer.

(To be concluded.)

JOY, THE FRUIT OF THE SPIRIT.

A SERMON PREACHED AT ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL, ON SUNDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 26TH, 1893, BY THE VENERABLE WILLIAM MACDONALD SINCLAIR, D.D., ARCHDEACON OF LONDON, CANON OF ST. PAUL'S, AND CHAPLAIN-IN-ORDINARY TO H.M. THE QUEEN.

LIFE is not meant by our Heavenly Father to be mournful. Those of our religious poets who sing of this life as necessarily a dismal exile, a long and dreary business, a night of weeping, a vale of tears and woe, are using artificial, unreal, and affected language. There is not one of them who, if Fate suddenly appeared before them, like Queen Eleanor, with immediate and inevitable death in her hand, would not prefer a reprieve. It is only through the poison of sin and the disappointments of our own failures and misdoings that life is often so sorrowful. Think when you were last grieved. Was it not because you had lost your self-restraint and committed some folly? When were you last in anxiety and distress? Was it not because you had been guilty of some great stupidity, or had seared your conscience by doing something you knew to be wrong, or had allowed the canker of some evil or defective habit to grow up within you, which would never let you forget its demoralising presence? Or may it not have been because you had allowed ambition and self-seeking to lodge in your heart, which must necessarily set everybody against you, and surround you with suspicion and jealousy, and set you on a false and mistaken track, where you will find nothing but thorns, stones, morasses, and pitfalls, and be mocked by the fitful flicker of the will-o'-the-wisp of an ever-retreating allurements? If your unhappiness has ever come through the misconduct of others, then, on the one hand, it is true that they have caused the misery, contrary to the wishes of God, and on the other that you have probably made too much of them, and in exaggerating their merits and their importance to yourself have been erring against the law of God which tells you that you are not to set your affections too firmly on what is below, but on things above. And even if your mournfulness has come through the removal of the very light of your eyes from your side, yet if that terrible bereavement issued in a permanent dejection, it is a proof that you do not fully trust the Divine Hand, and that you are not yet ready to say, "It is the Lord: let Him do what seemeth Him good!"

It has been said by those who make generalisations in the wish to be thought philosophic, that the age in which we live is joyless and disappointed. That amounts to the assertion that amongst those persons who make up the characteristics of our era there are more who are dismal than happy. If we judge from the standpoint of the world, this may well be so, and it would probably have been always found to be true: the worldly people are always the most prominent, and influence the tone and fashion of society most forcibly; and it is that outward appearance which is most readily estimated. In any period or generation the really glad and happy are those who have a firm, vivid, and unshakable belief in God and in the unseen world, and who exercise themselves to have a conscience void of offence both towards Him and towards men. They are not always easy to discover for the purposes of philosophical generalisation; but all the while they are universally present, here and there, in every section of society, as the salt of the earth and the light of the world. It is these tranquil, radiant, unselfish, unambitious souls who, in their various quiet stations, keep the commonwealth from putrefaction. It is they who support all the glorious and salutary institutions of philanthropy. It is they who know the secret of the Lord, and have His perpetual sunshine in their hearts.

Yes! God meant us to be as happy as the birds that flit about with song and carol in the deep delight of summer woods. The picture of what we ought to be is given us in that beautiful poetical vision which Moses embodied in his story of Adam and Eve in the blessed gardens of Paradise. It is because we have come such a very long way from that idea, and have, in all our history and circumstances, grown so sinful, earthly, and worldly, and have been so miserably misled into placing our delight in what is not really true enjoyment at all, that life has often been to many so dull and sad.

Some of us make the grave mistake of imagining that joy is pleasure. Some think it must be mirth and fun. Some identify it with perpetual novelty. It is in reality none of these things. Such empty gratifications pass away with a mere flicker, and leave no real satisfaction behind. "Mortal or natural joy is ever on the wing, and hard to bind; it can only be kept in a closed box; with silence we best guard the fickle god, and swift it vanishes if a flippant tongue haste to raise the lid." That is the way the world talks of its ideal objects of pursuit. True joy lies in the improvement of our character, the discipline of our affections, in being on the same side as the Supreme Ruler and Disposer of all things, in becoming more like Him who comprises in Himself all perfection, in sharing His Divine nature of beauty and glory, in understanding what is meant by love of Him and love of our humankind, and in steadily and earnestly carrying out that love in our daily lives. "Joy is the mainspring in the whole round world of everlasting nature; joy moves the wheels of the great timepiece of the world; she it is that loosens flowers from their buds, suns from their firmaments, rolling spheres in distant space seen not by the glass of the astronomer." Every created object that is fulfilling the law of its being is full of joy and unutterable contentment; and the law of our being is to discover and to fulfil the will of God.

Do you remember a passage in that short and nameless but very beautiful Psalm which occupies the forty-third place in our collection? It seems to put cause and effect in its true sequence: "O send out Thy light and Thy truth: let them lead me; let them bring me unto Thy holy hill, and to Thy dwelling-places. Then will I go to the altar of God, unto God my exceeding Joy." God's light and truth it is that we want first. His truth to teach us the exceeding littleness of all earthly things, and the lasting greatness and importance of all things spiritual; and His light to enable us to see and grasp these truths, to understand where in our past lives we have been so unhappily wrong, and how we may live nearer to Him in the future; His light to show us the curse of selfishness, and the bliss of Christian devotion to His service and to the good of our brothers and sisters of His great family. Then, and not till then, shall we be able to go with praise, thanksgiving, and gladness to the presence of God, to seek Him out, and find Him that is alone real and true, Himself to be our exceeding joy.

My brothers, like the wonderful gift of Christian love, the blessing of joy can only come to us through the Holy Spirit of God Himself, in answer to firm faith and continuous prayer. Joy is a sort of quiet, perpetual effervescence of internal happiness. "They that have a secret spring of spiritual joy, and a continual feast of a good conscience within them, cannot be miserable." Their contentment arises from the consciousness of what is eternal; whereas all the grief, trouble, melancholy, sadness, despondency, gloom, dejection, and tribulation which from time to time afflict them, like clouds passing over a bright landscape, belong only to transitory and temporal causes. "Worldly joy is a sunflower, which shuts when the gleam of prosperity is over; spiritual joy is an unfading, an ever-green plant." Think what it is to feel our feet placed on the everlasting Rock; to hold daily communion with God, not through another, but in our own persons; to take a daily delight in doing our duty; to be persuaded in our very soul of souls that this life is but the preparation for that glorious existence to come, which has no ending; to realise that everything we do or say has its effect on that unending prospect; to feel under us the everlasting arms, and to know, by the experience of our own consciences, that God is indeed in the midst of us, therefore shall we not be removed for ever. "No joys are always sweet, and flourish long, but such as have the approval of conscience for their root, and the Divine favour for their shelter." Joy is the certainty of acceptance by a Heavenly Father's love; "it is love exulting in its own precious experiences; it is love aware of its own indisputable felicity, and resting in riches which it has no fear of exhausting; it is love taking a view of its treasures, and surrendering itself to bliss because it has no reason for foreboding." "I will see you again," says our dear Lord to each one of us, "and your heart shall rejoice, and your joy no man taketh from you."

My brothers, you must not be disturbed because the world cannot understand the cause of your exhilaration. Remember that the exuberant exultation of the Apostles themselves on the Day of Pentecost was mistaken for the fulness of new wine. "The joys of the Christian are incomprehensible to those who have not tasted them, and yet they are the only real joys in the universe." The world is ever rushing for its amusements, and pastimes, and varied succession of pleasurable sensations. These are the resources for which it lives, and it knows nothing of the peace of God which passeth understanding, or the blessedness of him whose transgression is forgiven and his sin covered.

"Mankind is mad!

Such mighty numbers 'list against the right
(And what cannot numbers, when bewitched, achieve?)—
They talk themselves to something like belief
That all earth's joys are theirs!

"They grin; but wherefore? and how long the laugh?
Half ignorance their mirth, and half a lie;
To cheat the world and cheat themselves, they smile.
Hard, either task! The most abandoned own
That others, if abandoned, are undone:
Then, for themselves, the moment reason wakes
(And Providence denies it long repose)
O how laborious is their gaiety!
They scarce can swallow their ebullient spleen,
Scarce muster patience to support the farce,
And pump sad laughter till the curtain falls."

Do not, I pray you, allow the scepticism of the world to spoil the fulness of your gladness in believing. There is all the difference imaginable between you, who realise that God has given you a revelation, and them to whom it is nothing better than an idle tale. Do not, as you value your immortal soul, allow the relation between you and your God to be spoiled or weakened by paying attention to the fashions and habits of mind in which the world indulges. If you do believe at all, believe with all your hearts. If you are convinced that your belief is reasonable, do not allow anything whatever to interfere with its hold upon your soul. Give yourselves up to that belief, plunge in it, swim in it, bask in it, drink of it, feed yourselves on it, delight in it, explore it, understand it, let it be the penetrating principle of guidance in your whole life. Then, indeed, your happiness will be complete. It was for an assured peace that our Lord gave us His message: "These things have I spoken unto you, that My joy might remain in you, and that your joy might be full." "Now come I to Thee; and these things I speak in the world, that they might have My joy fulfilled in themselves."

Do not suppose, again, that this flower of your faith will come to you without repentance, or while sin is an accepted guest in your heart. Repentance must be deep and conscientious in the beginning, and renewed from day to day and from season to season. Human nature is never perfect on this side the grave. We are often betrayed into inconsistencies that mar our peace. If we are self-satisfied, not only shall we make no progress, but the real unutterable spiritual tranquillity can never be ours. "As sunshine seems brightest after rain, and calm is most welcome after storm; as pearls are fetched from deep waters, and gold is dug from far down in the mines; so joy is never so real or welcome as after sorrow; the truest joy is that poured into a broken heart." "Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean; wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow. Make me to hear joy and gladness, that the bones which Thou hast broken may rejoice. Hide Thy face from my sins, and blot out all mine iniquities. Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me. Cast me not away from Thy presence, and take not Thy Holy Spirit from me. Restore unto me the joy of Thy salvation and uphold me with Thy free Spirit." "The highest joy of the Christian almost always comes through suffering: no flower can bloom in Paradise which is not transplanted from Gethsemane; no one can taste of the fruit of the tree of life that has not tasted of the fruits of the tree of Calvary; the crown is after the Cross."

My brothers, when once you have this quiet, well-founded sense of spiritual tranquillity and imperishable satisfaction in God's Divine presence and grace, there are many things which will seem sad to you, but they will not be able to destroy your peace. "As sorrowful," St. Paul described himself, "yet always rejoicing." "A good man has more sorrows than the wicked are aware of: his own offences, the sins of others, the dishonour of God, the prevalence of Satan's kingdom, and the present misery of his subjects. When the profane man pours out his blasphemies, the good man cannot help the tear rising, and is petitioning Heaven for his pardon. But he has one joy to strengthen him against all his sorrows, and that is, the truth of God's promises. "Spiritual joy is like the light of the sun, which though it may for a time be overcast with clouds of temptations, mists of troubles, persecutions, and darkness of melancholy, yet it ordinarily breaks out again with more sweetness and splendour when the storm is over. In any case, it has ever the Sun of Righteousness and Fountain of all comfort so rooted and resident in the heart that not all the darkness and gates of hell shall ever be able to displace or straiten it, no more than a mortal man can pull the sun out of his sphere, or put out his glorious eye."

Dear brothers, it is this feeling of spiritual joy that I want you all to cultivate, at all times. Have you received this gracious fruit of the Spirit? Is your joy the pleasure of seeing a brilliant drama, or eating a tasteful meal, or looking on a beautiful face or object, or any worldly and physical sensation whatever? Real joy is as sacred and Divine a thing as there is. You know that it is true that we may, if we choose, begin to enter on our inheritance of eternal things now, here, in this life. Especially is this the case with this Divine gift of the gladness of the soul. Do not rest content with any mere small, finite, temporal thing, and call that joy; it is some mere passing earthly elevation of spirits. That is merely a selfish impression. That is not connected with any feeling of regret for our imperfection, as true joy must ever be. In true joy there can be no selfishness. It is the delight that comes from consciousness of the nearness of God, consciousness of love to Him, consciousness of sin forgiven, consciousness of living for the good of our brothers and sisters of the human family. True joy, being founded itself on the chastening of repentance and the acknowledgment of sin, will make you feel all the more tenderly and really the awful sufferings and sorrows of others. If your joy at the assurance that God has actually chosen you does not, by its very presence and fulness in your heart, make it more kindly and sympathetic, then you may know it quite well for the poor worthless kind of joy, the joy that is of the world, and passeth away. Let your joy lead you continually to the simple thanksgiving of the Lord's Supper, where, above all other places and times, you are impressed with the reality of your human brotherhood. And when you are at that joyous feast, do not go as a duty, a task, a performance. Go, because God has sent you His light and His truth! Go, because He has shown you both your failures and your hopes; because He has given you an understanding of the right way; because He has put into your hearts love for Him, the One and the True, and love for your fellows. Go, because you find in Him your exceeding great reward!

THE MASTER OF KING'S HAVEN.

A SKETCH.

BY C. E. C. WEIGALL, AUTHOR OF "THE TEMPTATION OF DULCE CARRUTHERS," "A ROMANCE OF MAN," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER I.

HERE was a Dorcas Meeting going on at Sandhaven Vicarage, and on those occasions Mrs. Broadhurst, the vicar's wife, was decidedly in her element. It was a hot day, and the July sun was glaring down on the bright geranium-beds and the cool lily-stems with which the old-fashioned garden was set.

But the study was cool enough, with its green blinds and big open windows; and Mrs. Broadhurst, in her brown holland dress, was cutting out striped shirts with a large pair of scissors and an energy which knew no beginning and no end.

The members of the Dorcas Meeting were few in number, and consisted of Amelia Broadhurst, a pale, lanky girl, with a timid manner; the squire's wife, Mrs. Hawke, and her two handsome, fashionable daughters; Mrs. Seddon, the doctor's wife; the village schoolmistress, and Miss Lettice Fontaine.

"One, two, three, four inches, hem and gusset, and I can really get the collar out of this piece. Really, I do flatter myself that I am pretty good at cutting out and planning," said Mrs. Broadhurst, with a little nod of triumph, as she rent a piece of shirting in halves with an energy that set everyone's teeth on edge save her own.

"And that reminds me that I have an interesting piece of news for you."

Amy and Florrie Hawke looked up from their dilettante sewing with a sudden expression of interest. The Dorcas Meeting was an intensely dull affair to them, which would have been absolutely impossible had there been anything better to do in Sandhaven.

But as Sandhaven was intensely dull in July, and times had been too bad to allow of their usual trip to Scotland, a Dorcas Meeting and a chance of a little gossip was better than nothing.

Miss Lettice Fontaine looked up from her diligent stitching, and smiled a little to herself; Mrs. Broadhurst so often had an interesting piece of news to impart, which quite as often proved absolutely uninteresting.

When she smiled, it was evident that Miss Lettice must have once been a very pretty woman.

She was faded now, and her face, with its tremulously sweet expression, looked quite its five-and-forty years, while her brown soft hair, which still lay so prettily on her low white forehead, was streaked here and there with grey. In fact, she was one of those members of society whom the world unites in faintly ridiculing—a poverty-stricken old maid.

Florrie and Amy Hawke, in all the pride of their youth and good looks, did occasionally deign to speak to her, and Mrs. Hawke now and again asked her up to the Hall to afternoon tea; for Miss Lettice was well-born, and her family had owned half a county when the Hawkes had been tillers of the soil.

But the family had ended in her, after a career that had gradually tended downwards, and with her the Fontaines would die out, unmissed and unmourned.

"For goodness' sake let's hear the news, Mrs. Broadhurst!" cried Florrie Hawke, as she leaned her handsome head forward, and arranged the folds of her pink muslin gown with her pretty white hand.

The vicar's wife looked round keenly, to see that everyone was on the tiptoe of expectation. Then she said emphatically, "King's Haven is taken at last. The vicar saw Mr. Lea this morning, and he said that Sir Anthony Vesey was coming in at once, and had already sent some of his boxes down."

"Oh, but how interesting!" cried the Hawke girls in one breath. "Is he married?"

"No, my loves," said Mrs. Broadhurst, with a faint touch of malice in her sharp voice. "There is a good chance for you. He is only about six- or seven-and-forty, quite good-looking still, and absolutely rolling in money."

"Do you know if Sir Anthony was in the army?" said Miss Lettice suddenly. Her face had flushed a little, and the hand that held the stiff wristband trembled nervously.

"Don't know, I'm sure," said Mrs. Broadhurst curtly. "Did you ever see him?"

It was so absolutely improbable that Miss Lettice had ever seen the interesting baronet that she asked the question more out of faint malice than any real kindness.

"I—I used to know him very well when I was young," said Miss Lettice simply; but even the Hawke girls, with their sharp eyes, could not detect the slightest change on her mobile face—never even guessed that in that name lay the one romance of Miss Lettice's grey, uninteresting life.

There was a little desultory conversation after this; a few questions asked, a few conjectures made, and the Dorcas Meeting broke up, still discussing the interesting topic of King's Haven.

"My dears," said Mrs. Hawke, as she walked meditating homewards, "you must really have some new gowns. I will get your father to squeeze some money out of somewhere, and write to Elise. Then we must, of course, ask Sir Anthony to dinner."

She looked swiftly at her two handsome girls, both dark and rich in colouring, and straight as young saplings. They would either of them make a very good Lady Vesey, and she only hoped that their strong wills would not clash over the desired prey. She was a little nervous, but she hoped for the best.

When Miss Lettice had folded up her work, and had said good-bye to the vicar's wife, and had paused to ask the schoolmistress after her sick baby, she too went homewards, with a heart in which memory had stirred some sleeping sadness.

Her way led her past King's Haven, and she paused for an instant at the big gates, and looked up the smooth gravel sweep, past the close-shaven grass-plot and the sun-dial and the stone balustrades, where the brilliant peacocks were sunning themselves, to the beautiful Elizabethan house, with its oriel windows and its stately walls.

Was Sir Anthony there already? and what had made him come to this out-of-the-way sea-side village, famous only for the beauty of its sea-line and the majesty of its rocky coast?

It would be strange to see him again, and stranger still to watch him unknown; for she would never reveal her identity to him—never let him know that she was the same Letty from whom he had parted long years ago, as a penniless subaltern, with bitter tears.

So much had passed since then. The father who had forbidden the young lovers to correspond was dead, and the old home long passed into the hands of strangers. But Miss Lettice's heart still beat a little faster as she remembered the boyish, handsome face, and the parting in the cold grey mist of a November morning, when India had seemed the very ultima thule of the world, and their own hearts were full almost to breaking.

"What a goose I am, after all!" said Miss Lettice impatiently, as she turned away from King's Haven and trotted homewards.

Miss Fontaine's home was a four-roomed cottage of red brick, with a mass of roses against the windows and a green plot of garden in front, set thick with asters and mignonette.

She paused as she walked up the miniature pathway to sniff at the bush of lavender, which she had brought as a sprig from her old home, and which had taken root and been the foundation of hundreds of bags of lavender in as many linen-presses in Sandhaven.
